The word "conceal," in Code 1886, § 3835, providing that any person who, for the purpose of hindering, etc., any person having a lawful claim, etc., hides, receives, or conceals any property with knowledge of the existence of such claim, must on conviction be punished, etc., is employed in its primary sense—to hide from sight or observation, to secrete, to cover. It implies some act done or procured to be done which is intended to prevent or hinder the discovery of the thing searched for. A mere failure or refusal to give information is not enough. Thomas v. State, 9 South. 540, 541, 92 Ala. 49.

Under a statute authorizing an attachment in case defendant has concealed his goods and effects with intent to defraud his creditors, where defendant sold his goods and concealed the fact of the sale and the money received therefor, an instruction that the statute means secreting goods, and not concealment of circumstances or misrepresentation of facts, and that this last-mentioned conduct is no ground for issuing an attachment, was error. If defendant packed away in his cellar goods to the value of $1,000 with the view of defrauding his creditors and prevent them from collecting their debts, this is construed to be a fraud, within the meaning of the statute, and, if he sells the same goods and puts the money in his pocket with the same intent of cheating his creditors by the operation, it is regarded by such instruction as a mere concealment of circumstances, and therefore not such a concealment as is urged by the attachment law. The statute uses the phrase "goods and effects"; but money for which the goods were sold was as capable of being concealed as the goods were, and the concealment of the money is surely not less a fraud because it was accompanied by a concealment and misrepresentation of facts and circumstances. Powell v. Matthews, 10 Mo. 49, 50, 53.

Resistance of officer.

A party who resists an officer of the customs seizing goods as wrongfully imported is not guilty of a concealment of the goods, within Collection Act March 2, 1799, c. 128. United States v. Farnsworth (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1048, 1049.

As secretion.

In a warrant of attachment based on the ground that defendant fraudulently concealed his property, the word "conceal" is equivalent to the word "secrete," and hence the warrant was not insufficient as not complying with the statute authorizing the issuance of a warrant where the defendant fraudulently secretes his property. Jurgens v. Tum Suden, 52 N. Y. Supp. 662, 663, 32 App. Div. 1.

Civ. Code, § 221, subsec. 5, providing that the plaintiff may have an attachment against the property of the defendant if the defendant conceals himself to avoid the service of summons, involves the intention on the part of a debtor to delay or to prevent creditors from enforcing their demands in the ordinary modes prescribed by law, which he may accomplish by secreting himself in his own house or on his own premises, or by departing secretly from the place of his abode to a more secure spot either in or out of the county of his residence. Dunn v. Salter, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 342, 345.

An attachment statute provided that an attachment might be issued if the debtor conceals himself or stands in defiance of an officer so that process cannot be served on him. Held, that the statute comprehends two classes of debtors in contradistinction—the debtor who conceals himself so that process cannot be served on him, and the debtor who stands in defiance of an officer so that process cannot be served; and hence "concealment," as so used, was not limited to an act which follows or is attended with an attempted service of process, but it included any person leaving a place to "avoid service, and requesting false information to be given as to his movements, or placing himself in such a position that he was not accessible to his creditors." North v. McDonald (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 332, 333.

Silence or inaction.

"Conceals," as used in Rev. St. c. 81, § 107, providing that, if any person liable to an action fraudulently conceals the cause of such action from the person entitled thereto, the action may be commenced at any time within six years after the person entitled thereto discovers that he has a just cause of action, should be construed to include the withholding from a plaintiff all knowledge of the falsity of representations concerning the relation of debtor and creditor, then subsisting between defendant and the plaintiff's creditor. There was no corporeal thing to be concealed, but simply a mental one, and knowledge of the fact of a perjury. "The word 'conceal,' according to the best lexicographers, signifies to withhold or keep secret mental facts from another's knowledge, as well as to hide or secrete visible objects from sight or observation. Viewed in the former sense of this word, the defendant's conduct clearly amounted to a concealment of the cause of action; he falsified the facts in the case and concealed the knowledge that he had done so." Geery v. Dunham, 57 Me. 334, 338.

"Conceal," as used in Pen. Code, § 32, providing that all persons who, after full knowledge that a felony has been committed, conceal it from a magistrate, means more than a simple withholding of knowledge possessed by a party that a felony has been committed, but includes the element of some affirmative act on the part of the person tending to or looking towards the concealment of the commission of the felony. Mere silence is not sufficient. People v. Garnett, 61 Pac. 1114, 1115, 120 Cal. 364.

"Concealment of a will," within the meaning of the law affecting the running of limitations, means something more than mere silence or inaction. There must be some act, arrangement, or contrivance of an affirmative character, where the purpose or design is to prevent its discovery. Fox v. Fee, 60 N. E. 281, 282, 167 N. Y. 44.

Fraud of a secret nature in a particular case, conceived and executed on such a plan as to secure continued secrecy without further acts of concealment except silence, will constitute a "concealment," within the meaning of the statute of limitation of actions.

In such case it may be said to be a continuous concealment. The making of a fraudulent deed, and the keeping of it off record by all the persons concerned, combined with their purposed silence, is a concealment within the meaning of such statute. McAlpine v. Hedges (U. S.) 21 Fed. 681, 690.

"Conceals," as used in Rev. St. c. 185, § 8, as amended by Laws 1843, c. 35, authorizing the arrest of a debtor who conceals his property so that no attachment or levy can be made, implies something done to prevent the attachment or seizure of the property concealed. One who did not change the condition of his watch or a sum of money, but merely carried them about on his person in the usual manner, as he had been accustomed to do before he anticipated any attachment, did not conceal them. Clement v. Dudley, 42 N. H. 367, 368.

"Concealment," within the meaning of the statute of limitations in reference to a concealment which will suspend the running of the statute of limitations, does not include the mere nonuser of all corporate powers. City of Ft. Scott v. Schulenberg, 22 Kan. 648, 656.

The concealment of a fraud which is sufficient to prevent the running of the statute is not established by mere silence. There must be some trick or contrivance intended to exclude suspicion and prevent inquiry. Shelby County v. Bragg, 135 Mo. 291, 36 S. W. 600. The concealment contemplated by the statute must be something more than mere silence. It must be of an affirmative character, and must be alleged and proved so as to bring the case clearly within the meaning of the statute. Callan v. Callan 74 S. W. 965, 969, 175 Mo. 346 (citing Ware v. Galveston City Co., 146 U. S. 102, 116, 13 Sup. Ct. 33, 38 L. Ed. 904).

CONCEALED WEAPONS.

As to what constitutes about the person, see "About the Person."

As to what constitutes a weapon, see "Weapon."

Carrying Concealed Weapons, see "Carry."

To "conceal," as the word is defined by lexicographers, according to the common and approved usage of language, and therefore in the proper meaning of the statute against carrying concealed weapons, is to hide, secrete, screen, cover. Williams v. Commonwealth, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 663, 664, 37 S. W. 680.

The statute which makes it an indictable offense for a person, except on his own premises, "to carry concealed about his person any pistol or other deadly weapon," is not violated by one who carried a pistol buckled around him without scabbard and naked, in a belt on the outside of his clothing. To constitute the offense there must be a concealment. When the proof shows there is no concealment, there is no violation of the statute. It would be a contradiction in terms to hold that the person conceals that which he carries about him openly and to the view of everybody. State v. Roten, 86 N. C. 701, 703.

A carrying of concealed weapons, within the meaning of a statute making such act criminal, is not shown by evidence that defendant borrowed a revolver and carried it on the street in his hand. Ridenour v. State, 65 Ind. 411, 412.

A person who, in the room of another, in which there are two or three other persons, bears in his vest pocket a pistol, willingly or knowingly kept from sight without any of the excuses therefor recognized by law, is guilty of carrying a concealed weapon, within the meaning of the statute imposing a penalty on any one who carried, concealed about his person, a pistol or other description of firearm. Owen v. State, 31 Ala. 387, 389.

Code, § 4527, making it a misdemeanor to carry a concealed weapon, does not mean only a weapon concealed in the clothing of the accused, but embraces any means by which a weapon is carried about concealed; not for the purpose of transportation alone; and so one carrying a pistol in a covered basket was guilty under the statute. Boles v. State, 12 S. E. 361, 362, 86 Ga. 255.

Code, § 4109, prohibiting carrying deadly weapons "concealed about the person" means "that the weapon is so connected with the person that the locomotion of the person will carry the weapon with him. The practice the Legislature intended to interdict was the facility it furnishes for the prompt use of a deadly weapon so concealed as to give no notice of its presence, yet so accessible as to afford immediate use when wanted." So where a person, while riding on horseback, had a pistol in his saddle bags, it was not concealed about the person, within the meaning of the statute. Cunningham v. State, 76 Ala. 88.

As not fully exposed to view.

A weapon is concealed, within the meaning of statutes prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons, if it is so carried that it is not left in full, open view. State v. Smith, 11 La. Ann. 633, 634, 66 Am. Dec. 208; Washington v. State, 36 Ga. 242, 245.

"Concealed" ordinarily means 'hidden,' and therefore one might be correct in saying that, if a thing is not hidden or is visible, it is not concealed; but, as used in statutes prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons, a partial concealment is a violation of the statute, and any weapon not fully exposed is regarded as concealed." State v. Blas, 37 La. Ann. 259, 260.

The carrying of concealed weapons, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting such carrying, imports the carrying of a pistol in such a manner that it cannot be seen and easily recognized as a pistol, even though it is partially exposed. Killet v. State, 32 Ga. 292.

As hidden from ordinary observation.

To constitute concealment, within the meaning of the statutes in reference to carrying concealed weapons, it is not necessary that the weapon may be seen from without by inspection or examination more or less close. It is sufficient if it is hidden from ordinary observation. Jones v. State, 51 Ala. 16. The general question is, was the weapon open to the ordinary observation of persons coming in contact, in the usual associations of life, with the person carrying it? Smith v. State, 11 South. 71, 96 Ala. 66. The word "concealed" cannot be properly used to characterize a carrying of a pistol unless it is so carried as not to be discernible by ordinary observation. Ramsey v. State, 8 South. 568, 91 Ala. 29; State v. Johnson, 16 S. C. 187, 189. It is not necessary that it should be completely or entirely hidden. State v. Johnson, 16 S. C. 187, 189.

To constitute the offense of carrying a concealed weapon, it must be worn or carried so that persons near enough to see it, if it was not concealed, cannot see it. Street v. State, 67 Ala. 87, 88.

The statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons does not mean or import that no part of the weapons should be concealed, but the offense is only committed when the weapon is so concealed that it is impossible for one approaching in view of the person carrying the weapon to see any part of it. All that the Legislature meant when it prohibited the carrying of concealed weapons was to compel persons to so wear them that others who might come in contact with them might see that they were armed and dangerous persons, who were to be avoided in consequence, for, if it should be required that no part of the weapon should be concealed, the statute would amount to an infringement of the constitutional right of citizens to have and bear arms, since it would be impossible for one to have and bear about his person a pistol or weapon of any kind without having some part of it concealed. Stockdale v. State, 32 Ga. 225, 227.

CONCEALING STOLEN PROPERTY.

"Conceal," as used in Gen. St. c. 371, § 12, making it an offense to receive and conceal stolen goods, is not used in a technical sense, but includes all acts done which render the discovery and identification of the property more difficult. State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 429, 442.

Receiving or concealing stolen property on separate occasions constitute distinct offenses, and cannot be prosecuted as one crime, though all the property be thereafter found in the possession of the defendant at one time and place; and in such case a conviction for a felony based on the aggregate value of all the property cannot be sustained when the value of that received or stolen on each of such occasions is less than $35. Smith v. State, 52 N. E. 826, 828, 59 Ohio St. 350.

CONCEDER.

The French word "conceder" means to grant. Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 410, 428, note, 9 L. Ed. 1137.

CONCEIVE.

"Conceive" is often used to signify to think; to understand; to have a complete idea of, as it is to imagine; to fancy; and therefore an instruction as to defendant's conduct in a negligence case, "We must compare his conduct with what we may conceive careful men would have done under similar circumstances," is not erroneous as permitting the jury to imagine or fancy what reasonable men would have done. Hays v. Paul, 51 Pa. (1 P. F. Smith) 134, 143, 88 Am. Dec. 569.

CONCENTRATED COMMERCIAL FEEDING STUFF.

The term "concentrated commercial feeding stuff" shall include linseed meals, cottonseed meals, pea meals, cocoanut meals, gluten meals, gluten feeds, maize feeds, starch feeds, sugar feeds, dried brewers' grains, malt sprouts, hominy feeds, cerealine feeds, rice meals, oat feeds, corn and oat chop, corn and oat feeds, ground beef or fish scraps, mixed feeds, provenders, bran, middlings, and mixed feeds made wholly or in part from wheat, rye, or buckwheat, and all materials of a similar nature, but shall not include hays and straws, the whole seeds nor the unmixed meals made directly from the seed of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, or broom corn, nor feed ground from whole grain and sold directly from manufacturer to consumer. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 4591.

CONCENTRATED MOLASSES.

"Concentrated molasses is melado or syrup boiled down to a denser consistency, and is manufactured by boiling down the melado, and thus evaporating the watery portions until the point of crystallization is reached." Belcher v. Linn, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 508, 519, 16 L. Ed. 754.

CONCENTRATING POINT.

"Concentrating point," as used in a libel for damages caused by a collision of vessels at sea, means that vessels going to and from Great Britain, Ireland, and various parts of the United States of America cross at a certain line in the ocean. It is probable that the place of meeting would be somewhere in that locality. The Europa, 2 U. S. Law Mag. 497, 499.

CONCERN.

See "Private Concern."

Arising concerning vessels, see "Arise—Arising."

8 & 9 Vict. c. 87, § 46, punishing every person who shall unship or assist or "be otherwise concerned in the unshipping of any goods which are prohibited to be imported," applies to the owner of a vessel who knowingly lets his vessel, that it may be employed in a smuggling adventure, the cargo of which was unshipped without the duty being paid. Attorney General v. Robson, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 405, 406.

As affecting.

Rev. Code 1855, p. 1221, art. 4, § 3, declares that suits concerning real estate, or whereby the same may be affected, shall be brought in the county within which the real estate or some part of it is situate. Held, that the phrase "action concerning real estate" was not limited in its application to actions real, as distinguished from actions personal, so as to exclude from the meaning of the provision actions to enforce contracts relating to real estate, but includes all actions which in any manner affect real property. Ensworth v. Holly, 33 Mo. 370, 372.

Rev. St. § 566, providing that a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction relating to any matter of contract or tort arising on or concerning any vessel of 20 tons' burden or upwards, shall be tried by a jury when either party requires it, includes both the vessel receiving the injury in a collision and also the vessel doing the injury, since the cause of action arises and concerns one of the vessels as much as the other, and it is no more important to the injured that she should recover her damages than it is to the other vessel that she should not be compelled to pay them; and hence either party is entitled to demand a trial by jury. The Erie Bell (U. S.) 20 Fed. 63.

The general principle is that if a covenant relate to the mode of enjoying the leased lands, whether for the benefit of the reversion, or of other lands of the lessor, or of a business conducted elsewhere by him, it is a covenant which, in the language of the old cases, "touches" or "concerns" the demised premises. American Strawboard Co. v. Haldeman Paper Co. (U. S.) 83 Fed. 619, 625, 27 C. C. A. 634.

As directly involved.

Const. art. 6, § 2, giving the Supreme Court of Appeals jurisdiction of controversies concerning the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls and taxes gives the right of appeal only in a direct proceeding; and in a case where the right of a corporation to levy tolls is not questioned, but it is claimed that the right does not authorize the levy under the particular facts as shown by the defendant in the case, the only matter in controversy is the amount of the tolls, and not the right to levy tolls. Though the right to levy under the special facts shown in the record is drawn in question incidentally and collaterally, the direct purpose of the action is the recovery of a specific amount in money. Miller v. Little Kanawha Nav. Co., 32 W. Va. 46, 51, 9 S. E. 57.

A policy providing that a loss thereunder should not be payable until the assured produced a certificate of loss of a magistrate "not concerned in the loss as a creditor" meant a magistrate who was not concerned in the loss by reason of having an interest in the property insured, or in the policy as security for an obligation, and does not disqualify a magistrate from acting who was merely a general creditor of the assured. Dolliver v. St. Joseph Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 39, 45.

Under the statute giving a court appellate jurisdiction in civil cases in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, an action of trespass is not an action concerning the title or boundaries of land, though in such action the title may be disputed. Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87, 88.

The phrase "concerning the title to land," in the clause to the statute of frauds, requiring all agreements concerning the title to lands to be in writing, does not include an agreement to remove a fence so as to open a road to its original width. Talmadge v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 493-498.

As engage in or take part.

In the statute making it an offense for any officer of the United States to directly or indirectly solicit or receive, or be in manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment for any political purpose (Act Jan. 16, 1883, § 11), the expression "being concerned in" is not a general term or conclusion which needs a specification of facts for completeness of description. It is a colloquial expression equivalent to "be engaged in" or "taking part in," and sufficiently informs the accused of what the government intends to prove. United States v. Scott (U. S.) 74 Fed. 213, 217.

In Dig. c. 52, § 72, providing that, where two persons are concerned in the commission of an offense, each may be sworn, and his testimony shall not be used against him in a criminal prosecution for the same offense, the word "concerned" is used in the sense of the word "participants." State v. Bach Liquor Co., 55 S. W. 854, 856, 67 Ark. 163.

The term "concerned in interest," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to be concerned in interest in the keeping of a table of a like kind as faro, keno, etc., does not apply to a person who does not take part in the game, but furnishes the room and guests in which poker is played, from which he receives a moderate compensation from the persons playing. Nuckolls v. Commonwealth (Va.) 32 Grat. 884, 885.

When one opens an office and makes arrangements and furnishes facilities to enable his customers to sit in his office and gamble upon the results of horse racing, he keeps a place for the purpose of carrying on gambling on the result of a trial of speed, contrary to the statute, and, if he knowingly assists in making the transmission of money in the course of that business, he is "concerned" in the business. State v. Harbourn, 40 Atl. 179, 182, 70 Conn. 484, 40 L. R. A. 607, 66 Am. St. Rep. 126.

As interested in.

In a statute relating to the probate of wills, and providing that, if any person interested shall appear within three years after the probate of any such will, then an issue shall be made whether the writing produced is the will of the testator, but, if no such person shall appear within the time aforesaid, the probate shall be conclusive on all parties concerned, the words "parties concerned" mean those on whom the law imposes the duty of settling the estate. McDonald v. White, 22 N. E. 599, 600, 130 Ill. 493.

Revision, p. 708, § 32, providing that the record of an assignment of a mortgage is notice, from the time the assignment is left for record, to all persons concerned, that the mortgage is assigned, does not mean only those concerned at the time of the placing of an assignment on record, but should be construed to include a subsequent assignee of the mortgagee. Mott v. Newark German Hospital, 37 Atl. 757, 762, 55 N. J. Eq. 722.

A deputy county treasurer becomes "concerned" in a tax sale, within the meaning of Code 1873, § 885, which provides that a tax sale shall be invalid if any county treasurer or officers be either directly or indirectly concerned in the purchase of land sold for taxes, if he request a third person to attend the tax sale and bid in the property in behalf of the deputy's minor son, and, after the person so requested has bid in the land, pays the purchase price in the son's behalf, and procures an assignment of the certificate of sale to the son. Kirk v. St. Thomas' Church, 30 N. W. 569, 570, 70 Iowa, 287.

As relating or pertaining to.

An allegation of libel, that the words were used "of and concerning" different matters alleged to be libelous, should not be construed to mean that the libel is stated to be of and concerning all of such matters, so that it would be necessary to prove a libel relating specifically to every one of the matters alleged, and that there would be a failure of proof if such was not the case, but the words only require that plaintiff prove the libel relating to those matters so far as they are concerned with the libel, in respect either to the particular defamatory character ascribed to it in the declaration, or of the manner in which it is afterwards set out. May v. Brown, 3 B. & C. 113, 137.

"Concerning," as used in Rev. St. § 3894, making it a crime to deposit in a post office a letter concerning a lottery, signifies pertaining to; having relation to. It does not conflict with this interpretation to concede that a letter pertaining to or having relation to a lottery might under some circumstances be deposited in the mail, and yet no crime be thereby committed. Such circumstances, however, would simply constitute a case manifestly outside of the intent of Congress as shown in the section, and which, therefore, the courts would hold to be exceptional. United States v. Fulkerson (U. S.) 74 Fed. 631, 632.

In Rev. St. § 3849, providing that no letters or circulars concerning lotteries shall be carried in the mail, the word "concerning" was not intended to be used in its broadest sense, as meaning pertaining to or relative to, as such a construction would include every letter of which the enterprise mentioned comprised the subject of the letter, and would condemn a letter seeking legal advice or written for the purpose of suppressing the lottery business, and even correspondence carried on between officers and the general post-office department in regard to such letters. The words should be construed only as meaning such letters and circulars as are sent out for the purpose of advertising lottery schemes and those of like import. Commerford v. Thompson (U. S.) 1 Fed. 417, 420.

CONCERNS AND ACCOUNTS.

See "Fiscal Concerns."

A commission merchant accepted certain orders, and agreed in writing to "account with the said B., and to pay to him, or order, any balance which may eventually be due on settling my concerns and accounts with M.

and H." Held, that words "concerns and accounts" were mercantile terms having an appropriate technical import, and, as used with the acceptance, meaning merchandise on consignment—nothing more or less than the business incident to a sale of consigned goods—and could not include any other right or interest, and such as are incidental to the sale on commission of the goods in relation to which the orders were drawn and accepted. Bruce v. Burdet, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 80, 82.

CONCERT.

"Concert," as defined by Webster, means "agreement in a design or plan; union formed by mutual communication of opinions and views." Dauids v. People, 61 N. E. 537, 540, 192 Ill. 176.

"Concert," as used in an ordinance forbidding concerts in the place operated under a license to sell liquors, unless a fee is paid, means a public performance of music in which several singers or instrumentalists are both participating, or a public performance of music intended to secure patrons for the saloon. A song or performance not intended to draw or secure an audience does not violate the ordinance. City of Buffalo v. Smith, 28 N. Y. Supp. 690, 691, 8 Misc. Rep. 348.

CONCESSI.

The words "dedi, concessi, and demisi," when used in a conveyance of real estate, at common law imported a covenant in law. Kenney v. Watts (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 38, 40.

At common law, a covenant for title was implied from the word "concessi" in a lease or grant for years. Koch v. Hustis, 87 N. W. 834, 835, 113 Wis. 599.

The use of the word "concessi," in a grant for years, at common law, imported a warranty of title. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541 (citing Coke's Littleton 384a).

The word "concessi" in a lease implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Gallup v. Albany Ry. (N. Y.) 7 Lans. 471, 479; Lanigan v. Kille, 97 Pa. 120, 125, 39 Am. Rep. 797.

CONCESSION.

The Latin word "concessio," derived from the operative word in the Latin assurance, heretofore used in England, formerly was employed to designate that species of assurance; and the English word "concession," derived from the Latin word in its ordinary use, is exactly or nearly the equivalent of the word "grant," though the former is not now, in Virginia or West Virginia, generally used, as the latter is, with reference to the conveyance of land or transfer of title, right, or claim thereto. Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 408, 448.

CONCESSION MEAT.

By "concession meat" is meant meat that has remained on hand so long in the cooler that it has become discolored or moldy, or not exactly what would be termed "first-class," but not unfit for use after it has been trimmed, though unfit for sale. When any cooler had such meat, the manager of another cooler would be called in to examine it, and if he believed it to be of such a character he would "concede" to the manager of the cooler having such meat the right or privilege to sell it for a price less than the agreed price as prescribed by the combination of packers. State v. Armour Packing Co., 73 S. W. 645, 650, 173 Mo. 356, 61 L. R. A. 464, 96 Am. St. Rep. 515.

CONCLAMATION.

"Conclamation" means a running together of persons. United States v. Hand (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 103, 104.

CONCLUDE.

The word "concluded," in a treaty which was to take effect when the terms of peace were agreed upon between Great Britain and France, and Great Britain was ready to conclude the same, was construed to mean when the agreement had received its last form by being signed and duly executed by the English minister. "It is this which concludes all agreements, whether made by nations or individuals." Hylton v. Brown (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 1129, 1132.

CONCLUSION.

See "Prosecute to Conclusion."

"Conclusion," as used by a juror in his examination, wherein his opinions were denominated by himself as "conclusions," was not intended to convey the meaning of "conclusiveness," but was only a loose use of the word in the sense of "opinion," having no fixedness or conclusiveness in his mind. Ortwein v. Commonwealth, 76 Pa. 414, 428, 18 Am. Rep. 420.

In Greater New York charter, § 86, providing that, if a riparian owner apply to the land commissioners for a grant of the soil under water, the board of docks shall determine whether it will conflict with the public interests, and report their conclusions, the phrase "report their conclusions" is to be construed as showing that such report is merely advisory, and not in any way conclusive. "The charter was framed by able lawyers, and in legal procedure 'to report their conclusions' has an accepted significance. A referee directed 'to report his conclusions' should report his conclusions of fact, which would show not only the result reached, but the ground which lead to the results. Such a report is always advisory, and not conclusive." People v. Woodruff, 68 N. Y. Supp. 10, 12, 57 App. Div. 273.

Of indictment.

The conclusion to an indictment "is one of its formal parts or divisions. It indicates the power or authority against which the facts charged constitute an offense. For such conclusion it cannot be necessary that any particular words shall be used in the indictment. At common law the conclusion was as to some crimes 'contra formam statuti,' and as to others 'contra pacem et dignitatem regis.'" State v. Waters, 1 Mo. App. 7, 9.

Of trial.

Within the provision that the party taking a bill of exceptions has a right to write them out and send the same to the judge for his signature during the term and within 10 days after the conclusion of the trial (Rev. St. art. 1363), the expression "conclusion of the trial" is held to be after verdict, or after the overruling of motions for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, where the same are filed. Exon v. State, 26 S. W. 1088, 1089, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 461.

CONCLUSION OF FACT.

"Conclusions of fact" are inferences drawn from the subordinate or evidentiary facts. Caywood v. Farrell, 51 N. E. 775, 778, 175 Ill. 480.

CONCLUSION OF LAW.

It may not be possible to formulate a definition that will always describe what is a mere "conclusion of law," so as to distinguish it from a pleadable ultimate fact, or that will define how great an infusion of conclusions of law will be held to enter into the composition of a pleadable fact. Precedent and analogy are the only guides, and in holding one class of inferences as facts to be pleaded, and another as conclusions of law to be avoided, courts may have been often governed more by precedent than by a substantial difference in principle, but it has been quite generally held that the question of negligence in a particular case is one of mingled law and fact; that when we speak of the act as "negligent" or "careless," according to the common use of language, we state, not simply a conclusion of law, but likewise state an ultimate fact inferable from certain other facts not stated. Clark v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 9 N. W. 75, 28 Minn. 69.

Whether a finding is an ultimate fact or a conclusion of law depends upon whether it is reached by natural reasoning or by the application of the artificial rules of law; and where plaintiff's mother owned property which, by proper steps, became the homestead of plaintiff's father and mother, and thereafter the mother died, and the father married again and conveyed the homestead, his wife joining in the conveyance under the name of the first wife, a finding of the court that this conveyance passed the title as against the plaintiff is a conclusion of law. Levins v. Rovegno, 12 Pac. 161, 164, 71 Cal. 273.

An allegation that no valid contract was made is held to be an allegation of a legal conclusion. Sigua Iron Co. v. Vandervort, 30 Atl. 491, 164 Pa. 572.

Fraud.

See "Fraud."

CONCLUSIVE.

See "Final and Conclusive."

Where the court, in instructing a jury, stated that, in order to reach certain conclusions, the evidence should be clear, satisfactory, and conclusive to their minds, the word "conclusive" was not used in its legal sense as possessing weight and force that could not be contradicted, but rather in its common acceptance, in which it means "decisive; putting an end to debate; leading to a conclusion or decision." Hoadley v. Hammond, 19 N. W. 794, 795, 63 Iowa, 599.

"Conclusive," in law, is that of which from its nature the law allows no contradiction or explanation; an inference which the law makes so peremptory that it will not allow it to be overthrown by any contrary proof, however strong. Joslyn v. Rockwell, 13 N. Y. Supp. 311, 317, 59 Hun, 129.

Rev. St. Wis. § 2832, providing that the settlement of an account by an assignee for the benefit of creditors shall be "conclusive," means simply that while the settlement stands unreversed it binds all parties to the proceeding, just as a judgment is conclusive because it binds all parties to the action, but does not prevent a court from vacating a settlement on a proper showing. Commercial Bank v. McAuliffe, 66 N. W. 110, 111, 92 Wis. 242.

The words "final and conclusive," as used in Act 1880, making judgments of the superior courts on appeals from order forming reclamation or swamp-land districts final and conclusive, are synonymous, and mean that the judgment shall be followed by no other proceedings in the same or any other court. Appeal of Bixler, 59 Cal. 550, 556.

"Conclusive," as used in an agreement to argue a case before the judges of the circuit court, and providing that their opinion should be conclusive, means that the decision, when rendered in pursuance of such agreement, terminates the litigation and deprives the parties of their right of appeal. Galbreath v. Colt (Pa.) 4 Yeates, 551, 556.

The word "conclusive," as used in the nineteenth section of the act establishing the orphans' court, Pat. 63, declaring that accounts of the estate shall be conclusive upon all parties cited to a hearing of such accounts, is made use of in contradistinction to the imperfect or inconclusive accounts sometimes formerly made without notice or citation. Burroughs v. Mickle, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 913, 915.

CONCLUSIVE ADMISSION.

An admission by a party in his pleading in an action is evidence tending to prove the same fact in another suit between the same parties, but is not a "conclusive admission," and would have no more force than mere oral admissions, which may be explained or contradicted. Rich v. City of Minneapolis, 40 Minn. 82, 41 N. W. 455, 456.

CONCLUSIVE EVIDENCE.

"Conclusive" or "unanswerable" evidence is that which the law does not permit to be contradicted. For example, the record of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be contradicted by the parties to it. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1837; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 690. See, also, Moore v. Hopkins, 23 Pac. 318, 319, 83 Cal. 270.

"Conclusive evidence" means evidence that is incontrovertible. Wood v. Chapin, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 509, 515, 67 Am. Dec. 62.

"Conclusive evidence" means either a presumption of law, or else evidence so strong as to overbear all other in the case to the contrary." Haupt v. Pohlmann, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 121, 127.

Evidence is sometimes said to be "conclusive" when the law does not permit it to be contradicted, but the word "conclusive," as used in the decisions of the court relating to the character of evidence necessary in cases where it is sought to reform an instrument for fraud or mistake, means that measure or degree of proof which produced in the unprejudiced mind the belief and conviction of the truth of the fact asserted, having in view all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction. West v. West, 57 N. W. 639, 640, 90 Iowa, 41.

If it was the intention of the Legislature that the schedule of rates fixed by the commission should be final and conclusive on the subject, it is difficult to see why they did not use the words "conclusive evidence" instead of the term "sufficient evidence."

53 Fed. 196, 202.

CONCLUSIVE JUDGMENT.

A judgment is not conclusive unless it is a judgment on the merits of the case. A judgment on a dismissal, nonsuit, default, and the like, does not settle the rights of the parties. Flynn v. Gorman, 48 Atl. 797, 22 R. I. 536.

CONCLUSIVE PRESUMPTION OF LAW.

Conclusive presumptions are inferences which the law makes so peremptory that it will not allow them to be overturned by any contrary proof, however strong. Brandt v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1002, 1004, 81 App. Div. 183.

"Conclusive presumptions of law" are rules determining the quantity of evidence requisite for the support of any particular averment. It is not permitted to be overcome by any proof that the fact is otherwise. United States v. Clark, 14 Pac. 288, 290, 5 Utah, 226 (citing Tayl. Ev. vol. 1, p. 85).

CONCLUSIVE PROOF.

In speaking of the meaning of the words "clear and decisive proof," "clear and satisfactory evidence," "clear and convincing evidence," "clear and conclusive proof," and "conclusive proof," the court quotes with approval the statement of Ballinger in his work on Community Property, where it is said that it is not believed that these terms should be considered as going to the length that their general meaning might import, and that it is certainly not required that the proof should be any more than sufficient to satisfy the mind of court or jury that its weight is enough to cause a reasonable person, under all the circumstances, to believe in its sufficiency. Freese v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 73 Pac. 172, 173, 139 Cal. 392.

CONCLUSIVELY.

"Conclusively," as used in an instruction in a slander suit that the law conclusively presumes from the falsity of the words that they were spoken maliciously, "carries with it the idea of finality, and implies necessarily that the presumption is of such a character that no evidence may be considered to rebut it." Smith v. Rodecap, 31 N. E. 479, 5 Ind. App. 78.

A statute authorized a change of venue on the ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had. The court, in construing the same, held that the word "conclusively," as defined by Webster, meant final determination; in a conclusive manner; to end deliberation, doubt, or contest; that which cannot be disputed or contradicted by any other evidence; and hence, as so defined, it requires too high a degree of proof, the statute only being held to require a reasonable probability, or a probable ground to believe or apprehend, that a fair and impartial, or at least a satisfactory, trial could not be had in the county where the suit was brought. Hilliard v. Beattie, 58 N. H. 312.

"Conclusively," when used in reference to a thing as being conclusively proven or shown, means that it follows as the only conclusion that may flow from the facts, and does not mean that there is that actual knowledge which precludes the possibility of error or mistake. Thus it often happens that things universally believed and deemed conclusively established in one age of mankind become to a subsequent generation such palpable absurdities that the difficulty is to imagine how they ever appeared credible. So that an instruction that the defendant's guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but that it does not mean that it shall be conclusively established, is erroneous, since to be established beyond reasonable doubt is to be conclusively established. People v. Stephenson, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1112, 1114, 11 Misc. Rep. 141.

CONCUBINAGE.

Concubinage is a practice of cohabiting without lawful marriage. When a single woman consents to unlawfully cohabit with a man as though the marriage relation existed between them, without any limit as to the duration of such cohabitation, and actually commences such cohabitation in pursuance of such understanding, she becomes his "concubine," or, as is usually expressed in modern times, his "mistress." Henderson v. People, 17 N. E. 68, 72, 124 Ill. 607, 7 Am. St. Rep. 391; State v. Bussey, 50 Pac. 891, 894, 58 Kan. 679.

"The relation which gives rise to the disreputable state of woman indicated by the term 'concubinage' may, like that of marriage, be contracted or assumed in a day as easily as in a year. When a single woman consents to unlawfully cohabit with a man generally, as though the marriage relation existed between them, without any limit as to the duration of such illicit intercourse, and actually commences cohabiting with him in pursuance of that understanding, she becomes his 'concubine,' or, as is usually expressed in modern times, 'his kept mistress,' which amounts to the same thing. So if we hold in this case that when the heartless libertine, by his seductive arts or other means, induces his confiding or intimidated victim, as the case may be, to abandon home and the wholesome restraints of parental authority, to accompany him whithersoever he may see proper to take her, without limit as to time or place, for the purpose of submitting to his licentious embraces, * * * he clearly brings himself within the provision of Crim. Code Ill. § 1, providing for the punishment of a person enticing an unmarried female from her home for the purpose of prostitution or concubinage." Henderson v. People, 17 N. E. 68, 72, 124 Ill. 607, 7 Am. St. Rep. 391.

The gravamen of the offense of concubinage is not simply living in the same house together, but having intercourse with each other as man and wife when there has been no legal marriage. In considering the statute providing that "every person who shall take away any female under the age of 18 years from her father, mother, or guardian for the purpose of prostitution or concubinage," shall be punished, etc., the court said: "The main crime contemplated by this statute is the taking away of a girl from her parents for the purpose of defiling her. After one act of sexual commerce, the happiness and honor of the girl are destroyed; her character is gone; her reputation may be ruined." State v. Overstreet, 23 Pac. 572, 574, 43 Kan. 299; State v. Goodwin, 6 Pac. 899, 901, 33 Kan. 538.

In an act relating to taking away females for the purpose of prostitution or concubinage, "taking for the purpose of concubinage" means for the purpose of cohabiting with her as man and woman in sexual intercourse for any length of time, even for a single night, without the authority of a legal marriage. State v. Gibson, 19 S. W. 980, 981, 111 Mo. 92; State v. Feasel, 74 Mo. 524, 525, 526.

The words "concubinage and prostitution" have no common-law meaning, and, in a statute relative to enticing away females for such purposes, were intended to cover all cases of lewd or illicit intercourse. People v. Cummons, 23 N. W. 215, 56 Mich. 544; People v. Bristol, 23 Mich. 118, 128.

Evidence that defendant took an unmarried female 18 years old away in a wagon to a railway station 16 miles distant, and, there being no train that night, stayed with her in a schoolhouse, and that the next morning she went to a city and stayed till after she was delivered of her child, will not support a conviction for taking her away for the purpose of concubinage, where the female testifies that, though the defendant had intercourse with her, his purpose in taking her away was to hide her disgrace and to shield his son, the father of the child, from prosecution. State v. Gibson, 18 S. W. 1109, 1111, 108 Mo. 575.

Prostitution distinguished.

"Concubinage" is defined as "a species of loose, informal marriage which took place among the ancients, and which is yet in use in some countries." It is distinguished from prostitution, which is defined by Webster as "the act or practice of prostituting or offering the body to an indiscriminate intercourse with men; common lewdness of a female;" and in the legal authorities as the common lewdness of a woman for gain; the act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for hire. The words have this separate meaning in Rev. St. § 3484, prohibiting the abduction of a female under the age of 18 years for the purpose of concubinage or seduction. State v. Gibson, 19 S. W. 980, 981, 111 Mo. 92.

CONCUR.

"Concur" means a consent evidenced in some manner; more active than mere acquiescence or silent submission. Dillon v. Scofield, 9 N. W. 554, 555, 11 Neb. 419.

CONCURRENCE.

"Concurrence," as used in the constitutional provision that the county seat shall not be removed without the concurrence of two-thirds of the voters of the county, is synonymous with "consent," and requires active affirmative action on the part of the voter. Bouldin v. Lockhart, 62 Tenn. (3 Baxt.) 262, 277.

Act 1891, which relates to the powers of street and water commissioners of Jersey City, and provides that, wherever there shall now or hereafter exist any limitation upon the powers conferred upon the board of street and water commissioners by requiring a "concurrence of any separate board" or municipal officer (excepting certain boards), the act shall not be construed as dispensing with such concurrence, relates to the execution of such acts as require a direct approval. It does not apply to the indirect control which the board of finance exercises by virtue of its power to limit appropriations. Board of Finance of Jersey City v. Board of Street & Water Com'rs, 26 Atl. 92, 93, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 230.

CONCURRENCE DELOYALE.

For offenses such as the infringement of trade-marks, wrappers, billheads, signs, etc., the French-speaking nations have a standard name. The term used is "concurrence deloyale," which may be fairly anglicized as a dishonest, treacherous, perfidious rivalry in trade. In the German Imperial Court of Colmar, in 1873, the court said that current jurisprudence understands by "concurrence deloyale" all maneuvers that cause prejudice to the name of a property, to the renown of a merchandise, or to lessening the custom due to rivals in business. O. F. Simmons Medicine Co. v. Mansfield Drug Co., 23 S. W. 165, 177, 98 Tenn. (9 Pickle) 84.

CONCURRENT OR CONCURRING CAUSES.

Causes are "concurrent" when they occupy exactly the same space of time (coincident or contemporaneous), or when they act conjointly and connectedly, co-operating and contributing to produce the accident. Fleming v. Buswell, 57 N. Y. Supp. 230, 232, 39 App. Div. 198.

Where a pipe line neither by its construction nor its operation tended to produce a fire which burned plaintiff's house, it cannot be said to be a "concurring cause" in the result. Behling v. Southwest Pennsylvania Pipe Lines, 23 Atl. 777, 778, 160 Pa. 359, 40 Am. St. Rep. 724.

CONCURRENT COVENANTS.

"Concurrent covenants" are those where mutual conditions are to be performed at the same time. Chouteau v. Rice, 1 Minn. 103, 108 (Gil. 83); Snow v. Johnson, 1 Minn. 48, 52 (Gil. 32); Gray v. Smith (U. S.) 76 Fed. 525, 534. In covenants of this character, if the one party is ready and offers to perform his part of the covenant, and the other refuses or neglects to perform his part, the party who was ready may maintain an action for the breach or default of the other, though it is uncertain which was obliged to do the first act. Snow v. Johnson, 1 Minn. 48, 52 (Gil. 32). Thus in an agreement to sell land for a certain sum of money and certain other land, the covenants to transfer the land are concurrent. The performance by each must be at the same time as that by the other. Gray v. Smith (U. S.) 76 Fed. 525, 534.

Covenants are either "dependent and concurrent," or "mutual and independent." The first depends on the prior performance of some act or condition and until the condition is performed the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. In the second, mutual acts are to be performed at the same time, and if one party is ready and offers to perform his part, and the other neglects or refuses to perform his, he who is ready and offers has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other's, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act. The third sort is where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received for a breach of the covenants in his favor, and it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenant on the part of the plaintiff. Bailey v. White, 3 Ala. 330, 381.

CONCURRENT INSURANCE.

See "All Policies Concurrent."

"Concurrent insurance" is that which to any extent insures the same interest against the same casualty, at the same time, as the primary insurance, on such terms that the insurers would bear proportionately the loss happening within the provisions of both policies. It is this last quality of sharing proportionately in the loss that distinguishes "concurrent insurance," from mere "double insurance." New Jersey Rubber Co. v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., 46 Atl. 777, 778, 64 N. J. Law, 580.

"Concurrent" means acting in conjunction, agreeing in the same act, contributing to the same event or effect; and hence, as used in an insurance policy permitting concurrent insurance, other insurance covering the insured property and other property is within the term "concurrent insurance," since it contributes to the same event or effect. Corkery v. Security Fire Ins. Co., 68 N. W. 792, 794, 99 Iowa, 382.

The term "concurrent insurance," in a fire policy permitting concurrent insurance, "should not be construed to require the later policies to exactly concur in covering all the property, otherwise it should be held that they must also cover all the time. The term includes policies running with the policy in question and sharing its risk, and includes those covering not only a part of the risk in question, but all of it, and more." The definition of lexicographers warrants such inclusion. Take that of Webster: "Concurrent—acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event or effect; co-operating; accompanying; conjoint; associate; concomitant; joint and equal; existing together; and operating on the same objects." Washburn-Halligan Coffee Co. v. Merchants' Brick Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 81 N. W. 707, 709, 110 Iowa, 423, 80 Am. St. Rep. 311.

The insertion in a policy of insurance of $1,000 of the words "total concurrent insurance, four thousand dollars," the policy being on property which was already insured to the amount of $3,000, included the amounts of both policies, and gave the assured no right to secure other insurance without further consent of the company. To be "concurrent," the insurance must operate at the same time, on the same property, and look to the indemnity of the insured in case of its loss or destruction from casualty insured against. The word "concurrent" means, literally, running together, and in the connection here used has the sense of "co-operating; contributing to the same event or effect." East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Blum, 13 S. W. 572, 576, 76 Tex. 653.

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION.Of courts.

"Concurrent jurisdiction" means equal jurisdiction. State v. Sinnott, 35 Atl. 1007, 1008, 89 Me. 41.

"Concurrent" is having the same authority. Such and such courts have concurrent jurisdiction; that is, each has the same jurisdiction. "Concurrent jurisdiction" is that of several different tribunals, each authorized to deal with the same subject-matter. So that, where a probate court has been given concurrent jurisdiction over certain matters, it is authorized to deal with such case in the same manner and to the same degree and with the same jurisdiction as that of the district court. Rogers v. Bonnett, 37 Pac. 1078, 1079, 2 Okl. 553.

"Concurrent jurisdiction" is that jurisdiction exercised by different courts, at the same time, over the same subject-matter, and within the same territory, and wherein litigants may, in the first instance, resort to either court indifferently. Bouv. Law Dict. "Jurisdiction"; Rap. & L., same title. Hence "concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court," as used in Rev. St. 1891, c. 37, § 240, giving city courts concurrent jurisdiction with circuit courts in all civil cases, means equal power and authority with the circuit court to hear and determine all civil and criminal cases, treason and murder excepted, etc. Hercules Iron Works v. Elgin, J. & E. R. Co., 141 Ill. 491, 498, 30 N. E. 1050, 1051.

Of states.

The term "concurrent jurisdiction on the water," used in the acts of Congress providing for the admission of the states of Wisconsin and Minnesota into the Union, refers to the effect of the law of each state within the domain of the other covered by water divided by the boundary line between the two states, as regards persons or things on the water concerned or connected in some way with the use thereof for purposes of navigation. It has no reference to the land under the water, or things of a permanent nature in or over the water. In respect to such matters and rights incident thereto, the jurisdiction of each state on its side of the boundary line is exclusive. Roberts v. Fullerton (Wis.) 93 N. W. 1111.

The words "concurrent jurisdiction" must have been used, in the compact between the federal government, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, in the sense in which they had previously been used and were generally understood. When, therefore, by such compact, it was in effect provided that each such state shall have "concurrent jurisdiction" on that portion of the river St. Croix constituting the boundary line between them, it included the exercise of such legislative powers by each state over the whole river as were consistent with the exercise of similar powers over the same portion of the river by the other states. In other words, by such compact each state secured to itself such concurrent jurisdiction upon the half of the river within the territorial limits of the other state by reducing what would otherwise have been its exclusive jurisdiction upon its own half to mere concurrent jurisdiction. The result is that neither of these states could, as against the other, rightfully assume, or authorize the assumption of, permanent and exclusive occupancy, possession, and control of the entire navigable portion of the river. J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. St. Croix Boom Corp., 38 N. W. 529, 542, 72 Wis. 62, 7 Am. St. Rep. 837.

The definition of "concurrent jurisdiction" given in Keaton L. Co. v. Boom Corp., supra, quoted and approved, and it was held that, as used in relation to the concurrent jurisdiction over the Columbia river by the states of Washington and Oregon, it means "acting in conjunction," and, when applied to the jurisdiction of Oregon to enact penal laws for the Columbia river, it can only mean the power to enact such criminal statutes as are agreed to or acquiesced in by the state of Washington, or as are already in force within its jurisdiction. In re Mattson (U. S.) 69 Fed. 535, 540.

"Jurisdiction," as applied to a state, signifies the authority to declare the power to enforce the law, as well as the territory within which such authority and power may be exercised. The jurisdiction of the state is coextensive with its sovereignty. Therefore, by conferring on Missouri "concurrent jurisdiction" on the river Mississippi, so far as the said river shall form a common boundary to the said state and any other state or states bounded by the same, Congress intended to declare that, subject to the other laws of the United States, transactions occurring anywhere on that river between the two states might lawfully be dealt with by the courts of either according to its laws, and that, where a court of one state assumed jurisdiction in a particular case, the same should be exclusive therein until relinquishment. Sanders v. St. Louis & N. O. Anchor Line, 10 S. W. 595, 597, 97 Mo. 26, 3 L. R. A. 390.

CONCURRENT LEASE.

A concurrent lease is one granted for a term which is to commence before the expiration or other determination of a previous lease of the same premises made to another person, or, in other words, an assignment of a part of the reversion entitling the lessee to all the rents accruing on the previous lease after the date of the lease, and on the remedies as against the tenant under the prior lease as his lessor would have had except for the assignment. Cargill v. Thompson, 59 N. W. 638, 642, 57 Minn. 534.

CONCURRENT LIENS.

Maritime liens are "concurrent" when they are of the same rank, and for supplies or materials or services in preparation for the same voyage, or if they arise on different bottomry bonds to different holders for advances at the same time for the same repairs, and will be discharged pro rata. The J. W. Tucker (U. S.) 20 Fed. 129, 132 (citing The Exeter, 1 C. Rob. 173; The Albion, 1 Hagg. 333; The Desdemona, 1 Swab. 158; The Saracen, 2 Wm. Rob. 458; The Rapid Transit [U. S.] 11 Fed. 322, 334, 335; The Paragon, 1 Ware, 325).

CONCURRENT REMEDIES.

The use of the words "concurrent remedies" in Const. art. 2, § 12, providing that no person shall be proceeded against criminally for felony otherwise than by indictment, and in all other cases offenses shall be prosecuted criminally by indictment or information as concurrent remedies, "manifestly implied a restrictive reference to the information as a known remedy, not less than to the indictment, each within its proper sphere. One or the other must be used in every case." Ex parte Thomas, 10 Mo. App. 24, 25.

"Concurrent," as used in Rev. St. N. Y. tit. 12, c. 8, pt. 3, reciting that it was the intention of the revisers to so extend the action of replevin as to make it a substitute for detinue, and a concurrent remedy in all cases of the unlawful caption or detention of personal property with trespass and trover, does not mean "coextensive." Sinnott v. Felock, 59 N. E. 265, 165 N. Y. 444, 53 L. R. A. 565, 80 Am. St. Rep. 736.

CONCURSO.

"Concurso" is the name of a suit or remedy provided by the Louisiana laws to enable creditors to enforce their claims against an insolvent or failing debtor. Schroeder's Syndics v. Nicholson, 2 La. 350, 355.

CONCUSSION.

"Concussion," as applied to the brain, is a jarring of the brain substance without laceration of its tissue, or with only microscopical laceration. As applied to the spine, if it still be admitted that such a condition may exist, is meant a condition of the spinal cord produced by a violent shock. Maynard v. Oregon R. Co., 72 Pac. 590, 593, 43 Or. 63.

CONDEMN—CONDEMNATION.

Confiscation distinguished, see "Confiscate—Confiscation."

To "damn" or "condemn" is to "deem, think, or judge any one to be guilty, to be criminal; to give judgment or sentence, or doom of guilt; to adjudge or declare the penalty or punishment." Blaufus v. People (N. Y.) 2 Cow. Cr. Rep. 306, 309.

"Condemnation" is defined by Bouvier as "a sentence or judgment, which condemns some one to do, to give, or to pay something, or which declares that his claim or pretensions are unfounded." Lockwood v. Saffold, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 72, 74.

Of land.

The "condemnation" of land is but the appropriation in invitum of the land in the absence of the owner's consent. It is distinguished from "dedication" in that it is compulsory. Venable v. Wabash West Ry. Co., 20 S. W. 493, 498, 112 Mo. 103, 18 L. R. A. 68.

To "condemn" land is to set it apart or expropriate it for public use. It is an apt term in proceedings in court for the final condemnation of land under the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and not such as is used in the exercise of legislative power; and hence the use of the term in an ordinance, declaring that it condemned, appropriated, acquired, and set apart certain land for public use, was an exercise of judicial power. Wulzen v. Board of Sup'rs of City and County of San Francisco, 35 Pac. 353, 356, 101 Cal. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"Condemnation," as used in Act Cong. Aug. 1, 1888, authorizing designated government officers to acquire for the United States by "condemnation" real estate for the erection of public buildings, must be construed to mean condemnation with just compensation, as otherwise the statute would be in conflict with Const. Amend. 5, declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. In re Rugheimer (U. S.) 36 Fed. 369, 372.

Of vessel.

"Condemned," as used in Rev. St. § 4582, providing that the three months' extra wages due to seamen discharged was not to be required where vessels are wrecked or stranded or "condemned" as unfit for service, does not mean condemned by decree of an admiralty court. It means that proceeding known in all ports by which ships which have suffered disaster are condemned or pronounced unfit for service, the common method being by the report of a survey, called by the consul of the nation to which the ship belongs, on the application of the master. Gallagher v. Murray (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 1087.

CONDEMNATION MONEY.

See "Eventual Condemnation Money."

Act Dec. 16, 1811, providing that no injunction shall be sanctioned or granted by any judge of the superior courts of the state until the party requiring the same shall have previously given to the party against whom such injunction is to operate, by application to the clerk of the superior court for that purpose, a bond for the "eventual condemnation money," together with all further costs, means that which the law sentences the party to pay, expressed by the judgment of the court, the legitimate organ of the law. Lockwood v. Saffold, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 72, 73.

"Condemnation money," as used with reference to a recovery on an appeal bond, means damages that should be awarded against the appellant by the judgment of the court. It does not embrace damages not included in the judgment, nor costs, but such damages as have been suffered by the appellee by reason of the appeal. Doe v. Daniels (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 8, 9.

The phrase "condemnation money," as used in a bond obligating the principal and surety to pay the condemnation money and costs if the judgment be affirmed, means money which, by the original judgment, the plaintiff in error, the principal in the bond, is adjudged to pay. Hayes v. Weaver, 55 N. E. 172, 173, 61 Ohio St. 55.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.

As an action, see "Action."

As civil case or suit, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

As special case, see "Special Case."

As special proceeding, see "Special Proceeding."

As suit, see "Suit."

Condemnation proceedings are proceedings in rem, and bind all persons interested in the res, though not technically parties to the proceeding. All questions of title to the res are transferred to the money awarded after a valid condemnation. Gardiner v. City of Baltimore, 54 Atl. 85, 87, 96 Md. 361.

Mortgage as, see "Mortgage."

Other conditions, see "Other."

In its more extended sense, the word "condition" signifies a clause in a contract or agreement which has for its object the suspension, rescission, or modification of the principal obligation, or, in case of a will, to suspend, revoke, or modify the devise or bequest. Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 309;

Elyton Land Co. v. South & North Alabama R. Co. (Ala.) 14 South. 207, 208.

The word "condition" is defined by Mr. Webster to mean "the mode or state of being; state or situation with regard to external circumstances; essential quality; property; attribute." Under an ordinance requiring a street railway company to keep the portions of streets between its railway tracks and two feet on each side thereof in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the streets, it is the duty of the company to pave the portions of streets between its said tracks, and two feet on each side thereof, when the city paves the balance of the streets. For when the city paves, if the company decline so to do, it cannot be said that it keeps the parts of the streets in question in as good condition, or in as good state of being or essential quality, as the city keeps the balance. In order to meet this obligation, the company must also pave. State v. Jacksonville St. R. Co., 29 Fla. 590, 613, 10 South. 590, 596 (quoting Webster, Dict.).

"A condition is a qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance of lands, whereby it is provided that in case a particular event does or does not happen, or in case the grantor or grantees do or omit to do a particular act, an estate shall commence, be enlarged, or be defeated." Heaston v. Randolph County Com'rs, 20 Ind. 398, 402; Johnson v. Gurley, 52 Tex. 222, 226; Thornton v. Trammell, 39 Ga. 202, 207; Laughley v. Ross, 55 Mich. 163, 20 N. W. 886, 887; Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co., 81 Mich. 43, 49, 18 Am. Rep. 142; Michigan State Bank v. Hastings (Mich.) 1 Doug. 224, 252, 41 Am. Dec. 549; Campau v. Chene, 1 Mich. (Man.) 400, 413; Detroit Union R. Depot & Station Co. v. Fort Street Union Depot Co., 87 N. W. 214, 216, 128 Mich. 184; Warner v. Bennett, 81 Conn. 468, 475; Fowlkes v. Wagoner (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 586, 591; Williamson v. Gordon Heights Ry. Co. (Del.) 40 Atl. 933, 934; Smith v. White, 5 Neb. 405, 407; Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 527, 554; Raley v. Umatilla County, 13 Pac. 890, 894, 15 Or. 172, 3 Am. St. Rep. 142. The condition which is to affect the estate may be express or implied, and it may be precedent or subsequent. Raley v. Umatilla County, 13 Pac. 890, 894, 15 Or. 172, 3 Am. St. Rep. 142; Michigan State Bank v. Hastings (Mich.) 1 Doug. 224, 252, 41 Am. Dec. 549 (citing Litt. § 325). "The condition is annexed to the estate; it doth always attend and wait upon the estate; it is knit to it." If it would not be competent for an individual to separate an estate from the condition annexed to it, it would not be competent for the state to do it. Michigan State Bank v. Hastings (Mich.) 1 Doug. 224, 266, 41 Am. Dec. 549. A condition must be reserved by words used by the grantor, but it is not necessarily confined to the covenants of the deed. So where the recital of a deed was not a mere recital of past circumstances, but a declaration of present intention and a part of the original contract of the parties, and declared that the conveyance was "on this condition"—that is, that the grantee should discharge a certain ground rent, and also build a house on such land for the use of the grantor—the condition was effectually reserved, in addition to the security afforded by covenants in other parts of the deed. Hamilton v. Elliott (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 375, 381.

The words "and these presents are upon this condition," namely, that the lessee shall suffer the lessor to enjoy a way reserved through the demised premises without obstruction, are sufficient in a durable lease to make the estate a conditional one without an express clause of re-entry, and, if the way be obstructed, ejectment lies. Jackson v. Allen (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 220, 225.

A "condition" is a qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance, and so united with it in the deed as to qualify it or restrain it. Cooper v. Green, 28 Ark. 48, 54.

A "condition" is something inserted in a deed for the benefit of the grantor, giving him the power, on default of performance, to destroy the estate if he will, and re-vest the estate in himself or his heirs. Smith v. Smith, 23 Wis. 176, 181, 99 Am. Dec. 153. A condition not only depends on the option of the grantor, but is controlled by equity in any case where the grantor attempts to make an inequitable use of it. Duryee v. City of New York, 96 N. Y. 477, 496.

"Conditions," as used in a deed reciting that "this conveyance is made to the parties, their heirs and assigns, absolute and in fee simple with and on the following conditions," is used in its generic sense "to denote the predicament or status of the title, its condition, and, where a subsequent portion of the deed shows that the grantor only owned an equity of redemption in the land, the deed will not be considered as passing a fee simple." Dunlap v. Mobley, 71 Ala. 102, 105.

The word "conditions," as used in Acts Cong. April 14, 1802, and May 26, 1824, providing that an alien may be admitted to become a citizen on the "following conditions, and not otherwise," and specifying the proceeding for naturalization, cannot be held to mean that the applicant shall see to it that the proceedings are recorded. The conditions are well satisfied by limiting them to what the applicant is required to do in so far as his acts are concerned. In re Coleman (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 49, 55.

"Condition, in its legal signification, means something annexed to a grant." State v. Board of Public Works, 42 Ohio St. 607, 615.

As used in Hoboken City Charter of 1861, § 11, providing that it shall be lawful for the council by general ordinance to grant permission to any person or corporation to lay railroad tracks over any street or highway within the city under such conditions and restrictions as the council may think proper, the words "conditions and restrictions" authorize the council to impose only such conditions and restrictions as were annexed to the grant, and such words import simply a qualification or limitation of the gift to which they are annexed, and are inapplicable to a corporation possessing its franchises and its power to lay rails by authority derived from the Legislature. North Hudson County Ry. Co. v. City of Hoboken, 41-N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 71, 76.

Within Code, § 3252, providing that no condition or restricted provision of a policy of insurance shall be valid as a defense to an action on the policy unless printed in certain sized type, the term "conditions" was not used in any narrow or technical sense, but was intended to cover any clause, expression, or provision included in or appended to a policy whereby the effect of the principal and essential part of the policy is modified, changed, restricted, or otherwise affected so as to materially influence the rights and liberties of the insurer thereunder; and it is of no consequence whether the language used be in the form of a condition or agreement. National Life Ass'n v. Berkeley, 34 S. E. 469, 97 Va. 571.

By the word "condition" is usually understood some quality annexed to real estate by virtue of which it may be defeated, enlarged, or created upon an uncertain event: also qualities annexed to personal contracts and agreements are frequently called "conditions," and these must be interpreted according to the real intention of the parties. Bac. Abr. "Conditions." The learning in the books relates principally to the former kind. Conditions of the latter class rest upon the same general reasoning with those of the former. "Conditions precedent" are such as must be punctually performed before the estate can vest, but on a "condition subsequent" the estate is immediately executed; yet the continuance of the estate depends upon the breach or performance of the conditions. Selden v. Pringle (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 458, 465 (citing Bac. Abr. Cond. 1).

A "condition" is a quality annexed to land whereby an estate may be divided. Littlejohn v. Egerton, 77 N. C. 379, 384.

The time when the enjoyment of property is to begin or end may be determined by computation, or be made to depend on events. In the latter case the enjoyment is said to be "upon condition." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3303.

The use in the Penal Code of any word expressive of relationship, state, condition, office, or trust of any person, as the "parent," "child," "ascendant," "descendant," "minor," "infant," "ward," "guardian," or the like, or of the relative pronouns "he" or "they" in reference thereto, includes both males and females. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 22.

Cause of injury distinguished.

Where one driving along a street after crossing a street car track stopped so near it to converse with a person that there was not room enough for a car to pass, such position constituted a "condition" of the injury, and was not a cause of it. Redford v. Spokane St. Ry. Co., 46 Pac. 650, 651, 15 Wash. 419.

As condition in life.

The term "condition," as used in a statute relating to the property of a bankrupt, providing that there should be exempt to the bankrupt the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles or necessities as his assignee should designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family and "condition" and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed a certain specified sum, means his position, personal or relative, which he had occupied in life at and previous to his assignment. In re Ludlow, 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 322, 323.

As condition precedent.

"Conditions," within the meaning of a statute providing that a railroad desiring to occupy a highway may agree with the public authorities upon the manner, terms, and conditions upon which the same may be used and occupied, has reference to stipulations precedent to the enjoyment of the grant. Cleveland C. & St. L. R. Co. v. City of Cincinnati (Ohio) 1 Prob. R. 269, 278.

"Conditions," as used in an ordinance relating to corporations supplying natural gas within the limits of a city, declaring that the privileges granted should be enjoyed only on "the following conditions," is used in the sense of regulations, and not conditions precedent. Appeal of City of Pittsburgh, 7 Atl. 778, 787, 115 Pa. 4.

It seems to be agreed in regard to all conditions, whether in a deed or a will, where the condition is in the nature of a consideration for the concession, its performance will be regarded as intended to precede the vesting of any right, and so a condition precedent. Merrill v. Wisconsin Female College, 43 N. W. 104, 74 Wis. 415 (citing 2 Redf. Wills, 283).

Conditional limitation and limitation distinguished.

"An estate in fee 'on condition' leaves in the grantor a vested right which by its very nature is reserved to him as a present existing interest transmissible to his heirs, while a 'conditional limitation' passes the whole interest of the grantor at once, and creates an estate to arise and vest in a third person on a contingency at a future and uncertain period of time." Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 142, 147.

The distinction between an estate upon condition and the limitation by which an estate is determined upon the happening of some event is that in the latter case the estate reverts to the grantor or passes to the person to whom it is granted by limitation over upon the mere happening of the event upon which it is limited, without any entry or other act, while in the former the reservation can only be made to the grantor or his heirs, and an entry upon breach of the condition is requisite to revest the estate. The provision for re-entry is therefore the distinctive characteristic of an estate upon condition. Hoselton v. Hoselton, 65 S. W. 1005, 1006, 166 Mo. 182.

A condition subsequent, followed by a limitation over to a third person in case the condition is not fulfilled, or there is a breach of it, is known as a "conditional limitation." A condition brings the estate back to the grantor or his heirs; a conditional limitation carries it over to a stranger. A condition terminates an estate; a limitation creates a new one. "A remainder may be limited on a contingency which, if it happens, will operate to abridge or determine the precedent estate, and every such remainder shall be a conditional limitation." Real Prop. Law, § 43; Williams v. Jones, 60 N. E. 240, 244, 166 N. Y. 522.

A limitation marks the period which determines the estate, without any act on the part of who has the next expectant interest. Upon the happening of the contingency prescribed, the estate comes at once to an end, and the subsequent estate arises. The condition determines an estate after breach upon entry or claim by the grantor or his heir or the heirs of the deviser. Fowkes v. Wagoner (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 586, 592.

Where words of condition are used in connection with a devise, and there is another or subsequent devise of the same premises on the failure of the first or preceding devise, the "words of condition" are not strictly considered as such, or rather, have not the force and operation of words of condition, and are called "words of limitation." Smith v. Hance, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 244, 248.

Covenant distinguished.

A "condition" is a qualification annexed to an estate by the grantor, whereby it may be enlarged, defeated, or created on an uncertain event, and it differs from "covenant" in this: that a condition is in the words of and binding on both parties, while a covenant is in the words of the covenantor only. Langley v. Ross, 20 N. W. 886, 887, 55 Mich. 163.

"A 'condition' differs from a 'covenant' in that the legal responsibility of nonfulfillment of a covenant is that the party violating it must respond in damages, while the consequence of the nonfulfillment of a condition is a forfeiture of the estate. If it be doubtful whether a clause in a deed be a covenant or a condition, the courts will decide against the latter construction." Woodruff v. Woodruff, 16 Atl. 4, 7, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 349, 1 L. R. A. 380.

A condition is a qualification or restriction annexed to a deed or devise, by means of which an estate is made, possessed, or to be enlarged or to be defeated upon the happening or not happening of a particular event, or the performance or nonperformance of a particular act. Words declaratory of the consideration for, and the purpose for, and the purpose of the conveyance and the limitation of, the use of the property, or which direct or prohibit the performance of a particular act, do not of themselves render an estate conditional. The same words may be employed to create a covenant as to create a condition, and, if there is any doubt regarding the intention of the grantor or devisor, courts will incline toward the former construction, for conditions which destroy estates are not favored and are strictly considered. A condition is always the creation of the grantor or devisor. A covenant may be made either by a grantor or the grantee. Detroit Union R. R. Depot & Station Co. v. Fort Street Union Depot Co., 87 N. W. 214, 216, 128 Mich. 184.

The term "negative covenant," and not the word "condition," is correctly used to designate a provision in a deed that the premises thereby conveyed are not to be used for saloon purposes. Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 45 N. E. 145, 147, 163 Ill. 652.

Creation and construction.

The words usually employed in creating a condition are "upon condition," and Lord Coke says this is the most appropriate expression, or the words may be "so that," "provided," "it if shall happen." Apt words of limitation are "while," "so long as," "until," "during," etc. Campau v. Chene, 1 Mich. (Man.) 400, 413. See, also, Heaton v. Randolph County Com'rs, 20 Ind. 398, 402; Raley v. Umatilla County, 13 Pac. 890, 894, 15 Or. 172, 3 Am. St. Rep. 142. There are certain technical words proper in themselves to make a condition. These are "sub condition," "proviso," "ita quod," but these words are not necessary to create a condition. It may be created by any words which show a clear, unmistakable intention on the part of a grantor or devisor to create an estate on condition, regard being had to the whole of the deed or will in which they occur. Fowlkes v. Wagoner (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 586, 591.

"A condition is a qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance. The words must not only be such as of themselves import a condition, but must be so connected with the grant in the deed as to qualify or restrain it." Laberee v. Carleton, 53 Me. 211, 213.

No precise or technical words are required in a deed to create a condition precedent or subsequent. It is said that the words "proviso," "ita quod," and "sub conditioni" are the most proper to make a condition, yet they have not always that effect, but frequently serve for other purposes, sometimes operating as a qualification or limitation, and sometimes as a covenant. Thus where a land company conveys to a railway the right of way through a growing city, provided, however, that any other railway running into or through the city shall have the right of running a parallel track along and upon the same right of way, but reserves no right of re-entry, a breach of the proviso will be construed as a covenant and limitation rather than a condition subsequent. Elyton Land Co. v. South & North Alabama R. Co. (Ala.) 14 South. 207, 208.

A condition may be created by express words, which is called a "condition in fact," as where a feoffment is made on land reserved, rent payable on a certain date, on "condition" that if not paid on the day the feoffor may re-enter. The law inclines to construe conditions as subsequent rather than precedent, and to be remedied by damages rather than by forfeiture. "Conditions subsequent," says Chancellor Kent, "are to be construed strictly, because they tend to destroy estates." Thornton v. Trammell, 39 Ga. 202, 207.

The term "condition" in a conveyance to a church, on the express condition and limitation that it should not be sold, mortgaged, or in any way conveyed, or any buildings kept, maintained, or erected thereon except for the purposes of the church, was held, in view of the fact, to receive a liberal construction for the benefit of the grantees, and not a construction tending to defeat the conveyance. Mills v. Davidson, 35 Atl. 1072, 1074, 54 N. J. Eq. 659, 35 L. R. A. 113, 55 Am. St. Rep. 594.

A condition in a deed, such as will work a forfeiture of the estate if not performed, is not favored in the law, and will not be implied. It will only be enforced where the language of the instrument containing it unmistakably imposes an estate on condition. Hamilton v. Kneeland, 1 Nev. 40, 53.

No precise form of words is necessary in order to create a condition in a will, but, whenever it clearly appears that it was the testator's intention to make a condition, that condition will be carried into effect. Thus a legacy directed to be paid at the end of two years, provided that the legatee shall be deemed to be a reformed man in the judgment of the executors, is a conditional legacy. Markham v. Hufford, 82 N. W. 222, 223, 123 Mich. 505, 48 L. R. A. 580, 81 Am. St. Rep. 222.

Testator by his will gave certain estate to trustees to hold for the sole benefit of his grandchildren for three years, and at the expiration of that time to transfer the property to such grandchildren, adding, "If either of said children die before the trust ceases his or her legal heirs shall be substituted in place of the deceased in every respect." A granddaughter died within the three years, leaving a will by which she in terms gave her share of the property to her husband and others. The words of the will clearly enough created a conditional devise only. No particular set of technical words is necessary to create a condition; a common-sense construction of the words governs. The expressive word "if" is quite commonly employed to express a condition. The words "shall be substituted" have an unmistakable meaning in their place. It would be a perversion of the common meaning of common words to deny the testator's intention to create a conditional devise, and the happening of the subsequent condition defeats the precedent estate. Although a vested estate, therefore, nothing passed by her will. The husband of the devisee cannot be considered one of her legal heirs in the sense of the term as used in the devise over to "legal heirs." Buck v. Paine, 75 Me. 582, 588.

As environment of premises.

"Condition," as used in an insurance policy providing that the company shall not be liable if there be any omissions, misrepresentations, nondisclosure, or concealment of the condition of the premises, means more than location; it means location and environment. Fromherz v. Yankton Fire Ins. Co., 63 N. W. 784, 786, 7 S. D. 187.

As essential part of contract.

In Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago Ice Co., 36 Md. 102, 11 Am. Rep. 469, the decision turned upon the meaning of the word "conditions" in a fire policy, and the court, following the suggestions in Blake v. Exchange Mut. Ins. Co., 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 265, confined it to those provisions of the policy which entered into and formed a part of the contract of insurance, and are essential to make it a binding contract between parties, and which are properly designated as "conditions." Dwelling-House Ins. Co. v. Snyder, 34 Atl. 931, 932, 59 N. J. Law, 18.

As restriction.

A provision in a will that real estate which had therein been devised in fee should not be sold or alienated by the devisees for a certain number of years is properly a restriction, though called in the will a "condition." Fowler v. Duhme, 42 N. E. 623, 633, 143 Ind. 248.

As terms.

In an order granting a new trial on condition that the party pay all costs, the word "condition" is used as synonymous with the word "terms," and so does not render the order invalid as conditional. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Borden (Tex.) 29 S. W. 1100, 1101.

An order granting a new trial and directing the party to whom it was granted to pay witness fees as a "condition" upon which such new trial was granted, means that the payment of the fees was the terms on which the order was made, and not a condition on the performance of which it should take effect. In this connection the court says: "If the word 'condition' had no other meaning except that in which it is used in the law of conveyances, we might be constrained to hold that the order granting a new trial was to take effect only upon the contingency that the defendant should pay the costs, but such is not the fact. Among other definitions, Worcester gives its meaning as 'something to be done,' and in that sense, when plural, it is synonymous with 'terms.'" Fenn v. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co., 13 S. W. 273, 76 Tex. 380.

Where, pending the submission to arbitration of a controversy as to the ownership of a tract of land known as the "Poke Run Place," the parties entered into an agreement whereby they "agreed that the contest as to the Poke Run Place be given up 'on condition' that Mr. Rugh shall in a reasonable time convey to Jacob Haymaker's three daughters the whole of the Poke Run Place by deed in fee simple, and, on said Rugh's doing so, said Haymaker quits all claims to said place," the word "condition" was obviously employed to express the same as "term of the agreement," as if it had read, "It is agreed that the contest be given up on the terms following," etc., and the agreement should be construed not as conditional, but absolute. Meanor v. McKowan (Pa.) 4 Watts & S. 302, 305.

Trust created or implied.

The word "condition" is a term of flexible meaning. In leases it is often construed as a covenant. Express words of condition shall be taken for a limitation, if the nature of the case requires it. Words of express condition are not inapt as introductory to a declaration of trust. Every conveyance to a charitable use is a conveyance to hold upon the trust declared, and the execution of the trust is a "condition" upon which the estate is taken and held, to be given effect to, not by forfeiture of the title, but by those methods by means of which a court of equity compels the performance of such trusts. So, where a conveyance of a lot of land was made to a church and to their successors, but not to their assigns, with a habendum in these words, "To have and to hold unto the said party of the second part upon this express condition and limitation, that neither of said parties or their successors shall at any time sell, mortgage or in any way convey the said lands and premises," etc., it was held that the grant did not create a condition for the breach of which the grantors might enter as for a forfeiture of the estate, but created a trust, which the grantee taking the legal estate was bound to perform. Mills v. Davison, 35 Atl. 1072, 1073, 54 N. J. Eq. 659, 35 L. R. A. 113, 55 Am. St. Rep. 594.

A grant of land to the bishop of a church, upon "condition" that it shall be forever held for the use of a certain church, does not necessarily create a technical estate on condition, so that the estate shall be revertible, but means simply that the estate is to be held in trust for the purpose named. The use of the term "condition" does not necessarily import the creation of a conditional estate, but "condition" may mean "trust," and vice versa. Neely v. Hoskins, 24 Atl. 882, 883, 81 Me. 386.

In a contract for sale of storage battery equipments for street cars, which provided that the plant shall be considered satisfactory if it fulfills the "following conditions," it was held that the "conditions" did not mean merely conditions upon which the vendor might compel the acceptance of the equipment, but were warranties for the breach of which damages might be recovered. Accumulator Co. v. Dubuque St. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 70, 77, 12 C. C. A. 37.

In American Popular Life Ins. Co. v. Day, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 89, 23 Am. Rep. 198, in our court of last resort, "warranties" and "conditions" in insurance policies are treated as synonymous terms, as indeed they are. In Sonneborn v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 220, 222, 43 Am. Rep. 365, it was declared in the same court that a promissory warranty had the nature of a condition precedent. That every inducing statement made a warranty by a policy of life insurance shall be true is plainly a condition precedent to the insurer's liability under such policy. In Eddy Street Iron Foundry v. Hampden Stock & Mut. Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 300, Clifford, J., said that in the law of insurance a warranty is a stipulation forming a part of the contract, and is construed as a condition; and in Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 965, he reaffirmed that doctrine. In First Nat. Bank v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 95 U. S. 673, 24 L. Ed. 563, Harlan, J., said that, when warranted, the exact truth of statements in an application for insurance became a condition precedent to any binding contract, and he repeated the expression in Moulton v. American Life Ins. Co., 4 Sup. Ct. 466, 111 U. S. 335, 28 L. Ed. 447. Dimick v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 692, 694, 67 N. J. Law, 867.

There is an apparently irreconcilable conflict of authority as to the distinction between "warranties" and "conditions," and as to the rights and obligations of parties thereunder. Much of the confusion has arisen from the fact that what were generally considered in this country as warranties that the article shall be of the kind or species contracted for were, prior to the passage of the sales of goods act in England, and are in some of the courts of this country, treated as conditions precedent. Benj. Sales (7th Ed.) pp. 589, 594, 677; Carleton v. Lombard, Ayres & Co., 149 N. Y. 137, 147, 43 N. E. 422. Furthermore, the word "warranties" has been used in such a great variety of senses, and the decisions thereon have been so anomalous, that, as a distinguished jurist has said, an attempt to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion about any principle supposed to be established by them would be hopeless, if not absurd. McFarland v. Newman (Pa.) 9 Watts, 55, 34 Am. Rep. 497. Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 118 N. Y. 260, 23 N. E. 372, 16 Am. St. Rep. 753, approving the doctrine that a positive affirmation, relied on as such by the vendee, is an express warranty, quotes with approval from an opinion by Judge Learned as follows: "There can be no difference between an executory contract to sell and deliver goods of such and such a quality, and an executory contract to sell and deliver goods which the vendor warrants to be of such and such a quality; the former is as much a warranty as the latter. Kent v. Friedman, 101 N. Y. 616, 3 N. E. 905." Manifestly there is no distinction in principle as to the rights and remedies of a purchaser between a cause of action arising out of a breach of contract by the vendor to deliver an article of a specified quality or description, or out of a breach of representation which is material to the contract, or out of such a breach when the representation or warranty is implied instead of express. In either case there is an agreement, in substance and purport, to the same effect; in either, a breach of it works the same injury to the vendee; whether the cause of action is for a breach of contract or for the breach of a warranty is a mere matter of nomenclature. Cleveland Linseed Oil Co. v. A. F. Buchanan & Sons (U. S.) 120 Fed. 906, 908, 57 C. C. A. 498 (citing Bagley v. Cleveland Rolling Mills Co. [U. S.] 21 Fed. 159).

The word "condition," in an instruction in an action for libel that in estimating damages the jury are to consider plaintiff's injured feelings and tarnished reputation, taking into account the nature of the imputation, extent of its publication, the character, "condition," and influence of the parties, and all the surrounding circumstances, refers rather to social standing than to wealth, for it would not be the legitimate and natural construction of the word to consider it as meaning wealth. Buckstaff v. Hicks, 68 N. W. 403, 404, 94 Wis. 34, 59 Am. St. Rep. 853.

CONDITION CONCURRENT.

"Conditions concurrent" are those which are mutually dependent and are to be performed at the same time. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1437; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1953; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3771; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1123.

CONDITION IN LIFE.

See "Circumstances."

"Circumstances and condition in life," within the meaning of the rule that it is the duty of a husband to furnish his wife with a present comfortable support and maintenance in a manner corresponding with their circumstances and station in life, includes their social standing. "How could it be said that, in fixing the obligation of a husband for the support of his wife, her social position in society, which is the synonym of 'rank' or 'station,' should not be considered? Such is the rule in awarding alimony and in fixing the rights of a wife for separate support." Thill v. Pohlman, 41 N. W. 385, 386, 76 Iowa, 638.

The terms "condition in life" and "situation in life" are synonymous, and may be used interchangeably. Ross v. Kansas City, 48 Mo. App. 440, 447.

CONDITION OF BOND.

The "condition of a bond" is the statement, with necessary and appropriate recitals, of the circumstances and contingencies under and upon which the bond shall become void. The statement is necessarily in the alternative. In one case or contingency the obligation is to be null and void, and the obligor's liability will be at an end; in the other his responsibility will become absolute, and the condition is in such case said to be broken, and it is from a breach of the condition that nearly or quite all the litigation on this subject arises. Rawson v. Taylor (Neb.) 95 N. W. 1033, 1036 (citing Murfree, Off. Bonds).

CONDITION PERFORMED.

A "plea of conditions performed" in an action of covenant or debt for money is equivalent to a "plea for payment." Hammit v. Bullett's Ex'rs (Va.) 1 Call, 567.

CONDITION PRECEDENT.

"Precedent conditions are such as must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged" (Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 309; Warner v. Bennett, 31 Conn. 463, 475; Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 45 N. E. 145, 147, 163 Ill. 652; Cooper v. Green, 28 Ark. 48, 54; Moore v. Sanders, 15 S. C. 440, 442, 40 Am. Rep. 703; Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 527, 554; Jarboe v. Hey, 122 Mo. 341, 353, 26 S. W. 968), "as if a lease be made to commence from the first day of May thereafter, 'on condition' that B. pay a certain sum of money by that time." Blean v. Messenger, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 499, 503. If land is conveyed upon a condition precedent, the title will not pass until the condition is performed. Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 45 N. E. 145, 147, 163 Ill. 652.

A "condition precedent" is one which is to be performed before some right dependent thereon accrues, or some act dependent thereon is performed. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1436; City of Stockton v. Weber, 33 Pac. 332, 334, 98 Cal. 433; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3770; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1122; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1952.

Conditions are precedent or subsequent. The former fix the beginning, the latter the ending, of the right. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3304.

"An estate 'on condition precedent' is one where no right vests at all till the condition be performed." White v. St. Guirons (Ala.) Minor, 331, 341, 12 Am. Dec. 56; Stoel v. Flanders, 32 N. W. 114, 118, 68 Wis. 256 (citing Wood, Inst. 235); Moore v. Moore (N. Y.) 47 Barb. 257, 262; Ludlow v. New York & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 440, 442; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 332, 5 Mont. 111; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 42 N. E. 465, 467, 143 Ind. 113; Goff v. Pensenhafner, 60 N. E. 110, 112, 190 Ill. 200.

A "condition precedent" in a will is one which is required to be fulfilled before a particular disposition takes effect. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1346; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1799; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2796; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6866; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1065.

The term "condition precedent," as used in relation to contracts, means a condition which must happen before either party becomes bound by the contract, although such conditions may be waived by the party in whose favor they are made. Jones v. United States, 96 U. S. 24, 26, 24 L. Ed. 644.

In the law of contracts, a "condition precedent" is a condition "which must be performed before the agreement of the parties becomes a valid and binding contract." A condition precedent calls for the performance of some act, or the happening of some event, after the terms of the contract have been agreed upon, before the contract shall take effect—that is to say, the contract is made in form, but does not become operative as a contract until some future specified act is performed, or some subsequent event transpires; hence it is said a condition precedent doth get and gain the thing or estate made upon condition by the performance of it, as a condition subsequent keeps and continues the estate by the performance of the condition. Redman v. Aetna Fire Ins. Co., 4 N. W. 591, 595, 49 Wis. 431 (citing Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Condition").

✓ "Conditions precedent" are, as the term implies, such as must happen before the estate depending upon them can arise or be enlarged. Raley v. Umatilla County, 13 Pac. 890, 894, 15 Or. 172, 3 Am. St. Rep. 142; Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Iowa) 82 N. W. 1003, 1004. The act or event must precede the vesting of the estate, and without it title never passes, so that, where the provisions of a deed relate to things which must be done subsequent to its delivery, they are not "conditions precedent." Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Iowa) 82 N. W. 1003, 1004.

Condition subsequent distinguished.

There are no technical words to distinguish between "conditions precedent" and "conditions subsequent." The distinction is a matter of construction. The same words may indifferently make either, according to the intent of the person who creates the condition. If the language of the particular clause, or of the whole will, shows that the act on which the estate depends must be performed before the estate can vest, the condition is "precedent," and unless it be performed the devisee can take nothing. If, on the contrary, the act does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, and this can be collected from the whole will, the condition is "subsequent." Burdis v. Burdis, 30 S. E. 462, 96 Va. 81, 70 Am. St. Rep. 825 (citing Finlay v. King, 28 U. S. [3 Pet.] 346, 7 L. Ed. 701). See, also, Parmelee v. Oswego & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 599, 617.

There are no precise technical words which distinguish conditions "precedent" and "subsequent"; whether they are one or the other is a matter of construction, to be solved by ascertaining the intention of the party creating the estate. They are not determined merely by the structure of the instrument or the arrangement of the covenants. Where mutual covenants go to the mutual consideration on both sides, they are "mutual conditions," one preceding the other. Where the undertaking on one side is in terms a condition to the stipulation on the other—that is, where the contract provides for the performance of some act or the happening of some event, and the obligations of the contract are made to depend on such performance or happening—the conditions are "conditions precedent." Thus where an oil and gas lease, by which the lessor is to be compensated solely by a share of the product, contains a proviso requiring the lessee to commence and complete a well on the property within a specified time, such proviso and the time of its performance constitute a "condition precedent" to the vesting of any estate in the lessee. Huggins v. Daley (U. S.) 99 Fed. 606, 609, 40 C. C. A. 12, 48 L. R. A. 320.

A "condition precedent" is defined by Mr. Taylor, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 1, § 275, as follows: "Where the condition must be performed before the estate can commence, it is called a 'condition precedent'; but where the effect of a condition is either to enlarge or defeat an estate already commenced, it is called a 'condition subsequent.' The former avoids the estate by not permitting it to vest until literally performed, while the nonperformance of the latter defeats the estate by divesting the party of his title and the interest already vested." See, also, 2 Wood, Landl. & Ten. (2d Ed.) § 510. Spencer v. Commercial Co., 71 Pac. 53, 54, 30 Wash. 520.

Where by the express language of a will the absolute ownership of the property is only to vest in the donee upon his becoming married, the condition is a "condition precedent" rather than a "condition subsequent." Ransdell v. Boston, 50 N. E. 111, 114, 172 Ill. 439, 43 L. R. A. 526.

A "condition precedent" is one which must take place before an estate can vest, and which delays the vesting of the right until the event happens, while a "condition subsequent" is one which operates upon an estate already created and vested, and renders it liable to be defeated. Where an act on which an estate or right depends does not necessarily precede the vesting of an estate or right, but may accompany it or follow it, the condition is subsequent. A college to whom a party had made certain absolute gifts of money agreed to pay the donor an annuity upon certain sums during her lifetime. The requirements of the payment of such annuity did not make the gift conditional, or less absolute than it otherwise would have been. If the payments of the annuities were conditions, they were in the nature rather of "conditions subsequent" than of "conditions precedent." Beatty's Estate v. Western College of Toledo, 52 N. E. 432, 437, 177 Ill. 280, 42 L. R. A. 797, 69 Am. St. Rep. 242 (citing City of Chicago v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co., 105 Ill. 73).

"Conditions precedent" are such as must be punctually performed before the estate can vest. But on a "condition subsequent" the estate is immediately executed, yet the continuance of the estate depends upon the breach of performance of the condition. In a contract for the sale of an interest in certain machinery and a patent "to be applied for," the consideration in part being a note payable in 15 months, with interest, it being agreed that, if the payee in the note failed to procure a patent or was defeated in a lawsuit then pending, the contract should be void, the procuring the patent and successful termination of the lawsuit were not "conditions precedent" to the payment of the note, but were "conditions subsequent." Selden v. Pringle (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 458, 466.

Whether a condition in a deed is a "condition precedent" or a "condition subsequent" must be determined by the intention of the parties, and not from technical words or the collocation of the words used. Thus, where a stipulation in a deed declared that the grantee should come into immediate possession, such provision had the effect of construing a condition which might have otherwise been construed as a "condition precedent" into a "condition subsequent." Green v. Thomas, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 318, 320.

"One general rule will serve to solve most cases requiring a condition 'precedent' to be distinguished from one 'subsequent' to wit: If the thing conditioned is to exist or happen before the estate is to vest, the condition is 'precedent'; if after, it is 'subsequent.'" Opinion of Earl, J., in Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 322.

The use of the words "conditioned grant," as used in section 9 of the act granting to the Northern Pacific Railroad certain lands, describing them as "conditioned grants," does not change the character of such conditions from conditions subsequent to conditions precedent. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 332, 5 Mont. 111.

The word "conditioned," used in a legacy, does not necessarily imply a strict condition either precedent or subsequent. The intention must control. McNally v. McNally, 49 Atl. 699, 23 R. I. 180.

Creation and construction.

A condition precedent must happen or be performed before the estate, right, or interest to which it is annexed can vest or take effect. Where no time is fixed within which a condition shall be performed, the rule is that it must be performed within a reasonable time. Soderberg v. Crockett, 30 Pac. 826, 827, 17 Nev. 409.

A condition which involves anything in the nature of a consideration is, in general, a condition precedent. Thus, a condition that a legacy shall be paid to a legatee at the end of two years, provided that the legatee shall be deemed a reformed man in the judgment of the executors, is a valid condition precedent. Markham v. Hufford, 82 N. W. 222, 223, 123 Mich. 505, 48 L. R. A. 580, 81 Am. St. Rep. 222.

A condition precedent in a contract is an act to be performed by one party before the accruing of a liability of the other party, and it must be pleaded and proved. Chit. Cont. (11th Am. Ed.) 1083. What is a condition precedent depends not on the technical words, but on the plain intention of the parties to be deduced from the whole instrument. Stipulations in a Lloyd's fire policy binding the assured to resort first to an action against the attorneys for the underwriters to determine the fact of the underwriters' liability, and then to a trust fund in the attorneys' hands, before he can sue the individual underwriters, are conditions precedent. Ketchum v. Belding, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1099, 1100, 53 App. Div. 295.

The fact that the word "precedent" is not included in a deed containing a condition is not essential to warrant an interpretation that a condition is a condition precedent. Conditions have no idiom. Whether they are precedent or subsequent is a question purely of intent, and the intention must be determined by considering not only the words of the particular clause, but also the language of the whole contract, as well as the nature of the act required, and the subject-matter to which it relates. Buckspout & B. R. Co. v. Inhabitants of Brewer, 67 Me. 295, 298.

A condition in a fire insurance policy that the insured, "if required," shall furnish a certificate of the disinterested magistrate living nearest the place of fire, etc., is not a "condition precedent," and hence is not affirmed by an allegation of the petition that the insured has "duly performed all the conditions on his part." McManus v. Webster Assur. Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 820, 825, 22 Misc. Rep. 269.

CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

A condition subsequent is one referring to a future event, upon the happening of which the obligation becomes no longer binding upon the other party if he chooses to avail himself of the condition. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1438; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3772; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1124; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1954.

Conditions are precedent or subsequent. The former fix the beginning, the latter the ending, of the right. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3304.

A condition subsequent is where an estate in interest is so given as to vest immediately, subject only to be divested by some subsequent act or event. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1349; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1068; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6869; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2799; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1802.

Condition subsequent is that kind of a condition which operates upon estates already created, and which may defeat or cause a forfeiture of such estate. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 332, 5 Mont. 111; Moore v. Moore (N. Y.) 47 Barb. 257, 263; Ludlow v. New York & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 440, 442; Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 309; Wright v. Mayer, 62 N. Y. Supp. 610, 611, 47 App. Div. 604; Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 45 N. E. 145, 147, 163 Ill. 562; Mahoning County Com'rs v. Young (U. S.) 59 Fed. 96, 103, 8 C. C. A. 27; Warner v. Bennett, 31 Conn. 468, 475; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 42 N. E. 465, 467, 143 Ind. 113. "An estate on condition subsequent is one wherein an estate vests, but may be defeated by nonperformance." White v. St. Guirons (Ala.) Minor, 331, 341, 12 Am. Dec. 56; Raley v. Umatilla County, 13 Pac. 890, 894, 15 Or. 172, 3 Am. St. Rep. 142. Conditions subsequent are such as, when they do happen, defeat an estate already vested. Cooper v. Green, 28 Ark. 48, 54. A condition subsequent defeats an estate already vested. Moore v. Sanders, 15 S. C. 440, 442, 40 Am. Rep. 703; Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 527, 554; Woodruff v. Woodruff, 16 Atl. 4, 7, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 349, 1 L. R. A. 380.

A "condition subsequent is" one which has a qualification annexed, by which, on the happening of a particular event, it may be created, enlarged, or destroyed. If set forth, the condition is expressed, and if it allows the estate to vest and then to be divided, in consequence of a nonobservance of the requirements, it is a condition subsequent." Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co., 31 Mich. 43, 49, 18 Am. Rep. 142.

"A condition subsequent is one by which an interest already vested may be divested, or a contingent interest defeated before vested." Goff v. Pensenhaver, 60 N. E. 110, 112, 190 Ill. 200.

A condition subsequent operates on an estate already created and vested, and renders it liable to be defeated. Moran v. Stewart, 73 S. W. 177, 179, 173 Mo. 207.

"A condition subsequent is a contingency named on the happening of which a grant may be defeated—such as a failure to pay money, erect buildings, or do any other required act, the failure to do which authorizes the grantor's re-entry." Hague v. Ahrens (U. S.) 53 Fed. 58, 60, 3 C. C. A. 426.

In case of a condition subsequent, the estate becomes divested and ceases, and a right of re-entry arises, upon the happening of the event provided for in the condition. Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 309.

A deed upon condition subsequent conveys a fee when it is executed, but the fee passes subject to a contingency of being defeated as provided in the condition, the grantor having the power of re-entry upon condition broken; and, if there is a breach of the condition, the estate continues in the grantee till defeated by actual entry. Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 45 N. E. 145, 147, 163 Ill. 652.

A condition subsequent is one which operates on an estate already created and vested, and renders it liable to be defeated. Thus, if a man grant an estate in fee, reserving to himself and his heirs a certain rent, and that, if such rent be not paid at the time limited, it shall be lawful for him and his heirs to re-enter and avoid the estate, the grantee and his heirs have an estate on condition subsequent, which is defeasible if the condition be not strictly performed. The usual words of a condition subsequent are "so that," "provided," "if it shall happen," or "upon condition," the latter being the most appropriate. Chapin v. School Dist. No. 2 in Winchester, 35 N. H. 445, 450.

A condition in a deed, such that its performance necessarily takes place after the vesting of title, is a condition subsequent; and within this definition a deed giving title subject to the payment of the income and profit for the support of the grantors is a condition subsequent. Birdsall v. Grant, 57 N. Y. Supp. 705, 706, 87 App. Div. 348.

The failure to perform a condition subsequent does not divest the estate. The grantor or his heirs may not choose to take advantage of the breach, and until they do so by entry there is no forfeiture of the estate. Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 121, 131.

A mortgage at common law is a conveyance absolute in its form, granting an estate defeasible by the performance of a condition subsequent. The estate thus created was strictly an "estate on condition," and in a court of law was treated as such, to be defeated only by the performance of the condition in the manner and at the time stipulated for in the defeasance. Shields v. Lozear, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 496, 502, 3 Am. St. Rep. 256.

Condition precedent distinguished.

See "Condition Precedent."

Covenant distinguished.

A condition subsequent is one that operates upon an estate already separated and vested, which, if not performed, may be defeated at the election of the grantor, provided he re-enters within a reasonable time after default or asserts his rights in an equivalent manner. It is at all times difficult to distinguish a condition subsequent from a mere covenant, and, owing to the disfavor in which conditions subsequent are regarded, cases may be found which hold such conditions to be covenants. Thus, evidence that a deed was executed on the condition that subsequently thereto the grantee should care for and support the grantor if it became necessary would tend to create a condition subsequent. Byars v. Byars, 32 S. W. 925, 926, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 565.

The chief distinction between a condition subsequent and a covenant pertains to the remedy in the event of a breach, which in the former subjects the estate to a forfeiture, and in the latter is merely ground for the recovery of damages. Where a deed does not create an obligation on the part of the grantee, it will be held to be a condition subsequent. Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Iowa) 82 N. W. 1003, 1004.

Creation and construction.

In 2 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) 7, it is said that "if, from the nature of the act to be performed and the time required for its performance, it is evidently the intention of the parties that an estate shall vest and the grantee perform the act after taking the possession, then the condition is subsequent." This rule may, perhaps, properly be treated as decisive of the construction when the words themselves are not conclusive. It certainly requires that the ordinary terms of affirmance and avoidance be held to create a condition subsequent when employed in a deed given to provide for the support of the grantor. The nature of the contract contemplates the possession and use of the property in the performance of the condition. It therefore follows that a condition in a deed that the grantee shall provide for the grantor for life, and, if he fails, the instrument shall be void, is a condition subsequent, vesting title in the grantee until defeated by nonperformance of the condition and a claim of forfeiture by the grantor. Shum v. Claghorn, 37 Atl. 236, 69 Vt. 45 (citing Rollins v. Riley, 44 N. H. 9).

"A condition subsequent in a deed that will, under any circumstances, defeat the title conveyed, must provide that the conveyance is on the condition, and that the failure to perform it shall operate as a forfeiture of the estate granted. The limitation of an estate to a particular use does not constitute, without words of forfeiture, such a condition. Though a deed contain a clause declaring the purpose for which it is intended the granted premises shall be used, if such purpose will not inure specifically to the benefit of the grantor, but is in its nature general and public, and if there are no other words in the grant indicating an intent that the grant is to be void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled, such a clause is not a condition subsequent." Coffin v. City of Portland, 17 Pac. 580, 582, 16 Or. 77.

The words of a condition subsequent are "so that," "provided," "if it shall happen," or "upon condition." The latter, according to Lord Coke, is the most appropriate. No form of expression, however, is essential to create a condition, and, if it is manifest from the terms of the grant that it was made on condition, the estate will become defeated if the condition is not kept. Conditions subsequent are not favored in the law, and are construed strictly, because they tend to destroy estates. If it be doubtful whether a clause in a deed is a condition or a covenant, the courts will incline against the condition, for a covenant is far preferable. Chapin v. School Dist. No. 2 in Winchester, 35 N. H. 445, 450.

Among the words which imply a condition in a grant are the following: "On condition," "providing always," "if it shall so happen," or "so that he, the grantee, pay." It is also said that to make a condition there must be added a conclusion with a clause of re-entry, or, if without such clause, they shall declare the estate shall cease or be void. Mahoning County Com'rs v. Young (U. S.) 59 Fed. 96, 103, 8 C. C. A. 27.

Conditions in the grant of lands in aid of a canal, as to the filing of a map of location, etc., of a canal, and the commencement of the work and completion of the same, are conditions subsequent, to be taken advantage of only by the grantor or some one under the grantor. Wheeler v. City of Chicago (U. S.) 68 Fed. 526, 528.

"A subscription for stock in a corporation on a condition subsequent contains a contract between the corporation and the subscriber whereby the corporation agrees to do some act, thereby combining two contracts—one, the contract of subscription; the other, an ordinary contract of the corporation to perform certain specific acts. The subscription is valid and enforceable, whether the conditions are performed or not. The condition subsequent is the same as a separate collateral contract between the corporation and the subscriber, for breach of which an action for damages is the remedy." Morrow v. Nashville Iron & Steel Co., 10 S. W. 495, 501, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 262, 3 L. R. A. 37, 10 Am. St. Rep. 658.

The courts will not favor the forfeiture of estates, and the rule of common law that estates upon condition may be defeated by nonperformance of the condition subsequent is to be construed strictly; and, if there is any other reasonable construction which must be given to a deed so as to avoid a forfeiture, it ought to receive such construction. In Wier v. Simmons, 55 Wis. 637, 13

N. W. 873, the language of the deed was "upon the express condition"; but the court held that such language did not create an estate upon condition, and said: "The rule is well settled that conditions subsequent which work a forfeiture of the estate are not favored by law, and no language will be construed into such condition, contrary to the intent of the parties, when such intent can be derived from a consideration of the whole instrument or from the circumstances attending the execution thereof; nor will the language used be construed into such a condition subsequent when any other reasonable construction can be given to it." Conditions are to be construed with great strictness because they tend to destroy estates, and the vigorous exaction of them in many cases is hardly reconcilable with conscience. The words "in trust nevertheless and on condition always" to use the premises for a public trust, in a deed of land, do not necessarily create a condition. Sohler v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1. And the words "upon this express condition," used in a will, are held not to create an estate upon condition, the words being followed by others directing a legatee to pay certain bequests. And a conveyance "upon the express terms, conditions, and reservations" that a portion of the land should be used as a cemetery, and that a certain sum should be expended in its improvements, conveyed an absolute estate, and not an estate on condition. City of Portland v. Terwilliger, 19 Pac. 80, 93, 16 Or. 465 (citing Wright v. Wilkin, 2 Best & S. 232).

CONDITIONAL.

As used in an insurance policy, the terms "interest" and "title" are not synonymous. A mortgagor in possession and a purchaser holding under a deed defectively executed have both of them absolute as well as insurable interests in the property, though neither of them has the legal title. "Absolute" is here synonymous with "vested," and is used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional." Loventhal v. Home Ins. Co., 112 Ala. 108, 116, 20 South. 419, 33 L. R. A. 258, 57 Am. St. Rep. 17.

CONDITIONAL ACCEPTANCE.

A conditional acceptance is a new offer which requires acceptance to close the bargain. A request, contained in a letter of acceptance, that the proposer take certain action, does not necessarily render the acceptance conditional. Stotesburg v. Massengale, 13 Mo. App. 221, 226.

In Story, Bills, § 239, it is said an acceptance is general when it imports an absolute acceptance precisely in conformity to the tenure of the bill itself. It is conditional or qualified when it contains no qualification, limitation, or condition different from what is expressed on the face of the bill or from what the law implies upon a general acceptance. It is qualified when the drawee absolutely accepts the bill, but makes it payable at a different time or place, or for a different firm, or in a different mode from that which is the tenure of the bill. Todd v. Bank of Kentucky, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 626, 628.

CONDITIONAL APPEARANCE.

An appearance bene esse, if filled up at length, is an appearance conditionally if the summons of scire facias be returned served. If it is, there is a return with a full appearance; so much so that on the writ thus returned the party would be considered in court appearing by his attorney unless on or before the return he entered a retraxit of his appearance. Blair v. Weaver (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 84, 85.

CONDITIONAL BEQUEST.

"A conditional bequest is one the taking effect or continuing of which depends upon the happening or nonoccurrence of a particular event." Mitchell v. Mitchell, 42 N. E. 465, 467, 143 Ind. 113; Farnam v. Farnam, 2 Atl. 325, 328, 53 Conn. 261; Merrill v. Wisconsin Female College, 43 N. W. 104, 74 Wis. 415.

CONDITIONAL CONTRACT.

A conditional contract is defined by Story as "an executory contract, the performance of which depends upon a condition. It is not simply an executory contract, since the latter may be an absolute agreement to do or not to do something, but it is a contract whose very existence and performance depends upon a contingency and condition." Nashville & N. W. R. Co. v. Jones, 42 Tenn. (2 Cold.) 574, 584.

Mr. Story says that an executory contract of sale is absolutely to sell at a future time, while a conditional contract of sale is conditionally to sell. In the one case, he says, the performance of the contract is suspended and deferred to a future time; in the other, the very existence and performance of the contract depends upon a contingency. French v. Osmer, 32 Atl. 254, 255, 67 Vt. 427.

CONDITIONAL CONVEYANCE.

A conditional conveyance is one which is illustrated and limited by some condition, the nonperformance of which will hinder it from operation and effect if it be a condition precedent. Falconer v. Buffalo & J. R. Co., 69 N. Y. 491, 498.

CONDITIONAL DELIVERY.

A conditional delivery of a deed is and can only be made by placing the deed in the hands of a third person, to be kept by him until the performance of some condition or conditions by the grantee or some one else, or until the happening of some event, upon the performance or happening of which the deed is to be delivered by the depositary to the grantee. Again, it follows in case of a conditional delivery, or where the instrument has been deposited as the writing or escrow of the grantor, that it does not become the grantor's deed, and that no estate passes until the event or condition has happened on which it is to be delivered to the grantee, or until the second delivery or redelivery, as it is sometimes called, by the depositary to the grantee. Schmidt v. Deegan, 84 N. W. 83, 84, 69 Wis. 300.

A conditional delivery of a deed is one which passes the deed from the possession of the grantor, but is not to be completed by possession of the grantee, or a third person as his agent, until the happening of a specified event. Dyer v. Skadan, 87 N. W. 277, 278, 128 Mich. 348, 92 Am. St. Rep. 461.

CONDITIONAL DISPOSITION.

A conditional disposition is one which depends upon the occurrence of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take effect or be defeated. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1345; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6865; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1064; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2795.

CONDITIONAL FEE.

A conditional fee, at common law, was a fee restrained to some particular heir exclusive of others, as to the heirs of a man's body, by which only his lineal descendants are admitted, in exclusion of the collateral heirs. Simmons v. Augustin (Ala.) 3 Port. 69, 96; Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 259, 277; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson, 13 Atl. 369, 370, 68 Md. 606. This was at common law construed to be a fee simple upon condition that the grantee had the heirs prescribed. If the grantee die without such issue, the lands revert to the grantor. By having the issue the condition was supposed to be performed for three purposes, to wit, to alien, to forfeit, and to charge. By the performance of the condition the grantee could, by alienation, not only bar his own issue, but the possibility of reversion to the grantor. Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 147, 190. It is a limited fee, which includes qualified or base fees and fees conditional, all of which differ from a fee simple, which imports an absolute inheritance clear of any condition. A conditional fee also differs from a qualified or base fee, which is a fee confined to a person as tenant of a particular place. Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 258, 277. In Idle v. Cook, 1 P. Wms. 74, it is said: "A fee tail was a fee simple at common law, for there were three sorts of fees simple: Absolute; qualified, which was as to time only, to wit, as long as such a tree stood, and also fee simple conditional, which was limited as to the heirs inheritable, for it was not a fee accruing upon the performance of a condition." In reference to the words necessary to create this fee conditional at the common law, we are told that, as the word "heirs" is necessary to create a fee, so the word "body" or some other single word of procreation is necessary to make it a fee tail. Halbert v. Halbert, 21 Mo. 277, 281.

A conditional fee, at common law, was a fee restrained to some particular heirs exclusive of others. Kirk v. Furgerson, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 479, 483.

A fee conditional is such an estate as is to descend indefinitely in the line of the first taker. Buist v. Dawes (S. C.) 4 Rich. Eq. 421, 426.

CONDITIONAL GUARANTY.

A guaranty is conditional when there is some extraneous event, beyond the mere default of the principal, by which the guaranty becomes binding. The liability does not attach immediately on nonpayment or on nonperformance by the principal. In general, it is necessary, to fix the liability of the guarantor, that there should be notice of the guaranty and notice of the principal's default, and reasonable diligence in exhausting reasonable remedies against the principal. Yager v. Kentucky Title Co., 66 S. W. 1027, 1028, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2240, 2241, 112 Ky. 932.

A conditional guaranty of a bill or note is a guaranty that it is collectible by due diligence. Esberg-Bachman Leaf-Tobacco Co. v. Held (U. S.) 62 Fed. 962, 963.

A conditional guaranty, in the law of negotiable instruments, means an undertaking by the guarantor of a note to pay, if payment cannot by reasonable diligence be obtained from the principal debtor. Beardsley v. Hawes, 40 Atl. 1043, 1044, 71 Conn. 39.

CONDITIONAL JUDGMENT.

Under the practice in Virginia, when a defendant has been brought into court by a summons requiring him to appear on a certain day, when a declaration will be or has been filed, if he fail to appear and plead, the clerk enters what is called the "common order." This rule is called the "conditional judgment" because it threatens the defendant with a judgment unless he appear and plead according to its terms. Mahoney v. New South Building & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 70 Fed. 518.

A conditional judgment is one whose force depends upon the performances of certain acts to be done in the future by one of the parties. A judgment ordering partition according to the will of testator, and directing the commissioners to charge the shares of certain of the parties with the sums expressly laid upon them by the will, is not void as conditional because it further directs that, if the sums so charged shall be paid before the commissioner acts, the shares shall be relieved of the charges. Simmons v. Jones, 24 S. E. 114, 115, 118 N. C. 472.

CONDITIONAL LEGACY.

A conditional legacy is a bequest, the existence of which depends on the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take place or to be defeated. Harker v. Smith, 41 Ohio St. 236, 238, 52 Am. Rep. 80; Markham v. Hufford, 82 N. W. 222, 123 Mich. 505, 48 L. R. A. 580, 81 Am. St. Rep. 222. No precise form of words is necessary in order to create a condition in wills, but, whenever it clearly appears that it was a testator's intent to make a condition, that intent should be carried into effect. Markham v. Hufford, 82 N. W. 222, 123 Mich. 505, 48 L. R. A. 580, 81 Am. St. Rep. 222 (citing 2 Williams' Ex'rs, p. 558); Cannon v. Apperson, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 553, 566. Thus, a legacy directed to be paid at the end of two years, provided that the legatee shall be deemed to be a reformed man in the judgment of the executors, is a conditional legacy. Markham v. Hufford, 82 N. W. 222, 123 Mich. 505, 48 L. R. A. 580, 81 Am. St. Rep. 222.

CONDITIONAL LIMITATION.

A condition subsequent, followed by a limitation over in case the condition is not fulfilled or there is a breach of it, is known as a "conditional limitation." Stearns v. Godfrey, 16 Me. (4 Shep.) 158, 160; Williams v. Jones, 60 N. E. 240, 244, 166 N. Y. 522; Fowlkes v. Wagoner (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 586, 592.

A condition followed by a limitation over to a third person in case the condition be not fulfilled, or there is a breach of it, is termed a "conditional limitation." Proprietors of Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 142, 151, 63 Am. Dec. 725.

A conditional limitation is of a mixed nature, and partakes of a condition and limitation; as, if an estate be limited to A. for life, provided that, when C. returns from Rome, it shall thenceforth remain to the use of B. in fee. Smith v. Smith, 23 Wis. 176, 181, 99 Am. Dec. 153.

A conditional limitation is where property is limited over to a third party in case the condition be not fulfilled, denominated by Littleton a condition in law. 1 Inst. 234. In such case the estate determines ipso facto when the contingency happens. Hammond v. Port Royal & A. Ry. Co., 15 S. C. 10, 33.

A condition brings the estate back to the grantor or his heirs. A conditional limitation carries it over to a stranger. A condition terminates an estate. A limitation creates a new one. "A remainder may be limited on a contingency which, if it happens, will operate to abridge or determine the precedent estate, and every such remainder shall be a conditional limitation." Real Property Law, § 43. Williams v. Jones, 60 N. E. 240, 244, 166 N. Y. 522.

A conditional limitation "is of a mixed nature partaking both of a condition and of a limitation; of a condition because it defeats the estate previously limited, and of a limitation because on the happening of the contingency the estate passes to the person having the next expectant interest, without entry or claim." Proprietors of Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 142, 147, 63 Am. Dec. 725; Lockridge v. McCommon, 38 S. W. 33, 34, 90 Tex. 234 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. *128; 2 Minor, Inst. p. 231); Fowlkes v. Wagoner (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 586, 592.

"A conditional limitation—an example of which is a grant to one so long as he occupies the premises, or to a widow during widowhood—differs from a condition subsequent, which is a contingency named on the happening of which a grant may be defeated, only in form, and the fact that re-entry is not necessary to terminate the grant." Hague v. Ahrens (U. S.) 53 Fed. 58, 60, 3 C. C. A. 426.

Conditional limitations are estates "limited so as to be independent of the measure or extent originally given to the first estate, and to take effect in possession upon an event which may happen before the regular determination, to which the first estate is liable from the nature of its original limitation, and so as to rescind it." Shadden v. Hembree, 18 Pac. 572, 575, 17 Or. 14.

If an estate conveyed is expressly so restricted by the instrument creating it that it cannot endure after the happening of a contingency upon which the estate or interest by the terms of the instrument is to cease, then the limitation is said to be conditional. Templeman v. Gibbs, 24 S. W. 792, 793, 86 Tex. 358.

A provision, in a deed conveying land in fee simple, that in case of the grantee's death, without having disposed of the land by deed or will, without issue or their descendants living at the time of his death, the title should pass to others, is valid as a conditional limitation. Lockridge v. McCom- mon, 38 S. W. 33, 34, 90 Tex. 234.

A remainder may be limited on a contingency which, in case it should happen, will operate to abridge or determine the precedent estate; and every such remainder is to be deemed a conditional limitation. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1227.

CONDITIONAL OBLIGATION.

An obligation is conditional when the rights or duties of any party thereto depend upon the occurrence of an uncertain event. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1950; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3768; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1120.

Conditional obligations are such as are made to depend on an uncertain event. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2021. See, also, Moss v. Smoker, 2 La. Ann. 989, 991.

CONDITIONAL PARDON.

A conditional pardon is a pardon granted on condition that it shall only endure until the voluntary doing of some act by the person pardoned or some other person for him. Ex parte Janes, 1 Nev. 319, 321.

CONDITIONAL PROMISE.

A conditional promise is a clause in a contract or agreement which has for its object to suspend, rescind, or modify the principal obligation. A mere limitation as to the amount or purpose of drafts which have been drawn will not render the promise conditional. James v. E. G. Lyons Co., 66 Pac. 210, 212, 134 Cal. 189.

CONDITIONAL PURCHASE.

To constitute a conditional purchase there must be a sale for a valuable consideration between the parties, with a right of repurchase. Flagg v. Mann (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 202, 204.

CONDITIONAL SALE.

A conditional sale is where it is agreed that, until the price is paid, the title is to remain in the vendor. Rose v. Story, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 190, 195, 44 Am. Dec. 121.

A conditional sale is a purchase for a price paid or to be paid, to become absolute on a particular event, or a purchase accompanied by an agreement to resell upon particular terms. Poindexter v. McCannon, 16 N. C. 373, 376, 18 Am. Dec. 591.

A sale with an agreement to repurchase is usually termed a "conditional sale." Crimp v. McCormick Const. Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 366, 367, 18 C. O. A. 595.

A contract by which the owner of chattels agrees to deliver them to one who agrees to pay a certain gross sum as hire, but which does not provide for a return of the chattels, constitutes a conditional sale. Farquhar v. McAlevy, 21 Atl. 811, 812, 142 Pa. 233, 24 Am. St. Rep. 497.

A "conditional sale" of personal property, as the term is used in Pub. St. c. 140, § 23, relating to the reservation of vendors' liens on conditional sales, requiring the vendor to record a written memorandum signed by the purchaser, etc., means a contract of sale under which the property is delivered to the purchaser upon the condition that the title is not to pass until payment is made. Churchill v. Demeritt, 51 Atl. 254, 255, 71 N. H. 110.

Where, by a contract of sale, the vendor is to do anything to the goods before delivery, it is a condition precedent to the vesting of the property, and where anything remains to be done to the goods for ascertaining the price, such as weighing, testing, etc., it is a condition precedent to the transfer of the property; and likewise where the buyer is by contract bound to do anything as a condition precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer. Where an agreement to sell provided that, on the payment of the price or the execution of a mortgage, the seller was to execute a bill of sale, in the meantime title to remain in him, and on default in any payment he was to have the right of recaption, the sale was a conditional one; and this, though the promise to pay was absolute, and notes for the price were given. Van Allen v. Francis, 56 Pac. 339, 340, 123 Cal. 474.

To constitute a conditional delivery it is not necessary that the vendor should declare the condition in express terms at the time of delivery. It is sufficient if it can be inferred from the acts of the parties and the circumstances of the case that it was intended to be conditional. No particular words or terms of expression are necessary for the creation of a conditional sale. Any words which indicate an intention to annex a condition to the sale will be sufficient. Such words, however, as "on condition," "provided," "if it shall so happen," etc., are found in constant use in making conditional sales, and, if employed, will usually remove any doubt as to the sale or transaction. McManus v. Walters, 61 Pac. 686, 688, 62 Kan. 128.

To constitute a conditional sale within the statutes requiring the recording thereof in order to affect third persons, there must be a delivery of possession to the purchaser with the intention of passing immediate ownership, subject only to the reservation of title to the seller as security for the purchase money. Donnelly v. Mitchell, 93 N. W. 369, 371, 119 Iowa, 432.

A conditional sale is one in which the seller retains the title as security, so that, upon failure of the purchaser to pay the purchase money, he may replevy the property, and thereby defeat the sale arising out of plaintiff's demand. Under Act Tenn. 1858, § 2918, providing for a set-off by defendant of any matter arising "out of plaintiff's demand," or "out of the original consideration of any written instrument," it is held that these phrases do not mean all rights that may be asserted, of whatsoever nature, by either party, to the property, or concerning the property, which was the subject of the dealing of the parties. In the first expression quoted, the word "demand" means the assertion of a right to recover a sum of money from the defendant, and subsequently the same ideas are conveyed by the word "consideration" in the second expression. Blair v. A. Johnson & Sons (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 912, 914.

The expressions "cash," "cash down," or "cash on delivery," as used in sales, may be used in two different senses—one where the words indicate simply that the goods must be paid for before the buyer is entitled to possession, and the other where they indicate an intention not to part with the title until the price is paid. A cash sale is not necessarily in law either a conditional or unconditional sale. If by the use of these terms the parties understand merely that no credit is to be given, and the seller will insist on his right to possession until the payment of the price, the sale is so far complete and absolute that the property passes, but, if it is understood that the goods are to remain the property of the seller until the price is paid, the sale is conditional, and the title does not pass. Austin v. Welch, 72 S. W. 881, 883, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 526 (citing Scudder v. Bradbury, 106 Mass. 422; Towne v. Davis, 22 Atl. 450, 66 N. H. 396).

derstanding that there is to be no sale until the happening of a certain condition, this is a bailment, and the title does not pass until the condition happens. If the goods be delivered with the understanding that under certain circumstances the vendee may return them, this is a conditional sale, and title immediately passes, although under the contract the vendee may have the right to rescind and return the goods. In the one case the condition is precedent; in the other, subsequent. Under a contract of sale or return, the title passes, and remains in the vendee until the option to return is exercised. A bailee with an option to purchase does not become a purchaser until he exercises such option. Furst Bros. v. Commercial Bank, 48 S. E. 728, 729, 117 Ga. 472.

The most approved test to be applied to determine whether a contract is a "conditional sale" rather than a bailment lies in ascertaining whether there was a promise to pay for the goods. If so, as a general rule the transaction will be declared a conditional sale. Thus, where goods were consigned to a factor to be sold by him as provided by written contract stipulating that he should buy at a fixed price all goods remaining unsold on a certain date, and that the title should not vest in him until the purchase price should be paid in full, the goods remaining sold after such date are held by him as owner under a conditional sale. Norton v. Fisher, 85 N. W. 801, 802, 113 Iowa, 595.

A conditional sale implies the delivery to the purchaser of the subject-matter, the title passing only upon the performance of a condition precedent or becoming reinvested in the seller upon failure to perform a condition subsequent. It is not infrequently a matter of difficulty to accurately distinguish between a conditional sale and a bailment of property. It is an indelible incident to a bailment. If the identical thing, either in its original or an altered form, is to be returned, it is a bailment. In a contract of sale there is this distinguishing test common to an absolute and a conditional sale: that there must be an agreement, expressed or implied, to pay the purchase price. In a bailment, if a bailment for hire, there must be payment for the use of the thing let or bailed. If service is to be rendered to the subject-matter of the bailment, there must be compensation for the service unless the bailment be a mandate. An agreement to feed and care for cattle at the expense of a defendant whose compensation was to be money realized from the sale of the cattle exceeding a certain sum per head, but who was liable for deterioration in flesh or condition, was a bailment, and not a conditional sale. Union Stock-Yards & Transit Co. v. Western Land & Cattle Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 49, 53, 7 C. C. A. 660.

A contract that the bailee of chattels shall pay a certain stated sum monthly as rent for the use thereof, and that, when the price fixed upon the goods is in that way fully paid, they shall become the property of the bailee, amounts to a conditional sale. Gerrish v. Clark, 13 Atl. 870, 64 N. H. 492.

The term "conditional sale," and not the term "bailment," is correctly applied to the relation arising by a contract by a manufacturer to construct a refrigerating plant in a brewery on foundations to be furnished by the brewer, with a stipulation that the title is not to pass until the entire purchase price has been paid; and therefore, while the sale is valid between the parties, the machinery and plant are subject to be sold on execution against the brewer. Ott v. Sweatman, 81 Atl. 102, 106, 166 Pa. 217.

Mortgage distinguished.

A mortgage, when in the form of a deed absolute, and a conditional sale, are frequently so nearly allied to each other that it is sometimes difficult to say whether a particular transaction is the one or the other. The distinctive difference, however, appears to be this: The former is a security for a debt; the latter a purchase of land for a price paid or to be paid, to become absolute on the occurrence of a particular event, or is a purchase accompanied by an agreement to resell in a given time for a given price. Miller v. Hulbert (Ohio) 6 Wkly. Law Bul. 412.

Where an absolute deed is executed, and by a different instrument the grantee agrees to reconvey to the grantor upon the payment of a stipulated sum within a limited period, it is a question of intention whether the transaction constitutes a mortgage or a conditional sale. Crane v. Bonnell, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 264.

The distinction between a mortgage and a conditional sale is clearly drawn in Turner v. Kerr, 44 Mo. 429, as follows: "A mortgage and a conditional sale are said to be nearly allied to each other, the difference between them being defined to consist in this: that the former is a security for a debt, while the latter is a purchase accompanied by an agreement to resell on particular terms. A conveyance to secure a debt is a mortgage, and the stipulations of the parties cannot make it otherwise. But a conveyance to pay a debt is a totally different affair. If the conveyance extinguishes the debt, and the parties so intend, so that a plea of payment would bar an action thereon, a subsequent stipulation in the interest of the debtor, securing to him an opportunity to reacquire the title, ought not to be construed to the creditor's prejudice. Such a transaction is not a mortgage, but a conditional sale." Holaday v. Willis (Va.) 43 S. E. 616, 617.

"A conveyance to secure the payment of a debt still existing is a mortgage, while a conveyance to pay a debt which extinguishes the same, and with which is coupled an agreement for repurchase, is a conditional sale. In determining whether a transaction is a mortgage or a conditional sale, the understanding and purpose of the parties are to be considered. If they intended an extinguishment of the debt and the vesting of an absolute title, subject only to an agreement to reconvey on specific terms—such, for instance, as a payment of an amount equal to the canceled debt and interest—such a transaction is a conditional sale and a mortgage. That the amount of money to be paid as a condition to the right to demand a reconveyance is measured by the amount of debt and interest is a circumstance of no controlling importance." Turner v. Kerr, 44 Mo. 429, 431.

"The difference between a mortgage and conditional sale is that in a mortgage, though the time of payment be passed, there is an equity of redemption, which continues until foreclosed or barred by the statute of limitations, while in a conditional sale, if the condition of payment is not complied with at or before the time limited, the sale becomes absolute." Weathersly v. Weathersly, 40 Miss. 462, 463, 90 Am. Dec. 344.

The material distinctions between a conditional sale and a mortgage are that in the first there is no right of redemption in the vendor after the expiration of the time fixed for payment of the stipulated price, while in the other the right of redemption continues until sale actually made under decree or until twenty years after strict foreclosure; and that in the first there is not, and in the latter there is, a continuing personal liability for the amount named as the consideration of the conveyance. It is often difficult to draw the line between a mortgage and a conditional sale. The intention of the parties is the only true and infallible test, and this intention is to be gathered from the circumstances surrounding the transaction and the conduct of the parties. A conveyance giving a grantor the right to repurchase on the payment of what he owes the grantee, where the grantee retains no possession or control of the premises, but the grantee selects the tenants, pays taxes, makes repairs, improvements, etc., is a conditional sale, and not a mortgage. Hopper v. Smyser, 45 Atl. 206, 208, 90 Md. 363.

CONDITIONALLY PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

A "'conditionally privileged communication' is a publication made on an occasion which furnishes a prima facie legal excuse for the making of it, and which is privileged unless some additional fact is shown which so alters the character of the occasion as to prevent its furnishing a legal excuse." Ruehs v. Backer, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 395, 405, 19 Am. Rep. 598.

In speaking of a publication, the nature of which exempts the publisher from an action of libel for matters therein stated, the better term is "privileged publication" instead of "privileged communication." Though these terms are often used interchangeably and as synonymous, the term "privileged communication" in its ordinary signification has reference to that class of written messages which either entitle or oblige the party to whom they are communicated to withhold the disclosure of matters thereof. Coogler v. Rhodes, 21 South. 109, 112, 38 Fla. 240, 56 Am. St. Rep. 170.

CONDITIONALLY PRIVILEGED PUBLICATION.

A conditionally privileged publication is the privilege to publish by speech or writing whatever a party honestly believes is essential to the protection of his own rights or to the rights of another, provided the publication be not necessarily made to others than to those persons whom the publisher honestly believes can assist him in the protection of his own rights, or in those whom he believes will, by reason of the knowledge of the matter published, be better able to assert or protect from invasion either their own rights or the rights of others intrusted to their guardianship. George Knapp & Co. v. Campbell, 36 S. W. 765, 767, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 199.

A conditionally privileged publication takes place where circumstances exist, or are reasonably believed by the defendant to exist, which cast upon him the duty of making a communication to certain other persons, to whom he makes such communication in the bona fide performance of such duty. In slightly different language it is said where a person is so situated that it becomes right, in the interest of society, that he should tell to a third person certain facts, then if he, bona fide and without malice, does tell them, it is a privileged communication. Coogler v. Rhodes, 21 South. 109, 112, 38 Fla. 240, 56 Am. St. Rep. 170.

The author of Black, Const. Law, § 164, in speaking of the freedom of the press, says that a publication is said to be conditionally privileged, and the author of it is not to be held accountable for its falsity, if it is made for good ends and from justifiable motives, but otherwise if it is made with malicious intent to injure individuals. In applying this precept to the case of a newspaper, that author formulates the modern doctrine thus: It has often been claimed that publishers of newspapers, in view of the peculiar nature of their business of gathering and disseminating news, should have a more liberal exemption from liability to the law of libel than persons engaged in other occupations, but this claim has never been conceded by the courts. Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co., 20 South. 173, 179, 48 La. Ann. 1116.

Where a matter alleged to be libelous was contained in a letter written by defendant to his mother, and its only publication was by sending the letter to his mother by mail, written by the son for the purpose of informing her as to her rights in certain property, and the danger of their loss unless she took some action to protect them, the communication was a conditional privilege, and it was incumbent on plaintiff to establish malice on the part of defendant. Kimble v. Kimble, 44 Pac. 866, 14 Wash. 369.

CONDITIONED.

Rev. St. Tex. art. 2201, provides that an administrator appealing from an order of removal shall give a bond with two or more good and sufficient sureties, payable to the county judge, conditioned that the appellant shall prosecute said appeal to effect. Held, that the word "conditioned" indicated that there should be in the bond an obligation to pay a specific sum. Munzeshelmer v. Wickham, 12 S. W. 751, 752, 74 Tex. 638.

CONDONATION.

Mr. Bishop has defined the doctrine of "condonation" to be the remission of one of the contracting parties of an offense which he or she knows the other has committed against marriage on condition of being treated by the other with conjugal kindness. This definition necessarily implies a valid marriage and a lawful reinstatement of the matrimonial position or status. Pain v. Pain, 37 Mo. App. 110, 115.

"Condonation is a pardon or forgiveness of a past wrong, fault, or deficiency which has occasioned a breach of some duty or obligation. If there has been an actual forgiveness of a breach of contract on the part of a master to a defaulting servant, he cannot afterwards rely upon such breach in discharging the servant; but such condonation can in no respect extend to subsequent offenses or to a continued deficiency." Leatherberry v. Odell (U. S.) 7 Fed. 641, 648.

A condonation sufficient to defeat a cause for divorce must consist of an offer on the one side to forgive the offense and the acceptance of such forgiveness on the other. "The term 'condonation' necessarily includes that operation of the mind evinced by words or acts as forgiveness; the free, voluntary, and full forgiveness and remission of a matrimonial offense." Betz v. Betz, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 694, 696.

Within the provisions of the Code that a divorce must be denied on the ground of desertion when there is an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action such as establishes a presumption of connivance, collusion, or condonation of the offense, the word "condonation" means forgiveness, and is revoked when the condonee commits the offense, and condonation does not exist where the plaintiff alleged that defendant deserted him, and still continues such desertion without cause and against his will and without his consent, and such allegations are proven. Thomson v. Thomson, 53 Pac. 403, 121 Cal. 11.

"Condonation is not so readily presumed against the wife as the husband. Knowledge of the guilt of the husband and forgiveness by the wife are not legally to be presumed, and must be clearly and distinctly proved in order to bar her action." Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286, 318. It is not so readily presumed as a bar against the wife as against the husband. Forgiveness by a wife with hope of reclaiming her husband is meritorious. Johnson v. Johnson (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 637, 643.

Cohabitation.

Condonation takes place where, after the injury, the parties have become reconciled and have lived together or cohabited as husband and wife. Such cohabitation is a forgiveness of the injury, which prevents it afterwards being brought forward as a ground of divorce. Phillips v. Phillips, 27 Wis. 252, 253; Wood v. Wood (N. Y.) 2 Paige, 108, 110; Hall v. Hall, 4 N. H. 462, 463.

Condonation, as applied to marital offenses, means a voluntary forgiveness thereof; and, while "condonation" will in general be inferred from the sexual intercourse between the parties, such will not be the case, however, where it appears that it was not "voluntary," in any proper sense of the term, on the part of the wife. Thus, where, pending divorce proceedings, negotiations were entered into for a reconciliation and a dismissal of the action, and the parties met in the ladies' room of a hotel, ostensibly for the purpose of making further efforts towards the dismissal of the action, and while the parties were together in such room the husband requested intercourse, which his wife declined, but thereafter submitted to, but not voluntarily, she testifying that "he was so much determined I could not get away from him," and there was a fair inference that the entire arrangement on his part was for the purpose of using the occurrence to defeat the action for divorce, it would not be held that such fact constituted a "condonation" nor a bar to the wife's action. Harnett v. Harnett, 7 N. W. 394, 395, 55 Iowa, 45.

"Condonation" means forgiveness, and refers to all marital offenses. It will be inferred from the fact of sexual intercourse after knowledge of guilt. The general presumption is that a husband and wife living in the same house lived on terms of matrimonial cohabitation. This presumption, however, may be met and overcome by a proof of facts and circumstances which destroy the probability from which the presumption springs that married persons living in the same house maintained marital relations. Thus, if it is satisfactorily established that the parties occupied separate apartments, or had no access to each other, the presumption is destroyed. Graham v. Graham, 25 Atl. 358, 363, 50 N. J. Eq. 701.

"Condonation," as applied to offenses against the marital relation, means the forgiveness of such offenses, which may be evidenced, and most generally is evidenced, by acts of the parties as well as by mere words. Thus, the act of a wife in allowing her husband to return and cohabit with her after she had obtained a decree for separate maintenance, on the ground of his desertion, amounts to a "condonation," though she did the same under the impression that her refusal would furnish ground for divorce, which would entail a cessation of the maintenance. Wade v. Wade (Cal.) 31 Pac. 258, 259.

"Condonation" implies a condition subsequent; that the forgiving party must be treated with conjugal kindness. Civ. Code, § 117. In an action for divorce on the ground of cruelty, there can be no condonation unless there is a reconciliation between the parties, a remission of the matrimonial offenses, and an expressed agreement to condone. Thus, the fact that plaintiff lived and cohabited with defendant after the action was commenced, and until the summons was served, does not effect a condonation. Morton v. Morton, 49 Pac. 557, 558, 117 Cal. 443.

"Condonation" of a married person's acts which will constitute a bar to divorce by the other party is not an absolute term, which can be applied alike to all circumstances. Its application will vary as the offense said to have been condoned may vary. If the offense be adultery, knowledge of the fact by the defendant, followed by cohabitation, is ipso facto condonation; but if, for instance, it is habitual drunkenness on the part of the husband which is the ground for condonation from cohabitation, it does not take place until the final crisis is reached, for the term "habitual" implies growth from various and increasing stages until drunkenness becomes a fixed or established habit, and since until this degree is reached it is not a ground for divorce it cannot be maintained that when this degree is reached the wife would be repelled because she had remained loyally with her husband, suffering, and yet striving to save him until the final crisis is reached. So of cruelty. Cruelty is cumulative, admitting of degrees and augmenting by addition, so that it may be condoned, and even forgiven, for a time and up to a certain point without any bar, in sense or reason, to bring it all forward when the continuance of it has rendered it no longer condonable. Cruelty extending through series of years must consist of numerous acts, many of which might, and possibly would, be of themselves of a character not to warrant a divorce, yet, constantly recurring, they would indicate a wicked mind, and taken all together would show that the condition of the suffering was unsafe, and beyond the point of further forbearance. Mere endurance is not a condonation. McClanahan v. McClanahan, 56 S. W. 858, 861, 104 Tenn. 217 (quoting 2 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. § 306).

In Youngs v. Youngs, 22 N. E. 806, 130 Ill. 230, 6 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313, it was held that where a wife, after acts of cruelty, lived with her husband from December to March, and cohabited with him, it was such condonation as would prevent a divorce. Abbott v. Abbott, 61 N. E. 350, 351, 192 Ill. 439.

As a conditional forgiveness.

"Condonation" of acts by one of the parties to a marriage which would furnish grounds of divorce to the other is "a conditional forgiveness, the condition being that the offense shall not be repeated. If the charge or offense be repeated, then the condonation is to be deemed withdrawn or avoided, and the party forgiving may avail himself of the facts alleged to have been condoned, just as if no condonation had occurred." Eggerth v. Eggerth, 16 Pac. 650, 651, 15 Or. 626.

Condonation is a conditional forgiveness by one of the married parties of a matrimonial offense committed by the other, and which would constitute a cause of divorce; and if a person has a right to a divorce for any cause he is not bound to exercise it, but may waive or abandon it. The peace and equity of families, the tranquility of society, and a proper regard for the welfare of the issue of the marriage which may be born after the time of the condonation, constitute the most potent reasons on which the principle rests. Turnbull v. Turnbull, 23 Ark. 615, 619.

"Condonation" is defined to be the forgiveness, either express or implied, by a husband of his wife, or by a wife of her husband, for a breach of marital duty, with an implied condition that the offense shall not be repeated. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 34 Ind. 368, 369 (citing Webst. Dict.).

The condonation which will bar a suit for divorce is forgiveness upon condition that the injury shall not be repeated, and is dependent upon future good usage and conjugal kindness; but it must be free, for if obtained by force and violence it is not binding, and if made upon express conditions the conditions must be fulfilled, and it must also be fairly obtained. An act of condonation induced by false representation can be no more binding than any contract obtained by fraud. Farnham v. Farnham, 73 Ill. 497, 500.

It is a settled and familiar law that cohabitation which will condone past matrimonial offenses is conditioned upon future good behavior of the spouse whose offenses are condoned, and that when, after the condonation, the offenses are repeated, the right to make them a ground of divorce revives. Twyman v. Twyman, 27 Mo. 383. Where a wife has separated from her husband for causes which would entitle her to a divorce, her return to him for the sole purpose of nursing him while he is suffering from a supposed mortal ailment is not necessarily a condonation of past offenses, even though she remain with him for several years. Guthrie v. Guthrie, 26 Mo. App. 566, 573.

Civ. Code, § 115, defines "condonation" as the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce, and section 116 makes the following requirements essential to condonation: (1) A knowledge on the part of the condoner of the facts constituting the cause of divorce; (2) reconciliation and remission of the offense by the injured party; (3) the restoration of the offending party to all marital rights. Wolff v. Wolff, 36 Pac. 767, 768, 102 Cal. 433.

All "condonations," especially the implied, are upon the condition both that the offense shall not be repeated, and likewise that continually afterwards the party forgiven shall treat the other with conjugal kindness, whereupon a breach of the condition revives the original right of divorce. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 308. Fisher v. Fisher, 48 Atl. 833, 834, 93 Md. 298 (citing Johnson v. Johnson [N. Y.] 14 Wend. 637); Creech v. Creech, 85 N. W. 726, 126 Mich. 267; Sharp v. Sharp, 6 N. E. 15, 19, 116 Ill. 509; Heist v. Heist, 67 N. W. 790, 791, 48 Neb. 794; Owens v. Owens, 31 S. E. 72, 74, 96 Va. 191; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 32 Miss. 279, 289; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 34 Ind. 368, 369; Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286, 318.

"Condonation," as the term is used in the divorce law, is always a forgiveness of an offense upon condition that it will not be repeated; and we have held that where an offense has been condoned, such as cruelty, and the party forgiven has subsequently been guilty of such conduct as to lead the wife or husband condoning the offense to believe that it will or may be repeated, the condonation will be thereby avoided. Abbott v. Abbott, 61 N. E. 350, 351, 192 Ill. 439.

"Condonation of criminal treatment is not absolute, but only conditional, forgiveness. It is subject to the implied condition that the injury shall not be repeated, and that the other party shall thereafter be treated with conjugal kindness. After condonation, former injuries will be revived by subsequent similar misconduct, although of a slighter nature." Crichton v. Crichton, 40 N. W. 638, 640, 73 Wis. 59; Phillips v. Phillips, 27 Wis. 252, 253; Lutz v. Lutz, 28 Atl. 315, 316, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 241; Abbott v. Abbott, 61 N. E. 350, 351, 192 Ill. 439. In Farnham v. Farnham, 73 Ill. 497, it was held that condonation of personal acts of violence and cruelty may be avoided by abusive language and opprobrious epithets.

Condonation is forgiveness for the past upon the condition that the wrongs shall not be repeated, and is dependent upon future good conduct. It must be free and voluntary. Where a wife, while sick and suffering intense pain, scarcely knowing what she did or said, on being asked by her husband to forgive him all the wrongs he had done her, told him she would forgive him, whatever of condonation there may have been in this was forfeited on his thereafter renewing and repeating his acts of cruelty. Wessels v. Wessels, 28 Ill. App. 253, 258.

Condonation implies a condition subsequent; that the forgiving party must be treated with conjugal kindness. Civ. Code, § 117. Condonation is revoked, and the original cause of divorce revived, (1) when the condonee commits acts constituting a like or other cause of divorce; (2) when the condonee is guilty of great conjugal unkindness not amounting to a cause of divorce, but sufficiently habitual and gross to show that the condition of condonation had not been accepted in good faith or not fulfilled. Section 121. Thus, where a wife left her husband because of his violent treatment of her, but was persuaded to return to him, and he thereafter renewed his former cruel treatment, there was no condonation. Andrews v. Andrews, 52 Pac. 298, 299, 120 Cal. 184.

"Condonation," as used in the chapter relating to the dissolution of marriage, is the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of action. The following requirements are necessary to condonation: (1) A knowledge on the part of the condoner of the facts constituting the cause of divorce; (2) reconciliation and remission of the offense by the injured party; (3) restoration of the offending party to all marital rights. Condonation implies a condition subsequent that the forgiving party must be treated with conjugal kindness. When the cause of divorce consists of a course of offensive conduct, or arises in cases of cruelty from successive acts of ill-treatment, which may aggregately constitute the offense, cohabitation or passive endurance or conjugal kindness shall not be evidence of condonation of any of the acts constituting such cause, unless accompanied by an express agreement to condone. In such cases condonation can be made only after the cause of divorce has become complete as to the acts complained of. A fraudulent concealment by the condonee of facts constituting a different cause of divorce from the one condoned, and existing at the time of condonation, avoids such condonation. Rev. Code N. D. 1899, §§ 2747, 2748; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 77, 78.

Knowledge of facts required.

"Condonation" is the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 163; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 115.

"Condonation" of an act done by one of the parties to a marriage means forgiveness, absolution, wiping out of all the past. It must be with knowledge and such knowledge as will satisfy a prudent man that a crime has been committed, and done with the intention of forgiving the offense. Ellis v. Ellis (N. J.) 9 Atl. 884, 886; Owens v. Owens, 31 S. E. 72, 74, 96 Va. 191; Wolff v. Wolff, 36 Pac. 767, 768, 102 Cal. 433.

"Condonation," as the term is used in the law of divorce, means a continuance of the connubial relation, with full knowledge of all the facts giving rise to a cause of divorce. Polson v. Polson, 39 N. E. 498, 499, 140 Ind. 310; Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286, 318.

There can be no "condonation" or forgiveness of adultery unless the party condoning has knowledge of the offense, or of such facts as fairly import that she should have known. Merrill v. Merrill, 58 N. Y. Supp. 503, 504, 41 App. Div. 347.

The term "condonation" in the law of divorce cannot be applied to an act of the husband in living with his wife after she has given him cause to sue for divorce, if the husband has no knowledge of her wrongful acts, but merely a suspicion. Bailey v. Bailey, 29 Atl. 847, 67 N. H. 402.

To establish condonation as a defense to an action for divorce for the adultery of the wife, it is not only necessary that the husband should have full knowledge of the facts, but that he should be able to prove them. Hence a private oral confession by the wife to the husband would not suffice, as there would be no means of proving it, nor would mere circumstances of a suspiclous nature be sufficient to constitute knowledge. It is further necessary that the husband should believe the wife to be guilty, and a knowledge of the fact implies not merely acquaintance with the facts concurring to prove the particular charge of adultery, but of all then existing charges of adultery. Uhlman v. Uhlman (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 236, 263.

Offer to return.

Condonation "is a meeting of the minds of the parties on an offer on one side to forgive upon specified conditions, and the acceptance of such forgiveness, and the performance of those conditions by the other; and an act of condonation, to be effectual, must be one to which husband and wife both assent, and in which each participates. An unaccepted offer to return to the matrimonial bed is not of itself a condonation, but only an expression of willingness to condone." Betz v. Betz (N. Y.) 19 Abb. Prac. 90, 92.

A voluntary promise merely by a wife to return and live with her husband does not constitute a condonation, since it neither remitted his offenses nor restored him to marital rights. Wolff v. Wolff, 36 Pac. 767, 768, 102 Cal. 433.

CONDUCE.

The word "conduce" means to tend or contribute toward a proof of the fact. Evidence may conduce to establish the proof of a fact which it is very far from establishing, and which could not be fairly inferred from it. Thus an instruction that the demurrant must be considered as admitting all that could reasonably be inferred by the jury from the evidence given against him is much more correct than the expression that the demurrant must admit or is considered as admitting every fact which the evidence may conduce to prove. Hansbrough's Ex'r v. Thom (Va.) 3 Leigh, 147, 159.

CONDUCT.

See "Disorderly Conduct"; "Good Conduct"; "Improper Conduct"; "Justifiable Conduct."

To "conduct" is defined by Worcester as to carry on, to manage, to regulate; and hence the use of the term "as heretofore conducted," when used in the conveyance of a fishery as it had theretofore been conducted, refers to how the fishery was carried on, managed, or regulated, and had no reference to the extent of the fishery, where the extent of the grant was clearly defined. Harvey v. Vandergrift, 89 Pa. 346, 352.

To "conduct" is defined in the Century Dictionary to mean "to direct the course of, to manage, to carry on." Thompson v. Ackerman, 12 O. C. D. 456, 463.

An order of court directing a receiver to "conduct and run" a hotel is sufficient authority to perform acts necessary to the conduct of the business, and hence sufficient to authorize the receiver to make purchases of necessary merchandise on credit, in the absence of any provision enabling him to raise money. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Thornton (Ala.) 16 South. 699, 700.

Under Pilot Act, 6 Geo. IV, c. 175, § 70, providing that if one who is not a licensed pilot shall continue in the "charge or conduct" of any ship or vessel after any duly licensed pilot shall have offered to take charge of such ship, such unlicensed pilot shall forfeit a certain sum, a person employed to tow or move a vessel, if the bona fide object of the employment be the moving power, is not included, as such person is not a pilot and has not the conduct or charge of the vessel. The words mean the taking the charge and direction of as a pilot, whose proper and sole duty is to select the course and take the management and conduct of the vessel for the purpose of directing her in that course. Beilby v. Scott, 7 M. & W. 93, 100.

Of actions.

Under a statute providing that the town clerk shall be paid the usual personal charges for "conducting or opposing bills in parliament and conducting actions or suits," in law or equity, the clerk is not confined to actual proceedings in an action or suit, but would extend, for instance, to a mandamus if one had been directed for the purpose of settling a question in dispute. He is entitled to charges for having prevented litigation by his laudable exertions made under the sanction of the town. Regina v. Prest, 16 Q. B. 31, 44.

The "conduct of business" of necessity includes necessary agents or servants. People v. Feitner, 61 N. E. 762, 763, 168 N. Y. 494.

"Conducted," as used in Gen. St. § 1753, providing that all local option elections shall be "conducted" according to the laws governing municipal elections of the city, town, or village in which they are held, was intended to embrace the declaration of the result, and was not used in its strict and limited sense. Blake v. Walker, 23 S. C. 517, 524.

"Conducting," as applied to an election, relates to the mode of voting, the mode of receiving and registering the votes, and computing them. The giving a casting vote is not a part of the manner of conducting an election, but is effecting the election. It is so far from being the manner of conducting the election that it is absolutely making the election. State v. Adams (Ala.) 2 Stew. 231, 242.

Of person or party.

The "conduct" of a party, in its broad sense, consists of acts, words, silence, or negative omission to do anything. It consists of the entire manner of life of a person. The term is frequently used and is an important factor in the law of estoppel, especially in that class of estoppels the foundation of which is justice and good conscience; its object being to prevent the unconscientious and inequitable assertion of claims or rights which might have existed or been enforced by other rules of law unless prevented by estoppel. Hallowell Nat. Bank v. Marston, 27 Atl. 529, 531, 85 Me. 488.

If there be a metaphysical distinction between character and conduct, there is no authority in law for admitting evidence of conduct where evidence of character would be excluded. Character or reputation is generally regarded as the voice of the community, but that is just what the conduct of the individual makes it. "The speech of the people," as it is most descriptively called, is suggested by the general tenure of the conduct, so that to prove the one is in effect to prove the other. The text-writers of the adjudged cases generally speak of "conduct" and "character" as convertible terms. Zitzer v. Merkel, 24 Pa. (12 Har.) 408, 410.

"Conduct" is defined as personal deportment, mode of action, and behavior, and is so used in Gen. St. 1889, § 2591, providing that in all actions against incorporated cities for damages, in consequence of the action of mobs, the reputation and conduct of the person injured may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. Adams v. City of Salina, 48 Pac. 918, 919, 58 Kan. 246.

CONDUCTED AND HOLDEN.

The words "conducted and holden," in Acts 1901, p. 60, c. 4930, § 7, providing that a copy of the record of the result of the canvas of the returns of the election held under the local option law should be prima facie evidence that such election was legally called, conducted, and holden, should be construed to embrace a declaration of the result. By the provision that the record of the canvas should be evidence of an election legally called, conducted, and holden, it was certainly intended that the result of the election, as well as the fact that an election had been had, should be shown thereby, and this includes the canvas. Brass v. State (Fla.) 34 South. 307, 309.

CONDUCTOR.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

"Conductor" is the name of a bailee in a bailment in which goods are left with the bailee to be used by him for hire. Per Holt, C. J., in Coggs v. Bernard, Ld. Raym. 909, 913.

In construing a statute providing that "every railroad corporation shall be liable for damages sustained by any employé thereof without contributory negligence on his part, when such damage is caused by the negligence of any train dispatcher, telegraph operator, superintendent, yard master, conductor, or engineer, or of any other employé who has charge or control of any stationary signal, target point, block or switch," the court said: "There were at the time of the enactment, and had been for a long period of years theretofore, and have been subsequently, in railroad service everywhere in this country, as a matter of common knowledge, officers known as superintendents in the operating department of the road—general superintendents of the whole line and superintendents of divisions. The general duties of such superintendents are intimately connected with the movement of trains and cars. Now, it must be presumed that the Legislature used the word as it was commonly used; that they had in mind the officers of railroads to whom the term was generally applied. The position of superintendent in the railway service is as definitely and well known as that of train dispatcher, telegraph operator, conductor, or engineer. It could not be sincerely claimed that the word 'conductor' can be applied to the foreman of a section gang or of a bridge crew because he merely conducts or manages the work, or that it can be applied to any other conductor than the one who manages the railroad train; and yet the act does not say 'train conductor.' It could not be sincerely claimed that the word 'engineer' can be applied to the engineer who locates tracks and does engineering work of that kind, or who runs some little stationary pumping engine, or to any one of many other persons connected with railroad service that might properly be called engineers; and yet the act does not say 'locomotive engineer.' And the same illustration might be given in respect to each of the persons specifically named in the act. It may thus be clearly seen that to apply the word 'superintendent' to the mere foreman of a repair shop would be entirely inconsistent with the obvious purpose of the act." Hartford v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 64 N. W. 1033, 1034, 91 Wis. 374.

CONDUIT.

"Conduit," as used in Revision, p. 650, conferring on a corporation the right to "take and divert any and all such springs and streams of water, and erect, alter, and repair reservoirs and works, and lay down all such pipes and conduits as shall be necessary," etc., includes an open canal cut in the earth, and laid in and lined with cement. Cheyney v. Atlantic City Water Works Co., 26 Atl. 95, 96, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 235.

"Conduit is a general word which applies to any channel or structure by which flowing water can be conducted from one point to another. It includes a ditch, flume, pipe, or any kind of aqueduct." Sefton v. Prentice, 37 Pac. 641, 642, 103 Cal. 670.

CONFECTIONERY.

A "confectionery," as defined by Webster, is a place where sweetmeats and similar things are made and sold. Such business does not include the selling of liquors by the drink, and hence a confectioner's license in a city whose ordinance requires the licensing of both confectionery and drinking saloons is not sufficient to authorize its holder to sell liquors by the drink. City of New Orleans v. Jane, 34 La. Ann. 667, 668.

An indictment charging the defendant with fraudulently adulterating one pound of "confectionery" is insufficient to describe the substance adulterated. "The word 'confectionery' is a generic word, which includes a great variety of kinds of articles usually sold in a confectioner's shop, and does not describe the substance which the defendant is charged with adulterating with the precision and certainty that the Constitution of the commonwealth and rules of criminal pleading require." Commonwealth v. Chase, 125 Mass. 202, 203.

CONFEDERACY.

"Confederacy (confederatio) is when two or more persons combine together to do any damage or injury to another, or to do any unlawful act." State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271, 284, 22 Am. Rep. 719; Watson v. Harlem & New York Nav. Co. (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 348, 353.

CONFEDERATE.

Confederate currency as cash, see "Cash."

Confederate treasury note as bill of credit, see "Bill of Credit."

CONFEDERATE MONEY.

"Confederate money" was and is an obligation or a promise of the Confederate States to pay a certain number of dollars therein mentioned to bearer, in a specified time after a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States.

It did not purport to be of any value unless the Rebellion should prove to be a success. Goodman v. McGehee, 31 Tex. 252, 254.

CONFESSION.

See "By Confession"; "Extrajudicial Confession"; "Implied Confession"; "Indirect Confession"; "Judgment by Confession"; "Judicial Confession"; "Relative Confession"; "Simple Confession"; "Voluntary Confession."

"A 'confession' means ordinarily the acknowledgment of some facts." Adams v. Tator, 10 N. Y. Supp. 617, 618, 57 Hun, 302.

Confessions are divided into two classes—judicial and extrajudicial. Judicial confessions are such as are made before a magistrate or court in due course of legal proceedings, while extrajudicial confessions are such as are made by a party elsewhere than before a magistrate or any court, and include either express or implied confessions. Speer v. State, 4 Tex. App. 474, 479.

A confession is an admission of something done antecedently, and hence the admission of a member of a firm, while the firm is in existence, that the proceeds of a note executed by him actually went to the use of the firm, was not a confession. Uhler v. Browning, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 79, 82.

A confession in an answer that plaintiff was entitled to recover damages to a certain amount is an admission of a cause of action as alleged in the description only to the extent of its terms, and no further, and must then be taken as it is made, since the policy of the law relative to confessions is to enable the defendant, by an admission of so much of the claim as he thinks fit, to limit the controversy to the matters really in dispute, without changing in any respect the situation of the parties as to the matters not admitted, and it would defeat the entire object of confession if it were held to contain any implied admission as to the matters left open to controversy. A confession may doubtless be made in such form as to admit the entire cause of action; but where a cause of action is in its nature divisible, and the defendant confesses it in part only, it is immaterial in what terms and in what manner the extent of the confession is limited—it will not be construed to extend beyond those terms. Hackett v. B. O. & M. R. Co., 35 N. H. 390, 397, 398.

As acknowledgment of guilt.

A "confession," as defined in Black's Law Dictionary, "is a voluntary statement made by a person charged with the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, communicated to another person, wherein he acknowledges himself to be guilty of the offense charged, and discloses the circumstances of the act, or the share and participation which he had in it." Spicer v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 51 S. W. 802, 803.

A "confession" is an admission or declaration, made by a party who has committed a crime or misdemeanor, of his agency or participation therein, and is generally restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 632, 637; People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457, 461; People v. Le Roy, 4 Pac. 649, 650, 65 Cal. 613; People v. Ammerman (Cal.) 50 Pac. 15, 18; People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, 157; People v. Miller, 54 Pac. 523, 524, 122 Cal. 84; State v. Red, 4 N. W. 831, 835, 53 Iowa, 69; State v. Carr, 53 Vt. 37, 44; Territory v. Underwood, 19 Pac. 398, 400, 8 Mont. 131; State v. Carson (S. C.) 15 S. E. 588, 590; Mora v. People, 35 Pac. 179, 182, 19 Colo. 255; Taylor v. State, 37 Neb. 788, 796, 56 N. W. 623, 625; Johnson v. People (Ill.) 64 N. E. 286, 287.

"Confession" or admission, in that sense, means something to the effect that the party himself had some criminal or questionable relation to the alleged crime. State v. Carr, 53 Vt. 37, 44.

"A free and voluntary confession is deserving of the highest credit, because it is presumed to flow from the strongest sense of guilt, and therefore it is admitted as proof of the crime to which it refers; but a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or the tortures of fear comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as evidence of guilt, that no credit should be given it." Citing Eyre, C. B., in Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach, Cr. Cas. 299: "The important inquiry is whether the confession has been made under the influence of hope or fear brought to bear on the prisoner's mind by third persons. When these influences are direct and strongly made, the courts uniformly reject the confession, and this is especially so when made under arrest to the officer having the prisoner in charge or by other persons having authority." Territory v. Underwood, 19 Pac. 398, 400, 8 Mont. 131.

A confession is rather a fact to be proved by evidence than evidence to prove a fact. It is not so much proof that a particular thing took place as it is a waiver by the party charged of his right to have certain facts alleged against him technically proved. Where defendants were on trial together, and neither defendant implicated himself in the statement made by him, such statements are not confessions. State v. Carson, 15 S. E. 588, 590, 36 S. C. 524.

By confession is meant direct confession; where a person charged directly confesses the crime with which he is charged.

This direct confession is the highest confession which can be, and carries with it so strong a presumption of guilt that an entry on record, "Quod cognovit indictamentum," etc., in an indictment for trespass, estops the defendant to plead not guilty to an action brought afterwards against him for the same matter. State v. Oxendine, 19 N. C. 435, 437 (citing 2 How. 466 [B 2, c. 31, §§ 1, 2]).

Where the term "confession" is used in criminal law, it is generally restricted to an acknowledgment of guilt. Where words in themselves are consistent with the innocence of the party, and are therefore admissible in evidence, it is erroneous for the court to charge the jury as to the effect of a confession. Lee v. State, 29 S. E. 264, 265, 102 Ga. 221.

The confession made by an accused without intimidation, threats, or inducement on the part of the officer of the law is admissible in evidence. State v. Berry (La.) 24 South. 329, 331.

A confession is an admission made at any time by a party stating or suggesting that he committed that crime. Under such definition a statement made by the accused shortly prior to the homicide, on the accusation by the decedent of stealing his money, that she did not have his money, does not constitute a confession. State v. Spillers (La.) 29 South. 480, 481.

A statement by defendant denying that he had stolen the money as charged, and accounting for his possession by claiming to have found it, is not a confession. People v. Ammerman, 50 Pac. 15, 18, 118 Cal. 23. A declaration by the person accused of crime, denying any criminal act, and explaining incriminating circumstances brought against him, to show his innocence of any crime, is not a confession. Mora v. People, 35 Pac. 179, 182, 19 Colo. 255.

The statement by the accused, in an answer to the statement of an officer, that "this looks suspicious," "well, damned if it don't," is not a confession. People v. Hickman, 45 Pac. 175, 176, 113 Cal. 80.

The common-law confession is practically the testimony of the accused given in open court, conclusively proving the facts in issue, and sufficient of itself to support conviction. State v. Willis, 41 Atl. 820, 824, 71 Conn. 293.

Acts and admissions of one charged with criminal libel, tending to show his proprietorship of the paper in which the libel was published, are not confessions, in legal contemplation. People v. Miller, 54 Pac. 523, 524, 122 Cal. 84.

The confession must be voluntary. It is well said that if induced by the flattery of hope or the torture of fear the confession is inadmissible. State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 581, 597.

The confession of an infant, disclosing no fact pregnant with any circumstance to give it authority, or in any way to corroborate it, is a simple, naked confession, and when obtained from an infant under the age of 11 years by some degree of pressure, at least after a firm denial, ought not to have been admitted in evidence, and, if admitted, ought not to be ground of a conviction. State v. Aaron, 4 N. J. Law (1 South.) 231, 240, 7 Am. Dec. 592.

Admission or declaration distinguished.

The word "confession" is not the mere equivalent of the word "statement" or "declaration." Taylor v. State, 37 Neb. 788, 796, 56 N. W. 623, 625; People v. Miller, 54 Pac. 523, 524, 122 Cal. 84 (citing People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151).

A confession in criminal law is the voluntary declaration made by a person who has committed a crime or misdemeanor to another of the agency or participation which he had in the same. The term "admission" usually applied to civil transactions and to those matters of fact in criminal cases which do not involve criminal intent; the word "confession" relating to the acknowledgment of guilt and admission relating to the acknowledgement of fact. State v. Heidenreich, 45 Pac. 755, 29 Or. 381; State v. Porter, 49 Pac. 964, 966, 32 Or. 135; State v. Reinhart, 38 Pac. 822, 825, 26 Or. 466. Thus, the statements of the accused admitting that he purposely committed the homicide are, strictly speaking, confessions, though they embrace narrations tending to show or present an excuse for the killing. State v. Porter, 49 Pac. 964, 966, 32 Or. 135. So, where the evidence merely shows an admission of facts from which a conclusion of guilt might in a certain instance be drawn, the use of the word "confession" in a charge was erroneous. State v. Heidenreich, 45 Pac. 755, 29 Or. 381.

A "confession" is a person's declaration of his agency of participation in a crime. The term is restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. A confession is limited in its precise scope and meaning to the criminal act itself. It does not apply to acknowledgments of facts merely tending to establish guilt, since a damaging fact may be admitted without any intention to confess guilt. These are criminating admissions, rather than confessions. Where a person only admits certain facts from which the jury may or may not infer guilt, there is no confession. State v. Picton (La.) 25 South. 375, 377; State v. Reinhart, 38 Pac. 822, 825, 26 Or. 466; Taylor v. State, 56 N. W. 623, 625, 37 Neb. 788. The false entries in the books of a firm kept by the defendant, though they tend to prove the commission of the crime charged, do not constitute a confession. State v. Reinhart, 38 Pac. 822, 825, 26 Or. 466.

There is a clear distinction between a confession and an admission or declaration, unless the admission or declaration has within it the scope and purpose of a confession, in which its distinguishing feature as an admission or declaration is lost in the broader term "confession." A confession is a voluntary admission or declaration by a person of his agency or participation in a crime. To make an admission or declaration a confession, it must in some way be an acknowledgment of guilt, and be so intended, for it must be involuntary. A mere admission or declaration by a defendant against his interests is not necessarily a confession, and this is true even though the admissions are criminating. A confession of guilt is an admission of a criminal act itself, and not an admission of a fact or circumstance from which guilt may be inferred. State v. Novak, 79 N. W. 465, 468, 109 Iowa, 717.

The term "admission" is usually applied to civil action, and confession or acknowledgment of guilt in criminal prosecution. Where statements are made by a defendant to an officer, they may be received as an admission against interest, even though they might be regarded as a confession in a criminal court. Notara v. De Kamalaris, 49 N. Y. Supp. 216, 219, 22 Misc. Rep. 337.

The word "confession" is not the mere equivalent of the word "statement" or "declaration." People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, 157; People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457, 461.

As confidential communications.

"Confessions," as used in Acts 1879, p. 245, providing that clergymen shall be incompetent to testify concerning confessions made to them in the course of discipline enjoined by their church, includes only such confessions as are penitential in their character, or were made to clergymen in obedience to some supposed religious duty or obligation, and do not embrace communications to clergymen, however confidential, which were not made in connection with or in discharge of some supposed religious duty, or when made to them while in the discharge of duties other than those which pertain to the office of a clergyman. Knight v. Lee, 80 Ind. 201, 203.

Wrongdoing implied.

"Confess" has several different meanings, but is ordinarily used to characterize the admission of sin or wrongdoing, and such is its meaning when used in a newspaper statement that a person has made a confession to the district attorney of the entire affair. Gallagher v. Bryant, 60 N. Y. Supp. 844, 845, 44 App. Div. 527.

CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

See "Plea of Confession and Avoidance."

The expression "confession and avoidance" means the same as "new matter constituting a defense," used in many codes with reference to the answer. Finley v. Quirk, 9 Minn. 194 (Gil. 179, 187), 86 Am. Dec. 93.

CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT.

See "Offer to Confess Judgment."

The phrase "confession of judgment" has a popular as well as a technical significance. As popularly understood, it signifies an acknowledgment of indebtedness, upon which it is contemplated that a judgment may and will be rendered. Kinyon v. Fowler, 10 Mich. 16, 18.

Confession of judgment is the voluntary submission to the jurisdiction of the court, giving by consent, and without the service of process, what could otherwise only be obtained by summons and complaint and through formal proceedings. A person who confesses a judgment submits to be sued in that form and manner. The confession of a judgment is but one of the ways and processes, one manner, by which a person is sued. First Nat. Bank v. Garlinghouse (N. Y.) 53 Barb. 615, 619.

CONFIDE.

See "Wholly Confiding."

A statute providing that physicians are not competent witnesses as to matters "confided" to them in the course of their profession, unless with the consent of the party making such confidential communication, does not mean that the knowledge which he has was obtained through statements by the patient under an injunction of secrecy, expressed or implied, but matters which he has learned by observation or by examination of the patient are matters "confided" to him within the meaning of the statute, and he cannot be compelled to testify concerning them without the patient's consent. Masonic Mut. Ben. Ass'n v. Beck, 77 Ind. 203, 209, 40 Am. Rep. 295.

1 Wag. St. 500, § 9, providing that if any guardian of any female under the age of 18 years, or any other person to whose care or protection any such female "shall have been confided," shall defile her, he shall be punished, etc., means that the other person alluded to should occupy a position similar to that of a guardian, or stand in some attitude in which a peculiar or confidential trust was reposed. It is not necessary that he should be the legal protector of the female, but it is essential that she should have been committed to his special care with the expectation that he should exercise a supervision over her; and hence a female who was allowed by her father to go and assist the defendant in laboring for one day was not specially confided to his protection and care within the meaning of the statute. State v. Arnold, 55 Mo. 89, 91.

The word "confide," as used in a will, according to Perry on Trusts (volume 1, c. 4, § 112), in a clause that the testator confides in a legatee to make a certain disposition of the fund bequeathed, is a word of intention, which the court will carry into effect as if the testator had used an absolute word of devise in trust, and the court will direct the donee or first taker to hold as a trustee for those whom the donor intended to benefit. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, 589.

CONFIDENCE.

See "Full Confidence."

The word "confidence" is a word peculiarly appropriate to create a trust. It is, as applicable to the subject of a trust, as nearly a synonym as the English language is capable of. "Trust" is a confidence which one man reposes in another, and "confidence" is a trust. Appeal of Coates, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 129, 133.

The words "having confidence," when used in a will in which testator bequeaths certain property to certain beneficiaries, having confidence that they will use the property for certain purposes, have always been held by the courts not to impose any obligation or create any trust. Willets v. Willets (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 401, 407.

CONFIDENCE GAME.

"A confidence game" is the "obtaining, or attempting to obtain, money or property by means of the use of any false or bogus check, or by any other fraudulent means, instrument, or device." Morton v. State, 47 Ill. 468, 474.

A "confidence game" is any swindling operation in which advantage is taken of the confidence reposed by the victim in the swindler. Maxwell v. People, 41 N. E. 995, 998, 158 Ill. 248. See, also, Du Bois v. People, 65 N. E. 658, 659, 200 Ill. 157, 93 Am. St. Rep. 183.

"Confidence game," as used in Rev. St. Mo. 1889, § 2836, providing that every person who, with intent to defraud, obtains money or valuables by means of an instrument or a device commonly called the "confidence game," shall be deemed guilty of a felony, is not a charge of any specific offense, as the words are no expression of the nature and cause of the accusation against the defendant. State v. Cameron, 22 S. W. 1024, 1025, 117 Mo. 371.

Inducing men to bet on the top or bottom of dice, and procuring money from a man for that purpose, or getting possession of his pocketbook for the purpose of betting, is enough of a "confidence game" to sustain a conviction therefor and distinguish it from robbery, although fear is aroused in him for the loss of his money by threats and insinuations in regard to the danger of gambling in a saloon. Van Eyck v. People, 52 N. E. 852, 853, 178 Ill. 199.

CONFIDENCE MAN.

Any person or persons who shall obtain or procure, or attempt to obtain or procure, from any other persons any money or valuable thing by means of any game or games, or any fraudulent pretense or pretenses, practice or practices, scheme, trick, device, or deception, and any person who shall confederate, conspire, or combine with any bunco-steerer or other person or persons for the purpose and with intent to procure or obtain, or to attempt to procure or obtain, from any other person or persons, any money or other valuable thing by means of any such game or games, fraudulent pretense or pretenses, practice or practices, scheme, trick, device, or deception, shall be deemed a "confidence man." Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1399.

CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATION.

There are certain admissions and communications excluded from public policy. Among these are: (1) Communications between husband and wife; (2) between attorney and client; (3) among grand jurors; (4) secrets of state. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5198.

Between attorney and client.

A communication to a lawyer, taken for the most part in the presence of other witnesses, and with no injunction as to secrecy, is not a confidential communication. In Hills v. State, 85 N. W. 836, 61 Neb. 589, 595, 57 L. R. A. 155, it is said the mere fact that a communication is made to a lawyer, a doctor, or a priest does not of itself make such communication privileged. To have such effect, it must have been made in confidence of the relation, and under such circumstances as to imply that it should forever remain a secret in the breast of the confidential adviser. Elliott v. Elliott (Neb.) 92 N. W. 1006, 1008.

Confidential communications of which an attorney cannot testify without the consent of his client include "not only all communications made to an attorney with the view to the prosecution or defense of a suit by legal process pending or immediately contemplated, but it extends to all communications made to an attorney or counselor duly qualified and authorized as such, and applied to by the party in that capacity with a view to obtain his advice and opinion in matters of law in relation to his legal rights, duties, and obligations, whether with a view to the prosecution or defense of a suit or other lawful object." Hatton v. Robinson, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 416, 421, 25 Am. Dec. 415.

A "confidential communication" is any communication by the client in a professional consultation with his counsel, and is not confined to facts disclosed in relation to suits actually pending at the time, but extends to all cases in which a client applies to his counsel for his aid in the line of his profession. If the principle was confined to cases actually pending at the time, there would be no safety for a person consulting counsel as to the expediency of bringing a suit, or of compromising it if contemplated to be brought against him. Parker v. Carter (Va.) 4 Munf. 273, 287, 6 Am. Dec. 513.

"Confidential communications between attorney and client" are communications taking place between a person and his attorney which are not allowed to be divulged or inquired into in legal proceedings. The privilege is not that of the attorney, but that of the client, and it is indispensable for the purpose of private justice. Whatever facts are communicated by a client to his counsel solely on account of that relation, such counsel are not at liberty, even if they wish, to disclose. Chirac v. Reinicker, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 280, 292, 6 L. Ed. 674.

"Confidential communications" are communications made by a client to his attorney during the existence of the relation, and an attorney cannot, after he ceases to be the attorney of a party, disclose what was communicated to him in that capacity. But this is the privilege of the client, and if he chooses, after this relation has ceased, to volunteer any communications, he is not protected, although they may be in substance the same as were given while that relation subsisted. Yordan v. Hess (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 492, 494.

"Confidential communications" between attorney and client include only such communications as are made for conducting the cause, and do not include extraneous or impertinent communications. Riggs v. Denniston (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 198, 203, 2 Am. Dec. 145.

Between husband and wife.

Confidential communications, "within that section of the Code forbidding confidential communications between husband and wife to be given in evidence, are such communications as are expressly made confidential, or such as are of a confidential nature, or induced by the marital relation. Ordinary conversations relating to matters of business, which there is no reason to suppose he would have been unwilling to hold in the presence of any person, are not confidential." Parkhurst v. Berdell, 110 N. Y. 386, 18 N. E. 123, 6 Am. St. Rep. 384. In none of the cases in Vermont has there been any attempt to define "matters of confidence." It may be difficult to frame a definition which will be applicable to all the varying circumstances of the married life. In these decisions we have carefully guarded statements, both positive and negative, of what are and what are not "confidential communications." Their nature is so dependent upon the existing circumstances of each case that it would be difficult to enlarge or limit these statements. In Vermont, under the common law, a divorced wife is a competent witness to testify against her divorced husband to any facts or acts, occurring during their marriage, which did not come to her knowledge in confidence growing out of the marital relation, though they may tend to show that the husband has committed a fraud, or to discredit him as a witness, or to indirectly, but not directly, show that he has been guilty of a crime. French v. Ware, 26 Atl. 1096, 1099, 65 Vt. 338, 345, 346.

In a criminal case, conversation between defendant and her husband, tending to show an admission of her guilt to him, and overheard by a witness who was in an adjoining room, is not such a confidential communication as the law excludes as evidence. State v. Center, 35 Vt. 378, 386.

In Parkhurst v. Berdell, 18 N. E. 123, 110 N. Y. 386, 6 Am. St. Rep. 384, Judge Earl defined the "confidential communications" between a husband and wife which are rendered incompetent as against either party by Code Civ. Proc. § 831, as "not all communications made between husband and wife when alone. They are such communications as are expressly made confidential, or such as are of a confidential nature, or induced by the marital relation. This definition is not wholly satisfactory, because it does not define what communications are of a confidential nature. It is probably impossible to give an exact and comprehensive definition of the term 'confidential communications.' Defined by exclusion, however, we think it may be safely said that unfounded charges of immorality, abusive language, and profanity towards a wife, are not such communications as the Legislature intended to protect." Millsbaugh v. Potter, 71 N. Y. Supp. 134, 135, 62 App. Div. 521.

Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5994, providing that no husband or wife shall be examined for or against the other, without the other's consent, as to any communication made during marriage, was held to apply only to "confidential communications"—that is, such as are expressly made confidential, or as are of a confidential nature, or are induced by the marital relations—and not to ordinary conversations relating to matters of business in which either party had a right to engage, such as to acquiring real estate separate from the other. Sackman v. Thomas, 64 Pac. 819, 827, 24 Wash. 660.

Whether a communication is to be considered as "confidential" depends on its character as well as upon the relation of the parties. It is essential that it should be made in confidence, and with the intention that it should not be divulged. The term does not include a boastful and defiant declaration by a husband to his wife of his misconduct, and of his intention to openly persist in his course, accompanied by insolent and brutal taunts. Seitz v. Seitz, 32 Atl. 578, 170 Pa. 71.

Testimony by a husband, in a prosecution of a third person for fornication committed with his wife before their marriage, was not a "confidential" communication made by the one to the other during their marriage. State v. Wiseman, 41 S. E. 884, 130 N. C. 726.

CONFIDENTIAL CREDITOR.

The term "confidential creditor" has been given to creditors of a failing debtor who furnished him with the means of obtaining credit to which he was not entitled, involving in loss the unsuspecting and fair-dealing creditors. Gay v. Strickland (Ala.) 20 South. 919, 921.

CONFIDENTIAL POSITION.

Laws 1896, c. 112, § 10, provides that special agents appointed by the state commissioner of excise shall be deemed the "confidential" agents of the state commissioner. The duties of such agents are to perform acts in the name of the commissioner which are secret and which involve trust and confidence. It was said that, notwithstanding the civil service commission placed the position of special agent in the list where competitive examinations are required, such agents hold "confidential" positions, which are expressly excepted from the operation of Laws 1896, c. 821, providing that Union veterans shall be preferred in civil service positions. It was said in the case of People v. Palmer, 152 N. Y. 217, 220, 46 N. E. 328, in considering a similar statute, that such statute had reference to officials, and that the confidential relations mentioned undoubtedly had reference to official acts, including not only those that are secret, but those that involve trust and confidence which are personal to the appointing officer. People v. Lyman, 52 N. E. 132, 138, 157 N. Y. 368.

"Confidential" is defined as having or enjoying another's confidence; having private or secret relations with another. So that a person who is a subpoena server, and whose duty is to serve subpoenas upon such persons as may be affected as witnesses in prosecutions of persons charged with the commission of crime, does not hold a confidential position in relation to a district attorney, within the provision of the statute providing that no honorably discharged Union soldier shall be removed from office except for incompetency or misconduct, except such as are holding a strictly confidential position. People v. Gardiner, 53 N. Y. Supp. 451, 453, 33 App. Div. 204.

Under Laws 1896, c. 821, prohibiting the removal of a veteran from office, except on hearing for cause, but providing that it shall not be construed to apply to the position of private secretary or deputy of an official or department, or to any other person holding a strictly "confidential position," the secretary of the fire department, whose duties require him to open all letters addressed to the commissioners, to supervise the keeping of the department records, to make disbursements for office expenses, to maintain discipline in the office, and to grant leave of absence to employes, is liable to removal. People v. Scannell, 64 N. Y. Supp. 593, 594, 51 App. Div. 360.

CONFIDENTIAL RELATION.

See "Strictly Confidential Relation."

The meaning of "confidential" has two elements—that of secrecy, and that of trust and confidence. A "confidential relation," in law, as defined by the Century Dictionary, is a relation of parties in which one is bound to act for the benefit of the other, and can take no advantage to himself from his acts relating to the interest of the other. Such a relation arises whenever a continuous trust is reposed by one person in the skill or integrity of another. Thus the assistant warrant clerk of the comptroller of the city of Brooklyn holds a "confidential relation" to the comptroller. People v. Palmer, 46 N. E. 328, 329, 152 N. Y. 217.

Any relation may be deemed "confidential," arising from nature, or granted by law, or resulting from contract, where one party is so situated as to exercise a controlling influence over the conduct and interest of another, or where, from similar relations of mutual confidence, the law requires the utmost good faith, such as partnerships, principal and agent, etc. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4030.

A "confidential relation," such as the law infers, always exists as between parent and child, guardian and ward, counsel and client, principal and agent. But it also exists in numerous cases where only the facts warrant the inference. Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 125, says: "But when the relations existing between the contracting parties appear to be of such a character as to render it certain that they do not deal on equal terms, but that on the one side from overmastering influence, or on the other side from weakness, dependence, or trust justifiably reposed, unfair advantage in a transaction is rendered probable, then the burden is shifted, and the transaction is presumed void; and it is incumbent on the party in whom such confidence is reposed to show affirmatively that no deception was used, and that all was fair, open, voluntary, and well understood. This principle is of very general application, and the courts have always been careful not to fetter this useful jurisdiction by defining the exact limits of its exercise." And that is the principle announced by this court in Appeal of Hetrick, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 477. Stepp v. Frampton, 36 Atl. 177, 179, 179 Pa. 284.

"The phrases 'confidential relation' and 'fiduciary relation' seem to be used by the courts and law-writers as convertible terms. It is a peculiar relation which undoubtedly exists between client and attorney, principal and agent, principal and surety, landlord and tenant, parent and child, guardian and ward, ancestor and heir, husband and wife, trustee and cestui que trust, executors or administrators and creditors, legatees, or distributees, appointer and appointee under powers to partners and part owners. In this and the like case the law, in order to prevent undue advantage from the unlimited confidence, affection, or sense of duty which the relation naturally creates, requires the utmost degree of good faith in all transactions between the parties." Robins v. Hope, 57 Cal. 493, 497 (quoting Story's Eq. Jur. 218).

The term "confidential relation" is not confined to any specific association of the parties to it. While its most frequent illustrations are between persons who are related as trustee and cestui que trust, guardian and ward, attorney and client, parent and child, husband and wife, it embraces partners and copartners, principal and agent, master and servant, physician and patient, and generally all persons who are associated by any relation of trust and confidence. Scattergood v. Kirk, 43 Atl. 1030, 1032, 192 Pa. 263.

All the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another fall within the general term "confidential relations." Harraway v. Harraway (Ala.) 34 South. 836.

The phrase "confidential relation," as used in the statement of a rule that, where a conveyance is made to one standing in a confidential relation to the grantor, the burden is on the grantee to show the transaction fair, is sometimes difficult of definition; but such a relation will be presumed in certain cases, as, for instance, in that of a guardian and ward, parent and child, attorney and client, principal and agent, and may exist in other relations. Brown v. Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., 40 Atl. 256, 257, 87 Md. 377.

"Fiduciary" or "confidential" relation, as used in the law relative to undue influence, is a very broad term. It has been said that it exists and relief is granted in all cases in which influence has been acquired and abused, in which confidence has been reposed and betrayed. The origin of the confidence and the source of the influence are immaterial. The rule embraces both technical fiduciary relations, and those informal relations which exist wherever one man trusts in and relies on another. Thomson v. Whitney, 57 N. E. 808, 810, 186 Ill. 225.

One who, prior to the last illness of the grantor in a deed, was the manager of the grantor's business, and also was connected with him by blood, stood in a confidential relation to the grantor. Adair v. Craig, 33 South. 902, 135 Ala. 332.

CONFINE—CONFINEMENT.

See "Close Confinement."

The words "confined," "imprisoned," "in custody," "confinement," "imprisonment," refer not only to the actual, corporeal, and forcible detention of a person, but likewise to any and all coercive measures, by threats, menaces, or the fear of injury, whereby one person exercises a control over the person of another and detains him within certain limits. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 171; Ex parte Snodgrass, 65 S. W. 1061, 1062, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 359.

The word "confine," in a statute providing that one who, without lawful authority, seizes, inveigles, or kidnaps another with intent to cause her to be securely confined or imprisoned in the state, or to be sent out of the state, etc., or detained against her will, is guilty of kidnapping, ordinarily contemplates actual force. People v. De Leon, 16 N. E. 46, 47, 109 N. Y. 226, 4 Am. St. Rep. 444.

"Confinement additional," as used in Crimes Act, § 194 (Revision, p. 261), providing that, if any offender sentenced to imprisonment shall escape, he shall on conviction suffer such additional confinement as the court shall direct, means "added punishment," and has no reference to the place, so as to require the additional confinement to be in the place from which he escaped. State v. Strauss, 13 Atl. 173, 174, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 345.

Of master of vessel.

Crimes Act, 1 Stat. 112, § 12, declaring that the confining of the master of a ship shall be a misdemeanor means any "confinement of the master, whether by depriving him of the use of his limbs, or by shutting him up in the cabin, or by intimidation preventing him of the free use of every part of the vessel." United States v. Sharp (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1041, 1043; Same v. Smith, Id. 1247; Same v. Hemmer (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 259, 260.

If the person of the master of a vessel is in fact seized, or if he is in fact held in personal restraint, whether for a long or short time is immaterial, it is a "confinement" within the meaning of a statute making the "confinement of the master" of a vessel punishable, although it may be for the purpose of inflicting personal chastisement upon him. United States v. Savage (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 966.

Crimes Act 1790, c. 9, § 12, providing a punishment for the confinement of the master of a vessel, means a confinement by any moral, as well as physical, restraint of the master which prevents his free movements and commands of the ship, but "must in either case be an illegal restraint, for it is not an offense for the seamen to confine the master for a justifiable cause or in justifiable self-defense." United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 102.

Assault and battery by a seaman upon the master of a vessel does not amount to a "confinement" of the commander. United States v. Lawrence (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 885.

Under Act 1790, c. 9, § 12, providing that "if any seaman shall confine the master of any ship or other vessel," etc., such person or persons shall on conviction be punished, etc., the word "confinement" is not to be limited to mere personal restraint by seizing the master and preventing the free movement of his body, nor to imprisonment in any specific place, as locking him in a stateroom or cabin. It is equally a confinement within the statute to prevent him from free movement about the ship by force or intimidation, as by limiting him to walking on a particular part of the deck by terror of bodily injury or by present force. If he is surrounded and prevented from moving where he pleases, according to his right or duty as master, under threats or force, or if he is restrained from going to any part of the ship by an avowed determination of the crew, or of any part of them, to resist him, and to employ force adequate to prevent it, these fall within the meaning of "confinement." United States v. Hemmer (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 259, 260.

Under Act 1790, c. 9, § 12 (1 Stat. 115), prohibiting the confining of a master of a ship on the high seas, such confinement may be by a moral or physical restraint, by threats of violence with a present force, which restrains the master from his freedom of movement or command in his ship, or by physical restraint of his person. In the present case the defendant seized the master and held him back against the ship's rail, against his will. This is, therefore, in the sense of the act, a clear case of confinement of the master; and it matters not whether it was for a long or short time, for a minute, or for an hour, or for a day. The law looks to the fact, and not to the duration of the confinement. But every confinement is not an offense within the act; it must be an illegal confinement or restraint. If the master is about to do an illegal act, and especially to do a felony, a seaman may lawfully confine or restrain him. So a seaman may confine a master in justifiable self-defense. United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 102.

"Confinement," as used in Act March 17, 1796, for the benefit of insolvent debtors, and extending in its provisions to all persons "now in confinement for debt," means actual confinement in jail, and one who has been arrested on a capias ad respondendum and permitted to go at large is not "in confinement for debt" within the meaning of the statute. In re Brush, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 404.

"Confinement in jail," as used in a statute requiring six months' confinement in jail of one imprisoned for debt before such person should be entitled to be discharged by the jail commissioners, "does not mean free and promiscuous going at large during such time, but requires actual confinement within the jail." State v. Lamoine, 53 Vt. 568, 573. If the party sees fit not to abide in the confinement, and by permission of the jailer goes at large ad libitum because he prefers to, all that need be said is that he will fail of qualifying himself for the interposition of the jail commissioners. Hutchins v. Tyler, 53 Vt. 572, 573.

The word "confined," as used in P. L. 1835-36, p. 740, providing that the court of common pleas of any county in which any person may be confined by sentence or order of any court of the commonwealth until he restore any stolen goods or chattels, or pay the value thereof, etc., shall have power to discharge such person on his making application, does not mean actual imprisonment in jail, but a man is "confined" the moment he is handed over to the sheriff under sentence. Appeal of Luzerne County, 19 Atl. 1063, 135 Pa. 468.

Rev. Code, § 1060, authorized the circuit judge to institute an inquiry into the sanity of any person in confinement under an indictment or on other than civil processes. Held, that the words "in confinement" "are used to import those who are imprisoned in the county jail awaiting a final trial, or in the actual custody of the officers of the law, as distinguished from those not having been arrested, or, being arrested, have been discharged from arrest on bail. It is true that a man's bail are looked upon as jailers of his own choosing, and for some purpose he is esteemed to be in their custody and in the prison of the court. This, however, is rather a legal fiction indulged to secure to the bail the ample right by law to detain the principal, and to surrender him in discharge of their recognizance or obligation." Ex parte Trice, 53 Ala. 546, 548.

The stock law requiring that stock shall be "confined" in the nighttime meant that they should be "prohibited from running at large," as that expression is used in the county herd law. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Mossman, 2 Pac. 146, 150, 30 Kan. 336; Osborne v. Kimball, 21 Pac. 163, 164, 41 Kan. 187.

CONFINED TO THE HOUSE.

The words "confined to the house," as used in an accident policy, were not intended to mean a constant restraint within doors. One may be sick and able to move about, and, on occasion, temporarily pass to the outside. A complete withdrawal from business was undoubtedly necessary, but exceptional and temporary absences from the house are not inconsistent with the idea of a general confinement within it. Mutual Ben. Ass'n v. Nancarrow (Colo.) 71 Pac. 423, 424.

CONFIRM—CONFIRMATION.

To "confirm" is to make firm or certain; to give new assurance of truth or certainty; to put past doubt. Webster. Thus "confirmation of land titles," within the meaning of a statute requiring such confirmation, imports some title previously existing, and the confirmation only becomes conclusive evidence of that which it concedes existed before. Confirmation can only be matter of evidence. It makes certain; gives new assurance; puts past all doubt. Boggs v. Merced Min. Co., 14 Cal. 279, 305.

A confirmation is making firm what was before infirm, so that an instrument reciting that, in consideration of the premises, the parties have fully ratified and confirmed a sale of land, makes the title valid. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Ransom, 41 S. W. 826, 830, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 689.

In construing a deed where the language used was, "For value received of G. and B., I hereby make over and confirm unto them and their heirs," etc., the court observed that the words "make over" have no precise technical import, and must be taken in their popular sense. The word "confirm" has no application unless there is a previous estate in possession. A confirmation makes a voidable estate sure, or increases a particular estate. There must be a previous estate on which it is to operate. It was held that the words used were sufficient to raise a trust under the statute, and to convey the premises to the bargainee in fee. Jackson v. Root (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 60, 68, 79.

"Confirmation" is the approbation or consent to an estate already created which, as far as it is in the confirming power, makes it good and valid; so that confirmation does not regularly create the estate, yet such words may be mingled in the confirmation as may create or enlarge an estate, but that is by force of words foreign to the business of confirmation, and which by their own force and power tend to create the estate. People v. Law (N. Y.) 84 Barb. 494, 511.

"Confirmation," as used in a statute regulating an assessment for improvements, and limiting the issuance of a certiorari to 30 days from the date of confirmation, does not apply to an invalid confirmation. Evans v. Inhabitants of North Bergen Tp., 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 456, 457.

In construing the treaty by which Spain ceded Florida to the United States, and which required that grants of land previously made by the King of Spain should be ratified and confirmed to persons in possession, which treaty was reduced to writing in both the English and Spanish languages, Chief Justice Marshall said that although the words "ratify and confirm" are properly the words of contract, stipulating for some future legislative act, they are not necessarily so, but may import that they shall be ratified and confirmed by the force of the instrument itself. It was held that the latter was the proper meaning to be given to the words in the treaty, according to the meaning shown by the Spanish copy of the treaty, the court approving the doctrine that the construction by which the English and Spanish parts of the treaty could be made to agree was that to be adopted. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 973, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 776.

"Confirmation" is the approbation or consent to an estate already created, which, so far as it is in the confirming power, makes it good and valid. So that a confirmation does not regularly create an estate, but such words may be mingled in the confirmation as may create or enlarge an estate; that is, by the force of such words as are foreign to the business of confirmation, and by their own force and power tend to create the estate. People v. Law (N. Y.) 22 How. Prac. 109, 126 (citing Gilbert, Tenures, 69). See, also, Fauntleroy's Heirs v. Dunn, 42 Ky. (3 B. Mon.) 594, 608.

As a conveyance.

"A confirmation is the conveyance of an estate or right, that one hath in or unto lands or tenements, to another that hath possession thereof, or some estate therein, whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unvoidable, or whereby a particular estate is increased or enlarged." De Mares v. Gilpin, 24 Pac. 568, 570, 15 Colo. 76 (citing Shep. Touch. 311); Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 323, 5 Mont. 111 (citing Co. Litt. 295b, 2 Bl. Comm. 325); Turk v. Skiles, 30 S. E. 234, 235, 45 W. Va. 82; Langdeau v. Hanes, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 521, 530, 22 L. Ed. 606.

A confirmation is of a nature similar to a release. To make sure a voidable estate is the proper form of a confirmation. Thus where, under a deed of trust, a mortgagee of the premises transferred joined, and the words used are, "do grant, bargain, sell, and confirm unto the trustee," the mortgagee released his lien to the extent of the purpose specified in the deed of trust. Turk v. Skiles, 30 S. E. 234, 235, 45 W. Va. 82.

"A legislative confirmation of a claim to land is a recognition of the validity of such claim, and operates as effectually as a grant from the government." Langdeau v. Hanes, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 521, 530, 22 L. Ed. 606.

Covenant of title or warranty implied.

"Lord Eldon, in Browning v. Wright, 2 B. & P. 21, said the words 'confirmed, granted, bargained, sold, and enfeoffed' certainly import a covenant in law. It seems now to be settled that in conveyances by deeds of bargain and sale they have no such effect, but, on the creation of an estate less than freehold, a covenant of title is implied from the words of leasing." Phillips v. City of Hudson, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 143, 151 (citing Rawle, 272).

Since the case of Frost v. Raymond (N. Y.) 2 Caines, 188, 2 Am. Dec. 228, it has been regarded as settled in this state that neither the words "grant, bargain, sell, alien, or confirm," when used in a conveyance of real estate, import a warranty. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541.

As judicial sanction.

"Confirmation" of a sale by the court is but a signification in some way of its approval. Until confirmation the sale is not complete. Confirmation of a sale by the chancery court is not necessary where the acts of the parties amount to confirmation. "A confirmation by the parties themselves, by their own acts, is as valid as if by the court." Johnson v. Cooper, 56 Miss. 608, 618 (quoting Tooley v. Gridley, 11 Miss. [3 Smedes & M.] 493, 41 Am. Dec. 628). When made, it relates back to the time of the sale, and supplies all defects except those founded in jurisdiction or in fraud. Hyman v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 744, 765 (citing Rorer, Jud. Sales, pp. 55, 56, §§ 122, 124).

Confirmation is the "judicial sanction of the court, and by 'confirmation' the court makes a judicial sale, a sale of its own, and the purchaser is entitled to the full benefit of his contract, which is no longer executory but executed, and which will be enforced against him and for him. As soon as the sale is confirmed by the court, there is a completed contract; the bidder becomes a purchaser, and is thenceforth regarded and treated as an equitable owner of the land, with the right reserved to compel him to comply with his contract by payment of his purchase money." Langyher v. Patterson, 77 Va. 470, 473.

Ratification distinguished.

"Confirmation" is a ratification of previous transaction known to be voidable. De Hereu v. Hereu (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 871, 876.

"Confirmation" applies to that by which what was before voidable is made valid, as where one makes valid a voidable contract of his own which he might have repudiated; while "ratification" applies to the act of another in the nature of an act of agency. While such is the primary use of the words "confirmation" and "ratification," they are often used interchangeably as synonymous. Seiffert & Wiese Lumber Co. v. Hartwell, 63 N. W. 333, 334, 94 Iowa, 576, 58 Am. St. Rep. 413.

CONFIRMATION OF JUDGMENT.

A "dismissal" of an appeal for want of prosecution is not a "confirmation" of the judgment below. There is a striking difference between a dismissal of the appeal and the confirmation of the judgment. Had they been "affirmed," there would have been an end to the cases; but in "dismissing" the appeals, the court places the parties in the same condition as if no appeal had been prayed or allowed. Ashley v. Brasil, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 144, 149.

CONFIRMED DRUNKENNESS.

"Gross and confirmed drunkenness," as used in St. Mass. 1889, c. 447, making gross and confirmed drunkenness caused by the voluntary excessive use of opium and other drugs a ground for divorce, includes an occasional condition of drunkenness from the use of a drug, where the gross and confirmed character of the use of the intoxicant or drug has ceased for some length of time; the use must be excessive, and must produce a certain result. Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 624, 168 Mass. 204.

CONFIRMED HABITS OF INTOXICATION.

"Confirmed habits of intoxication" means intoxication whenever opportunity offers.

Thus, evidence that a person had been grossly intoxicated as often as three or four times a year for a period of 12 or 15 years, and remained in that condition for 7 to 10 days on each occasion, and at such times went or was sent to the asylum for inebriates; that when the desire for drink came upon him he could not resist, and that a single glass of liquor would bring on excessive drinking and a renewal of gross intoxication; that there had been no apparent improvement in his habits in this respect, and that any undue excitement made him drink—is sufficient to justify a finding that he had contracted and was confirmed in the habit of intoxication. Blaney v. Blaney, 126 Mass. 205.

CONFIRMED SWAMP LANDS.

The word "confirmed" was employed in the earliest state legislation with reference to swamp lands. Gould, Dig. p. 717, § 3; Id. p. 719, § 7. In the earlier acts the authority of state officers to make sales was confined to the confirmed lands, while the right of settlement and pre-emption was provided for the unconfirmed lands. So at one time the Governor was authorized to issue a patent only upon being satisfied that the lands were confirmed. In determining whether the lands were "confirmed" within the meaning of the act, the court said, in Hendry v. Willis, 33 Ark. 833: "The selections have been made in fact by agents of the state, sent to the Secretary of the Interior through the Commissioner of the General Land Office, approved, and returned to the Governor. When those lists so approved have been transmitted to the Governor, they have been treated in our legislative and official acts as 'confirmed,' and so we must understand the word." Ohism v. Price, 54 Ark. 251, 257, 15 S. W. 883, 885, 1031.

CONFISCABLE.

All things come within the description of "confiscable personal property" which a man has in his own right, whether they be in action or possession. Camp v. Lockwood (Pa.) 1 Dall. 393, 403, 1 L. Ed. 192.

CONFISCATE—CONFISCATION.

The verb "confiscate" is derived from the Latin "con," with, and "fiscus," a basket or hamper, in which the Emperor's treasure was formerly kept. The meaning of the word "confiscate" is to transfer property from private to public use, or to forfeit property to the prince or state. Ware v. Hylton, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 199, 234, 1 L. Ed. 568, 584.

To "confiscate" does not mean the taking of property by the government to provide for the general wants, or protection of the public and the support of institutions of society. The term ought not to be applied to a legitimate exercise of the powers of taxation, though the taking of property because the thing taken is required for public use may sometimes be called "confiscation." The term ordinarily implies a taking by some extraordinary process, or for some extraordinary purpose other than the general purpose of government or the general process of taxation. State ex rel. Rosenblatt v. Sargent, 12 Mo. App. 228, 234.

Condemnation distinguished.

"Condemnation" is the act of a belligerent against another belligerent, and can only be made in accordance with the principles of law recognized in the common jurisprudence of the world; while "confiscation" is the act of a sovereign against a rebellious subject, and may be effected by such means, either summary or arbitrary, as the sovereign, expressing its will through lawful channels, may please to adopt. Both are proceedings in rem, but confiscation recognizes the title of the original owner to the property which is to be forfeited, while in condemnation the tenure of the property seized is qualified, provisional, and destitute of absolute ownership. Winchester v. United States (U. S.) 14 Ct. Cl. 13, 48.

CONFLICT.

"Conflict," as used in Revision, p. 762, § 53, defining those who shall constitute the family entitled to the benefit of section 52, providing for the setting apart of certain property to the family of a deceased person out of his estate, to be the widow and child or children who shall reside in the family of the decedent at his death, and adding that nothing in section 52 shall be permitted to "conflict" with the provisions of any last will, means that the will shall be supreme where the complete execution of its provisions does not admit, expressly or impliedly, of the bestowal of the bounty provided by the statute. Carey v. Monroe, 35 Atl. 456, 458, 64 N. J. Eq. 632.

CONFLICTING INTERESTS.

In Rev. Civ. Code, § 283, declaring that every person who shall have "interests conflicting" with those of a minor in any matter, in which a family meeting may be necessary shall be incompetent to be a member of such family meeting though he be one of the nearest relatives, the lawmakers did not contemplate, by the use of the words "conflicting interest," to restrict the ground of exclusion to cases which would only fall under a narrow technical definition of those terms; it was evidently meant to extend the judge's control over the subject-matter. In re Bothick, 11 South. 712, 714, 44 La. Ann. 1037.

CONFORM.

Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5043k, provides that any quarantine right fixed by the commission for a quarantine of splenic fever in cattle shall conform to the federal quarantine established by the United States Department of Agriculture. Held, that the word "conform" is used in the sense of "comply with" or "adopt," and means that the quarantine lines should be identical. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Masterson, 66 S. W. 833, 834, 95 Tex. 262.

CONFORMABLY TO THE LAWS.

Rhode Island Declaration of Rights, guarantying to every person in the state a remedy for injuries "conformably to the laws," means that a legal adequate remedy for every injury shall be supplied, but does not entitle suitors to any particular form or extent of remedy, which is necessarily subject to the legislative power of the state. In re Nichols, 8 R. I. 50, 54.

CONFORMITY.

Bonds issued by a municipal corporation, reciting that the bonds have been issued "in conformity with" the statutes, import in favor of bona fide purchasers a full compliance with the statutes, and preclude inquiry as to whether the precedent conditions were performed before the bonds were issued. Independent School Dist. v. Stone, 1 Sup. Ct. 84, 87, 106 U. S. 183, 27 L. Ed. 90. See, also, Bates v. Independent School Dist. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 192, 194.

"Conformity," as used in Lynch's Code, § 288, authorizing the clerk of the court to enter judgment in conformity with the verdict of the jury, means agreement—congruity with something else—and as applied to cases of this kind its use was intended to convey the idea that the judgment should carry out the intent of the verdict. Eason v. Miller, 15 S. C. 194, 200.

A certificate by a judge that he has discharged a certain duty in "conformity" with the law means that the duty was done "according to the spirit and intent" of the law. The two expressions are of equivalent import. The use of the latter phrase in the certificate would import to it no additional substance or force. Friend v. Hamill, 34 Md. 298, 303.

As indicating identity.

"Conformity" means correspondence in character or manner; resemblance; agreement. It is often followed by the word "to" or "with," and is frequently qualified by the word "perfect," without which qualification identity is not indicated; so that Code Civ. Proc. § 540, requiring a writ of attachment to state the amount of plaintiff's claim in "conformity" with the complaint, does not require the amount to be identical. De Leonis v. Etchepare, 52 Pac. 718, 721, 120 Cal. 407.

CONFRONT.

The right given accused in criminal cases to "confront" his witnesses was intended not merely to secure to him the privilege of examining witnesses in his behalf, but was in affirmance of the rule of common law that in trials by jury the witness must be present before the jury and accused, so that he may be "confronted"; that is, put face to face. State v. Behrman, 114 N. C. 797, 805, 19 S. E. 220, 25 L. R. A. 449; Westfall v. Madison County, 17 N. W. 614, 615, 62 Iowa, 427.

As used in Const. U. S. art. 6, providing that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, "confronted" means examined in the presence of the accused, and be subject to cross-examination. Houser v. Commonwealth, 51 Pa. (1 P. F. Smith) 332, 338.

"Confront" means to stand facing or in front of; to face; to sit face to face for examination and discovery of the truth; and as used in Const. art. 1, § 12, providing that in criminal prosecutions accused shall have the right to be "confronted" by the witnesses against him, means that the witnesses on the part of the state shall be personally present when the accused is on trial, or that they shall be examined in his presence, and be subject to cross-examination by him; so that, where defendant is required to sit in a part of the courtroom out of the sight of the witness, his constitutional right is infringed. State v. Mannion, 57 Pac. 542, 543, 19 Utah, 505, 45 L. R. A. 638, 75 Am. St. Rep. 753.

"Confronted with the witnesses," as used in the sixth amendment of the United States Constitution, providing that the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against him, does not absolutely require the presence of the witness at trial, but the taking of a deposition of a witness in the presence of the defendant, where he has the right of cross-examination, is being "confronted with the witness," and hence such deposition is admissible. Territory v. Evans, 23 Pac. 232, 234, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 651, 7 L. R. A. 646.

The statement that the accused has the right to be "confronted with the witnesses against him" does not require that the accused shall in all cases be confronted with the witnesses against him upon a pending trial of the indictment, and where he has been confronted with the witnesses against him in a former trial it is sufficient. People v. El-

CONFUSION.

The term "confusion" as used in the civil law is synonymous with "merger" as used in the common law. Palmer v. Burnside (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1022, 1023.

"Confusion," as applied to the condition of the minds of the jury after receiving instructions by the court, is the synonym of "bewilderment" and "distraction" in respect thereto, and no mind can be said to be "reasonably satisfied" as to the existence of a particular fact which is in a state of confusion. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hill, 9 South. 722, 727, 93 Ala. 514, 30 Am. St. Rep. 65.

CONFUSION OF DEBTS.

"Confusion of debts," according to Mr. Story's definition, is the concurrence of two adverse rights to the same thing in one and the same person. Story, Prom. Notes, § 439. Pothier says the reason given for the doctrine is that a person cannot at the same time be both creditor and debtor. Pothier on Obligations (Evans' Ed.) note 607. "But," says the same author, "in order to induce a confusion of the debt, the characters not only of debtor and creditor, but of sole debtor and sole creditor, must concur in the same person." Woods v. Ridley, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 194, 198.

CONFUSION OF GOODS.

The doctrine of confusion of goods has been often discussed, and may be considered as clearly and distinctly settled. If the goods of several intermingled can be easily distinguished and separated, no change of property takes place, and each party may lay claim to own. If the goods are of the same nature and value, although not capable of actual separation by identifying each particular, if the portion of each owner is known, and a division can be made of equal property and value, as in the case of a mixture of corn, coffee, tea, and wine, or other articles of the same kind and quality, then each may claim his aliquot part. Belcher v. Cassidy Bros. Live Stock Commission Co., 62 S. W. 924, 926, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 60 (citing Robinson v. Holt, 39 N. H. 557, 563, 75 Am. Dec. 233). But if the mixture is undistinguishable, because a new ingredient is formed not capable of a just division according to the original rights of each, or if the articles mixed are of different values or quantities and the original values and quantities cannot be determined, the party who occasions, or through whose fault or neglect occurs, the wrongful mixture, must bear the whole loss. So where one permitted the hay of another to be so mixed with hay mortgaged to him by such other party that a sheriff, in attempting to levy an execution upon the unmortgaged hay, was unable to distinguish the one from the other, after making every reasonable inquiry and effort so to do, the mass of hay became subject to the levy. Robinson v. Holt, 39 N. H. 557, 563, 75 Am. Dec. 233. To the same general effect is the language of Mr. Story in his work on Bailments (9th Ed.) § 40, where he states: "But there may be a case of confusion of property neither by consent nor by willfulness, as where a bailiff, by negligence, unskillfulness, or inadvertence, mixed up his own goods of the same sort with those bailed; and there may also be a confusion arising from mere accident and unavoidable casualty. In the latter case—that of intermixture by accident—the civil law deemed the property to be held in common, whether the mixture produced a thing of the same sort or not, as if the wine of two persons were mixed by accident. The latter rule would probably be adopted by our law under like circumstances." Belcher v. Cassidy Bros. Live Stock Commission Co., 62 S. W. 924, 926, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 60.

"Confusion of goods" arises where the goods of two or more persons are so intermingled that the several parts or portions can no longer be distinguished. Hawkins v. Spokane Hydraulic Min. Co., 33 Pac. 40, 43, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 650; Hesseltine v. Stockwell, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 237, 1 Am. Rep. 627.

The doctrine of "confusion of goods" is derived from the civil law, and means a mixture of goods, and is generally confined to a mixture of liquids so that they cannot be separated. It also includes the mingling of other property of the same kind; but the placing of crockery, china, or other articles resembling each other on the same shelf is not a "confusion" of them. Treat v. Barber, 7 Conn. 274, 280.

"Confusion" is the inseparable intermixture of property belonging to different owners. If a party having charge of the property of others so confounds it with his own that the line of distinction cannot be traced, all the inconvenience of the confusion is thrown on the party who produces it, and it is for him to distinguish his own property or lose it. Hart v. Ten Eyck (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 62, 108.

Where logs of the plaintiff and defendant are intermingled, but are distinctly marked and their identity not lost, there was no "confusion" or "commixture" of goods in the sense applied by these terms in law. Goff v. Brainerd, 5 Atl. 393, 394, 58 Vt. 468.

The doctrine of "confusion of goods," which has sometimes been invoked to suppress an entire publication, is not applicable where the infringing portions can be pointed out and separately condemned. West Pub.

Co. v. Lawyers' Co-operative Pub. Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 360, 364, 25 L. R. A. 441.

CONGREGATE.

Within the statute punishing a person who shall allow minors to congregate in a billiard saloon, the word "congregate" necessarily implies the joint action or co-operation of two or more persons, and it is meaningless to say that a man can "congregate" at any given place without the co-operation of some one else, or that one man by himself can form a "congregation" of any kind. Powell v. State, 62 Ind. 531, 532.

CONGREGATION.

See "Religious Congregations."

A congregation professing to be Roman Catholic must not only hold the same faith, but must render submission to the government and discipline of the church of which it is a branch. Obedience to the laws of a church by its members is as essential to its harmony and existence as obedience to the municipal laws is essential to good order and the existence of civil government. Smith v. Bonhoof, 2 Mich. 115, 126.

"Congregation," as used in a New York statute providing for the incorporation of religious societies and congregations, means an assembly met or a body of persons who usually meet in some stated place for the worship of God and religious instruction. Robertson v. Bullions (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 64, 67.

A "congregation" is an assemblage or union of persons in society for some religious purpose, to unite in the public worship of their God in such manner as they deem most acceptable to him. Runkel v. Winemiller (Md.) 4 Har. & McH. 429, 452, 1 Am. Dec. 411.

The term "congregation," in 2 Starr & C. Ann. St. c. 120, § 2, cl. 2, exempting from taxation all church property actually and exclusively used for public worship, if owned by the congregation, means that some one body or congregation shall own the property as an organization, but does not import that others may not worship in the church by permission. People v. Watseka Camp Meeting Ass'n, 43 N. E. 716, 717, 160 Ill. 576.

"Congregation," as used in St. 1 W. S. 504, § 30, providing that every person who shall maliciously disturb any congregation, etc., shall be guilty of misdemeanor, means a congregation actively engaged in religious worship, and after the minister in charge has dismissed the congregation it ceases to be a "congregation" within the meaning of the law. "There must be some point of time when the purpose for which the congregation met is ended, and that time has always been understood to be when the head of the congregation dismisses it." State v. Jones, 53 Mo. 486, 489.

The words "colleges, universities, academies, and schoolhouses," in Act July 2, 1839, exempting five acres of land, with the improvements thereon, attached to religious congregations, universities, colleges, academies, and schoolhouses belonging, etc., shows that the term "religious congregations," is to be construed not to mean "congregations," but "church buildings." Cumberland County v. Big Spring Church (Pa.) 17 Leg. Int. 300.

The word "congregation," in the United States, means the members of a particular church who meet in one place to worship. Every church building which has been constructed for or is devoted to the purpose of providing a room or place in which the congregation of the church and other persons may assemble for devotional exercises should, if no part is devoted to secular uses, be regarded as exclusively devoted to public worship, together with the land or lot of sufficient size for the location of the building, though it should also contain rooms for the safe-keeping of wraps, umbrellas, etc., or rooms required to secure the comfort of the worshipping congregation, or a study for the pastor, or rooms for Sunday schools or suborganizations of the church. In re Walker, 66 N. E. 144, 147, 200 Ill. 566.

A "congregation" evidently consists of two kinds of members, one possessing the right to vote, and the other not. State v. Crowell, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 390, 423.

Church distinguished.

A congregation or religious society is what is usually denominated a "poll parish." "It consists of a voluntary association of individuals or families united for the purpose of having a common place of worship, and to provide a proper teacher to instruct them in religious doctrines and duties, and to administer the ordinances of baptism, etc. The 'church,' strictly so called, comprises only a part of the congregation or society. The 'church' consists of an indefinite number of persons of one or both sexes, who have made a public profession, and who are associated together, by a covenant of church fellowship, for the purpose of celebrating the sacrament and watching over the religious welfare of each other. Though a church or body of professing Christians is almost uniformly connected with such a society or congregation, the members of the church have no other or greater rights than any other members of the society who steadily attend with them for the purpose of divine worship. All questions relating to the faith and practice of the church and its members belong to the church judicatories to which they have voluntarily subjected themselves. But, as a general principle, those ecclesiastical judicatories cannot interfere with the temporal concerns of the congregation or society with which the church or the members thereof are connected." Baptist Church in Hartford v. Witherell (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 296, 301, 24 Am. Dec. 223.

Noncommunicants.

All the ecclesiastical authorities hold that the "congregation" is composed of all noncommunicants, as well as communicants, who contribute statedly to the support of divine worship in the particular church. Everett v. Trustees of First Presbyterian Church, 32 Atl. 747, 749, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 500 (citing Hodge, Presb. Law, pp. 35, 37, 38, 40, 41; Moore, Presb. Dig. pp. 404, 405, 855).

"Congregation" might be construed as composed of all who meet together at the chapel, or in a more limited sense it might mean the members only, and it will be so limited in a devise to the congregation of a Scotch chapel in which the members exercise the right of electing the minister. Leslie v. Birnle, 2 Russ. 114, 120.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

"A 'congregational church' is a voluntary association of Christians united for discipline and worship, connected with and forming part of some religious society having a legal existence." Anderson v. Brock, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 243, 247.

"A Congregational society is generally made up first of the church, and next of those who worship with the church and favor the same views, and who assist in supporting the preaching and public worship of that church. The society, as such, often, perhaps generally, has no creed or published religious opinions distinct from the church; the church is the basis or foundation of the whole. This is true in the Congregational societies in this country generally, whether orthodox or Unitarian." Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 83, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

"A Congregational society is a voluntary association from which the members might secede at pleasure, and to which, in order to perpetuate the society, new members would of course from time to time be added; and the society was associated with an organized church." Attorney General v. Town of Dublin, 38 N. H. 459, 574.

The leading American lexicographers make the primary meaning of the word "congregational" pertain to church government, although a secondary and popular meaning relates to doctrine. So it is held that a provision of the will of Benjamin Franklin designating the minister of the oldest Congregational church in Boston as one of the board of managers of a trust fund bequeathed by the will referred to to the oldest church of that kind, well known in Boston and elsewhere in Massachusetts as Congregational, chiefly from the form of government, and did not have reference to any doctrinal tenets which an individual church might hold in reference to the Trinity. City of Boston v. Doyle (Mass.) 68 N. E. 851, 854.

CONGREGATIONALIST.

A "Congregationalist" is one who holds to the independence of each congregation or church of Christians, and the right of the assembled brethren to elect their own pastors and determine all ecclesiastical matters. Attorney General v. Town of Dublin, 38 N. H. 459, 541 (citing Webst. Dict.)

CONGRESS.

A joint resolution, passed by Congress, suspending the execution of a certain act "until the further order of Congress," meant not only a suspension of the execution during the existence of that Congress, and until such Congress should further order, but until the further order of the legislative body called in the Constitution of the United States (article 1, § 1) a "Congress of the United States." United States v. Stockslager, 9 Sup. Ct. 382, 384, 129 U. S. 470, 32 L. Ed. 785.

CONJECTURE.

"Conjecture," as to the meaning of a will, is when you suppose what would have been the testator's meaning if he had had the whole case before him, and what, if he had thought of such an event, he would have said upon it. Jones v. Morgan, Fearne, Rem. Append. 3, pp. 577, 589 (cited in Weed v. Scofield, 49 Atl. 22, 25, 73 Conn. 670).

CONJOINT USE.

The words "conjoint use" are constantly applied to denote a use in the same machine or apparatus, and are to be construed as having such meaning in a bill, in a suit for the infringement of five patents, which alleges that the things patented in the said patents are so nearly allied in character as to be capable of conjoint as well as separate use. Union Switch & Signal Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (U. S.) 69 Fed. 833, 834.

CONJUNCTION.

The word "conjunction," in its ordinary meaning, is the state of being conjoined, united, or associated; union; association; league. An indictment charging that S., acting for himself and in conjunction with H., placed a letter, etc., charges H. with a participation in the offense. Hume v. United States (U. S.) 118 Fed. 689, 695, 55 C. C. A. 407.

CONJUNCTIVE DENIALS.

In Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 287, it is said: "If several material facts are stated conjunctively in a verified complaint, an answer which undertakes to deny their averments as a whole, conjunctively stated, is evasive. Such an answer constitutes what is called 'conjunctive denials.'" Hardy v. Purington, 61 N. W. 158, 159, 6 S. D. 382.

CONJUNCTIVE OBLIGATION.

A "conjunctive obligation" is one in which the several objects in it are connected by a copulative, or in any other manner which shows that all of them are severally comprised in the contract. This contract creates as many different obligations as there are different objects, and the debtor, when he wishes to discharge himself, may force the creditor to receive them separately. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2063.

CONJURATION.

"Conjuration" signifies a plot or compact made by persons combining by oath to do any public harm. The term is more especially used to describe personal influence with the Devil, or some evil spirit, to know any secret or effect any purpose. Conjuration is the act of using certain words or ceremonies to obtain the aid of a supreme being, the act of summoning, in a sacred name, the practice of arts to expel evil spirits, allay storms, or perform supernatural or extraordinary acts. Cooper v. Livingston, 19 Fla. 684, 693.

CONJURISTS.

"Conjurists" are those who, by force of certain magic words, endeavor to raise the devil and oblige him to execute their commands, and such persons are punished as rogues and vagabonds. Tomlin's Law Dict. 4 Bl. Comm. 60. Webster defines "conjuror" as one who attains to the secret art of supernatural or extraordinary by the aid of supreme powers; an impostor who pretends by unknown means. Cooper v. Livingston, 19 Fla. 684, 694.

CONNECT—CONNECTED.

To "connect" is to join, unite, bind, or fasten together. A highway that does not intersect an existing highway at more than one of its terminal points does not connect existing highways, and is not authorized by the provisions of a statute authorizing the laying of a highway of less than a certain width to "connect" existing highways. It is not enough that one terminal point connects with an existing highway. Bridgman v. Town of Hardwick, 31 Atl. 33, 34, 67 Vt. 132.

"Connected to" means bound or fastened together, united, or joined, or coupled to—like a connecting rod. Claims for an air-brake emergency valve controlled by a piston "connected to" said valve, and for a piston stem, a valve on the piston stem controlling the passage, etc., are not infringed by a device in which the valve is unseated by the piston, whose stem merely rests against it, but which cannot be resealed by the piston for want of actual connection therewith. Westinghouse v. New York Air-Brake Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 581, 605.

1 Comp. Laws, § 2032, provides that every devise, gift, or bequest of real estate hereafter made by lease, will, or testament shall be void, so far as such devise shall be or purport to be for the use of any church, religious society, or for the use of any ecclesiastical or educational institution "connected or to be connected" with any such church, unless such will shall have been executed at least two months prior to the decedent's death. Held, that the Legislature, by using the word "connected," must have used it according to its common and approved usage in the language, which meant "linked" or "united to another." The word "affiliate," as sometimes used, is synonymous with it. Webster defines "affiliated societies" as "local societies connected with a central society or with each other." It is evident, therefore, that the sense of a term so used required that the related bodies should severally continue to exist, since one body could not be said to be "connected with" itself. Allison v. Smith, 16 Mich. 405.

With business of employer.

Acts 1887, c. 270, declares that the master shall be liable for injuries to his servant because of defects in the ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer. Held, that the phrase "connected with or used in the business of the employer" could not be taken literally, but when used in connection with "ways, works, or machinery," must be understood to mean "ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer by his authority and subject to his control." Thus, the statute does not render a railroad company liable for injuries sustained by an employé from a defective track of another company over which it had had no control, but which it sometimes went on to get cars under a license. Trask v. Old Colony R. R. Co., 31 N. E. 6, 7, 156 Mass. 298.

With dwelling house.

A plantation, about five miles distant from the town in which the decedent resided at the time of his death, and from which he drew his supplies and derived his income, and the superintendence of which constituted his only business, is not "connected with the dwelling house," within the Code of Alabama, entitling the widow to the possession or rents of the property connected with the dwelling house where the deceased usually resided, next before his death, until her dower is assigned. McAllister's Ex'r v. McAllister, 37 Ala. 484, 487. It does not include a plantation in the occupancy of a tenant under a contract of renting, in the country, several miles distant from the dwelling house in the city where the husband most usually resided. Ogbourne v. Ogbourne's Adm'r, 60 Ala. 616, 619.

Act April 23, 1861, conferring the power on railroad companies to lease other roads, providing the roads of said companies so leasing shall be directly or by means of intervening railroads "connected with each other," means, either such a union of tracks as to allow the passage of cars from one track to the other, or such intersection of roads as to admit the convenient interchange of freight and passengers at the point of intersection, and implies a closer union than can be made between railroad tracks of different gauges, since in its material sense the word "connect" means to tie together, to be joined or united. The meaning of the word is derived from the process of knitting, where the union of parts becomes very intimate, and it would be difficult to say that railroads of different gauges could be knit together. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. v. Catawissa R. Co., 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 20, 59.

Const. Colo. art. 15, § 4, providing that every railroad company shall have the right with its road to intersect, "connect" with, or cross any other railroad, cannot be construed to mean the right of connecting business with business. "The railroad companies are not to be connected, but their roads. A connection of roads may make a connection in business convenient and desirable, but the one does not necessarily carry with it the other. It applies to the road as a physical structure, not to the corporation or its business." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co., 4 Sup. Ct. 185, 187, 110 U. S. 667, 28 L. Ed. 291.

Act April 4, 1868, giving railroad companies the right to "connect their roads with roads of a similar character," means a mechanical connection with a road of similar gauge, so as to permit the running of cars from one road to the other. Altoona & P. Connecting R. Co. v. Beech Creek R. Co., 35 Atl. 734, 735, 177 Pa. 443.

"Connected," as used in the charter of a railroad declaring that any county through which the road may run, and every county through which any other road may run with which this road may be "connected," may and are hereby authorized to aid in the construction of the same, etc., means joined to, or afforded with facilities whereby transportation may be transferred from one road to the other. Kenicott v. Wayne County, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 452, 466, 21 L. Ed. 319.

Laws 1847, c. 270, making a railroad company which "connects" with one or more roads, and receives freight to be transported to a place on the line of a road thus connected, liable as common carriers for the delivery thereof, applies to roads connected with others wholly beyond the state, as well as roads that are within the state. Burtis v. Buffalo & S. L. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 269, 273.

With subject-matter of action.

"Connected," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1201, subd. 1, providing that a counterclaim must be a cause of action connected with the subject of the action, is said, in Carpenter v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 93 N. Y. 552, 556, to have a broad signification. The connection may be slight or intimate, remote or near, but the counterclaim must have such a relation to and connection with the subject of the action that it will be just and equitable that the controversy as to the matters alleged in the complaint and in the counterclaim should be settled in one action by one litigation, and that the claim of the one should be offset against or applied on the claim of the other. Siebrecht v. Siegel-Cooper Co., 56 N. Y. Supp. 425, 426, 38 App. Div. 549.

"Connected," as used in Code Civ. Proc. in reference to counterclaims, cannot be construed to apply to a set-off in an action for unlawfully, wrongfully, and maliciously commencing an action against the plaintiff in causing him to be arrested, setting up a cause of action for deceit against the plaintiff in inducing the defendants to sell goods on credit by false representations which constituted one of the causes of action for which the prosecution of the plaintiff was instituted. Rothschild v. Whitman, 10 N. Y. Supp. 427, 57 Hun, 135.

In an action for an alleged wrongful taking and a conversion of a quantity of wood, defendant set up as a counterclaim, in substance, that it held a bond as a mortgage as collateral upon certain lands, which were insufficient security, as the obligor was insolvent; that plaintiff, being a second mortgagee in possession of the lands, with knowledge of the facts, and with intent to reduce and deprive defendant of its security, and to defraud it, wrongfully cut the wood in question from the said land, and that, on foreclosure of defendant's mortgage and sale thereunder, a large deficiency was left. Held, that defendant's claim was "connected with the subject-matter of the action," within Code Civ. Proc. § 501, and so constituted a proper counterclaim. Carpenter v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 93 N. Y. 552, 556.

A cause of action set out in a counterclaim is "connected with the subject-matter of the action," within the meaning of the statute relating to counterclaims, only when it is directly connected, or so connected that a cross-bill would have been sustained or recoupment allowed before the enactment of the statute. Akerly v. Villas, 21 Wis. 88, 111.

In an action for possession of a schooner alleged to have been wrongfully detained, together with damages for its detention, a claim for services rendered by defendant in caring for the schooner is "connected with the subject-matter of the action" so as to be a proper counterclaim. Lapham v. Osborne, 20 Nev. 168, 173, 18 Pac. 881.

CONNECTING ROADS.

"Connecting roads," as used in Act 1874, entitled "An act to prohibit monopolies," § 719q, declaring that all railroad companies shall at their terminus or intermediate point deliver to the "connecting road" all cars, etc., means "where any road at its terminus, or at any intermediate point along its line, joins another, or where two railroads have the same terminus, or where a railroad is adjacent to another and capable of being joined to it by a switch, either at its terminus or anywhere along its line where they meet or converge." Logan v. Central R. R., 74 Ga. 684, 685.

CONNECTION.

See "In Connection With."

A policy of insurance insuring plaintiff's wheat on the steamer Colorado and "connections" was not intended to cover a casual, unusual, and unanticipated connection with a ship substituted for the occasion, on a state of things temporary in their nature, and unknown at the time the contract was made, but referred to the regular connections of the company only. Schroeder v. Schweizer Lloyd Transport Versicherungs Gesellschaft, 60 Cal. 467, 478, 44 Am. Rep. 61.

St. Mass. 1897, c. 500, § 17, providing that, wherever a certain elevated railroad company is authorized to construct its road, the transit commission shall construct a tunnel of sufficient size for two railway tracks, etc., from a certain point to another point where a suitable "connection" with surface tracks may be made, means an actual physical contact, and hence such end of the tunnel must touch the subway, or at least come in immediate connection with it, and the tracks between them must come to the same grade at the point of junction, so that the passengers may pass directly from one to the other. Browne v. Turner, 54 N. E. 510, 515, 174 Mass. 150.

In construing an act granting a right of way for a switch road, and reserving to the grantor "the right to make or cause to be made and built on his own lands such switch road connection with the said line of switch, provided such connection shall in no manner obstruct or interfere with the use of said switch," the courts say that the words "connection" and "switch road" are used as synonymous terms. Palfrey v. Foster, 17 South. 425, 428, 47 La. Ann. 939.

"Connections," as used in a will providing that in case of the death of the testator's daughter the property devised to her should revert to the testator's nearest relations or connections, is synonymous with "relations," and includes only those who would be entitled to take under the statute of distributions had the testator died intestate, and does not include the testator's widow. Storer v. Wheatley's Ex'rs, 1 Pa. (1 Barr.) 508, 507.

In a bequest to the two nearest female relatives or "connections of my mother," the word "connections" may have a larger signification than "relatives," and it may have been the testator's intention, when giving to relatives or connections, to include connections by marriage in default of there being any relatives by consanguinity. Ennis v. Pentz (N. Y.) 3 Bradf. Sur. 382, 385.

CONNIVANCE.

"Connivance" is the corrupt consent of one party to the commission of the acts of the other constituting the cause of divorce. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 112; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 161. Corrupt consent is manifested by passive permission with intent to connive at or actively procure the commission of the acts complained of. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2745; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 75.

Connivance is the corrupt consenting of a married party to that conduct of the other of which afterwards complaint is made. It bars the right of divorce because no injury is received, for what a person has consented to he cannot set up as an injury. Connivance is a thing of the intent resting in the mind. It is the consenting. But the connivance may be the passive permitting of the misconduct as well as the active procuring of its commission. If the mind consents, that is connivance. Dennis v. Dennis, 36 Atl. 34, 36, 68 Conn. 186, 34 L. R. A. 449, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95 (citing Ross v. Ross, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 734; Pierce v. Pierce, 20 Mass. [3 Pick.] 299, 15 Am. Dec. 210).

Connivance is an agreement or consent, directly or indirectly given, that something unlawful shall be done by another. Oakland Bank of Savings v. Wilcox, 60 Cal. 126, 137.

Within the rule that connivance by a husband in his wife's adultery will bar him from a divorce, a corrupt intention is necessary to constitute connivance. The reasonable foundation of the rule that connivance prevents the libelant from maintaining his libel for adultery is that he has consented thereto, though the consent is unknown to the wife. Robbins v. Robbins, 5 N. E. 837, 839, 140 Mass. 528, 54 Am. Rep. 488.

Within the provisions of the Code providing that a divorce must be denied on the ground of desertion when there is an unreasonable lapse of time, such as establishes the presumption of connivance or collusion or condonation of the offense, "connivance" implies consent to the act complained of, and does not exist where the plaintiff alleged that defendant deserted and still continues such desertion without cause and against his will and without his consent, and such facts have been proved. Thomson v. Thomson, 53 Pac. 403, 121 Cal. 11.

"Passive sufferance and connivance" imply knowledge, and, where acts are suffered without remonstrance, it would be assent, although perhaps not choice. Sherwood v. Titman, 55 Pa. (5 P. F. Smith) 77, 81.

If a party who desires the testimony of a disobedient witness has "participated in his disobedience" (1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 1191), or has been guilty of "connivance" at the fault of the witness (Keith v. Wilson, 6 Mo. 435, 35 Am. Dec. 443)—that is to say, has been guilty of "voluntary oversight" or "passive consent" (Webst. Int. Dict.) while the witness, by his presence, was violating the rule—all the authorities agree he should not be allowed to testify. State v. Gesell, 124 Mo. 531, 536, 27 S. W. 1101, 1102.

CONQUEST.

Conquest is the right to conquer which results from a state of war. United States v. Castillero, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 17, 109, 17 L. Ed. 360.

CONQUETS.

In the French law, "conquets" means the profits; property jointly acquired by a husband and wife during the marriage. Picotte v. Cooley, 10 Mo. 312, 313, 314.

CONSANGUINITY.

See "Collateral Consanguinity"; "Direct Consanguinity"; "Lineal Consanguinity."

Consanguinity is the having the blood of some common ancestor, and is in its nature incapable of dissolution. Blodget v. Brinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30.

Consanguinity is blood relationship. Holt v. Watson, 71 S. W. 262, 263, 71 Ark. 87; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Iowa Water Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 467, 468.

"Consanguinity" means the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor, and is either lineal or collateral. Lineal is that which subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other. Collateral kindred descends from the same stock, but differ from the lineal in that they do not descend one from the other. State v. De Hart, 33 South. 605, 606, 109 La. 570.

"Consanguinity," as used in a by-law of a beneficial association providing that, when no relationship by marriage or consanguinity is shown in the direction for the payment of the benefit, proof of dependency must be furnished, means blood relationship. Tepper v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 45 Atl. 111, 115, 59 N. J. Eq. 321.

Consanguinity is either lineal or collateral. Lineal consanguinity is that which subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as between an intestate and his father or grandfather, etc., in the direct ascending line, or between him and his son or grandson, etc., in a direct descending line; and every generation in lineal, direct consanguinity constitutes a different degree, reckoning either upward or downward. Brown v. City of Baraboo, 62 N. W. 921, 90 Wis. 151, 30 L. R. A. 320.

"Consanguinity" is used by Blackstone synonymously with "kindred," and is defined as the relations of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor. Authors use the term "kin" or "kindred" as descriptive of those only who are related by consanguinity in the ordinary sense. The word may sometimes be used in a different sense, and is descriptive of those who are related by affinity. Rector v. Drury (Wis.) 3 Pin. 298, 302.

Consanguinity is the basis of the laws which regulate the degrees between which marriage is forbidden, the rules of succession and tutorship, recusation of judges, and the admission or rejection of persons who are offered as witnesses. Bernard v. Vignaud, 10 Mart. (O. S.) 482, 562.

Affinity distinguished.

The word "consanguinity" denotes relationship by blood as distinguished from "affinity," which is the connection existing in consequence of marriage between each of the married persons and the kindred of the other. Tegarden v. Phillips, 42 N. E. 549, 551, 14 Ind. App. 27; Carman v. Newell (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 25, 26; Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 531, 545; Doyle v. Commonwealth, 40 S. E. 925, 926, 100 Va. 808.

Computation of degrees.

"Consanguinity is the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor, vinculum personarum ab eodem stipite descendit (Toller, 87). Lineal consanguinity falls strictly within this definition, and is reckoned in the same way in the canon and common law; the rule being to begin at the common ancestry and reckon downward, and in whatever degree the two persons or the most remote of them is distant from the common ancestor, that is the degree in which they are related to each other." Sweezy v. Willis (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 495, 498.

CONSCIENCE.

"Conscience is defined to be internal or self-knowledge; the judgment of right and wrong, or the faculty, power, or principle within us which decides on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of actions and affections, and instantly approves or condemns them. Conscience is called by some writers the moral sense, and considered as an ordinary faculty of our nature." People v. Stewart, 7 Cal. 140, 143.

Every man of ordinary intelligence understands, in whatever other words he may express it, that conscience is that moral sense which dictates to him right and wrong. True, this sense differs in degree in individual members of society; but no reasonable being, whether controlled by it or not in his conduct, is wholly destitute of it. Miller v. Miller, 41 Atl. 277, 280, 187 Pa. 572.

Principle distinguished.

"Principle is the result of judgment, is tested by reason, definable by argument, and yields to the decision of an intelligent mind. Conscience springs from some internal source of self-knowledge which acknowledges no superior, bows to no authority, yields to no administration, and is governed by no law; it ignores reason, defies argument, and is unaccountable and irresponsible to all human tests and standards. In many cases conscience and principle have no connection whatever, and a man may be opposed on principle to what he conscientiously believes to be right." People v. Stewart, 7 Cal. 140, 143.

CONSCIENTIOUSLY.

"Conscientiously" is a word of quality rather than of quantity, and is not a proper substitute, therefore, for the expression "beyond a reasonable doubt," in a charge as to the quantum of evidence required in a criminal case. One may conscientiously—that is, sincerely, honestly—believe, having reference to the gravity of his belief, a thing to be true, which he does not, having reference to the strength of his belief, believe beyond a reasonable doubt. Burt v. State, 16 South. 342, 344, 72 Miss. 408, 48 Am. St. Rep. 563; Hammond v. State, 21 South. 149, 150, 74 Miss. 214; Orr v. State (Miss.) 18 South. 118.

CONSCIOUS.

A charge in a criminal case that, if the prisoner had power of mind enough to be "conscious of what he was doing" at the time, then he was responsible to the law for that act, was held not to be error; the court (Agnew, C. J.) saying: "It is contended this language was incorrect, and was liable to mislead the jury, because the prisoner might be conscious of what act he was doing, and yet, in consequence of mental disability or disease, be incapable of refraining from its commission. But the charge has a plain English meaning, referring to the nature of the act, and, when taken in connection with other parts of the charge, this portion is not susceptible of misconstruction. All the judge said referred plainly not to the mere act, but to the prisoner's consciousness of what he did as a crime. The phrase 'conscious of what he was doing' is idiomatic, and is understood to mean the real nature and true character of the act as a crime, and not to the mere act itself. As used by the judge in connection with what else he said, it was not contradictory or misleading. A memorable instance of this idiomatic use of the word 'what' is found in the language of our Saviour on the cross, when he said, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' Clearly, the Jews knew well that they were crucifying Jesus, but their darkened minds were unconscious of the great crime they were committing." Brown v. Commonwealth, 78 Pa. (27 P. F. Smith) 122, 128.

CONSCRIPT—CONSCRIPTION.

See "Bureau of Conscription."

"A 'conscript' is one taken by lot from the conscription or enrollment list, and compelled to serve as a soldier or sailor." Webst. Dict., "Conscript." Kneedler v. Lane, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 238, 267.

A note for the payment of a sum of money, conditioned that, if the conscript should take a certain person, the note should be void, and, if the conscript does not take such person, it should remain in full force and virtue, was held to mean the actual placing of the person in the conscript's service, not if the conscript law should take such person. Conscription was what the parties were looking to and providing against, and conscription in its popular sense means a finished complete enrollment of the soldier in the public service, not merely the extension of the law so as to embrace it. It means "taken by the conscript officer for a conscription and placed in the conscript service." Lively v. Robbins, 39 Ala. 461, 463.

CONSECUTIVE.

"Consecutive" is synonymous with "successive," and these words are often used interchangeably; so that a decision that a publication for 3 successive weeks must be made for a period of 21 days authorizes such holding as to a publication required to be made for 3 consecutive weeks. Dever v. Cornwell, 86 N. W. 227, 230, 10 N. D. 123.

The requirement that the same person shall not be elected sheriff for two consecutive full terms, in Const. art. 9, § 2, does not apply to two terms separated by a period of two years. Gorrell v. Bier, 15 W. Va. 311, 321.

While the term "consecutive days" primarily means that many days directly following one another, it is also defined as meaning successive; but in cases of contracts that significance should be given it which the parties evidently intended it should have. A contract providing for publication in a paper for 10 consecutive days must mean publication in consecutive numbers as such paper was published. We do not regard the word "consecutive" as any more forcible than the word "continuous." Both signify "unbroken," and the fact that the newspaper published no issue on Sunday did not render the publication other than consecutive. City of El Paso v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank (Tex.) 71 S. W. 799, 802.

CONSEDO.

A word used in Mexican conveyances which is to be translated as "granted." Mulford v. Lu Franc, 26 Cal. 88, 103.

CONSENT.

See "Age of Consent"; "Implied Consent"; "Mutual Consent"; "Without Consent"; "Written Consent."

The word "consent" has been defined to be an agreement of the mind to what is proposed or stated by another. Plummer v. Commonwealth, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 76, 78.

Consent, says Story, is the act of reason, accompanied with deliberation, the mind weighing as in a balance the good and evil on both sides. To give consent there must be capacity, therefore, to know and understand fully the nature of the act done and its effects upon the interests of the agent. Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484, 492.

Consent in law is more than a mere formal act of the mind. It is an act unclouded by fraud, duress, or sometimes even mistake. Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457, 463.

The consent of a local government controlling public streets, on which the right to construct and operate a railroad through or on public streets is dependent, whether it be permanent or for a number of years or at the will of such local government, is what the law denominates an easement, the duration of which is dependent only upon the extent of the interest the grantor had authority to grant, and the terms of the consent itself. Detroit Citizens' St. Ry. Co. v. City of Detroit (U. S.) 64 Fed. 628, 644, 12 C. C. A. 365, 26 L. R. A. 667.

Where papers showing the required consent of taxpayers have been filed, and an affidavit attached to them stating that the consent in writing had been obtained of persons owning, etc., which consent has been proved and acknowledged according to the acts—specifying them definitely—but the affidavit did not state otherwise what the consent was to or for, it must nevertheless be taken to mean the consent required by the statutes designated. Phelps v. Lewiston (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 450, 459.

The term "consent," as used in Act May 16, 1894 (P. L. 1894, p. 374), providing that a petition for the designation of route, construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway company shall not be granted by the governing body of any municipality until there be filed with the clerk of such municipality the consent in writing of the owners of at least one-half in amount in lineal feet of property fronting on the street over which the street railway is to run is neither a license nor concession, granting to the street railway company some interest in land or right in the highway, but, on the contrary, it is the statutory mode of conferring upon the legislative body of the municipality jurisdiction over a special subject. Currie v. Atlantic City, 48 Atl. 615, 616, 66 N. J. Law, 140.

Acts 1838, c. 126, § 1, requiring that desertion, in order to justify a divorce, should be without the consent of the party deserted, meant without the manifested consent, and the undisclosed emotions of the deserted party did not affect his rights. Ford v. Ford, 10 N. E. 474, 475, 143 Mass. 577.

The "consent" of the parties in a contract of sale, as explained by Pothier, consists in the concurrence of the will of the vendor to sell a particular thing to the purchaser for a specified price, with the will of the purchaser to buy the same thing for that price. Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith (N. Y.) 6

Wend. 103, 114, 21 Am. Dec. 262 (citing Contrat de Vente, pl. 1, § 2, art. 3, No. 31).

"Consent" implies a degree of superiority; at least, the power of preventing. It implies not merely that the person accedes to, but authorizes, an act. Cowen v. Pad-dock, 17 N. Y. Supp. 387, 388, 62 Hun, 622.

Acquiescence.

Mere acquiescence in the erection or alteration of improvements by lessees is not a consent to the lessees making such improvements. There must be something more. Consent is not a vacant or neutral attitude in respect of a question of such material interest to the property owner. It is affirmative in its nature. It should not be implied contrary to the obvious truth unless upon equitable principles the owner should be estopped from ascertaining the truth. De Klyn v. Gould, 59 N. E. 95, 97, 165 N. Y. 282, 80 Am. St. Rep. 719.

In a statute providing that no part of a county shall be taken from another county to form a new county, or a part thereof, without the consent of two-thirds of the qualified voters, in such part taken off, "consent" means the active concurrence of the voters, and not a passive acquiescence, and that the votes of two-thirds of the qualified voters must be had in favor of the change in order to authorize the same. Cocke v. Gooch, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 294, 310; Braden v. Stump, 16 Lea, 581 (quoted in Philomath College v. Wyatt, 31 Pac. 206, 217, 26 Or. 390, 26 L. R. A. 68).

Within the provision of an act conferring on contractors and others improving real property, with the consent and at the request of the owner thereof, a lien for such improvements, the word "consent" implies that the owner must either be an affirmative factor in procuring the improvement to be made, or, having possession and control of the premises, assent to the improvement in the expectation that he will reap the benefit of it. Thus, where an owner of land leased it to a corporation, the lessee to have the right to remove all buildings, etc., erected by it, the landlord was not liable for work done upon the buildings erected by the lessee, which was in no way to his interest, but was liable for work done in grading the premises at the lessee's instance, but with the landlord's knowledge, before the execution of the lease, and before possession had been given to the lessee. Rice v. Culver, 64 N. E. 761, 762, 172 N. Y. 60.

As agreement.

Pothier Traite de Contrat de Venta. Mac-tier's Adm'r's v. Frith (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 103, 114, 21 Am. Dec. 262.

As used in Gen. St. 1872, c. 120, § 7, giving a lien for labor and material furnished by consent, "consent" is to be construed as meaning an agreement or contract, if not express, at least implied. Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 1, 3.

A wife allowed her husband, at his own expense, to build houses on land held by a title of record to her sole and separate use, and the contractor furnished materials and built the houses, supposing that the husband was the owner. It was held that the contractor was not entitled to a lien under Gen. St. § 3018, giving a mechanic's lien for materials furnished or services rendered under an agreement with or by the consent of the owner of the land. The court said: "Consent means unity of opinion; the accord of minds; to think alike; to be of one mind. Consent involves the presence of two or more persons, for without at least two persons there cannot be a unity of opinion or an accord of mind or any thinking alike. When the statute uses the words 'by the consent of the owner of the land,' it means that the person rendering the service or furnishing the materials and the owner of the land on which the building stands must be of one mind in respect to it. The words 'consent of the owner' are used in the statute as something different from an agreement with the owner, and, while it may be urged that they do not require such a meeting of the minds of the parties as would be essential to the making of a contract, there must be enough of a meeting of their minds to make it fairly apparent that they intended the same thing in the same sense. It cannot be supposed that the statute was designed to be made a cover for entrapping a party into seeming consent when there was no real one. Without this degree of unanimity there could be no real consent. Gilman v. Disbrow, 45 Conn. 563; Flannery v. Rohrmayer, 46 Conn. 560, 33 Am. Rep. 36. It is plain from the finding that the owner never consented to the thing which the plaintiff claims. She consented, indeed, to the building of houses on her land by her husband upon the promise that they should be built without any expense to her and without any risk to her interest in the land. She did not consent even that her husband should build them at her expense or upon the credit of her land; much less did she ever consent that the plaintiff should build them at her cost." Huntley v. Holt, 20 Atl. 469, 470, 58 Conn. 445, 9 L. R. A. 111.

"Consent," as used in Laws 1885, c. 342, § 1, providing that any person who shall perform any labor or service or furnish any materials which have been used, or which are to be used, in erecting, altering, or repairing any house, with the consent of the owner, may have a lien on such house and on the lot, arises from a contract for the sale of the land which obligated the vendee to erect houses thereon within a specified time, and in which the vendor agreed to advance the vendee a designated sum to partly pay the cost of their construction. Miller v. Mead, 28 N. E. 387, 388, 127 N. Y. 544, 13 L. R. A. 701.

Aiding, abetting, and assisting distinguished.

There is a plain distinction between consenting to a crime, and aiding, abetting, or assisting in its perpetration. "Aiding, abetting, or assisting" are affirmative in their character, while "consenting" may be a mere negative acquiescence, not in any way made known at the time to the principal malefactor; such consenting, though involving moral turpitude, not amounting to aiding, abetting, or assisting. Jones v. People, 46 N. E. 723, 725, 166 Ill. 264; White v. People, 81 Ill. 333, 337; State v. Douglass, 26 Pac. 476, 479, 44 Kan. 618.

The words "approve of" and "consent to" do not, singly or combined, express the idea of contribution to, or procurement of, a felonious act, for a person may be present and heartily approve of an act after it is done without being at all willing to or capable of aiding or advising or procuring it to be done, especially if it be felonious; or he may consent in the sense of offering no resistance to the commission of the act, or the slightest contribution to it of his own will; and therefore it is erroneous, in a homicide case, to instruct that, if defendant did in some manifest manner approve of or consent to the killing of deceased by another, he would be guilty of the crime. True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 685, 90 Ky. 651; Omer v. Commonwealth, 25 S. W. 594, 596, 95 Ky. 353.

"Consent," as a substantive, is a synonym of "assent," "acquiescence," "concurrency," and means an agreement or harmony of opinion or sentiment. It does not imply any manifestation or expression of such concurrence, though this may sometimes be inferred from the connection in which the word is used; so that an instruction that, if murder was committed with the knowledge and consent of defendant, she was guilty as a principal, is erroneous in that it does not require any manifestation or overt act of such consent. Clem v. State, 33 Ind. 418, 431 (cited in Drury v. Territory, 60 Pac. 101, 107, 9 Okl. 398).

The word "consent" has been defined as an agreement of the mind to what is proposed or stated by another; but it is improperly used as tending to be misleading in an instruction in a homicide case, authorizing a conviction if deceased was murdered by the hand of some person other than either of the prisoners, and the prisoners, or either of them, were present, knowing of and consenting to the murder, for though such word might be properly understood to mean a participation in the murder, yet it might have been understood by the jury in a different sense, so as to authorize a conviction if defendants were present and acquiesced in the homicide, without aiding or abetting its perpetration or having any participation in the deed. Plummer v. Commonwealth, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 76, 78.

As assent or permit.

"Consent," as used in Laws 1885, c. 342, providing that any person furnishing materials or erecting buildings with the consent of the owner or his agent is entitled to a lien therefor, does not mean express authority or consent; and there is no distinction to be drawn between the meaning of the word as used and the word "assent" or "permit," though, as set forth in Crabb's English Synonyms, there may be a recognized and real difference between the words "assent," "consent," "permit," and "allow." He says: "As the act of an equal we consent to that in which we have a common interest with others; we permit or allow what is for the accommodation of others; we allow by abstaining to oppose; we permit by a direct expression of our will; contracts are formed by the consent of the parties who are interested. Consent respects matters of serious importance; permit and allow regard those of an indifferent nature. A parent consents to the establishment of his children; he permits them to read certain books; he allows them to converse with him familiarly. Assent may be given to anything, whether positively proposed by another or not, but consent supposes that what is consented to is proposed by some other person." Cowen v. Paddock, 17 N. Y. Supp. 387, 388, 62 Hun, 622.

"'Consent' is an agreement to do something proposed, and differs from 'assent.' The word is generally used in cases where power, rights, and claims are concerned. We give consent when we yield that which we have a right to withhold." Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 1, 7.

The word "consent" implies some positive action, while the word "permit" implies merely passivity. Aull v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co., 20 S. E. 302, 304, 42 S. C. 431.

As used in the laws giving a lien for material furnished with the consent of the owner, the word "consent" has the same legal meaning as the word "permission," and one permitting the erection of buildings gives a "consent," within the meaning of the act. Miller v. Meed, 3 N. Y. Supp. 784, 785; Rice v. Culver, 68 N. Y. Supp. 24, 25, 57 App. Div. 552; Hackett v. Badeau, 63 N. Y. 476.

"'Consent' is defined to be an agreement in opinion or sentiment, the being in one mind, accord, concurrence, and is synonymous with 'assent.'" Hawkins v. Carroll County Sup'rs, 50 Miss. 735, 759.

"Consent" and "assent" are not synonymous terms, but, when used in the phrases "assent to the sale" and "consent to the sale," are practically synonymous. Kornegay v. Styron, 11 S. E. 153, 105 N. C. 14, 18.

Conduct as indicating.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 23b, 30 Stat. 553 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3431], providing that suits by a trustee in bankruptcy shall be brought only in those courts where the bankrupt might have brought them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by "consent" of the proposed defendant, a person against whom the trustee files a petition in the court of bankruptcy for an order requiring him to surrender property alleged to belong to the bankrupt, and who answers on the merits, gives a bond for delivery of the property, and proceeds to a hearing before the referee without objection, must be taken to have "consented" to the proceedings. In re Connolly (U. S.) 100 Fed. 620, 626.

In the statement that a party is liable for the reasonable value of labor performed for him without an expressed contract as to payment therefor, but with his consent, consent is often treated as meaning conduct expressive of consent. Jacksonville Nat. Bank v. Williams, 20 South. 931, 935, 38 Fla. 305.

The phrase "without the consent," in a divorce statute making the desertion without the consent of the party deserted a ground for divorce, means the manifested consent, and the mere undisclosed emotion of the deserted party is immaterial. Ford v. Ford, 10 N. E. 474, 475, 143 Mass. 577.

Power to decide implied.

"The usual signification of the word 'consent' implies assent to some proposition submitted. In cases of contract it means the concurrence of wills. Consent supposes a physical power to act, a moral power of acting, and a serious determination and free use of these powers." The word is used in this sense in Const. art. 15, § 9, providing that a homestead shall not be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife, and therefore the consent of a wife to such conveyance must be at the time of its execution, and an attempted consent thereafter is of no effect. Howell v. McCrie, 14 Pac. 257, 261, 36 Kan. 636, 59 Am. Rep. 584; Locke v. Redmond, 49 Pac. 670, 671, 6 Kan. App. 76.

"'Consent' means a voluntary agreement by a person in the possession and exercise of sufficient mental faculty to make an intelligent choice to do or allow some lawful thing. A man cannot consent to the taking of his own life or to an injury which is likely to result in his own death. If a person is divested of the power of refusal by reason of total or partial want of mental faculties, the damage cannot be excused on the ground of consent given, and consent given by a person in such a condition is equivalent to no consent at all; more especially so when the state of mind is well known to the party doing him the injury." McCue v. Klein, 60 Tex. 168, 169, 48 Am. Rep. 260.

"Consent," as used in Mechanic's Lien Law 1885, § 1, providing that mechanics shall have a lien for labor done with the consent of the owner of the property, implies that the owner has the power to give or withhold his consent in respect to the construction, alteration, or reparation of the building. Vosseller v. Slater, 49 N. Y. Supp. 478, 480, 25 App. Div. 368 (affirmed 163 N. Y. 564, 57 N. E. 1127); National Wall Paper Co. v. Sire, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1009, 1010, 37 App. Div. 405; Rice v. Culver, 64 N. E. 761, 762, 172 N. Y. 60. The fact that the owner was frequently about the place and made no objection to the work as it progressed, but never gave affirmative consent to the work, or expressed to the contractor the approval or adoption of it while it progressed, did not constitute a consent to the work within the meaning of such law. National Wall-Paper Co. v. Sire, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1009, 1010, 37 App. Div. 405.

Presence implied.

A statement in a justice's docket that a certain cause was adjourned by consent is a sufficient docket entry to show that his jurisdiction was not defeated by the adjournment as being ordered in the absence of a party thereto, as the presumption will not be indulged that the parties were not present when they consented. Hardenburgh v. Fish, 70 N. Y. Supp. 415, 417, 61 App. Div. 333.

Ratification.

The consent of a borough, if necessary to enable a street railway company to change from horse power to an electric trolley system, may be by ratification as well as by previous permission. Potter v. Scranton Traction Co., 35 Atl. 188, 189, 176 Pa. 271.

Consent is had and obtained, as required by Act Cong. Jan. 20, 1813, for the enlistment of a minor child, when given after the enlistment. Commonwealth v. Camac (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 87, 88.

"Consent," as used in Rev. St. Ill. 1874, p. 1094, c. 146, § 9, allowing a change of venue by consent of the parties, means consent existing at the time the motion for change of venue is made, and a consent withdrawn before the making of the motion is not consent within the meaning of the statute. Schmidt v. Mitchell, 84 Ill. 195, 196, 25 Am. Rep. 446.

As shall.

Act May 21, 1889, providing that a corporation organized for floating logs shall not be obliged to operate or furnish the use of its improvements unless the owners of such logs consent to pay the tolls provided for, does not mean that the owner must give his express promise to pay before incurring any liability. The word "consent" has no other meaning than "shall." West Branch Logging Co. v. Strong-Deemer Co., 46 Atl. 290, 291, 196 Pa. 51.

Submission distinguished.

There is a difference between "consent" and "submission." Every consent involves a submission, but it by no means follows that a mere submission involves consent. Regina v. Day, 9 Car. & P. 722; State v. Cross, 12 Iowa, 66, 70, 79 Am. Dec. 519.

The mere submission of a child to an act of sexual intercourse can by no means be taken to be such consent as to justify the person in point of law. State v. Cross, 12 Iowa, 66, 70, 79 Am. Dec. 519.

CONSENT DECREE.

"A consent decree is the mere agreement of the parties under the sanction of the court, and is to be interpreted as an agreement and release by a party of his legal rights, not to be rashly deduced from equivocal terms." Allen v. Richardson (S. C.) 9 Rich. Eq. 53, 56; Kelly v. Town of Milan (U. S.) 21 Fed. 842, 865.

A consent decree is not, in a strict sense, a judicial sentence. It is in the nature of a solemn contract, and is in effect an admission by the parties that the decree is a just determination of their rights upon the real facts of the case, had such been proved. As a result, such a decree is so binding as to be absolutely conclusive upon the consenting parties, and it can neither be amended or in any way varied without a like consent, nor can it be reheard, appealed from, or reviewed upon a writ of error. Schmidt v. Oregon Gold Min. Co., 40 Pac. 1014, 28 Or. 9, 52 Am. St. Rep. 759.

CONSENT JUDGMENT.

A consent judgment is where the parties agree upon the terms of the judgment—that is, as to what shall be put in the judgment; but the agreement of attorneys to an order authorizing an award of arbitrators to be filed in another county than that in which the cause was tried is not such judgment. Henry v. Hillard, 27 S. E. 130, 132, 120 N. C. 479.

CONSENTABLE LINE.

A consentable line is the boundary line fixed by adjoining landowners, who, being duly apprised of their rights, establish such line as a permanent boundary and to settle a dispute in relation thereto. Brown v. Caldwell (Pa.) 10 Serg. & R. 114, 115, 13 Am. Dec. 660.

CONSENT OF OWNER.

As used in Pub. St. c. 191, § 1, giving a lien for labor or materials furnished and used in the erection of a building by virtue of an agreement with or by the "consent of the owner," does not necessarily mean a consent directly and personally given by the owner of the property himself, but includes the direction or consent of one to whom the owner has delegated authority concerning the subject-matter, so that where one, having a contract for a building, sublet the plumbing contract, the materials and labor furnished under the latter contract were furnished by "consent of the owner" within the meaning of the statute. Moore v. Erickson, 32 N. E. 1031, 1032, 158 Mass. 71.

Where a lease provides that the lessee may at his own expense alter and repair the building leased, one who makes such alterations under a contract with the lessee does the work with the "consent of the owner," within Laws 1885, c. 342, providing for a mechanic's lien for services performed or materials furnished with the consent of the owner. Mosher v. Lewis, 31 N. Y. Supp. 433, 435, 10 Misc. Rep. 373.

CONSEQUENCES.

See "In Consequence of"; "Natural Consequences"; "Probable Consequence."

An exception in an insurance policy that the company should be free of all claim for loss or damage occasioned by a derangement or breaking of the engine or machinery, or any "consequence" resulting therefrom, meant immediate or proximate, and not a remote consequence. Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Adams, 8 Sup. Ct. 68, 71, 123 U. S. 67, 31 L. Ed. 63.

"Consequences resulting therefrom," as used in a policy of marine insurance providing that the company shall not be liable "for any damage or loss received from the bursting of boilers, or from any consequences resulting therefrom," means any result of which the bursting of the boiler was the approximate cause. Roe v. Columbus Ins. Co., 17 Mo. 301, 305.

CONSEQUENTIAL CONTEMPT.

The term "consequential contempt" of court is the ancient name of what is now known as "constructive contempt." Ex parte Wright, 65 Ind. 504, 508.

CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.

"Consequential damages" are such as are the necessary and connected effect of the tortious act, though to some extent depending upon other circumstances. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3911.

"Consequential damages" are those that follow naturally, but indirectly, from a wrong act. Pearson v. Spartanburg County, 29 S. E. 193, 194, 51 S. C. 480.

"Consequential damage" is used to mean a diversity of things. "It means both damage which is so remote as not to be actionable, and damage which is actionable. Sometimes it is used to denote damage which, though actionable, does not follow immediately in point of time after the doing of the act complained of. This has been aptly called 'consequential damage to the actionable degree.' It is thus used to signify damage which is recoverable at common law in an action of case, as contradistinguished from an action of trespass. On the other hand, it is used to denote damage which is so remote a consequence of an act that the law furnishes no remedy to recover it. The terms 'remote damages' and 'consequential damages' are not necessarily synonymous, or to be indifferently used. All remote damages are consequential, but all consequential damages are by no means remote." Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. R., 51 N. H. 504, 511, 12 Am. Rep. 147.

CONSERVATOR.

In Connecticut the county courts appoint a committee of an idiot under the denomination of a "conservator" to take the oversight of his estate for his support. Treat v. Peck, 5 Conn. 280, 284.

CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE.

"Conservator of the peace" was the name of a common-law officer, which, prior to St. 1 Ed. iii, c. 16, authorizing the appointment of justices of the peace, were elected by the people. They were common-law officers, and their duties as such were to prevent and arrest for breaches of the peace in their presence, but not to arraign and try the offender. Smith v. Abbott, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 358, 366; In re Barker, 56 Vt. 14, 20.

A conservator of the peace is an officer authorized to preserve or maintain the public peace, so that one who is by a statute expressly designated as "a conservator of the peace" also comes within the description of a "peace officer." In Texas the statute imposing a penalty for carrying a pistol excludes from its operation all peace officers, and Const. art. 4, § 15, provides that county judges shall be conservators of the peace. Under these statutes it was held that a county judge was entitled to carry a pistol, the term "conservator of the peace" being synonymous with "peace officer." Jones v. State (Tex.) 65 S. W. 92.

CONSIDER.

See "It is Considered."

To "consider" means to think with care upon a matter. Lake v. Ocean City, 41 Atl. 427, 428, 62 N. J. Law, 160.

As used in a question to a witness, "Do not farmers consider corn mature when it is fit to cut up?" the word "consider" is synonymous with "think" or "believe." Richards v. Knight, 78 Iowa, 69, 71, 42 N. W. 584, 4 L. R. A. 53.

"Consider" means, primarily, to fix the mind on with a view to a careful examination; to think on with care; to ponder; to study; to meditate on; and is so used in Const. Oclo. art. 5, § 20, providing that no bill shall be "considered" or become a law unless referred to a committee, returned therefrom, and printed for the use of the members; and the provision is therefore sufficiently complied with by printing the bill before it is taken up as a subject of deliberation for debate or amendment. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Colorado Loan & Trust Co., 36 Pac. 793, 794, 20 Col. 1.

The words "considers himself aggrieved," as used in the statute of Wisconsin authorizing an appeal by any person who shall consider himself aggrieved by any order in relation to laying out, discontinuing, etc., a highway, is practically synonymous with "conceives himself aggrieved" as used in the New York statute. The word "consider" means to think, regard in a certain aspect, look upon, hold, or assume, while "conceive" means to believe, suppose, form a notion, or think; and hence the construction of the statute will be governed by that of the New York statute from which it is derived, and under such rule any freeholder may appeal from such order, and need not own land affected by a highway, nor have any such interest therein. State v. Wheeler, 72 N. W. 225, 226, 97 Wis. 96.

Under Code S. C. § 57, providing that any person interested in any final order, sentence, or decree of any probate court, and "considering himself injured thereby," may appeal therefrom, only a person who is a party to the proceedings in a court of probate can appeal, for no one can consider himself injured by any final order or decree made in a proceeding to which he is not a party. Witte v. Clarke, 17 S. C. 313, 323.

"The word 'consider' is often used to express an idea which exists in the mind with perfect distinctness, but it does not always convey to the understanding of the person to whom it is addressed one which is very precise. * * * A person, to secure his property so that it shall not be taken in payment of his debts, may by solemn instruments transfer it to a friend, expecting to have all the essential use as he had before. If he supposes that his property has been legally transferred, he may with propriety say that he 'considers' it the property of another, although bona fide it is otherwise." Crooker v. Trevett, 28 Me. 271, 274.

In common parlance "consideration" means deliberation, thought, but in legal phraseology, when the word is used in speaking of the "consideration of the court," it means judgment. It is used in the latter sense in a statute providing that every purchase made in a certain manner shall be "considered" fraudulent and void, and the phrase "it is considered by the court" is equivalent to the phrase that "it is adjudged by the court." Terrill v. Auchauer, 14 Ohio St. 80, 85.

As declare as a fact.

In an agreement for the occupation of land belonging to defendant upon certain terms specified, providing that when plaintiff came into possession defendant should furnish all the hay the stock required, and when the year expired plaintiff should leave enough hay to maintain the stock until grass came, or, if there was not enough, defendant should furnish it and plaintiff should pay a certain sum for it, the hay and straw to be considered as belonging to defendant from the beginning to the end of the year, and if there was any surplus of feed upon the farm it should be considered as belonging to defendant, "considered" rendered the expression equivalent to a declaration that the ownership of the hay and straw should be that of the defendant. Vedder v. Davis, 1 N. Y. Supp. 886, 887, 49 Hun, 611.

"Considered sound," as used in a bill of sale stating that plaintiff bought of defendant one bay horse considered sound, is not an assertion or undertaking that the horse was sound, so as to constitute a warranty. Wason v. Rowe, 16 Vt. 525, 528.

As be treated as.

Rev. St. Me. c. 91, § 2, providing that a chattel mortgage shall be "considered" as recorded when received, means that after the delivery and entry the effect shall be the same as if actually spread upon the records. This provision, however, applies only when the mortgage is left with the clerk until recorded. Jones v. Parker, 73 Me. 248, 251.

In an act providing that persons who have resided in any township for a certain term shall be considered as legally settled in such township, the word "considered" is not used in its technical definition as to fix the mind on, with a view to a careful examination; to revolve; to think over; to ponder. The Legislature is not required to use words in law in their stricter and more accurate sense. They are supposed to use words as they are commonly used, and the act speaks to those whose duty it is to pass judgment on the question of settlement, and in declaring what shall be the determination on certain facts found it cannot be amiss to do so in language such as courts of record uniformly adopt in recording their most solemn judgments. "Ita consideratum est per curiam" serves to conclusively determine issues of law and fact. McLorinan v. Bridgewater Tp., 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 614, 616, 10 Atl. 187.

CONSIDERABLE TIME.

In an instruction in an injury case against the city declaring that if the city permitted to be left for a "considerable length of time" a cut in the street, and permitted to be left for a "considerable time" a curbstone in the crossing, and that the cut and stone rendered the said work unsafe and dangerous, and the plaintiff was injured thereby, etc., the defendant was liable, etc., the phrase "a considerable length of time" was so indefinite as to form no proper test for the guidance of the jury, inasmuch as the period of 10 days and 2 months might be, in the estimation of the jury, a "considerable length of time," and, though whether the time occupied was reasonable or not was for the jury to determine, the test was the reasonableness of the time occupied, and not a "considerable length of time." City of Lincoln v. Calvert, 58 N. W. 115, 117, 39 Neb. 305.

Within the meaning of the rule that, to bar a right to enter lands as against a claimant thereof under erroneous boundary lines, the erroneous lines must have been agreed on between the parties claiming the land on both sides, and afterwards acquiesced in for a considerable time, what this period is has not been limited or defined, but is vague and uncertain, and must necessarily depend on the particular circumstances of each case. It has often been said that this acquiescence must have continued for a period of time scarcely less than that prescribed by the statute of limitations. Beardsley v. Crane, 54 N. W. 740, 742, 52 Minn. 537.

CONSIDERABLE PROVOCATION.

The term "considerable," although generally used by text-writers in describing that condition which will reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, is at best inexact and indefinite, and, unless explained by the court, well calculated to confuse or mislead the jury; for what one jurymen, in the absence of instructions on the subject, might regard considerable, would in the estimation of another fall short of that degree or character of provocation that would meet the requirement of the law. To make the best or most of the word "considerable," it certainly never was intended to mean more or less than legal provocation; and this court has expressly held that the trial court should not leave the jury to determine for themselves what would constitute legal provocation. McClurg v. Commonwealth, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 1339, 1341, 36 S. W. 14 (citing Donnellan v. Commonwealth, 70 Ky. [7 Bush] 676, 677).

The "considerable provocation" which may reduce murder to manslaughter must be such as was ordinarily calculated to excite the passions beyond control. Lewis v. Commonwealth, 19 S. W. 664, 665, 93 Ky. 238; Strutton v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 62 S. W. 875, 877, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 307.

With reference to the "considerable provocation" which will reduce murder to manslaughter, if the conduct of the persons slain would be likely to cause a reasonable person to act from mere passion, and without the exercise of reason, it constitutes an adequate cause, and what is known in law as a "considerable provocation." People v. Olsen, 11 Pac. 577, 4 Utah, 413.

CONSIDERATION.

See "Additional Consideration"; "Collateral Consideration"; "Failure of Consideration"; "Good Consideration"; "In Consideration"; "Legal Consideration"; "Moral Consideration"; "Nominal Consideration"; "Pecuniary Consideration"; "Sufficient Consideration"; "Take into Consideration"; "Valid Consideration"; "Valuable Consideration."

A "consideration" for a promise "is where there is a benefit to the party promising, or a loss to the person to whom the promise is made." Frear v. Hardenbergh (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 272, 277, 4 Am. Dec. 356; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 18 Am. Dec. 79; Kemp v. National Bank of the Republic (U. S.) 109 Fed. 48, 52, 48 C. C. A. 213. A "consideration" consists of some benefit or advantage accruing to the promisor, or of some loss or disadvantage incurred by the promisee. A consideration is an essential ingredient to the legal existence of every simple contract. Eastman v. Miller, 85 N. W. 635, 636, 113 Iowa, 404; Conover v. Stillwell, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 54; Headley v. Leavitt (N. J.) 55 Atl. 731, 734; Day v. Gardner, 7 Atl.

365, 366, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 199; Powell v. Brown (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 100, 104; Ryan v. Hamilton (Ill.) 68 N. E. 781, 785; Overstreet v. Phillips, 11 Ky. (1 Litt.) 120, 123.

A "consideration" is defined to be a cause, or occasion meritorious, that requires a mutual recompense. Sterling v. Sinnickson, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 756, 760.

A "valuable consideration," in a legal sense, may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other. St. Mark's Church v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583, 24 N. E. 1014, 1015 (citing Currie v. Misa, L. R. 10 Exch. 162; Chft. Cont. [9th Am. Ed.] 29; 2 Kent, Comm. 465); Larned v. City of Dubuque, 53 N. W. 105, 109, 86 Iowa, 166; Kemp v. National Bank of the Republic (U. S.) 109 Fed. 48, 52, 48 C. C. A. 213; Ballard v. Burton, 24 Atl. 769, 771, 64 Vt. 387, 16 L. R. A. 664.

A consideration emanating from some injury or inconvenience to the one party, or some benefit to the other, is a "valuable consideration." Day v. Gardner, 7 Atl. 365, 366, 42 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 199 (citing Conover v. Stillwell, 34 N. J. Law [5 Vroom] 54); Traphagen's Ex'r v. Voorhees, 12 Atl. 895, 901, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 21.

A "consideration" is any benefit to the promisor, or any loss, trouble, or inconvenience to or charge upon the person to whom the promise is made. Chicora Fertilizer Co. v. Dunan, 46 Atl. 347, 350, 91 Md. 144, 50 L. R. A. 401; Ayres v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co., 52 Iowa, 478, 3 N. W. 522, 523; Eastman v. Miller, 85 N. W. 635, 636, 113 Iowa, 404; Fisher v. Bartlett (Me.) 8 Greenl. 122, 123, 22 Am. Dec. 225.

Consideration "is something of value in the eye of the law, moving from one person to another. It may be of some benefit to the latter or some detriment to the former." New York & M. Gold Min. Co. v. Martin, 13 Minn. 417, 421 (Gil. 386, 388); Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Q. B. 851, 859; Kemp v. National Bank of the Republic (U. S.) 109 Fed. 48, 52, 48 C. C. A. 213; Ten Eyck v. Sleeper, 67 N. W. 1026, 1027, 65 Minn. 413. Thus, where the lessee of premises is insolvent and would be unable to pay the rent required in his lease, an agreement on the part of the lessor to accept a less sum as rent, which the lessee will be able to pay, is based on a sufficient consideration. Ten Eyck v. Sleeper, 67 N. W. 1026, 1027, 65 Minn. 413; Kidder v. Blake, 45 N. H. 530, 532. There must be something given in exchange, something which is mutual, which is the inducement to the contract; and there must be a thing which is lawful and competent in value to sustain the assumption. It was an early principle of the common law that a mere voluntary act of courtesy would not uphold an assumpsit, but a courtesy shown by a previous request would support it. Kansas Mfg. Co. v. Gandy, 11 Neb. 448, 450, 9 N. W. 569, 570, 38 Am. Rep. 370.

"Consideration" may be described generally as mere matter accepted or agreed on as a return or equivalent for a promise made, showing that the promise is not made gratuitously. Donahoe v. Rich, 28 N. E. 1001, 1003, 2 Ind. App. 540 (citing Bish. Cont. [Enlarged Ed.] p. 39, § 39).

The "consideration for a contract" is "the material cause of the contract, without which it will not be effectual or binding." Streshley v. Powell, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 178, 180 (citing Tomlin's Law Dict. p. 393).

"The 'consideration,' in the legal sense of the word, of a contract, is the quid quo, that which the party to whom a promise is made does or agrees to do in exchange for the promise. In a contract of insurance the promise of the insurer is to pay a certain amount of money upon certain conditions, and the 'consideration' on the part of the assured is his payment of the whole premium at the inception of the contract, or his payment of part then, and his agreement to pay the rest at certain periods while it continues in force." Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 7 Sup. Ct. 500, 506, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. Ed. 644.

The term "consideration," as used in the law of contracts, means "some benefit or advantage accruing to the party promising." Forbis v. Inman, Paulson & Co., 31 Pac. 204, 205, 23 Or. 68 (citing Buchanan v. International Bank, 78 Ill. 500).

One of the broadest and perhaps best definitions of the "consideration" for a contract is the reason which moves the contracting party to enter into an agreement. Chitty, speaks of the consideration as the "motive or inducement to make the promise." 1 Pars. Cont. 355, says "the consideration is the cause of the contract." This reason or motive, or inducement or cause, must, it is agreed on all hands, be free from illegality in the case of a contract. Roberts v. City of New York (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 41, 49.

Probably no rule of law has given rise to a greater multitude of cases and a greater diversity of decisions than that which requires that a simple contract cannot be supported without a sufficient consideration. Many judges, in giving opinions, and many authorized text-books, have endeavored to give a correct definition of such a consideration; but it is believed that it would be in vain to search the most complete law library for one that would be complete and logically accurate. We can deduce the rule that if a man by a promise induces the promisee or some other person on account of or for the benefit of the promisee, to do some act, or part with some chattel, title, interest, privilege, or right, which the law regards as of some value, there is a sufficient consideration for the promise. To ascertain what the consideration of a promise is, therefore, is to discover what the promisee or such other person did or parted with on the strength of the promise. Rice v. Almy, 32 Conn. 297, 303.

Amount of value.

It is said that it is not essential that the consideration should be adequate in point of actual value; that it is sufficient that a slight benefit be conferred on the defendant, or at his request on a third person, at law; and that mere folly and weakness, or want of judgment, will not defeat a contract, even in equity, when the folly is not so extremely gross as that, with other facts in corroboration, it does not establish a case for relief on the ground of fraud. Whitney v. Stearns, 16 Me. (4 Shep.) 394, 396.

It is not always necessary that consideration for a promise should be of some value to the promisor; damage or inconvenience to the promisee is sufficient consideration, and, where the court can see that there may have been some such inconvenience, it will uphold the contract. Williams v. Jensen, 75 Mo. 681, 685.

A sufficient consideration for a promise arises wherever, by the act of the promisee, a benefit results to the promisor, or, at his request, to a third person, or if a promisee sustains any loss or inconvenience, or subjects himself to any charge or obligation, at the instance of the promisor, although such promisor obtains no advantage therefrom. Wilson v. Baptist Education Soc. (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 308, 313.

Any benefit accruing to him who makes the promise, or any loss, trouble, or discharge undergone by or charge imposed upon him to whom the promise is made, is a sufficient consideration to sustain the promise; and hence, in the absence of fraud, mere inadequacy of consideration is no ground for avoiding a contract. Appeal of Clark, 19 Atl. 332, 333, 57 Conn. 585 (citing Smith's Lectures on Contracts). "The quantum of benefit on the one hand, or the loss on the other, is immaterial." Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 62, 18 Am. Dec. 79.

Any act done by the promisee at the request of the promisor, however trifling the loss to himself or the benefit to the promisor, is a sufficient consideration for a promise made without fraud and with full knowledge of all the circumstances. Doyle v. Dixon, 97 Mass. 208, 213, 93 Am. Dec. 80; Ballard v. Burton, 24 Atl. 769, 771, 64 Vt. 387, 16 L. R. A. 664. A very slight advantage to one party, or a trifling inconvenience to the other, is a sufficient consideration to support a contract when made by a person of good capacity who is not at the time under the influence of any fraud, imposition, or mistake. Traphagen's Ex'r v. Voorhees, 12 Atl. 895, 901, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 21 (citing Harlan v. Harlan, 20 Pa. [8 Harris] 303). In respect to the extent of the loss, trouble, or inconvenience to the promisee, it is immaterial that it is of the most trifling description, provided it be not utterly worthless in fact and law. Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511, 517.

"A consideration has been well defined as 'consisting of any act of plaintiff from which the defendant or a stranger derives a benefit or advantage.' * * * It is not necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise; it is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made, or that he suffer some prejudice or inconvenience, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction." 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. 2244. An order for the payment of money, given by a debtor to his creditor, and accepted by the drawee, is a sufficient consideration for an agreement by the creditor to forbear suing on the original debt for a specified time. Staver v. Missimer, 6 Wash. 173, 175, 32 Pac. 995, 996, 36 Am. St. Rep. 142.

Consideration may arise or be created by doing or permitting something to be done to the prejudice or loss of one of the parties. So that it is not absolutely necessary that the consideration for a contract import some gain to him that makes the contract, but it is sufficient that the party in whose favor the contract is made foregoes some advantage or benefit which otherwise he might have taken or had, or suffered some loss in consequence of placing his confidence in another's understanding. Wooldridge v. Cates, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 221, 222 (citing Pow. Cont. 344).

To constitute a consideration for a contract or promise, it is not absolutely necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction. Lee Silver Min. Co. v. Omaha & Grant Smelting & Refining Co., 26 Pac. 326, 331, 16 Colo. 118.

A consideration to a third party may be an inducement to a person to give his note, and in such case the promise is just as binding as though the promisor had received the benefit. Where, at the time of dedicating a church, A. promised verbally to pay $50 towards liquidating the indebtedness of the society and to enable it to complete its church, and thereafter, in lieu of his promise to contribute money, he gave his note for $50, payable to B., a trustee of the society, who had advanced money for the church, B. was entitled to recover on the note in his own name. Wheeler v. Toof, 2 Mich. N. P. 44, 48.

Consideration is sufficient if injurious to the promisee, whether beneficial or not to the promisor. Any damage to another, or suspension or forbearance of his right, is a foundation for an undertaking, and will make it binding, though no actual benefit accrue to the party undertaking. Farmer v. Stewart, 2 N. H. 97, 100; Townslley v. Sumrall, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 170, 181, 7 L. Ed. 386.

Any act done by the promisee, at the request of the promisor, by which the former sustains any loss, trouble, or inconvenience, constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise, though the latter obtains no advantage therefrom. Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511, 517.

"Any damage or suspension or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise. 2 Kent's Comm. (12th Ed.) p. 465. In Burr v. Wilcox, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 273, Wells, J., in defining 'consideration,' says any act done at the defendant's request, and for his convenience or to the inconvenience of the plaintiff, would be sufficient. Pollock, in his work on Contracts, p. 166, says 'consideration' means, not so much that one party is profiting, as that the other abandons some legal right in the present. In Boyd v. Freize, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 554, Shaw, C. J., says an agreement therefor to forego one's legal right, or forbear collecting a debt or enforcing any other beneficial right, is a good consideration for an express promise made upon it. Such agreement may be express or implied by law." Ballard v. Burton, 24 Atl. 769, 771, 64 Vt. 387, 16 L. R. A. 664.

Benefit to third person.

To constitute consideration, it is not absolutely necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise; it is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction. Violett v. Patton, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 142, 150, 3 L. Ed. 61.

As compensation or price.

The consideration of a contract is said by Blackstone (2 Comm. p. 444) "to be the price or motive of the contract." Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 496, 1 Am. Rep. 576; Latham's Adm'r's v. Lawrence, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 322, 325.

War Revenue Stamp Act 1898, Schedule A, requiring stamps on deeds of realty in proportion to the "consideration" or value of the interest transferred, where it is conveyed subject to incumbrances, means the consideration for the conveyance, which is the price bid. Central Trust Co. v. Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. (U. S.) 92 Fed. 919, 920.

"Consideration," as used in a statute requiring the consideration of every mortgage to be expressed therein, means something of value in the eye of the law, something in the way of price and compensation, which must be of value to the obligor or to the detriment of the obligee. Ford v. Burks, 37 Ark. 91, 94.

As demand.

Under Act 1858, § 2918, providing for a set-off by defendant of any matter arising "out of plaintiff's demand," or "out of the original consideration of any written instrument," it is held that these phrases do not mean all rights that may be asserted, of whatsoever nature, by either party, to the property, or concerning the property, which was the subject of the dealing of the parties. In the first expression quoted, the word "demand" means the assertion of a right to recover a sum of money from the defendant, and subsequently the same ideas are conveyed by the word "consideration" in the second expression. Blair v. A. Johnson & Sons (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 912, 914.

Doing what one is bound to do.

A promise to do what a person is bound to do by law is not a good consideration for another undertaking. Eastman v. Miller, 85 N. W. 635, 636, 113 Iowa, 404 (citing Ayres v. C. R. I. & P. R. Co., 52 Iowa, 478, 8 N. W. 522).

The performance of an act which the party is under legal obligation to perform does not constitute a consideration for a new contract. Thus, where plaintiff contracted to buy defendant's house, and afterward desired to have his wife substituted as grantee, but refused to accept a conveyance at all unless defendant would guaranty him a water-tight cellar, an agreement by defendant to do so in consideration of the wife accepting the conveyance was invalid for want of consideration. Jughardt v. Reynolds, 74 N. Y. Supp. 152, 154, 68 App. Div. 171.

Fortuitous or accidental result.

Consideration, like every other part of a contract, must be the result of agreement. The parties must understand and be influenced to the particular action by something of value, or convenience and inconvenience, recognized by all of them as the moving cause. That which is a mere fortuitous result, flowing accidentally from an arrangement, but in no degree prompting the actors to it, is not to be esteemed a legal consideration. Kirkpatrick v. Muirhead, 16 Pa. (4 Har.) 126. In order that an extension of time shall be a good and valid consideration, it must be contracted for. In re Dutton's Estate, 37 Atl. 582, 586, 181 Pa. 426.

Illegal acts.

Consideration is the inducement to a contract. "Simple contracts require a consideration to be proven or expressed; but every bond imports in itself a sufficient consideration, though none be mentioned; but if it were really given on an illegal consideration, the obligor may plead special matter, and thus avoid the bond." Grubb v. Willis (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 107, 108.

Love and affection.

A deed cannot operate as a bargain and sale unless it has a pecuniary consideration, nor as a covenant to stand seised to uses unless the consideration be love and affection for a near relation or marriage. Affection for an illegitimate child is not sufficient. Blount v. Blount, 4 N. C. 389, 391.

Mere expectation or possibility.

"Consideration," as an element of a contract, is that which is given or suffered in return for the promise. It may be either gain to the promisor or loss to the promisee, as forbearance to sue on a just debt. Mere possibility, however, of loss, or that the promisor might be injured, is not sufficient to constitute a consideration. The injury depended on must appear to have happened in consequence of an agreement clearly understood. Lemaster v. Burkhart, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 25, 30.

A "consideration for a contract" is the price voluntarily paid for a promisor's undertaking. "An expectation of results often leads to the formation of a contract, but neither the expectation nor the result is the cause or meritorious occasion requiring a mutual recompense in fact or in law." Philpot v. Gruninger, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 570, 577, 20 L. Ed. 743.

A moral obligation is available as a consideration for an express promise or contract in those cases, and only those, where a prior legal obligation has existed, which by reason of some statute, as the statute of limitations, or a stubborn rule of law, such obligation cannot now be enforced. Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 63, 18 Am. Dec. 79.

A moral obligation to pay a debt is a sufficient consideration to uphold a promise to pay it. So where a defendant, being in the custody of the sheriff under execution, escaped, and the sheriff paid the judgment, a promise made by the defendant to repay the sheriff the amount so paid by him was based on a sufficient consideration, both on the ground of moral obligation to pay, and also because, by such payment by the sheriff, defendant was exonerated from his liability to the judgment creditor. Doty v. Wilson (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 378, 381.

Any legal or equitable duty is sufficient for an actual promise to pay, though no court of law or equity could enforce a moral obligation. The honesty and rectitude of the thing is a sufficient consideration. Shenk v. Mingle (Pa.) 13 Serg. & R. 29, 33 (citing Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. 290).

Pre-existing or debt discharged in bankruptcy.

"Consideration" is defined by the negotiable instruments law, § 51, as follows: "Consideration. What constitutes—Value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. (a) An antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value; and is deemed such whether the instrument is payable on demand or at a future time." Brewster v. Shrader, 57 N. Y. Supp. 606, 608, 26 Misc. Rep. 480.

Discharge under the insolvent act does not make the original contract void. Where a debt is barred by a certificate of bankrupt, a promise made afterwards by the bankrupt will support an action, and it is sufficient in such case to declare upon the original consideration. Such promise could only revive a precedent good consideration, the remedy having been suspended by the discharge. The new promise is sufficiently laid by the words "ratified, renewed, and confirmed." The words "renewed the said promises" are peculiarly appropriate and amply sufficient. Shippey v. Henderson (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 178, 180, 7 Am. Dec. 458.

The consideration mentioned in rule 18 of the land office, providing that applications for change of entry or settlement must be forwarded to the commissioner of the general land office for consideration, is clearly not of the character of a review of the decision already made by the local land officers, but is in the nature of an original consideration of the subject by the general land office, to which office the final decision belongs. Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Gray Eagle Oil Co., 23 Sup. Ct. 692, 696, 190 U. S. 301, 47 L. Ed. 1064.

Value received.

Where the plaintiff, who had recovered a judgment in a justice court and taken out execution, directed the constable to take security from the defendant rather than carry him to jail, and the constable took as security the undertaking of a third person, indorsed on the execution, by which he promised to pay the debt and costs in the life of the execution "for value received," such undertaking was based on sufficient consideration. The words "value received" are a sufficient consideration, at least prima facie, and here was a good consideration in fact. Hinman v. Moulton (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 466, 467.

As the whole consideration.

Where a New York statute provides that, where a grant is made to one person and the consideration is paid by another, no use or trust shall result to the latter, and another section provides that the former section shall not extend to cases where the alienee named in the conveyance shall have taken the same in his name without the consent or knowledge of the person paying the consideration, the word "consideration" will be construed to mean the whole consideration, and not a part of it; and hence, where a wife paid about one-tenth of the consideration for a conveyance to her husband, which he agreed to take in her name, such payment did not vest in her any estate in the land. Schierloh v. Schierloh, 42 N. E. 409, 410, 148 N. Y. 103.

CONSIDERATUM EST PER CURIAM.

A judgment, though pronounced by the judges, is not their determination and sentence, but the sentence and determination of the law, which depends, not upon the arbitrary opinion of the judge, but upon the settled and invariable principles of justice, and is the remedy prescribed by law for the redress of injuries. And therefore the style of a judgment is not "that it is ordered or resolved by the judges"—for then the judgment might be their own—but "it is considered," ("consideratum est per curiam"), which implies that the judgment is not their own, but the act of the law pronounced and declared by the court upon determination and inquiry. Accordingly, where a judgment was entered below, "Ordered by the court that the said defendant," etc., there was no judgment, and no appeal would lie. Baker v. State, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 491, 492.

CONSIGN.

"To 'consign,' in the mercantile law, is ordinarily to send or transmit the goods to a merchant or factor for sale." Powell v. Wallace, 25 Pac. 42, 43, 44 Kan. 656.

In mercantile law, to "consign" is ordinarily to send or transmit goods to a merchant or factor for sale. The original meaning of the word "consign," which is of French origin, is to deliver or transfer, as a charge or trust. When used in connection with a vessel, it generally refers to the goods which are shipped by her, for the vessel itself is in the charge of the master. Gillespie v. Winberg (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 318, 320.

The words "consign" and "consigned," employed in letters relating to the shipments of goods by the consignor to another for the purpose of sale, are used in their commercial sense, and mean that the property was intrusted or committed to the other for care or sale by the one, or the purchase by the other. Sturm v. Boker, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 103, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

The term "consign," as used in a contract by which a company agreed to supply the plaintiff on his requisition with cash and raw material in advance, to be charged to him against manufactured goods consigned to them for sale, was to be construed in its obvious and common meaning, implying title in the consignor. Dittmar v. Norman, 118 Mass. 319, 324.

The word "consigned," in a commercial sense, carries a decided implication that the property consigned is not the property of the consignee. The invoice carries no implication of ownership, it being well understood that an invoice usually accompanies goods that are consigned to a factor for sale, as well as in case of purchase. Rolker v. Great Western Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Dec. 76, 83.

To "consign" is to deposit with another, to be sold, disposed of, or cared for, as merchandise or movable property. Stand. Dict. To "consign," in mercantile law, is to send goods to an agent, commission merchant, correspondent, or factor to be sold, stored, etc. F. F. Ide Mfg. Co. v. Sager Mfg. Co., 82 Ill. App. 685, 687 (quoting Rapalje & L. L. Dict.; Standard Dict.).

CONSIGNEE SIX MO.

A bill of goods sold, in which the words "consigned six mo." stand by themselves, conveys no distinct idea to a stranger to the dealings between the parties, but evidence is admissible to show that it meant that the goods could be returned if not sold within six months. George v. Joy, 19 N. H. 544, 547.

CONSIGNEE.

The person to whom freight is to be delivered is called the "consignee." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2110; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2800; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 662; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4186; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1539.

"Consignee," in its ordinary mercantile sense, means the person to whom a shipment of merchandise is addressed. Gillespie v. Winberg (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 318, 320.

A "consignee" is a person to whom merchandise or personal property of any kind is transmitted for the purposes of sale. Commonwealth v. Harris, 32 Atl. 92, 93, 168 Pa. 619; Powell v. Wallace, 25 Pac. 42, 43, 44 Kan. 656.

The term "consignee" means a purchaser of goods to whom they are shipped. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Freed, 38 Ark. 614, 622.

As bailee, factor, or owner.

A consignee differs from an ordinary bailee mainly in that he is authorized to sell in the ordinary course of business, but if he sells out of the ordinary course of business he abuses his powers, and against this abuse the consignor is protected like any other bailor. Romeo v. Martucci, 45 Atl. 1, 3, 72 Conn. 504, 47 L. R. A. 601, 77 Am. St. Rep. 327.

A consignee of goods is a factor, within the meaning of the embezzlement statutes. Thompson v. Beacon Valley Rubber Co., 16 Atl. 554, 558, 56 Conn. 493.

The term "consignee" is one to whom goods are consigned. The term is nearly synonymous with "factor"—"a person to whom goods are sent for sale or safe-keeping." The term is not synonymous with "owner," though the owner of goods may often be the consignee thereof. Lyon v. Alvord, 18 Conn. 66, 80.

The consignee of imported goods is the "owner" thereof, for the purpose of a collection of the duties thereon under section 3058, Rev. St., as amended by Act Feb. 23, 1887, c. 221, 24 Stat. 415 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2005], although the consignor, or any other party who, at the request or with the consent of the consignee, procured the importation, has failed to obey the consignee's instructions as to the payment of the duties thereon, or to comply with the terms of the contract between them in regard to the purchase and consignment of the goods. United States v. Bishop (U. S.) 125 Fed. 181, 183, 60 C. C. A. 123.

CONSIGNEE'S RISK.

See "At Owner's Risk."

CONSIGNMENT.

As convey, see "Convey."

"Consignment" imports a sending to, or transferring or delivering of, property by one into the possession of another. Block v. Columbian Ins. Co., 42 N. Y. 393, 403 (affirming 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. [3 Rob.] 296).

A consignment of goods for sale is ordinarily a bailment. The word "consignment" does not imply a sale. The very term imports an agency, and that the title is in the consignor. Harris v. Coe, 41 Atl. 552, 554, 71 Conn. 157 (citing Benj. Sales [6th Ed.] 7; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 326, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093; Rolker v. Ins. Co., 42 N. Y. 23; Powell v. Wallace, 44 Kan. 656, 659, 25 Pac. 42).

In a writing on a printed letter head describing the writer as a commission merchant, suggesting a consignment, and offering to handle grapes on commission or buy outright, "consignment" should be construed in the sense of shipment, and not as a consignment to a factor. Commonwealth v. Harris, 32 Atl. 92, 93, 168 Pa. 619.

CONSIGNOR.

The person who delivers the freight to the carrier is called the "consignor." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2110; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2800; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 662; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4186; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1539.

"Consignor," in the original mercantile acceptance of the word, signifies a shipper of merchandise. Gillespie v. Winberg (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 318, 320; Hardy v. Munroe, 127 Mass. 64.

"Consignor" is a term used to mean a vendor who ships goods. Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Freed, 38 Ark. 614, 622.

CONSIST OF.

"The words 'consisting of' are not synonymous with the word 'including,' but, where something is described as consisting of certain other things, it always implies that there may be others which are not mentioned." Farish v. Cook, 6 Mo. App. 323, 331.

CONSISTENT.

"Consistent" means not contradictory; compliable; accordant. O'Malley v. Luzerne County (Pa.) 3 Kulp, 41, 46.

"Consistent" means compatible; congruous; standing together in agreement. The test on the question of inconsistency between the charter of a railroad company and the general law relating to condemnation of lands for a right of way is this: Can the requirements of both the charter and the general act be followed out and complied with in one case? Visscher v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 37, 44.

A charge to a jury, reciting that reasonable care to prevent injury to passengers on an elevator is the highest degree of care "consistent with the possibility of injury," means that the care must be commensurate with or in proportion to the possibility of injury presented by the particular situation. Mitchell v. Marker (U. S.) 62 Fed. 139, 142, 10 C. C. A. 306, 25 L. R. A. 33.

CONSISTENT DEFENSES.

The expression "consistent defenses," as used in a statute providing that defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses as he may have, and that different "consistent defenses" may be separately stated in the same answer, means defenses which are not inconsistent with each other in fact, without reference to technical conclusions or implications of law which may be drawn or arise therefrom, and that in determining this right two statements or defenses should never be held to be inconsistent if both of them may be true. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Warren, 6 Pac. 724, 725, 3 Wyo. 134.

In discussing the allowance of pleas apparently inconsistent, but where no statement made is inconsistent with another express statement made in the pleas, the court said: "If we were to limit our statutory allowance of consistent defense by the strict logic of the old special pleas in bar, all special defenses would be cut off when the cause of action was denied, for such special defenses are technically supposed to confess and avoid, though in fact they may not confess at all. Such an interpretation of the statutes should not be adopted if there is any other that will give the party his clear right to several defenses. A special defense is not necessarily inconsistent with denial. For instance, suppose A. sues B. on a note. B. denies its execution in the nature of a special non est factum under the old system, and afterwards alleges payment or release. He did not thereby deny the existence of the paper, and an averment of payment or any other matter of discharge is not necessarily inconsistent in fact with original non-liability, for men sometimes adjust demands for which they are not liable. If, notwithstanding, the demand is put in suit, it would be unjust to deprive a defendant of every lawful defense. The right of a full defense will be secured if the consistency required be one of fact merely, and if two or more defenses are held to be inconsistent only when the proof of one disproves the other." Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596, 100 Am. Dec. 328 (cited in Smith v. Doherty, 60 S. W. 880, 381, 109 Ky. 616).

"Grotius calls a corporation 'consociatio,' which signifies association. He applies the term to a people, which is properly considered a corporation in respect to its power of individual action and ownership." Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 104.

CONSOLIDATE—CONSOLIDATION.

To "consolidate" means something more than rearrange or redivide. In a general sense, it means to unite into one mass or body, as to consolidate the forces of an army or various funds. In parliamentary usage, to "consolidate" two bills is to unite them into one. In law, to "consolidate benefices" is to combine them into one. Independent Dist. of Fairview v. Durland, 45 Iowa, 53, 56.

Of actions.

"Consolidation" is the uniting in one suit of two or more actions separately begun. "All courts feel a strong desire to prevent the accumulation of cases and the bringing of useless suits, and it is to further this object that consolidation is effected. In ordinary cases, when actions might have been comprised in same writ, it is the duty of the court, on motion of either party, on payment of the costs which have then accrued, to order a consolidation, unless the party shows that the same defense does not apply in all cases." Powell v. Gray, 1 Ala. 77, 79.

Where several actions or suits depend on the same questions and substantially the same evidence, a rule may be had that the causes be consolidated, and that all the causes abide the event and final determination of the one which the plaintiff may elect to notice for trial, and whatever judgment may be finally rendered in the cause thus noticed for trial will be entered in all the other causes as a final determination of them. Jackson v. Chamberlin (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 282.

Consolidation of actions will be ordered where separate suits are brought on notes and contracts made by the same person at the same time, and where the defense is or must be the same in law. Thompson v. Shepherd (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 262.

Of corporations.

When the rights, franchises, and effects of two or more corporations are by legal authority and agreement of the parties combined and united into one whole and committed to a single corporation, the stockholders of which are composed of those (so far as they choose to become such) of the companies thus agreeing, this is, in law and according to common understanding, a "consolidation" of such companies, whether such single corporation, called the "consolidated company," be a new one then created, or one of the original companies continuing in existence with only larger rights, capacities, and property. Meyer v. Johnston, 64 Ala. 603, 656.

Mr. Beach says: "The word 'consolidation' is used to denote any conjunction or union of the stock, property, or franchises of two or more corporations, whereby the conduct of their affairs is permanently or for a long period of time placed under one management, whether the agreement between them be by lease, sale, or other form of contract, and whether its effect be the dissolution of either of the companies, or whether one of them be dissolved and its existence be merged in the corporate being of the other, or whether it result in the dissolution of both companies, and the creation of a new corporation out of such portions of the original companies as enter into the new." 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 326. Where a street railway company transfers all its property and business to another company, in consideration of stock and bonds of the latter issued to the stockholders and bondholders of the former to replace its stock and bonds which were surrendered and canceled, no money being paid, such transaction, as to the creditors of the former company, should be considered a consolidation of the companies, by which the latter becomes liable for the debts of the former. Such transaction is termed in England an "amalgamation." Shadford v. Detroit, Y. & A. A. Ry., 89 N. W. 960, 962, 130 Mich. 300.

The term, where such phrase as "consolidation by merger" occurs, has, as it seems to us, been carelessly confounded with the term "amalgamation" as used in England. "Amalgamation," in the English sense, probably means about what "merger" does with us, but it is not "consolidation" in any proper sense of the term. It is in the interest of clearness of definition that "consolidation" should be limited to signify such union of two or more corporations as necessarily results in the creation of a third new corporation. Thus, in Brice's Ultra Vires, in a learned note, p. 538, it is said the term "amalgamation" is seldom applied to corporations in this country. That which takes its place as much as any is "consolidation." "Consolidation" would be inapplicable to a union of two or more companies in such way that one of the original corporations was continued in existence, while the others were merged or absorbed in it. The absorption of one corporation by another would, according to some of the decisions, be an "amalgamation" in England, but it would not be a "consolidation" here. The legal effect of a consolidation is to extinguish the constituent companies, and create a new corporation with proper liabilities and stockholders derived from those then passing out of existence. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 24 South. 200, 211, 77 Miss. 194, 60 L. R. A. 33 (citing McMahan v. Morrison, 16 Ind. 172, 79 Am. Dec. 418; Lauman v. Lebanon Val. R. Co. 30 Pa. [6 Casey] 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685; Clearwater v. Meredith, 68 U. S. [1 Wall.] 25, 17 L. Ed. 604; Atlantic & Gulf R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 359, 361, 25 L. Ed. 185; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 308, 14 Sup. Ct. 592, 38 L. Ed. 450; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 465, 466, 5 Sup. Ct. 529, 28 L. Ed. 1055).

The term "consolidation" is an elastic one, and may include a union of two or more corporations into a new one with a different name, with or without extinguishing the constituent corporations; or the merging of two or more corporations into one existing corporation under the name of the latter. Pingree v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 76 N. W. 635, 643, 118 Mich. 314, 338, 53 L. R. A. 274 (citing Elliot, R. R. § 335).

Consolidation of the stock of two companies results in the creation of a new corporation, rather than in the merger of the two corporations; and under Acts 1882, c. 932, § 25, whereby a railroad company is authorized to "consolidate" with any other railroad company, a "merger" of the two companies is not authorized. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 24 South. 200, 205, 77 Miss. 194, 60 L. R. A. 33.

The word "consolidation" is used to denote any conjunction or union of the stock, property, or franchises of two or more corporations, whereby the conduct of their affairs is permanently or for a long period of time placed under one management, whether the agreement between them be by lease, sale, or other form of contract, and whether it is effected by the dissolution of either of the companies, or whether one of them be dissolved and its existence merged in the corporate being of the other, or whether it result in the dissolution of both companies and the creation of a new corporation out of such portions of the original companies as enter into the new. People v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. (Ill.) 68 N. E. 950, 953.

"Consolidation" of corporations, as generally understood, means something more than the mere subscribing by one company for stock in another. It implies a blending of all assets under a common control, and the assuming by the joint responsibility of all the liabilities of each; the creation of a new corporate body which displaces and destroys an individual existence of its predecessors. Buford v. Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co., 3 Mo. App. 159, 171.

Corporations can only consolidate when authorized by law, and then in the manner provided by law, and where there is no law in the territory, when certain transactions occurred, authorizing the consolidation of corporations, the fact that any of the parties may have designated the acts done as a "consolidation" could have no legal effect. One corporation may, in contemplation of closing up its business, sell its assets, property, and business to another corporation, and make arrangement for the liquidation of its liabilities, but this does not constitute a "consolidation." Overstreet v. Citizens' Bank, 72 Pac. 379, 383, 12 Okl. 383.

Of laws.

"Consolidate," as used in the title of Laws 1893, Act No. 118, to consolidate the laws relative to penal institutions and the government and discipline thereof, and to repeal all acts inconsistent therewith, implied an intention on the part of the Legislature to include the entire control over the subject, and, the provisions of the act being intended to cover the entire management of such penal institutions, the same did not violate Const. art. 4, § 25, providing that the act consolidated and the sections altered or amended shall be re-enacted and published at length. Ellis v. Parsell, 58 N. W. 839, 840, 100 Mich. 170.

The use of the word "consolidate" in the act of 1897 entitled "An act to revise, amend, and consolidate the laws for the incorporation of the ecclesiastical bodies," indicates very clearly that the purpose of the Legislature was to collect in one act the law relating to the subject. Graham v. Muskegon County Clerk, 116 Mich. 571, 572, 74 N. W. 729, 730 (citing Attorney General v. Parsell, 100 Mich. 170, 58 N. W. 839).

Of railroads.

"Consolidation," as used in Const. Ill. art. 11, § 11, forbidding the consolidation of parallel railroads, is used in the sense of "joined" or "united," so that a lease of the parallel and competing railroad for 10 years is a consolidation. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Jarvis (U. S.) 92 Fed. 735, 743, 34 C. C. A. 639.

Act Mo. March 23, 1868, authorizing the "consolidation" of railroad companies under certain conditions, did not mean a sale by one company to another. Consolidation is not sale, and, when two companies are authorized to consolidate their roads, it is to be presumed that the franchises and privileges of each continue to exist in respect to the several roads so consolidated. Green County v. Conners, 3 Sup. Ct. 69, 70, 109 U. S. 104, 27 L. Ed. 872.

The word "consolidate" in Const. art. 11, § 3, providing that no railway company or telegraph company shall consolidate its property, franchises, or earnings in whole or in part with any other railroad corporation or telegraph company owning a parallel or competing line, is used in the sense of "join" or "unite." It is an absolute prohibition against a railroad corporation consolidating its stock, property, franchises, or earnings in whole or in part with any other railroad corporation owning a parallel or competing line, and the law cannot be evaded by substituting a lease of such a line by a deed or conveyance. State v. Atchison & N. R. Co., 38 N. W. 43, 51, 24 Neb. 143, 8 Am. St. Rep. 464.

CONSOLS.

Green and brown consols are those bonds of the state of South Carolina which were issued in 1877 and 1879, which were colored, respectively, green and brown. Whaley v. Gaillard, 21 S. C. 560, 568.

CONSONANT.

A "consonant" is a letter of the alphabet which can only be sounded with the aid of a vowel, and cannot be held to be a name by itself. Kinnersly v. Knott, 7 C. B. 980, 987.

CONSORTIUM.

As property, see "Property."

As separate property of wife, see "Separate Property."

The husband's interest in the society of his wife is expressed by the word "consortium"—the right to the conjugal fellowship of the wife, and her company, co-operation, and aid in every conjugal relation. Rigaouette v. Paulet, 134 Mass. 123, 124, 45 Am. Rep. 307; Jacobson v. Siddal, 7 Pac. 108, 110, 12 Or. 280, 53 Am. Rep. 360; Crowell v. Truesdell, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1013, 67 App. Div. 502; Long v. Booe, 17 South. 716, 719, 106 Ala. 570.

The gist of the action for alienating the affections of a wife is not the loss of assistance, but the loss of the "consortium" of the wife or the husband, under which term is usually included the person's affection, society, or aid. Lockwood v. Lockwood, 70 N. W. 784, 785, 67 Minn. 476; Betser v. Betser, 58 N. E. 249, 250, 186 Ill. 537; Reading v. Gazzam, 49 Atl. 889, 200 Pa. 70; Seaver v. Adams, 19 Atl. 776, 66 N. H. 142, 49 Am. St. Rep. 597.

The word "consortium" includes those duties and obligations which by marriage both husband and wife take upon themselves toward each other in sickness and health, which it cannot be supposed that the Legislature has intended wholly to uproot. A married woman may now perform any labor or services on her sole separate account, as her husband may; nevertheless each owes certain duties to the other which are not annulled by the statutes. Kelley v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 46 N. E. 1063, 163 Mass. 308, 38 L. R. A. 631, 60 Am. St. Rep. 397 (citing Mewhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618).

In an action by a husband for injury to a wife, it was said that the measure of recovery is the wrong done to his rights; that it closely resembles the action of a father for the injury to or disablement of his child, or the master for his servant. The measure of recovery differs just as the rights invaded differ. The wife owes a broader and a higher duty, of which physical labor may or may not be a part, according to circumstances. Her duty is called by the common-law writers "consortium," which means conjugal society and assistance. Selleck v. City of Janesville, 80 N. W. 944, 946, 104 Wis. 570, 47 L. R. A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892.

CONSORTSHIP.

An agreement or stipulation of "consortship" is a contract capable of being enforced in the admiralty against property or proceeds in the custody of the court. It is a maritime contract for services to be rendered on the sea, and an apportionment of the salvage earned therein. It seems to be a not uncommon course among the owners of a certain class of vessels commonly called "wreckers" on the Florida coast, with a view to prevent mischievous competitions and collisions in the performance of salvage services, to enter into stipulations with each other that the vessels owned by them respectively shall act as consorts with each other in salvage services, and share mutually with each other in the moneys awarded as salvage, whether earned by one vessel or by both. Andrews v. Wall, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 568, 571, 11 L. Ed. 729.

CONSPICUOUS.

"Conspicuous," as used in a rule of a railroad company requiring a backing engine or train to have a conspicuous light on the engine or rear car, means such light as will show the direction in which the car is moving. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Walsh, 41 N. E. 900, 901, 157 Ill. 672.

CONSPICUOUS PLACE.

By the use of the word "conspicuous," as used in the statute requiring town meetings to be notified by posting an attested copy of the warrant in "some public and conspicuous place in said town," etc., it was intended to prevent the possibility of calling a town meeting in a secret manner by posting a notice in a public place, and yet in such a position that but few, if any, persons would be likely to notice it. Wardens of Christ's Church v. Woodward, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 172, 179.

Dropping a notice of appeal into the office of the attorney for the adverse party through a letter slot in the office door is leaving it in a "conspicuous place," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 797, subd. 3, permitting the service of a paper on an attorney, if there is no person in charge of his office, and the service is made between 6 a. m. and 9 p. m., by leaving it in a conspicuous place in his office. Livingston v. New York El. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 706, 707, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 369.

"Conspicuous place," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1011, providing for the service of papers on attorneys by leaving them in a conspicuous place in the office in the absence of the attorney, should be construed to include a place designated by the attorney for the deposit of letters and papers in his absence. January v. Superior Court, 15 Pac. 108, 73 Cal. 537.

The phrase "conspicuous places," in Act June 7, 1897, c. 4, § 2, 30 Stat. 102 (2 Supp. Rev. St. 1892-97, p. 626 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2884]), providing for the furnishing of the inspectors' rules to ferryboats and steam vessels, and for posting them in conspicuous places, means that they should be posted where they can easily be read. In re Rapid Transit Ferry Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 786, 796.

Rev. St. 1898, § 1130, requiring the county treasurer, at least four weeks before the date of the sale of property for delinquent taxes, to cause to be posted up copies of such statement and notice in some conspicuous place in his office, is satisfied by the county treasurer posting such notice on the inside door of the county treasurer's office. The words "conspicuous place" should be given their natural meaning, and they naturally indicate an inner door into the treasurer's office, and hence necessarily a conspicuous place in the office. Allen v. Allen, 91 N. W. 218, 220, 114 Wis. 615.

Whether a paper is left, in serving it, in a conspicuous place in the office of an attorney, is a matter upon which the minds of men may differ, and must be determined by the court, in the exercise of its judicial functions, rather than by the party making the affidavit. Elder v. Frevert, 3 Pac. 237, 239, 18 Nev. 278, 280.

CONSPIRACY.

See "Civil Conspiracy"; "Criminal Conspiracy"; "Unlawful Conspiracy."

"Conspiracy" is said to be an offense known to the ancient common law, antedating the statute of Edward I; the most widely recognized definition of which declares a criminal conspiracy to consist of a combination between two or more persons for the purpose of accomplishing a criminal or unlawful act, or an object neither criminal nor unlawful by unlawful means, or, as it has been more concisely expressed, the combination of two or more persons to do something unlawful, either as a means or as an ultimate end. State v. Slutz, 30 South. 298, 299, 106 La. 182; Wright v. United States (U. S.) 108 Fed. 805, 808, 48 C. C. A. 37; The Mussel Slough Case (U. S.) 5 Fed. 680, 683; In re Wolf (U. Rep. 476; Clinton v. Estes, 20 Ark. 216, 217, 224; Regina v. Vincent, 9 Car. & P. 91.

A conspiracy is a combination formed by two or more persons to effect an unlawful end, said persons acting under a common purpose to accomplish the end desired. United States v. Benson (U. S.) 70 Fed. 591, 594, 17 C. C. A. 293; United States v. Babcock (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 913, 915; United States v. Newton (U. S.) 52 Fed. 275, 281.

A conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons, by concerted action, to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, or some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means. Pettibone v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 545, 148 U. S. 197, 37 L. Ed. 419; United States v. Weber (U. S.) 114 Fed. 950, 953; Drake v. Stewart (U. S.) 76 Fed. 140, 142, 20 C. C. A. 104; State v. Mayberry, 48 Me. 218, 235; Commonwealth v. Hunt, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.)

111, 123, 38 Am. Dec. 346. The term "criminal and unlawful" is used because it is manifest that many acts are unlawful which are not punishable by indictment or other public prosecution, and yet there is no doubt that a combination by members to do them would be an unlawful conspiracy, and punishable by indictment. Of this character was a conspiracy to cheat by false pretenses without false tokens, when a cheat by false pretense if only by a single person was not a punishable offense. So a combination to destroy the reputation of an individual by verbal calumny, which is not indictable. Commonwealth v. Hunt, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 111, 123, 38 Am. Dec. 346.

A "conspiracy" is a combination of men for an evil purpose; an agreement between two or more persons to commit some crime in concert; an agreement for the purpose of wrongfully prejudicing another or to pervert public justice. Girdner v. Walker, 48 Tenn. (1 Helsk.) 186, 190.

"A conspiracy is a corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do by concerted action something unlawful either as a means or an end. The word 'corrupt,' in the sense used, means unlawful. The intentment of this definition is that to conspire to do an unlawful act or to conspire to accomplish a result which may in itself be lawful, but to do it in an unlawful manner, or an unlawful agreement to accomplish an unlawful result, is a conspiracy." United States v. Johnson (U. S.) 26 Fed. 682, 683. The unlawful thing must be such as would be indictable if performed by one alone, or, not being such, be of a nature particularly adapted to injure the public or some individual by reason of the combination. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 503, 506, 507, 51 S. W. 624, 627, 45 L. R. A. 355 (citing 2 Bishop, Cr. Law, § 172).

"Conspiracy consists in a combination of two or more persons to effect an illegal purpose by legal or illegal means, or to effect a legal purpose by illegal means. * * * The law punishes the mere agreement to effect an illegal purpose or to use illegal means." Boutwell v. Marr, 42 Atl. 607, 609, 71 Vt. 1, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746.

A conspiracy is a confederacy to do an unlawful act, or a lawful act by unlawful means, whether to the prejudice of an individual or the public. United States v. Weber (U. S.) 114 Fed. 950, 953 (citing Commonwealth v. Shelton, 11 Va. Law J. 324); Commonwealth v. McKisson (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 420, 422, 11 Am. Dec. 630; Arthur v. Oakes (U. S.) 63 Fed. 310, 321, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414.

A conspiracy is an agreement to do a wrong or to do a criminal act. United States v. Boyd (U. S.) 45 Fed. 851, 860.

The most satisfactory definition of "conspiracy" to be found in any of the adjudicated cases is perhaps that given by Shaw, J., in Commonwealth v. Hunt, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346, in which he says: "Without attempting to review and reconcile all the cases, we are of the opinion that as a general description, though perhaps not a precise or accurate definition, a conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal, by criminal or unlawful means. We use the terms 'criminal' or 'unlawful' because it is manifest that many acts are unlawful which are not punishable by indictment or other public prosecution, and yet there is no doubt, we think, that a combination by numbers to do them would be an unlawful conspiracy, and punishable by indictment." He further adds: "But yet it is clear that it is not every combination to do unlawful acts to the prejudice of another which is punishable as conspiracy." Hart v. Hicks, 129 Mo. 99, 105, 318, 31 S. W. 351, 352.

Conspiracies are of two kinds: (1) Against the public, or such as endanger the public health, violate public morals, insult public justice, destroy the public peace, or affect public trade; (2) against individuals, such as have a tendency to injure them, in their persons, reputation, or property. Clinton v. Estes, 20 Ark. 216, 224.

The essentials of a conspiracy are (1) a combining of two or more minds; (2) the purpose of the combining. Commonwealth v. Grinstead, 55 S. W. 720, 725, 108 Ky. 59.

Agreements in restraint of trade.

A conspiracy consists in an agreement to do something; but in the sense of the law, and of the statute declaring every combination in the form of a trust or otherwise or conspiracy in restraining of trade or commerce illegal, it must be an agreement between two or more to do by concerted action something criminal or unlawful, or, it may be, to do something lawful by criminal or unlawful means. A conspiracy, therefore, is in itself unlawful; and, in so far as this statute is directed against conspiracies in restraint of trade among the several states, it is not necessary to look for the illegality of the offense in the kind of restraint proposed. Any proposed restraint of trade, though it be in itself innocent, if it is to be accomplished by conspiracy, is unlawful. United States v. Debs (U. S.) 64 Fed. 724, 748.

An agreement between pipe manufacturers in different states by which the territory in which they operated was divided into reserve cities and pay territory; the reserve cities were allotted to particular members of the combination, free of competition from the others, though provision was made for pretended bids by the latter at prices previously arranged in the pay territory; all offers to purchase pipe were submitted to a committee, which determined the price, and then awarded the contract to that member of the combination which agreed to pay the largest bonus, to be divided among the others—was an unlawful combination. United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 271, 293, 29 C. C. A. 141, 46 L. R. A. 122.

An agreement between mercantile dealers to compel another dealing in similar goods to sell at prices fixed by it, or upon his refusal so to do to prevent those of whom its members are purchasing customers from selling goods to him, is contrary to public policy and void. Brown v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co., 41 S. E. 553, 554, 115 Ga. 429, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 126.

Boycott.

A conspiracy is a combination of persons organized to interfere with the property rights of others, and includes a restraint upon the lawful prosecution of their industries, as well as an unlawful control over the use and employment by workmen of their labor for such time, purpose, and price as they chose. The term "conspiracy" includes what is ordinarily called "boycott." State v. Stewart, 9 Atl. 559, 566, 59 Vt. 273, 59 Am. Rep. 710.

A boycott to prevent the use of Pullman cars which were operated under a contract with a receiver of a railroad, and which would compel the receiver to break the contract, would be conspiracy, in that a breach of a contract is unlawful, and a combination for that purpose would be unlawful. Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 803, 818.

Common intent.

A conspiracy to defraud on the part of two or more persons means a common purpose supported by a concerted action to defraud, that each has the intent to do it, and that it is common to each of them, and that each understands that the other has that purpose. United States v. Frisbie (U. S.) 28 Fed. 808, 809.

As a distinct offense.

The conspiracy is in and of itself a distinct substantive offense, complete when the corrupt agreement is entered into. Thompson v. State, 17 South. 512, 515, 106 Ala. 67.

Where a conspiracy has not been effected it is punishable as a distinct offense; "but a contrivance to commit a felony, and executing the contrivance, cannot be punished as an offense distinct from the felony, because the contrivance is a part of the felony when committed pursuant to it." Commonwealth v. Kingsbury, 5 Mass. 106, 108.

A conspiracy is only a misdemeanor, and when its object is only to commit a misdemeanor it cannot be merged. People v. Mather (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 229, 265, 21 Am. Dec. 122.

A "conspiracy" to commit a misdemeanor is not merged in the commission of the misdemeanor. State v. Murray, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 100, 103.

Evil purpose or intent.

A conspiracy is the entering into an agreement to do an unlawful act with an evil purpose, and with knowledge that the act is unlawful. The agreement must have been entered into with an evil purpose as distinguished from a purpose simply to do the act prohibited in ignorance of the prohibition. People v. Flack, 26 N. E. 267, 270, 125 N. Y. 324, 11 L. R. A. 807.

Execution of unlawful agreement.

The gist of the offense in conspiracy is the unlawful combination and agreement. It is unnecessary to constitute the offense that an overt act should be done in pursuance of such combination and agreement. Alderman v. People, 4 Mich. 414, 424, 9 Am. Dec. 321. The crime is effected the moment the confederation is completed though nothing be done pursuant to the conspiracy. Commonwealth v. Bliss (Pa.) 12 Phila. 580, 581. The agreement itself constitutes the offense, whether the act is done in furtherance of the object or not. United States v. Watson (U. S.) 17 Fed. 145, 147. The offense is complete when the unlawful "conspiracy," combination, or agreement is made, and a criminal act done in the pursuance of the conspiracy is not necessary to justify a conviction of the crime of conspiracy itself. United States v. Lancaster (U. S.) 44 Fed. 896, 899, 10 L. R. A. 333; United States v. Barrett (U. S.) 65 Fed. 62; Thompson v. State (Ala.) 17 South. 512, 515; People v. Richards, 1 Mich. (Man.) 216, 223, 51 Am. Dec. 75; State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 500, 507; Johnson v. State, 3 Tex. App. 590, 591. Its legal character depends neither upon what actually follows it nor upon that which is intended to follow it. It is the same whether its object is accomplished or abandoned. It may be followed by one overt act or a series, but as an offense it is complete without them. State v. Setter, 57 Conn. 461, 18 Atl. 782, 14 Am. St. Rep. 121.

The gist of a conspiracy is the unlawful conspiracy to do an unlawful act, or even a lawful act for unlawful purposes. The offense is complete when the conspiracy is made, and any act done in pursuance of it is no constituent part of the offense, but merely an aggravation of it. Commonwealth v. Judd, 2 Mass. 329, 336, 3 Am. Dec. 54.

This rule of the common law is to prevent unlawful combinations. A solitary offender against law may be easily detected and punished; but combinations against law are always dangerous to the public peace and to private security. To guard against the union of numbers to effect an unlawful design is not easy, and to detect and punish them is often difficult. The unlawful confederacy is therefore punished to prevent the doing of any act in execution of it. Of this principle the adjudged cases leave no doubt. Commonwealth v. Judd, 2 Mass. 329, 337, 3 Am. Dec. 54.

It is complete when the combination is formed and an act is done to further it. United States v. Wootten (U. S.) 29 Fed. 702, 703.

Nor is the offense purged because subsequent events may render the consummation of the agreement impossible, or because the conspirators are entrapped in an attempt at its consummation. Thompson v. State, 17 South. 512, 515, 106 Ala. 67.

It is not necessary that the conspiracy be successful; it may fall short of the actual commission of the fraud intended. The conspirators may have been arrested or the conspiracy discovered, and its purpose thwarted, before the conspiracy has resulted in defrauding the government, and before the conspirators have reaped any pecuniary or other advantage from their conspiracy; yet if the conspiracy actually existed, and any party did any act towards effecting the object thereof, the offense is complete. United States v. Newton (U. S.) 52 Fed. 275, 281.

If the object to be attained by conspiracy be criminal or unlawful, the combination offends against the criminal law by criminal law rules without any overt act, and by statute when there is such overt act. If the means to be used are criminal or unlawful, the ultimate end to be attained need not be essentially wrong. In either case, if damage is produced to the person against whom the conspiracy is directed, an action to recover the same will accrue to him against all the guilty parties. Martens v. Reilly, 84 N. W. 840, 843, 109 Wis. 464.

By the common law a conspiracy was an indictable offense. It was an association of two or more persons to break the law, whether the association resulted in any act to be done by the conspirators or not. The gist of the offense was conspiring for an unlawful purpose, or to effect a lawful purpose by unlawful means. City of St. Louis v. Fitz, 53 Mo. 582, 584.

Inasmuch as there are no common-law offenses against the government of the United States, an act to be punished in the federal courts must be declared an offense by statute; and in an indictment for conspiracy there it is necessary to show that something was done to carry into effect the unlawful agreement. There must be an agreement of two or more wills to carry into effect some unlawful purpose, and some act or acts done in pursuance of that agreement. United States v. Barrett (U. S.) 65 Fed. 62.

The gist of the offense of conspiracy is in the illegal combination and intent, and the statute of limitations begins to run from the time the conspiracy is formed. The crime may be complete though the intent was never accomplished. And though the statute offense requires an overt act to be done by one or more of the parties to the conspiracy, or some act to effect its object, yet this act, as in the common-law offense of conspiracy, is not regarded as an essential part of the offense itself. United States v. Greene (U. S.) 100 Fed. 941, 945.

A conspiracy is the combining of two or more to do an unlawful or injurious act. A simple conspiracy, however atrocious, unless it results in actual damage to the party, never was the subject of a civil action. Dowdell v. Carpy, 61 Pac. 948, 949, 129 Cal. 168 (citing Herron v. Hughes, 25 Cal. 555, 560).

To render a conspiracy indictable at common law no overt acts in carrying out the design of the conspirators were necessary. The conspiring was sufficient to authorize an indictment. But, if in carrying out the design of the conspirators overt acts were done causing legal damage, the person damaged had a right of action. Brown v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co., 41 S. E. 553, 554, 115 Ga. 429, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 126.

In an action for libel the bill alleged the making of a corrupt agreement between the plaintiff and one P., for the purpose of procuring a collusive decree of divorce between P. and his wife, with a view to the marriage of plaintiff and P., but did not allege any act done in furtherance of such agreement. It is very questionable whether just such a charge as that amounts to a libel. Such a charge, not in writing, would not amount to verbal slander, as not charging any indictable offense. There must be some act done in furtherance of the corrupt agreement before the parties are liable to indictment as conspirators. Torrey v. Field, 10 Vt. 353-410.

To establish a conspiracy, it is not necessary that there should be "an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful act between the parties, nor is it essential that direct and positive proof be made of an express agreement to do the act forbidden by law. In conspiracy cases it is frequently impossible to produce such proof, because conspiracies are not usually meditated and planned in the presence of witnesses not parties thereto, nor in the terms of express stipulations. Hence a conspiracy may be proved by circumstances. The understanding, combination, or agreement between the parties in a given case to effect the unlawful purpose charged must be proved, because without corrupt agreement or understanding there is no conspiracy, but circumstantial evidence may be resorted to to show such agreement or conspiracy. United States v. Nunnemacher (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 197, 201.

A conspiracy "is an agreement or understanding between two or more persons to do an unlawful act, or to use unlawful means to do an act which is lawful. It is not necessary that it should be proven by an express agreement or by direct evidence, but it may be proven, like any other fact, by circumstantial evidence; but it must exist between at least two persons, for in its very nature it cannot be committed by one person, nor will an action lie for simply conspiring to do an unlawful act; and, in order to furnish a basis for such an action, the unlawful act must be accomplished and done in pursuance of such conspiracy, and must have resulted in some grievance to the person complaining, or the person must have sustained actual damages done by reason thereof." Ross v. Cleveland & A. Mineral Land Co., 62 S. W. 984, 987, 162 Mo. 317 (citing Kimball v. Harmon, 34 Md. 407, 6 Am. Rep. 340; 2 Hil. Torts [4th Ed.] §§ 16, 17).

In order to establish a conspiracy, evidence must be produced from which a jury may reasonably infer the joint assent of the minds of two or more persons to the prosecution of the unlawful enterprise. Drake v. Stewart (U. S.) 76 Fed. 140, 142, 22 C. C. A. 104.

A conspiracy "is a criminal purpose to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by criminal means, mutually assented to or agreed upon by two or more persons." Commonwealth v. Eastman, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 189, 223, 48 Am. Dec. 596.

A combination formed by two or more persons to effect an unlawful end is a "conspiracy"; said persons acting under a common purpose to accomplish the end designed. Any one who, after a conspiracy is formed and who knows of its existence, joins therein, becomes as much a party thereto from that time as if he had originally conspired. In order to establish a conspiracy it is necessary to prove a combination of two or more persons by concerted action to accomplish the criminal or unlawful purpose; but it is not necessary to constitute a conspiracy that two or more persons should meet together and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly, by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme was to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination was to be made effective. In other words, where an unlawful end is sought to be effected, and two or more persons, actuated by the common purpose of accomplishing that end, work together in any way in furtherance of the unlawful scheme, every one of said persons becomes a member of the conspiracy, although the part he was to take therein was a subordinate one, or was to be executed at a remote distance from the other conspirators. United States v. Cassidy (U. S.) 67 Fed. 698, 702.

The mere knowledge, acquiescence, or approval of an act without co-operation or agreement to co-operate is not enough to constitute the crime of conspiracy. State v. King, 74 N. W. 691, 692, 104 Iowa, 727.

Labor organizations.

In State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 286, 9 Atl. 559, 59 Am. Rep. 710, it was held that a combination of two or more persons to effect an illegal purpose, either by legal or illegal means, whether such purpose be illegal at common law or by statute, or to effect a legal purpose by unlawful means, whether such means be unlawful at common law or by statute, is a common-law conspiracy. So a combination or conspiracy to procure an employé or body of employés to quit service in violation of the contract of service would be unlawful. Arthur v. Oakes (U. S.) 63 Fed. 810, 321, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414.

Where not under special contract for a definite time, a simultaneous severance of the relation between employer and employés, at the instance of the employés, and where there was no preconcerted action of such employés, was never considered unlawful. A strike is not unlawful per se. Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 38 Pac. 547, 552, 26 Or. 527, 28 L. R. A. 464, 46 Am. St. Rep. 640.

Where two or more men wrongfully and corruptly agree among themselves, either for the purpose of creating sympathy in a threatened strike or for any other purpose, to cause trains carrying mail or interstate commerce to be stopped or to discharge their employés, or refuse to employ new men, so as to stop such trains, they are guilty of conspiracy. United States v. Debs (U. S.) 63 Fed. 436.

The members of two labor organizations entered into a combination to compel a manufacturer of casks and barrels to discontinue the use of a machine for hooping the same. This object was to be accomplished by notifying the plaintiff's customers and other persons not to purchase machine hooped barrels, and by inducing the members of all labor organizations throughout the country, and persons who were in sympathy with them, not to purchase provisions or other commodities which were packed in machine hooped barrels. Held to constitute an unlawful "conspiracy." Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. (U. S.) 83 Fed. 912, 921, 28 C. C. A. 99.

If the object of a miners' union is unlawful, or the methods employed by it either to induce acquisitions to its ranks or to accomplish its ulterior purposes are illegal, it appears to be well settled that the persons who combine in such efforts are conspirators. United States v. Weber (U. S.) 114 Fed. 950, 953.

Where employés enter into a lawful combination to control, by artificial means, the supply of labor, preparatory to a demand for an advance in wages, a combination of employers to resist such artificial advance is lawful, since it is not made to lower the price of labor as regulated by supply and demand. Cote v. Murphy, 28 Atl. 190, 192, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 135, 39 Am. St. Rep. 686.

"Jacobs says this word was formerly used almost exclusively for an agreement of two or more persons falsely to indict one, or to procure him to be indicted, for felony. Now it is no less commonly used for the unlawful combination of workmen to raise their wages, or to refuse working, except on stipulated conditions." Watson v. Harlem & New York Nav. Co. (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 348, 353.

Prearrangement.

Conspiracy, or a common purpose to do an unlawful act, need not be shown by positive testimony, nor need it be shown that there was prearrangement to do the specific wrong complained of. Collins v. State (Ala.) 34 South. 993.

Principals.

Persons may be associated as principals of the first and second degrees in the commission of murder or other crime without being in the technical sense "conspirators," although conspiracy is generally one of the facts found in reaching the conclusion of guilt. State v. Prater, 43 S. E. 230, 235, 52 W. Va. 132.

Time of entering into.

"Conspiracy" is defined by Pen. Code, § 182, as follows: "If two or more persons conspire to commit any crime under such statute, no time at which the conspiracy must be entered into is fixed." So that, where laborers are charged with a conspiracy in attacking a nonunion laborer, it is not necessary that the jury should locate the conspiracy at the union meeting or at any particular time prior to the coming of the defendants to the building where the deceased was at work. People v. Homes, 50 Pac. 675, 680, 118 Cal. 444.

Two or more participants.

Co-operation is of the nature of the offense of conspiracy; it cannot be committed by one person alone; and hence, as stated by Dr. Wharton (1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 431), a conspiracy must be by two persons at least. One cannot be convicted of it, unless he has been indicted with others or with persons to the jurors unknown. People v. Richards, 7 Pac. 828, 830, 67 Cal. 412, 56 Am. Rep. 716.

To constitute a conspiracy two or more persons must combine, and a husband and wife cannot be indicted for conspiracy, because they are but one person. State v. Christianbury, 44 N. C. 46, 48.

A conspiracy ex vi termini imports the participation of at least two persons, so that in an indictment the person or persons with whom the defendant conspires as well as the acts done must be stated. But a recognition for bail need only state the general nature of the charge, so that the statement that the defendant conspired to defeat the United States is a sufficient indictment for his crime. United States v. Dunbar (U. S.) 83 Fed. 151, 156, 27 C. C. A. 488.

Conspiracy to commit a crime is of itself criminal at common law. The fact that one of the conspirators could not himself commit the intended offense neither relieves him of guilt nor disables him from co-operating with another person who is able to commit it. So that a conspiracy to wrongfully injure another is actionable at common law if executed to the damage of another, whether that other would have a remedy if the act were committed by a single person or not, or whether one person could commit such injury alone. A combination of persons to injure another without any just cause, such as an injury that is not an incidental effect of the promotion of the legitimate interests of the members of a combine, is a conspiracy. State v. Huegin, 85 N. W. 1046, 1061, 1066, 110 Wis. 189.

The concurring will of at least two persons is as necessary to the offense as that of three to constitute a riot. State v. Jackson, 7 S. C. (7 Rich.) 283, 287, 24 Am. Rep. 476.

Unlawful purpose.

To constitute a conspiracy the purpose to be effected by it must be unlawful, either in respect of its nature or in respect of the means to be employed for its accomplishment. People v. Willis, 54 N. Y. Supp. 129, 133, 24 Misc. Rep. 537; People v. Olson, 15 N. Y. Supp. 778, 779; Payne v. Western & Atlantic R. Co., 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 507, 521, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

A conspiracy is punishable in this state only when the purpose to be accomplished thereby is in itself unlawful. Thus the statute defines the offense as follows: "If any two or more persons shall agree, conspire, or co-operate to do or aid in doing any other unlawful act," etc. 1 Mills' Ann. St. Colo. §

1294; Connor v. People, 18 Colo. 373, 33 Pac. 159, 25 L. R. A. 341, 36 Am. St. Rep. 295; Miller v. People, 45 Pac. 408, 409, 22 Colo. 530.

To constitute an indictable conspiracy there must be a combination of two or more persons to commit some act known as an offense at common law or declared such by statute. Alderman v. People, 4 Mich. 414, 424, 9 Am. Dec. 321.

A conspiracy is "a confederacy between two or more persons to injure an individual by an act unlawful or prejudicial to the community." McIntyre v. Mancius (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 592, 600.

"Conspiracy at common law is a confederacy of two or more persons wrongfully to prejudice another in his property, person, or character, or to injure public trade, or to affect public health, or to violate public policy, to obstruct public justice, or do any act in itself illegal." Johnson v. State, 26 N. J. Law (2 Dutch.) 313, 321.

To constitute a conspiracy there must be not only an agreement to co-operate to do a certain thing or act, but the act must be unlawful. Connor v. People, 18 Colo. 373, 33 Pac. 159, 36 Am. St. Rep. 295.

Mr. Eddy, in his work on Combinations, gives the following definition as comprehensive in its nature, and including both civil and criminal conspiracies: Conspiracy is the combination of two or more persons to do (a) something that is unlawful, oppressive, immoral; (b) something that is not unlawful, oppressive, or immoral by unlawful, oppressive, or immoral means; (c) something that is unlawful, oppressive, or immoral by unlawful, oppressive, or immoral means. Conspiracies are often spoken of as civil or criminal. The terms "criminal" and "civil" are used, respectively, to designate a conspiracy which is indictable, or a conspiracy which will furnish ground for a civil action. Brown v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co., 41 S. E. 553, 554, 115 Ga. 429, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 126.

Bishop says that conspiracy is the corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do by concerted action something unlawful, either as a means or as an end. The unlawful act must either be such as would be indictable performed by one alone, or, not being such, be of a nature particularly adapted to injure the public or some individual by reason of the combination. It is connected with every form of wrong-doing cognizable by the law. State v. Dyer, 32 Atl. 814, 816, 67 Vt. 690 (citing 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 166).

In the case of Comm. v. Carlisle, Bright. N. P. 40, Chief Justice Gibson says there is a conspiracy in law whenever the act to be done has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public or oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of the confederators, and giving color to the purposes of the latter, whether of extortion or mischief. Commonwealth v. Gallagher, 4 Pa. Law J. 58, 64; Cote v. Murphy (Pa.) 28 Atl. 190, 192, 23 L. R. A. 135, 39 Am. St. Rep. 686; Crump v. Commonwealth (Va.) 6 S. E. 620, 625, 10 Am. St. Rep. 895.

"Conspiracy was anciently confined to imposing by combination a false crime on any person, or conspiring to convict an innocent person by perjury and a perversion of the law; but it is certain that modern cases have extended the doctrine far beyond that, and every conspiracy to do an unlawful act is indictable." A combination by two to cheat a third person by making him drunk and playing falsely at cards with him is indictable at common law. State v. Younger, 12 N. C. 357, 358, 17 Am. Dec. 571.

A conspiracy to defraud creditors is an offense against good morals, common honesty, and sound public policy, for it is a let and hindrance to the due course and execution of law and justice, and tends to overthrow all true and plain dealing and bargaining between man and man, without which no commonwealth or civil society can be maintained or continued. Hawley v. Smelding, 42 Pac. 841, 842, 3 Kan. App. 159 (citing Bump, Fraud, Conv. 443; Weatherbee v. Cockrell, 44 Kan. 380, 382, 24 Pac. 417).

A conspiracy as an agreement or an undertaking or a combination entered into between two or more persons to accomplish an illegal result, i. e., the doing of something which is against the law of the government; entering into a combination to do something which is by law a crime against the United States. United States v. Howell (U. S.) 56 Fed. 21, 33.

CONSPIRE.

To "conspire" is defined by Webster as to make an agreement, especially a secret agreement; to do some act, as to commit a treason, or a crime, or to do some unlawful deed; to plot together; to concur to one end; to agree. In the Century Dictionary it is defined to agree by oath, covenant, or otherwise to commit a reprehensible or illegal act; to engage in a conspiracy. Thus, as used in statutes of the United States, that if two or more persons conspire they shall be punishable, etc., it is used in the sense in which it is employed by English writers and speakers, so that it would have added nothing to the meaning of the act to have added the word "together" or the words "between themselves"; and hence an indictment charging that persons conspire to defraud the United States is sufficient without the use of the words "combine, confederate, or agree together." Wright v. United States (U. S.) 108 Fed. 805, 809, 48 O. C. A. 37.

"Conspire" is a word in common use, which necessarily carries with it the idea of agreement, concurrence, and combination; and when one person is charged with conspiring with another there are no words in the English language by which the idea of the action and co-operation of two minds could be more effectively conveyed, since one cannot agree or conspire with another who does not agree or conspire with him. State v. Slutz, 30 South. 298, 299, 106 La. 182.

CONSTABLE.

See "State Constable."

As police officer, see "Police Officer."

As ministerial officer, see "Ministerial Office—Officer."

A constable is an officer charged with a duty to the public of the gravest and most delicate nature, in which the whole commonwealth is vitally interested. Pearson v. Brunswick County Sup'rs, 9 Va. 322, 334, 21 S. E. 483.

A constable is a known officer charged with the conservation of the peace, and whose business it is to arrest those who have violated it. Commonwealth v. Deacon (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 47, 49.

Constables are legal officers of the peace elected by cities and towns. Originally their duty was to keep the peace, and they have no authority to serve process in civil actions, except such as is conferred on them by statute. Leavitt v. Leavitt, 135 Mass. 191, 193.

Constables are in Michigan, and "always have been, the local peace officers of their vicinage, the ministerial officers of the judges of the peace, and the bailiffs of the court of record of criminal jurisdiction in the county." Allor v. Wayne County, 4 N. W. 492, 500, 43 Mich. 76.

In the construction of statutes the terms "sheriff," "coroner," "constable," "clerk," or other words used for an executive or ministerial officer may include any deputy or other person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8.

The term "constable" includes any person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 66.

The words "coroner," "justice," and "constable" mean officers of the county in which the action is brought or is pending, or in which the proceeding is had, or to whom the process is directed. Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7212.

CONSTANTLY.

Where an insurance policy provided that the insured premises should be "constantly worked," such phrase meant that the premises should be worked during the usual and customary working days and hours for the prosecution of the business for which they were employed. Prieger v. Exchange Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Wis. 89, 104.

CONSTITUENT.

His constituents, see "His."

"Constituent element," as used in reference to the conviction or acquittal of one crime as a bar to another, the proof of one of which involved the proof of the other, or such that one is a part or "constituent element" of the other, signifies an essential and necessary ingredient. State v. Magone, 56 Pac. 648, 650, 33 Or. 570.

CONSTITUTION.

See "State Constitution"; "Written Constitution."

"A 'constitution' is, according to the American idea, the organization of the government, distributing its powers among bodies of magistracy, and declaring their rights, and the liberties reserved and maintained by the people." French v. State, 52 Miss. 759, 762.

A constitution is not the beginning of a country, nor the origin of appropriate rights. It is not the fountain of law, nor the incipient state of government. It grants no rights to the people, but it is the creature of their power, the instrument of their convenience. Designed for their protection in the enjoyment of the rights and powers they possessed before the constitution was made, it is but the framework of political government, and necessarily based on the pre-existing rights, habits, and modes of thought. State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 520, 536.

When the people associate, and enter into a compact, for the purpose of establishing government, that compact, whatever may be its provisions, or in whatever language it may be written, is the constitution of the state, revocable only by the people, or in the manner they prescribe. It is by this instrument that government is instituted, its departments created, and the powers to be exercised by it conferred. Bates v. Kimball (Vt.) 2 D. Chp. 77, 84.

"A constitution or foundation of government embraces and declares the principles, regulates the division and exercise of the governing power, directs to what officers or agencies it shall be confided, and limits and controls its exercise. In other words, it establishes the government, delegates, limits, and defines the manner in which the governing power of the state shall be exercised, and by overpowering necessity compels those who frame government to confer ample power on its agencies to enforce the protection and security for which government is instituted." Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 236, 240.

A constitution is that by which the powers of government are limited. It is to the governors, or rather to the departments of government, what a law is to individuals; nay, it is not only a rule of action to the branches of government, but it is that from which their existence flows, and by which the powers (or portions of the right to govern) which may have been committed to them are prescribed. It is their commission; nay, it is their creator. Kamper v. Hawkins, 1 Va. Cas. 20-24.

A constitution is defined by Judge Story to be a fundamental law or basis of government. It is established by the people, in their original sovereign capacity, to promote their own happiness, and permanently to secure their rights, property, independence, and common welfare. McKoan v. Devries, 3 Barb. 196, 198 (quoting 1 Story, Const. §§ 338, 339); Church v. Kelsey, 7 Sup. Ct. 897, 898, 121 U. S. 282, 30 L. Ed. 900.

A constitution is the form of government, delineated by the mighty hand of the people, in which certain first principles of fundamental laws are established. The constitution is certain and fixed. It contains the permanent will of the people, and is the supreme law of the land. It is paramount to the legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the authority that made it. Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 304, 308, 28 Fed. Cas. 1012, 1 L. Ed. 391.

A constitution is that body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised, and its provisions are the rules of conduct for those branches of the government which exercise the sovereign power. State v. Griswold, 34 Atl. 1046, 1047, 67 Conn. 290, 33 L. R. A. 227.

"A constitution is an act of extraordinary legislation by which the people establish the structure and mechanism of their government, and in which they prescribe fundamental rules to regulate the motions of the several parts." Eakin v. Raub (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 330, 347.

"Every state constitution is a compact made by and between the citizens of a state to govern themselves in a certain manner, and the Constitution of the United States is likewise a compact made by the people of the United States to govern themselves, as to general objects, in a certain manner." Per

Jay, C. J., in Chisholm v. Georgia (Pa.) 2 Dall. 419, 471, 1 L. Ed. 440.

A constitution is the written charter enacted and adopted by the people of a state through a combination of representatives, or in any way the people may choose to act, by which a government for them is obtained and established, and by which the people give organic and corporate form to that ideal thing, a state, for all time to come, or during the life of the state. Lynn v. Polk, 78 Tenn. (8 Lea) 121, 165.

In our system of government, a written constitution is the highest expression of law; none other emanates directly from the sovereign people themselves. It is the deliberate and affirmative utterance of the sovereign majority. In re Denny, 59 N. E. 359, 360, 156 Ind. 104, 51 L. R. A. 722.

A constitution is an instrument of government, made and adopted by the people for practical purposes connected with the common business and wants of human life. In re Silkman, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1025, 1029, 88 App. Div. 102; People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 485, 486.

The term "constitution" is used in several senses. In a broad sense of the term, we may speak of a constitution resting upon usage or acquiescence, as in England. But in this country, when we use the term, we refer exclusively to the sovereign acts of the people, acting by conventions or in other constitutional modes. Horsman v. Allen, 61 Pac. 796, 799, 129 Cal. 139 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 5, 6).

In American constitutional law, the word "constitution" is used in a restricted sense, as implying a written instrument agreed on by the people of the Union, or of any one of the states, as the absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and officers of the government in respect to all of the points covered by it, which must control until it shall be changed by the authority which established it, and in opposition to which any act or regulation of any such department or officer, or even the people themselves, will be altogether void. Cline v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 320, 350, 36 S. W. 1099, 1107, 37 S. W. 722, 61 Am. St. Rep. 850 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 5).

A constitution is but a higher form of statutory law, and it is entirely competent for the people, if they so desire, to incorporate into it self-executing enactments. Willis v. Mabon, 50 N. W. 1110, 1111, 48 Minn. 140, 16 L. R. A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626.

The constitution of a state is the supreme law of the land, under the Constitution of the United States, and is of binding force and obligation upon all dependents of the government, and assigns the sphere within which each must act, and establishes bounds beyond which neither can go. Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 166, 87 Am. Dec. 52.

As contract or law.

See "Contract"; "Law."

As fixed and permanent.

A constitution is the form of government created by the hand of the people, in which certain first principles of fundamental law are established. The constitution is certain and fixed; it contains the permanent will of the people, and is the supreme law of the land; it is paramount to the power of the legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the authority that made it. Vanborne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 304, 308, 28 Fed. Cas. 1012, 1 L. Ed. 391.

The term "constitution," as applied to government, is the form or government instituted by the people in their sovereign capacity, in which, first, the principal and fundamental laws are established. A constitution is the supreme, permanent, and fixed will of the people in their original, unlimited, and sovereign capacity, and in it are determined the conditions, rights, and duties of every individual of the community. Pheobe v. Jay, 1 Ill. (Breese) 268, 271.

The term "constitution" implies an instrument of a permanent and abiding nature, and, while it contains provision for revision, it indicates the will of the people that the underlying principles upon which it rests, as well as the substantial entirety of the instrument, shall be of a like permanent and abiding nature. Livermore v. Waite, 36 Pac. 424, 426, 102 Cal. 113, 25 L. R. A. 312.

As a limitation on legislative power.

"The constitution of a state is the supreme, organized, and written will of the people, acting in convention, and assigning to different departments of the government their respective powers. It may remove and control the action of these departments, or it may confer upon them any extent of power not incompatible with the federal compact. By an inspection and examination of the constitutions of our country, they will be found to be nothing more than so many limitations upon the departments of the government and people." Taylor v. Governor, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 21, 27.

A constitution of a state is not a grant of power, or an enabling act to the legislature; but it is a limitation on the state's general powers of a legislative character, and restricts only so far as the restriction appears either by express terms or by necessary inference. McConville v. Howell (U. S.) 17 Fed. 104, 106.

A constitution, "according to the common acceptance of the word in the United States, may be said to be an agreement of the people, in their individual capacities, reduced to writing, establishing and fixing certain principles for the government of themselves. Among these principles, one of the most important in all our constitutions is to prescribe and limit the objects of legislative power. The people are sovereign, in power they are supreme, and the legislature acts by delegated and circumscribed authority; circumscribed as to its objects, circumscribed as to its extent over these objects." State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 427, 443.

As written and in English.

"In our American constitutional law the word 'constitution' is used in a restricted sense, as implying a written instrument agreed on by the people of the Union, or of any one of the states, as an absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and offices of the government in respect to all points covered by it, which must control till it shall be changed by the authority which established it, and in opposition to which any act or regulation of any such department or officer, or even the people themselves, will be together void." State v. McCann, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 1, 9 (quoting Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 2, 3).

In its most general sense, a "constitution" is defined as that body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised. Cooley, Const. Lim. 2. The term "constitution" may not be improperly applied to the guiding principles underlying these varying forms of government, whether they are or are not established by any written instrument. Miller, Const. 63. Comprehensively considered, therefore, a "constitution" consists in the fundamental principles of the government, and, as thus understood, the use of the term would not be inapplicable in referring to almost any kind of established human government. It might be either written or unwritten. The principles, therefore, might rest solely upon the will of an absolute monarch; but in the United States the word "constitution" is used in a restricted sense, as implying the written instrument agreed upon by the people of the Union, or any one of the states, as the absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and officers of government in respect to all the points covered by it, which must control until it shall be changed by the authority which established it. A "constitution," in the American sense of the word, is a written instrument by which the fundamental powers of the government are established, limited, and defined, and by which those powers are distributed among several departments for their safe and useful exercise for the benefit of the body politic. The term "constitution," within the provision that no person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state, relates to the Constitution as written, and as written in the English language, so that a person who cannot read the Constitution in the English language is not entitled to vote. Rasmussen v. Baker, 50 Pac. 819, 823, 7 Wjo. 117, 38 L. R. A. 773.

CONSTITUTIONAL FREEDOM.

"Constitutional freedom" certainly does not consist in exemption from governmental interference in the citizen's private affairs, in his being unmolested in his family, in being; suffered to buy, sell, and enjoy property, and generally to seek happiness in his own way. All these might be permitted by the most arbitrary ruler, even though he allowed his subjects no degree of political liberty. Mr. Justice Story has well shown that constitutional freedom means something more than liberty permitted; it consists in the civil and political rights which are absolutely guaranteed, assured, and guarded; in one's liberties as a man and a citizen—his right to vote, his right to hold office, his right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, his equality with all others who are his fellow citizens; all these, guarded and protected, and not held at the mercy and discretion of any one man or any popular majority. People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 106, 108, 9 Am. Dec. 103.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

See "Unconstitutional."

Constitutional law, in the form which it has taken in the United States, is an American graft on English jurisprudence. Its principles and rules are mainly the work of the present century. They rest upon the fundamental conception of the supreme law, expressed in written form, in accordance with which all private rights must be determined and all public authority administered. The Constitution of Connecticut, art. 2, has divided the powers of government into three distinct departments, each confided to a separate magistracy. To one of these departments is intrusted (article 5) the judicial power of the state. In all cases where the meaning of a written document is to be collected from the words in which it is expressed, its construction, if called in question in the course of a judicial proceeding, is to be determined by the court. This is a proper and necessary exercise of judicial power. Hence it follows that the constitutionality of a statute on which a prosecution is based is a matter for the court, and not for the jury. State v. Main, 37 Atl. 80, 69 Conn. 123, 36 L. R. A. 623, 61 Am. St. Rep. 30.

CONSTITUTIONAL OFFICE OR OFFICER.

Any of those officers whose tenure and term of office are fixed and defined by the Constitution are known as "constitutional officers." Foster v. Jones, 79 Va. 642, 644, 52 Am. Rep. 637.

Const. § 30, art. 16, provides that all terms of office not otherwise fixed by the Constitution are limited to two years. Held that, since the office of an attorney is one for life, he cannot be regarded as a constitutional officer. Ex parte Williams, 20 S. W. 580, 581, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 262, 21 L. R. A. 783.

"Constitutional offices" are those either created or provided for in the Constitution. They are, generally speaking, such as are governmental in their nature, as, for example, the executive, judicial, or legislative offices of the state, or any political division thereof. The offices are either created or provided for in the Constitution, while such offices as are designed for the administration of the affairs of municipalities are ordinarily created by the Legislature. People v. Scheu, 69 N. Y. Supp. 597, 599, 60 App. Div. 592.

CONSTITUTIONAL TERM.

Rev. St. c. 6, tit. 1, § 8, provides that all vacancies in the office of representative in Congress, senator, justice of the peace, etc., shall be supplied at the general election next succeeding the happening thereof, but when the term of service of any such officer will expire at the end of the year during which the vacancy in his office shall occur, no person shall be chosen to supply such vacancy, but the usual election shall be held for a new officer to hold during the constitutional term. Held, that the expression "constitutional term" did not mean a term of service necessarily commencing on the 1st day of January, since it is evident that the constitutional term of a representative in Congress does not commence on that date, but that the only effect of the section was to dispense with special elections, and, in case the term of service in any office in which a vacancy occurs should expire before the close of the year, a successor should be chosen in the same manner as if no vacancy had happened. People v. Green (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 266, 276.

CONSTRUCT—CONSTRUCTION.

See "Is Constructed"; "Original Construction."

Construction of instruments, see "Construct—Construction."

The International Dictionary defines the word "construct": "To put together constituent parts of something in their proper place or order; to build; to form; to make." Morse v. City of West-Port, 19 S. W. 831, 832, 110 Mo. 502; Contas v. City of Bradford, 55 Atl. 989, 990, 206 Pa. 291.

The words "construction, alteration, or repair," as used in the chapter relating to liens, shall be held to include partial construction, and all repairs done in and upon any building, or other improvement. Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 5632.

Alterations and reconstruction.

Every change, alteration, or addition in or to an existing structure does not constitute an "erection or construction of a building" within the meaning of that phrase as used in laws giving mechanics' liens. The change or alteration must be such that the whole structure as changed or altered would commonly be regarded as another new and different building, and the addition of a back building to a main structure, as, for instance, a bathhouse and kitchen to a residence, is not an "erection or construction of a building." Rand v. Mann (Pa.) 3 Phila. 429.

Under Gen. St. Mass. c. 151, § 12, giving materialmen a lien for labor and material furnished in the "construction and repair" of vessels, work on a steamer, consisting in enlarging the promenade deck, taking off and replacing the hurricane deck, and other items done in order to adapt the steamer to new uses and service, was included. Donnell v. Starlight, 103 Mass. 227, 232.

St. 1848, § 490, providing that, whenever a debt is contracted for labor performed or materials used in the "construction" or repair of any ship or vessel, such debt shall be a lien thereon, and shall be preferred to all other liens except mariners' wages, should be construed to apply to alterations and reconstructions as well as to the original construction, for, if the latter meaning alone had been intended, the word "building" would seem to have been more natural. The Ferax (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 1147.

"Construction," as used in Rev. St. 1881, §§ 40, 45, authorizing aid to the construction of railroads, will be construed to provide also for aid in the reconstruction of railroads, reconstruction being but a form of construction. Bell v. Maish, 36 N. E. 358, 359, 137 Ind. 226.

Where the structure of a building is so completely changed that in common parlance it may be properly called a 'new building' or a 'rebuilding,' the process of change is such an erection or construction of a building as to be within the meaning of that phrase as used in laws giving mechanics' liens. Smith v. Nelson (Pa.) 2 Phila. 113, 114.

The mechanic's lien act, authorizing a mechanic's lien to be filed on buildings for work and materials in the "erection or construction" thereof, means the original building of the house or other building, and cannot be construed to include the repair, alteration, or addition to houses or other buildings already constructed. Appeal of Hancock, 7 Atl. 773, 775, 115 Pa. 1 (citing Rynd v.

Bakewell, 87 Pa. 460; Appeal of Wetmore, 91 Pa. 276).

A statute authorizing a mechanic's lien for labor performed or materials furnished in "erecting or constructing" a building does not warrant a lien for remodeling or repairing a house, the walls of which were allowed to stand, though newly faced, and in which the owner continued to live while the work was being done. Perigo v. Vanhorn (Pa.) 2 Miles, 359, 362.

Bailment of material used not implied.

The words "construct and erect" are the usual words employed in a building contract, and they are effective words of sale to pass the title to the building materials, when erected, from the builder to the owner of the land. The words "construct and erect," as used in a contract to construct and erect at a certain brewery a refrigerating machinery and plant, are used in the same meaning as in ordinary building contracts, and do not imply that a bailment is being created. Ott v. Sweatman, 31 Atl. 102, 109, 166 Pa. 217.

As buy or provide.

"Construct," as used in a contract between two railroad companies, whereby one agrees to use the other's tracks until it has constructed tracks of its own, is not used in the sense of "purchase," and hence the company would be liable for the use of the tracks though it has purchased another road. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 87 N. W. 271, 275, 128 Mich. 333.

A statute authorizing a town to "construct" a townhall cannot be construed as authorizing the purchase of a building already constructed. Barker v. Town of Floyd, 66 N. Y. Supp. 216, 217, 32 Misc. Rep. 474.

"Construct," as used in Act March 26, 1890, authorizing cities and towns to construct internal improvements, is synonymous with "provide." Ordinarily the meaning of the word "construct" in the sense here meant would be to build or make, but to give the law any effect whatever it must have been known to the Legislature that more than the mere costs of construction, involving the labor necessary, would have to be implied. Seymour v. City of Tacoma, 32 Pac. 1077, 1080, 6 Wash. 138.

A statute, Rev. St. Ind. § 3106, granting power to a city to establish and construct wharfs, docks, piers, etc., does not imply power to condemn for public use an existing private wharf. City of Madison v. Daley (U. S.) 58 Fed. 751, 755.

Change of location or removal.

The words "erection" and "construction," as used in Sayles' Supp. art. 3164, giving a lien on a house to any person furnishing tools for the erection thereof, to secure payment for the tools so furnished for the construction of the house, etc., seem to be synonymous in their meaning, and in common acceptation, when applied to a house, they mean the building of it by putting together the necessary material and raising it; but it does not require a strained sense to bring the removal of a house from the place where it has been put together, and placing it in position or setting it up in another place, within the meaning of these words as used in the law. Burke v. Brown, 30 S. W. 936, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 298.

"Construction" means the putting together, ready for use; building; erecting; and hence a mechanic's lien cannot be upheld for the cost of removing an old building bodily and without detachment, and putting it on another foundation, there being no construction. Eichleay v. Wilson (Pa.) 42 Wkly. Notes Cas. 525, 527.

As dispose of or dispense with.

The power to "construct and maintain" waterworks, conferred on a city, imposes a duty on the municipality, through its corporate authorities, to preserve possession for the benefit of the public. Such power does not include the power to sell and dispose. Huron Waterworks Co. v. City of Huron, 62 N. W. 975, 976, 7 S. D. 9, 30 L. R. A. 848, 58 Am. St. Rep. 817.

A general power given by statute to a city to "construct" sidewalks, or not, in all streets, whether macadamized or paved, must be construed as one which deals with the whole subject, and places it within the control of the local authorities. It authorizes them not merely to construct them or not, in their discretion, where they do not now exist, but to remove or dispense with them where they do exist, if in their judgment it is desirable. Attorney General v. City of Boston, 142 Mass. 200, 204, 7 N. E. 722, 725.

As maintain or repair.

To build or "construct" a railroad is one thing; to "maintain" the structure after it is erected or built is another. Moorhead v. Little Miami R. Co., 17 Ohio, 340, 353.

Laws 1857, c. 521, § 8, authorizes the board of water and sewerage commissioners of Brooklyn, in case they find it necessary to construct a sewer or drain through any part of a street not opened by law, to apply to the Supreme Court to appoint the commissioners, etc., to open said street. Held, that the phrase "to construct" means the maintenance, preservation, and protection, as well as the establishment, of the sewer. In re Fowler, 53 N. Y. 60, 61.

"In the common understanding and language of the people, when we speak of the 'erection' or 'construction' of a house or building, we mean the erection of a new house or building, and not the repairing of an old one." In re Howett, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 379, 380.

In Act N. Y. March 8, 1871 (Sess. Laws 1871, c. 79), entitled "An act to authorize a certain town to raise money for the purpose of constructing a town dock in such town," the word "constructing" implies and includes the keeping it constructed by means of necessary repairs. It is a necessary incident to the general purpose indicated in the construction of the dock, reasonably to be inferred therefrom. Town of Pelham v. The B. F. Woolsey (U. S.) 16 Fed. 418, 419.

Internal Revenue Act June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 284), imposing a tax not only on the dividends of every railroad company, but also on "all profits used for construction," means new constructions adding to the permanent value of the capital, and hence does not apply to earnings expended for keeping the property in its normal condition, and improvements in the way of repairs made to take the place of prior structures. The phrase means only the increased value of the new over the old. Grant v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 93 U. S. 225, 228, 23 L. Ed. 878; Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Grant (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 699, 700.

In Laws 1872, c. 136, relating to the recovery of compensation for services rendered by a contractor against a railroad for the construction of its road, or any part thereof, the term "construction" includes the removal of an old bridge in supplying its place with a larger one constructed of iron, with stone-cut abutments embedded in the earth. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McConnell, 25 Kan. 370, 372.

Park.

To "construct" a thing is to put together its several parts in their proper place and order, and there is a sense in which to lay out and establish a public park may be held to be a construction, for a park is made up in part of walks and groves which are new constructions. City Sewerage Utilization Co. v. Board of Health (Pa.) 1 Leg. Gaz. 402, 403; City Sewage Utilization Co. v. Davis (Pa.) 8 Phila. 625, 626.

Street cleaning.

There is a sense in which to lay out and establish a public park may be held to be an erection or construction. To "construct" a thing is to put together its several parts in their proper places and order, and to erect is to found and form, as well as to build or raise and deliver up. A park is made up in part of walks and roads which are new constructions, and of ornamentation, with shrubbery and trees, which are set up in the places in which they are planted, and of booths and summerhouses, which are erected or built. But it cannot be said as much of the cleaning of the streets of the city; this is a work into which the elements of erection or construction do not enter, and therefore the restraining of the cleaning of the city streets does not fall within the prohibition of the act prohibiting the court in which the application for injunction is made from granting injunctions against the erection or use of any public work of any kind erected or in progress of erection under the authority of the act of the Legislature till the question of title and damages has been settled by the court of law. City Sewage Utilization Co. v. Davis (Pa.) 8 Phila. 625, 626.

Of railroad.

The word "completing" has substantially the same signification as "constructing." A railroad is completed or constructed when that is done which is necessary to make it a railroad; when it is fitted for use as a railroad; that is to say, when it is made ready and put in a proper condition for the placing and running of regular trains upon it—for its "operation," as it is usually termed. In its natural and ordinary sense, the word "completing" does not include the equipment of the road with rolling stock or putting it into operation. De Graff v. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 23 Minn. 144, 146.

"Construction" does not always mean "completion." It sometimes means "the act of constructing," and it is used in this sense in the act providing that an appeal from the valuation by commissioners "shall not prevent a railroad company from proceeding in the construction of its road." Here "construction" is used in the sense of the "act of building" or the "progress of construction." Greenville & C. R. Co. v. Nunnamaker (S. C.) 4 Rich. Law, 107, 114, 115.

The term "construction," when applied to a railroad as constituting an obstruction in a street, includes not only the movement of earth and the laying down of rails on a roadbed, but the character and purpose of the structure. Two parallel iron rails, in themselves considered, might present little or no obstacle in the way of access to the building which they were before; but the structure being a railroad built for the purpose of moving trains of cars by means of locomotive engines, whether it obstructed access or not depends, not merely on the position of the rails, but also on the use for which they were intended. Jones v. Erie & W. V. R. Co., 25 Atl. 134, 137, 151 Pa. 30, 17 L. R. A. 758, 31 Am. St. Rep. 722.

Act 1853, c. 31, § 1, provides that whenever any railroad company shall acquire a right of way, whether by purchase or the assessment of damages by a jury, the railroad shall have the right to take and remove, for the construction and repairing of the road, any earth, gravel, timber, or any other material on the land so acquired. Held, that the word "construction" meant not only the making of the roadbed, but also its preparation and readiness for use in a safe and convenient manner. Preston v. Dubuque & P. R. Co., 11 Iowa, 15, 17.

An act incorporating a company for the purpose of constructing a railroad between designated termini, with no further grant of franchises, would not confer the power of taking lands by the right of eminent domain, or even grant the lands owned by the state that might be crossed by the route. Keyport & M. P. Steamboat Co. v. Farmers' Transp. Co., 18 N. J. Eq. (3 O. E. Green) 13, 14.

CONSTRUCTED.

Act March 6, 1877, which authorized railroad corporations to condemn lands adjoining their road as "constructed," means the roadbed actually existing. Akers v. United N. J. R. & Canal Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 110, 111.

"Construct" means to put together, as the parts of a thing, for a new product; to build; so that, an act providing that fences shall not be "constructed" by railroads of barbed wire, does not apply to fences built before the passage of the act. Stisser v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 52 N. Y. Supp. 861, 862, 32 App. Div. 98.

"Constructed," as used in St. 1872, c. 53, § 12, providing that railroads hereafter constructed should pass over or under other roads which it was necessary for them to cross, does not mean entirely completed, but a road is "constructed," within the meaning of the statute, if the work thereon has been so far carried forward as to show that it was the intention of the constructed road to make a grade crossing. Attorney General v. Ware River R. Co., 115 Mass. 400, 404.

Gen. St. 1888, § 3481, provides that, "when a new highway shall hereafter be constructed" across a railroad, such highway shall pass under or over the railroad as the highway commissioners shall direct. Held, that the language "when a new highway shall hereafter be constructed" does not refer to the laying out of the highway, but to the building of the crossing over or under the railroad, and there is nothing in the language of the act requiring the laying out of the highway to be fully completed before the commissioners may direct whether the crossing shall be made over or under the railroad. Smith v. Town of New Haven, 22 Atl. 146, 148, 59 Conn. 203.

CONSTRUCTIVE.

The word "constructive" is defined by Webster to be "derivative; inferential." Middleton v. Parke, 3 App. D. C. 149, 160.

CONSTRUCTIVE AUTHORITY.

"Constructive authority" would be authority assumed to have been given because some other antecedent authority had been given. A denial to the orphans' court of incidental powers or constructive authority by Act Md. 1798, c. 101, subc. 15, § 20, does not mean the denial of such authority as is necessarily implied from that which is expressly granted. Middleton v. Parke, 3 App. D. C. 149, 160.

CONSTRUCTIVE BREAKING.

See "Breaking (In Criminal Law)."

CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT.

"Constructive" or "consequential" contracts are such as are committed outside of the view and presence of the court or judge at chambers. Cooper v. People, 22 Pac. 790, 796, 13 Colo. 337, 373, 6 L. R. A. 430; State v. Clancy, 61 Pac. 987, 989, 24 Mont. 359.

A "constructive contempt" is that which is not committed in the presence of the court, but which tends by its operation "to obstruct and embarrass or prevent the due administration of justice." Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 395, 404; In re Dill, 5 Pac. 39, 48, 32 Kan. 668, 49 Am. Rep. 505; State v. Henthorn, 26 Pac. 937, 938, 48 Kan. 613; Territory v. Murray, 15 Pac. 145, 148, 7 Mont. 251; Indianapolis Water Co. v. American Strawboard Co. (U. S.) 75 Fed. 972, 975; Ex parte Wright, 65 Ind. 504, 508; State v. Hansford, 28 S. E. 791, 792, 43 W. Va. 773; State v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 86, 177 Mo. 205; State v. McClaugherty, 10 S. E. 407, 408, 33 W. Va. 250, 253.

"Constructive contempts" are those which arise from matters not transpiring in court, but in reference to failures to comply with the orders and decrees issued by the court and to be performed elsewhere." Androscoggin & K. R. Co. v. Androscoggin R. Co., 49 Me. 392, 400; Ex parte Wright, 65 Ind. 504, 508.

Disobedience of judgment or decrees.

A party may be put in contempt for disobeying a judgment or decree for the performance of acts which are within his power, and which the court may properly adjudge and decree to be done. McMakin v. McMakin, 68 Mo. App. 57, 60.

Intent.

"Constructive contempts" may be distributed into two general classes, namely, first, those wherein the contemptuous acts primarily affect public rights or the due administration of public justice, and, second, those which primarily affect private rights, and only remotely and incidentally affect public rights or public justice. When the contempt consists in the failure or refusal of the party to do or refrain from doing something which he is ordered to do or refrain from doing for the benefit or advantage of the opposite party, the proceeding is not criminal, but is civil and remedial in its nature; and in this sort of contempt the intention with which the act was committed is immaterial, except in fixing the proper measure of punishment. Indianapolis Water Co. v. American Strawboard Co. (U. S.) 75 Fed. 972, 975.

Publications concerning legal proceedings.

Bishop (volume 2, § 26) thus defines "constructive contempt": "According to the general doctrine, any publication, whether by parties or strangers, which concerns a case pending in court, and has a tendency to prejudice the public concerning its merits, and to corrupt the administration of justice, or reflects on the tribunal or its proceedings, or on the parties, the jurors, the witnesses, or the counsel, may be visited as a contempt." People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 225, 16 Am. Rep. 528.

A publication by a newspaper, immediately after a judge of the superior court has sustained a demurrer to a petition, with leave to amend, falsely charging him, in so doing, "with deliberate lying about the law, deliberate, intentional falsification in his official capacity, and deliberate, intentional denial of justice;" with being a "fool," an "impudent rascal," a "criminal on the bench"—constitutes a contempt of court, and an unlawful interference with the proceedings of a court, within Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 1209, subd. 9. Ex parte Barry, 25 Pac. 256, 257, 85 Cal. 603, 20 Am. St. Rep. 248.

A publication in a newspaper, in a city where the Supreme Court of Appeals is sitting, with reference to a case then pending and undetermined, charging three of the four judges of the court with attending a political caucus more than a year before, and in the caucus advising the action out of which the case arose, and promising the caucus to hold its action legal and proper, and charging the court with agreeing to decide the case before an approaching political convention for political purposes, is a contempt of said court, which it may summarily punish. State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 448, 49 Am. Rep. 257.

A publication of the truth as to legal proceedings is not contempt of court. McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 119 Cal. 413, 419, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691.

CONSTRUCTIVE CONTRACT.

"Constructive contracts" are such as arise when the law prescribes the rights and liabilities of persons who have not in reality entered into a contract at all, but between whom circumstances make it just that one should have a right, and the other be subject to a liability, similar to the rights and liabilities in cases of express contracts. Wickham v. Weil, 17 N. Y. S. 518, 519.

"Constructive contracts" are fictions of law, adopted to enforce legal duties by actions of contract where no proper contract exists, express or implied. Woods v. Ayres, 39 Mich. 345, 350, 33 Am. Rep. 396; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 896, 398, 8 L. R. A. 189 (quoting Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. [5 Casey] 465, 467, 468).

Obligations incurred by a person, on the purchase of stock in a corporation, to pay assessments thereon, come within the class of contracts called "constructive contracts," and are not in fact contracts at all. Robinson v. Turrentine (U. S.) 59 Fed. 554, 559.

CONSTRUCTIVE CONVERSION.

A "constructive conversion" takes place when a person does such acts in reference to the goods of another as amount in law to the appropriation of the property to himself. Scruggs v. Scruggs (U. S.) 105 Fed. 28, 29.

CONSTRUCTIVE CRIME.

Where, by a strained interpretation of a penal statute, it is made to include an act not otherwise punishable, it is said to be a "constructive crime"; that is, one built up by the court with the aid of inference, implication, and strained interpretation. Such crimes are repugnant to the spirit and letter of English and American criminal law. Ex parte McNulty, 19 Pac. 237, 239, 77 Cal. 164, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257.

CONSTRUCTIVE DELIVERY.

A "constructive delivery" of personalty takes place when, without actual transfer of the goods, or their symbol, the conduct of the parties is such as to be inconsistent with any supposition other than that there has been a change in the nature of the holding; and whether such change has taken place is a question for the jury. Swafford v. Spratt, 67 S. W. 701, 702, 93 Mo. App. 631.

The "constructive delivery" sufficient to make valid a gift must be such as the nature of the thing and its actual position requires. Willey v. Backus, 3 N. W. 431, 432, 52 Iowa, 401.

Payment for the pasturage of a colt on the part of the purchaser is such an assumption of ownership and such an exercise of right as constitutes a "constructive delivery." Stockwell v. Baird (Del.) 31 Atl. 811, 1 Marv. 420.

Where a husband executed a deed to his wife and their children, and put the deed on record, this must be held to be a good "constructive delivery," and the deed took effect at the time of such record. Holliday v. White, 33 Tex. 447, 459.

CONSTRUCTIVE EVICTION.

The doctrine of "constructive eviction" grew out of the great number of cases in which a covenantee's right would be as effectually determined, and his enjoyment of the estate granted as effectually prevented, by other means as through a judgment actually enforced or an actual putting out of possession. Although the name "eviction" is still used to characterize the fact or facts which are allowed to constitute a breach of covenant, an eviction in fact is no longer necessary. Allis v. Nininger, 25 Minn. 525, 528.

"Constructive eviction," as the term is used with reference to the breach of the covenants of quiet enjoyment and of warranty, means the inability of the purchaser to obtain possession by reason of a paramount title. "When at the time of the conveyance the purchaser finds the premises in the possession of one claiming under a paramount title, there is a 'constructive eviction,' and the covenants for quiet possession or of warranty will be held broken without any other act on the part of the grantee or the claimant." Fritz v. Pusey, 18 N. W. 94, 95, 31 Minn. 368.

To constitute a "constructive eviction," there must be an intentional and injurious interference by the landlord which deprives a tenant of the beneficial enjoyments of the demised premises, or materially impairs such beneficial enjoyment. The fact that the rest of a tenant in an apartment house is disturbed by the noise of children in other apartments of the same building does not constitute such an eviction. Seaboard Realty Co. v. Fuller, 67 N. Y. Supp. 146, 147, 33 Misc. Rep. 109.

Eviction is "constructive" when the lessor, without intent to oust the lessee, does an act by which the latter is deprived of the beneficial enjoyment of some part of the premises, in which case the tenant has his election to quit and avoid the lease and rent, or abide the wrong and seek his remedy in an action for the trespass. Talbott v. English, 59 N. E. 857, 860, 156 Ind. 299.

CONSTRUCTIVE FORCE.

The force necessary to be used to constitute the crime of rape need not be actual, but may be constructive or implied. An acquiescence in the act obtained through duress or fear of personal violence is "constructive force." Shepherd v. State, 33 South. 266, 267, 135 Ala. 9.

CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD.

"Constructive fraud" consists: (1) In any breach of duty which, without an actually fraudulent intent, gains an advantage to the person in fault, or any one claiming under him, by misleading another to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of any one claiming under him; or (2) in any such act or omission as the law specially declares to be fraudulent, without respect to actual fraud. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1573; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2118; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 744; Rev. Codes, N. D. 1899, § 3849; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1202.

"Constructive fraud" consists in any act of omission or commission, contrary to legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence, which is justly reposed, which is contrary to good conscience and operates to the injury of another. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4025.

Constructive fraud "is indirect, and may be implied from some other acts or omission of an act, which may be in moral contemplation entirely innocent, but which, without expression of actual proof of its innocence, is evidence of fraud." People v. Kelly (N. Y.) 35 Barb. 444, 457; Carty v. Connolly, 27 Pac. 599, 600, 91 Cal. 15.

Acts contrary to public policy, sound morals, and the provisions of a statute, however honest the intention with which they may have been performed, are deemed "constructive frauds," or frauds in law. Meyer v. Black, 16 Pac. 620, 629, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 190 (citing Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 1 N. M. 34).

"By 'constructive frauds' are meant such acts or contracts as, though not originating in any actual evil design or contrivance to perpetuate a positive fraud or injury upon other persons, are yet, by their tendency to deceive or mislead other persons, or to violate private or public confidence, or to impair or injure the public interest, deemed equally reprehensible with positive fraud, and are therefore prohibited by law as within the same reason and mischief as acts and contracts done malo animo." Haas v. Sternbach, 41 N. E. 51, 53, 156 Ill. 44 (citing 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 258). Constructive or legal fraud exists where some settled rule of public policy is violated. Mills v. Smith, 19 N. Y. Supp. 854, 857, 65 Hun. 619.

In Story's Eq. Jur. vol. 1, § 395, it is said that another class of constructive frauds consists of those where a person purchases with full notice of the legal or equitable title of other persons to the property. In such cases he will not be permitted to protect himself against such claims, but his own title will be postponed and made subservient to his heirs. He becomes by such conduct particeps criminis with the fraudulent grantor. And, on all such cases of purchase with notice, courts of equity will hold the purchaser a trustee for the benefit of persons whose rights he has thus sought to defraud or defeat. Seymour v. Seymour, 51 N. Y. Supp. 130, 132, 28 App. Div. 495.

"Constructive fraud," sometimes called "legal fraud," is nevertheless fraud, although it rests more upon presumption, and less upon furtive intent, than moral fraud. Butler v. Prentiss, 52 N. E. 652, 656, 158 N. Y. 49 (citing Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 91, 99, 31 Am. Rep. 428).

"Constructive fraud" is synonymous with "legal fraud," and is such as is implied by law from the nature of the transaction itself. The question of the existence or non-existence of an actual purpose to defraud does not enter as an essential factor in determining the question, but the law regards the transaction as fraudulent per se. Newell v. Wagness, 44 N. W. 1014, 1016, 1 N. D. 62.

Where creditors sued out an attachment on the ground that their debtor had fraudulently disposed of its property with a fraudulent intent to hinder and delay its creditors, when there was proof that such allegation was in fact false, and that there was no ground for an attachment, it was such a violation of the law as amounted to "constructive fraud" as against the junior attaching creditors, and would, if permitted to stand, give to the appellee an unfair, inequitable, and unjust advantage over the others. Davis v. H. B. Clafin Co., 63 Ark. 157, 172, 38 S. W. 662, 665, 41 S. W. 996, 35 L. R. A. 776, 58 Am. St. Rep. 102.

In the application of the rule that if a lessor has knowledge of defects in the premises which are not discoverable by the tenant, and which will imperil his person or property, a liability arises from the fraudulent concealment thereof, the terms "fraud," "fraudulent concealment," "constructive fraud," and "deceit" are synonymous. Shinkle, Wilson & Krels Co. v. Birney & Seymour, 67 N. E. 715, 716, 68 Ohio St. 328.

Actual fraud distinguished.

"Fraud" in law is of two kinds, actual and constructive. The former arises from deception practiced by means of the misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact, the latter from a rule of public policy, or the confidential or fiduciary relation which one of the parties affected by the fraud sustained towards the other. It is a constituent of actual fraud that the party alleged to have been defrauded was deceived; no positive dishonesty of purpose is required to show constructive fraud. Forker v. Brown, 30 N. Y. Supp. 827, 10 Misc. Rep. 161.

Fraud may be actual or constructive. Actual fraud consists in any kind of artifice by which another is deceived; constructive fraud consists in any act of omission or commission, contrary to legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence justly reposed, which is contrary to good conscience and operates to the injury of another. The former implies moral guilt; the latter may be consistent with innocence. Massachusetts Ben. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261. One who knowingly and willfully makes false representations as to material facts, with intention to induce the other to enter into a contract with him, and who does so induce the other to enter into the contract to his injury, is guilty of actual fraud, without regard to his intent as to injury to the other party. It is a fraud in law if the party makes representations which he knows to be false, and injury ensues, although the motive from which the representations proceeded may not have been bad. Foster v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Montgomery (Ga.) 43 S. E. 79, 80, 116 Ga. 799 (citing Foster v. Charles, 6 Bing. 396, 1 E. C. L. 183).

Breach of duty.

A breach of duty by a person acting in a fiduciary capacity is constructive fraud. Warren v. Robinson, 61 Pac. 28, 30, 21 Utah, 429; Mills v. Smith, 19 N. Y. Supp. 854, 857, 65 Hun, 619.

"Constructive fraud" consists of any act of omission or commission, contrary to legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence justly reposed, which is contrary to good conscience and operates to the injury of another. City of Clay Center v. Myers, 35 Pac. 25, 26, 52 Kan. 363.

"Constructive fraud" consists, first, in any breach of duty which, without an actual fraudulent intention, gives an advantage to the person in fault, or any one claiming under him, by misleading another to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of any one claiming under him. Carty v. Connolly, 27 Pac. 599, 600, 91 Cal. 15.

The concealment, to the prejudice of another party with whom one is dealing, of any facts which if known to him might affect his decision, and which there is an obligation rising out of the transaction to disclose, is a constructive fraud, without respect to the motive of the party who conceals the fact. Leary v. King, 33 Atl. 621, 6 Del. Ch. 108.

The unauthorized purchase by an attorney of property intrusted to him to sell is sometimes termed a "constructive fraud." Yeoman v. Townshend, 26 N. Y. Supp. 606, 609, 74 Hun, 625.

CONSTRUCTIVE KNOWLEDGE.

Constructive knowledge on the part of the owner of an animal as to its vicious habits is gathered from all the facts and circumstances of each particular case, as well as from well-established inferences or presumptions in law. Brown v. Green (Del.) 42 Atl. 991, 993, 1 Pennewill, 535.

CONSTRUCTIVE MALICE.

"Constructive or implied malice" is an inference or conclusion of law upon facts proved, as when a person unlawfully and suddenly kills another, without premeditation or design, and without any, or without a considerable, provocation, such as would reduce the crime to manslaughter. State v. Harrigan (Del.) 31 Atl. 1052, 9 Houst. 369.

"Implied" or "constructive" malice, in the law of homicide, is an inference or conclusion of law from the facts found by the jury, and among these the actual intention of the prisoner becomes an important and material fact, for, though he may not have intended to take away life or to do any personal harm, yet he may have been engaged in the perpetration of some other felonious or unlawful act from which the law raises the presumption of malice. State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 139, 9 Houst. 564; State v. Jones (Del.) 47 Atl. 1006, 1007, 2 Pennewill, 573.

"Constructive malice," as used to define an element of murder in one of the lesser degrees, means implied malice, or malice which is presumed from the facts, as from the imminently dangerous character of the weapon used, or the felonious act in which the defendant or murderer was engaged. Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 238.

"Constructive malice," in the law of libel, is confined to those cases where the words are themselves capable of bearing a libelous meaning. The law in such cases reasonably presumes that the defendant meant to say what he did, but the law presumes no more, and when a hidden defamatory meaning is sought to be attributed to words in themselves innocent, and on their face containing no such sense by facts independent of the publication, the knowledge of such facts must be shown by averment, and proved to have existed in the breast of the defendant. Caldwell v. Raymond (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. 193, 196.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.

"Constructive notice," as defined by Judge Story, is in its nature no more than evidence of notice, the presumption of which is so violent that the court will not even allow of its being controverted." Cambridge Val. Bank v. Delano, 48 N. Y. 326, 339 (quoting Story, Eq. Jur. § 399); Kirklin v. Atlas Savings & Loan Ass'n (Tenn.) 60 S. W. 149, 157; Nelson v. Allen, 9 Tenn. (1 Yerg.) 360, 367; Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 145, 146; Townsend v. Little, 3 Sup. Ct. 357, 361, 109 U. S. 504, 27 L. Ed. 1012; Schweiss v. Woodruff, 41 N. W. 511, 512, 73 Mich. 473 (citing Clafin v. Lenheim, 66 N. Y. 301, 306); Thomas v. City of Flint, 81 N. W. 936, 944, 945, 123 Mich. 10, 47 L. R. A. 499; Fuller & Johnson v. McMahon (Iowa) 94 N. W. 205; Hayward

v. Mayse, 1 App. D. C. 133, 140; Rogers v. Jones, 8 N. H. 264, 270 (quoting 2 Anstr. 438).

"Constructive notice" is a legal presumption, and will be conclusive unless rebutted; and in many cases it cannot be gainsaid or denied, even by evidence of the absence of actual knowledge of notice. Brown v. Baldwin, 25 S. W. 858, 860, 121 Mo. 106.

"Constructive notice is a legal inference of notice of so high a nature as to be conclusive unless disproved, and is in most cases unsusceptible of explanation or rebuttal by evidence that the purchaser had no actual notice and believed the vendor's title to be good." White v. Fisher, 77 Ind. 65, 71, 40 Am. Rep. 287.

Constructive notice assumes that no information concerning the prior fact, claim, or right has been directly and personally communicated to the party, but is only inferred by operation of legal presumption. Levins v. W. O. Peoples Grocery Co. (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 733, 740 (citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 604).

Constructive notice is a legal inference from established facts, and when the facts are not controverted, or the alleged defect or infirmity appears on the face of the instrument and is a matter of ocular inspection, the question is one for the court. Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 220, 249; Thomas v. City of Flint, 81 N. W. 936, 944, 945, 123 Mich. 10, 47 L. R. A. 499.

Constructive notice is a creature of the statute, and, to be of any force, the statute must be strictly complied with. De Lassus v. Winn, 74 S. W. 635, 636, 174 Mo. 636 (citing Alt v. Fullerton, 151 Mo. 598, 603, 52 S. W. 400).

Actual notice distinguished.

Notice is of two kinds, actual and constructive. Actual notice may be either express or implied. If the one, it is established by direct evidence; if the other, by proof of circumstances from which it is inferable as a fact. Constructive notice is, on the other hand, always a presumption of law. Express notice embraces not only knowledge, but also that which is communicative by direct information, either written or oral, from those who are cognizant of the fact communicated. Implied notice, which is equally actual notice, arises where the party to be charged is shown to have had knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would lead him, by the exercise of due diligence, to a knowledge of the particular facts; or, as defined by the Supreme Court of Missouri in Rhodes v. Outcalt, 48 Mo. 367, 370, a notice is to be regarded in law as actual when the party sought to be affected by it knows of the particular fact, or is conscious of having the means of knowing it, although he may not employ the means in his possession for the purpose of gaining further information. City of Baltimore v. Whittington, 27 Atl. 984, 985, 78 Md. 231.

Implied notice distinguished.

"Constructive notice," in the law of adverse possession, differs from "implied notice," which is a knowledge imputed impliedly by collateral facts of such a nature as to cast on the party the legal duty of not being willfully or negligently ignorant of all proper inferences to be drawn from such facts. "Constructive notice" is defined to be a knowledge, often conclusively imputed by the court, on presumption that the information must have been communicated. 2 Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Notice." The underlying principle is that notice, whether express, implied, or constructive, is but a mode or means of imputing knowledge, actually, impliedly, or legally; and knowledge is but information imputed by notice in one of these several modes. Wells v. Sheerer, 78 Ala. 142, 147.

As notice from circumstances.

"Constructive notice" of a defective sidewalk on the part of the mayor and board of aldermen of a city means such notice as may be inferred from the fact that an obvious defect had existed so long as to be generally noticed by persons passing over it, and thus raise an inference that the mayor, or some members of such board, or employé of defendant whose duty it was to keep the streets in repair, had notice of such defects. Pool v. City of Jackson, 23 S. W. 57, 59, 93 Tenn. 62.

By "constructive notice" is meant such notice as the law imputes from the circumstances of the case. After a street has been out of repair so that the defect has become known and notorious to those traveling the street, and there has been full opportunity for the municipality, through its agents charged with that duty, to learn of its existence and repair it, the law imputes to it notice, and charges it with negligence. Keen v. City of Havre de Grace, 48 Atl. 444, 445, 93 Md. 34.

In considering the knowledge which the owner of an animal must have as to its dangerous character before he can be held liable for its acts, the court said: "Notice may be of two kinds. It may be an actual notice; that is, knowledge brought home to the party himself that his dog has bitten a certain person, at a certain time, under certain circumstances, which he had no right to do. Or a man may keep a vicious bull, and may have notice brought home to him of some immediate injury that he has done; that is actual notice. In case of any accident happening or injury being done, either by one animal or the other, in that case the master would be liable. But that is not the only case in which the master may be liable. There may be a case in which there is no actual notice, but where there are certain facts and circumstances which, being brought to his knowledge, imply notice; that is, by reason of the duty that is imposed upon him, he reasonably ought to know. If a man has a dangerous dog, though he may never have bitten any person, if he is of a vicious and ferocious character, and that knowledge is brought home to his wife under those circumstances, in case of injury inflicted by that dog he unquestionably would be liable though no actual notice had been given. In other words, that is what the law terms 'constructive notice,' which means nothing more nor less than that there are facts and circumstances which are brought to his knowledge tending to show that the animal is a dangerous and ferocious animal, and therefore he would be liable for any consequences which may result from the viciousness of the animal." Barclay v. Hartman (Del.) 43 Atl. 174, 175, 2 Marv. 351.

As notice of facts putting on inquiry.

"Constructive notice" is notice imputed by the law to a person not having actual notice, and every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, and who omits to make such inquiry with reasonable diligence, is deemed to have constructive notice of the fact itself. Kansas Moline Plow Co. v. Sherman, 41 Pac. 623, 626, 3 Okl. 204, 32 L. R. A. 33; Gress v. Evans, 46 N. W. 1132, 1134, 1 Dak. 387; Scheuber v. Wheeler (Tex.) 15 S. W. 503, 504; Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 145, 146; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2790; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 5117, 5118; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 2451, 2452.

The general doctrine is that whatever puts a party on inquiry amounts in law to notice, provided the inquiry becomes a duty, as in the case of purchasers or creditors. Jewell v. Truhn, 38 Minn. 433, 437, 38 N. W. 106.

A person is said to have "constructive notice" when, by any circumstances whatever, he is put upon inquiry which amounts in the judgment of law to notice, providing the inquiry becomes a duty, as in the case of purchasers and creditors, and would lead to the knowledge of the requisite fact by the exercise of ordinary diligence and understanding. Jackson v. Waldstein (Tex.) 27 S. W. 26, 27.

"Constructive notice" is whatever puts a party where he should make inquiry, and amounts in judgment of law to notice, provided it becomes a duty, as in the case of purchasers and creditors, and would lead up to the knowledge of acquired fact by the exercise of ordinary diligence. Hood v. Fahnestock, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 470, 472, 473, 44 Am. Dec. 147.

A party is charged with a constructive notice as to the condition of the title to real estate whenever he has information or knowledge of some extraneous facts which of themselves do not amount to nor show an actual notice, but which are sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon an inquiry respecting a conflicting interest, claim, or right, and the circumstances are such that the inquiry, if made and followed with reasonable care, would lead to a discovery of the truth. Lang Syne Gold Min. Co. v. Ross, 18 Pac. 358, 361, 362, 20 Nev. 127, 19 Am. St. Rep. 337. It is such notice "as would put a prudent man on inquiry which, if prosecuted with ordinary diligence, would lead to actual notice of the right or title in conflict with which he was about to purchase." Matesky v. Feldman, 48 N. W. 733, 734, 75 Wis. 103.

"Constructive notice" may be said to be a knowledge by the purchaser of some facts which would put him upon inquiry, and require him to examine other matters that would generally unfold the true title. If he omit in a proper case to make examination, he is conclusively charged with negligence, and notice of the defect in the title. Acer v. Westcott, 46 N. Y. 384, 7 Am. Rep. 355; First Nat. Bank v. National Broadway Bank, 47 N. Y. Supp. 880, 882, 22 App. Div. 24. Under such definition, the one who accepts, as collateral for a personal loan, certificates of stock which show on their face that the borrower holds them as trustee, is put on inquiry as to the nature and effect of the trust, so as to have constructive notice thereof. First Nat. Bank v. National Broadway Bank, 47 N. Y. Supp. 880, 882, 22 App. Div. 24.

"Constructive notice" of an outstanding title in land is the notice imparted by the registry. Hill v. Tissier, 15 Mo. App. 299, 306.

"Constructive" or "record" notice is such notice as is presumed to be imparted by recording with the proper authorities a properly drawn and properly acknowledged instrument. Livingston v. Stevens (Iowa) 94 N. W. 925, 927.

A recital in a deed of a prior unrecorded mortgage as an existing incumbrance is actual notice of such unrecorded mortgage to the grantee, and "constructive notice" of its existence to parties claiming under him. Buchanan v. Balkum, 60 N. H. 406.

Presumptive notice distinguished.

See "Presumptive Notice."

CONSTRUCTIVE OCCUPANCY.

As applied to a homestead, "constructive occupancy" is defined as a temporary vacation without abandonment, and with a bona fide and subsisting intention to return. Davis v. Kelly, 87 N. W. 347, 62 Neb. 642.

CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION.

"Constructive possession" is that which exists in contemplation of the law without actual personal occupancy. Newcome v. Crews, 32 S. W. 947, 98 Ky. 339; Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76, 80.

One is in "constructive possession" of real estate when it is in the custody or occupancy of no one, but when he has a title thereto. Brown v. Hartzell, 87 Mo. 564, 567.

Constructive possession "means that possession which is not actual, visible, notorious, and hostile. It is that possession which is deduced by a mode of interpretation; a possession which is inferred. Constructive possession is almost unknown in England. It is a doctrine peculiarly adapted to and has mainly grown up in the American states. The ordinary and usual method of supporting constructive possession is by entering under a recorded deed, or other equivalent record of title, upon a portion of the premises described therein, which in a new country is all the owner can do; and the public record of the boundaries is held to be equivalent to actual occupancy of the whole and every part of the premises." Hodges v. Eddy, 38 Vt. 327, 337.

The term "constructive possession" may be applied to designate the relation between the owner of property and the property when the owner is not in actual possession thereof, but when he knows where the property is situated, so that he is able to recover the actual possession when he desires. Such property is not lost, but in the possession of the owner to such an extent that a taking thereof constitutes larceny. Pritchett v. State, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 285, 288, 62 Am. Dec. 468.

"Constructive possession" of land is where a person, having paper title to a contract of land, is in actual possession of only a part thereof. In such a case the law construes the possession to extend to the boundary of a tract. Hence adjacent owners may be in constructive possession of the same land included in the boundaries of each tract. In such case no prescription can arise in favor of either. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3586.

"Constructive possession," which may or may not be adverse possession, arises when one under color of title, by patent, deed, or other writing, takes actual possession of a part of his land, thus in law acquiring possession to the extent of his boundaries contained in his patent, deed, or other writing. Thus, constructive possession has its origin in the maxim of the common law, "Possession of a part shall be construed as possession of the whole." Garrett v. Ramsey, 20 W. Va. 345, 350, 351.

Possession, following the registry of title, without any actual occupancy of the premises, is called "civil" or "constructive" possession, as distinguished from "natural" or "corporeal" possession. Civ. Code arts. 3427, 3428, 3431; Ashley Co. v. Bradford, 33 South. 634, 639, 109 La. 641.

Constructive possession follows the legal title, the rightful owner being deemed in possession until he is ousted and disseised. Possession follows the title, in the absence of actual possession adverse to it. Woolfolk v. Buckner, 55 S. W. 168, 169, 67 Ark. 411.

The "constructive possession" by the vendee which supersedes the right of stoppage in transitu exists when the carrier enters expressly into a new agreement, distinct from the original agreement, to hold the goods for the consignee as his agent, not for the purpose of expediting them to the place of original destination, but in a new character, for the purpose of custody on his account. Smith v. Gail (Fla.) 33 South. 527, 529, 60 L. R. A. 547 (citing Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 518).

A pistol left in the room of its owner during his absence, or in the possession of any particular person, remains in his constructive possession while in his room, and its theft therefrom is punishable, though the owner was in another state at the time of the theft. Webb v. State (Tex.) 44 S. W. 498.

Actual possession distinguished.

See "Actual Possession."

Possession of part under deed.

"Constructive possession" is a possession in law without a possession in fact. What will give one a constructive possession of land when he has not the actual possession is a question very largely depending on the facts of the particular case. It is held that the owner of land who enters into and holds possession of a portion of the land covered by his deed, and claiming under his deed, is, by construction and by virtue of his claim under his deed, legally in possession of all that his deed covers, though he has not the actual possession of the whole. Hodges v. Eddy, 38 Vt. 327, 344; Fleming v. Maddox, 30 Iowa, 239, 241.

Where one in actual possession at the same time holds under deed or title, he holds, to the extent of such deed or title, outside of his actual possession, by what is termed "constructive possession," and by "actual possession" to the extent of his inclosure of the lands of which he is in possession. Ramirez v. Smith (Tex.) 56 S. W. 254, 259, (citing Cunningham v. Frandtzen, 26 Tex. 34, 35; Evitts v. Roth, 61 Tex. 84).

CONSTRUCTIVE SEISIN.

"Constructive seisin" is seisin in law where there is no seisin in fact. Thus, when the state issues a patent to a person who never takes any sort of possession of the land granted to him, he has nevertheless constructive seisin of all the land in his grant, though some one else be at the time in actual possession of it. Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345, 351.

CONSTRUCTIVE SEIZURE.

As applied to the levy of an execution, "constructive seizure" means that the officer has received the execution for levy, and by virtue thereof makes a just and true inventory of the debtor's goods and files it as a return of the writ, such acts amounting to a constructive seizure and possession of the goods, though he does not take actual possession thereof, he being regarded as in possession as a matter of law. Lloyd v. Wyckoff, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 218, 222.

CONSTRUCTIVE SERVICE.

The doctrine of "constructive service," in the law of master and servant, is that a discharged employé holding himself ready to do the work has therefore done the work, and that readiness is therefore equivalent to all performance. A learned writer uses this language: "The doctrine of constructive services, however, does not permit an employé who has been wrongfully discharged to remain willfully idle during the period for which he was engaged. Constructive services never had, as we think, supported any such principle, and in a large measure the support heretofore found for it upon authority has disappeared. It may not be too much to say that the doctrine has in England, where it has its origin, been repudiated. The law there established that a servant wrongfully discharged has no action for wages unless something is due for past services actually rendered, and as to any other claim on the contract it is for the breach of it, and for his damages resulting therefrom, being the ordinary action for damages, and not the common-law action of indebitatus assumpsit." James v. Allen County, 6 N. E. 246, 249, 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. Rep. 821.

CONSTRUCTIVE TOTAL LOSS.

A "constructive total loss" is one which gives to the person insured a right to abandon, under a provision authorizing abandonment of the thing insured if more than half thereof in value is actually lost or would have to be expended to recover it from the peril; if it is injured to such an extent as to reduce its value more than one-half; if, the thing insured being a ship, the contemplated voyage cannot be lawfully performed without incurring an expense to the insured of more than half the value of the thing abandoned, or without incurring a risk which a prudent man would not take under the circumstances; or if, the thing insured being cargo or freightage, the voyage cannot be performed nor another ship procured by the master within a reasonable time, and with reasonable diligence, to forward the cargo.

without incurring a like expense or risk. Rev. Code N. D. 1899, §§ 45, 69; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1915.

A "constructive total loss," in insurance law, is that which entitles the assured to claim the whole amount of the insurance on giving due notice of abandonment. Devitt v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 65 N. E. 777, 779, 173 N. Y. 17 (citing Arn. Ins. § 1091).

The term "constructive total loss" is defined by Mr. Arnould in his work on Marine Insurance as follows: "An absolute total loss takes place when the subject insured wholly perishes, or there is a privation of it, and its recovery is hopeless. A constructive total loss takes place when the subject insured is not wholly destroyed, but its destruction is rendered highly probable; or the privation of it, though not quite irretrievable, is such that its recovery is either exceedingly doubtful or too expensive to be worth the attempt. An absolute total loss entitled the assured to claim from the underwriter the whole amount of his subscription. A constructive total loss entitles him to make such claim on condition of giving notice of abandonment of all right and title to any part of the property that may still exist or may still be recovered." Murray v. Great Western Ins. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 414, 416, 72 Hun, 282; McLain v. British & Foreign Marine Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. Supp. 77, 78, 16 Misc. Rep. 336. Where a boat was raised and found to be so injured as to be past repair, there was a constructive total loss. McLain v. British & Foreign Marine Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. Supp. 77, 78, 16 Misc. Rep. 336. Where it appeared that a vessel valued at $75,000 was sold for a little over $1,000 after the stranding, and that after making over $5,000 worth of repairs, the purchasers resold her for about $25,000, the jury was justified in finding that the vessel was a constructive total loss. Murray v. Great Western Ins. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 414, 416, 72 Hun, 282.

In Wright v. Williams (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 320, Barrett, J., said: "It is undoubtedly the general rule in insurance free of particular average that the underwriter is only liable for the total loss. In the former case the thing insured is physically destroyed—substantially so, at least; in the latter, the material form may exist, but the value to the owner is gone. The rule, then, is that, if the expense of repair will exceed one-half the value of the ship when repaired, there is a constructive total loss, and it may be abandoned." Devitt v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 654, 657, 61 App. Div. 390.

A "constructive total loss," as applied to marine insurance, is one where the loss, though not actually total, is of such a character that the insured is entitled, if he sees fit, to treat it as total by an abandonment. A constructive total loss of cargo may arise by the loss of the ship under circumstances amounting to the destruction of the contemplated adventure, when no part of the cargo can be forwarded by a substituted ship except at a cost beyond the value. So, also, it may arise if the damage to the goods, though repairable, cannot be repaired except at an expense greater than their value when repaired, and is thus impracticable from a business point of view. There is also in the United States a conventional rule, originally adopted because of its convenience and certainty, which authorizes an abandonment of ship or cargo when the damage exceeds a moiety of the value, and a recovery as for a total loss. An abandonment is indispensable in all cases of constructive total loss, except in those where it could not possibly be of any benefit to the insurer. Insurance Co. of North America v. Canada Sugar-Refining Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 491, 493, 31 C. C. A. 65; Devitt v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 654, 657, 61 App. Div. 390; Globe Ins. Co. v. Sherlock, 25 Ohio St. 50, 64.

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTEE.

"A person may become a 'trustee by construction' by intermeddling with and assuming the management of trust property without authority. Such persons are trustees de son tort." Perry, Trusts (3d Ed.) § 245; Morris v. Joseph, 1 W. Va. 256, 91 Am. Dec. 386; Piper v. Hoard, 107 N. Y. 73, 13 N. E. 626, 1 Am. St. Rep. 789. "During the possession and management of such constructive trustees they are subject to the same rules and remedies as other trustees, and they cannot avoid their liability by showing that they were not in fact trustees, nor can they set up the statute of limitations." Perry, Trusts (3d Ed.) § 245. Thus, where an administrator with the will annexed executes, without authority, a trust created by the will, he becomes a constructive trustee, or a trustee de son tort. Penn v. Fogler, 55 N. E. 192, 197, 182 Ill. 76.

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS.

Constructive trusts are raised by equity for the purpose of working out right and justice. All instances of constructive trusts may be referred to what equity denominates "fraud," either actual or constructive, including acts or omissions in violation of fiduciary obligation. If one party obtains the legal title to property not only by fraud, or by violation of confidence or fiduciary relations, but in any other unconscientious manner, so that he cannot equitably retain the property, which really belongs to another, equity carries out its theory of double ownership, equitable and legal, by impressing a constructive trust upon the property in favor of the one who is in good conscience entitled to it, and who is considered in equity the beneficial owner. Nester v. Gross, 69 N. W. 39, 41, 66 Minn. 371 (citing

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 155); Springer v. Young, 12 Pac. 400, 402, 14 Or. 280; Lewis v. Lindley, 48 Pac. 765, 771, 19 Mont. 422. And see Cline v. Cline, 68 N. E. 545, 548, 204 Ill. 130; Riley v. Martinelli, 32 Pac. 579, 580, 97 Cal. 575, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209 (citing Bayles v. Baxter, 22 Cal. 575; Currey v. Allen, 34 Cal. 254).

Perry, in his work on Trusts, defines "constructive trusts" as those which arise when a person, clothed with some fiduciary character, by fraud or otherwise gains some advantage to himself. Courts construe this to be an advantage for the cestui que trust, or a constructive trust. Kaphan v. Toney (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 909, 913; Burks v. Burks, 66 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 353, 356; Gabert v. Olcott, 23 S. W. 985, 987, 86 Tex. 121; Preston v. Beall, 19 S. W. 175, 177, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 61. "Constructive trusts" are limited by this writer to that large class of trusts which equity raises from frauds committed by one party on another, and he makes "express, implied, and resulting trusts" embrace all those trusts which arise from the express agreements and intentions of the parties, or from their intentions implied from their agreements, or from their express or implied agreements; in short, all trusts that arise, result, or are implied from the contracts and relations of the parties. Kaphan v. Toney (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 909, 913.

Perry, in his classification of "constructive trusts," uses this language: "Trusts that arise from some equitable principle, independent of the existence of any fraud; as, where an estate has been purchased, and the consideration money paid before the deed is taken, equity will raise a trust by construction for the purchaser." Equity in such case will regard the vendor as trustee of the legal title of the land for the benefit of the vendee. So, when a vendor of land takes notes from the purchaser for the purchase price, and uses these notes in purchase of other lands, after which the title to the land sold fails, the vendor will be entitled to hold such lands in trust for the purchaser. Matthews v. Crowder (Tenn.) 69 S. W. 779, 780.

The subject of constructive trusts is intimately connected with that of frauds. Indeed, the basis of all such trusts is fraud, either actual or presumed. Rightly understood, a "constructive trust" is only a mode by which courts of equity work out equity and prevent or circumvent fraud and overreaching. There are, therefore, two well-defined classes of constructive trusts, corresponding with the two classes of fraud, viz., (1) those which are raised in cases of actual fraud, and (2) those raised in cases of presumed or constructive fraud. Those of the first class are commonly called "trusts ex maleficio." 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 226. Thus equity will, as against a servant charged with the care of offices of a banking corporation and the preservation of the property therein, declare a trust in favor of the latter with respect to the proceeds of money stolen from it by the former while in the discharge of his said duty. Nebraska Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 71 N. W. 294, 296, 51 Neb. 546.

The generic term "implied trusts" includes resulting and constructive trusts, which latter are sometimes called "trusts ex maleficio." Springer v. Young, 12 Pac. 400, 402, 14 Or. 280.

Constructive trusts are of three kinds, or arise from one or the other of three conditions of fact: First, trusts arising from actual fraud; second, trusts which arise from a constructive fraud; and, third, trusts which arise from some equitable principle independent of the existence of fraud. O'Bear Jewelry Co. v. Volfer, 17 South. 525, 529, 106 Ala. 205, 28 L. R. A. 707, 54 Am. St. Rep. 31.

If a trust be constituted by the acts of the parties, the possession of the trustee is the possession of the cestui que trust, and no length of possession as such will bar an action to recover; but if a party is to be constituted a trustee by decree of a court of equity, founded on fraud or the like, his possession is then considered adverse, and the statute of limitations will run and be a bar. Willson v. Louisville Trust Co., 44 S. W. 121, 123, 102 Ky. 522.

A confidential relation is not necessary to establish a constructive trust. It may arise from actual fraud. This fraud alone, however, will not be sufficient to warrant relief, unless the party relied upon the fraudulent representations which were the inducements to their contracts. Edelman v. Latshaw, 28 Atl. 475, 476, 159 Pa. 644.

"Trusts arising by operation of law" are such trusts as arise or are imposed by law itself, without any act of the parties. Such trusts arise, among other things, from fraud, actual or constructive, and are termed "constructive trusts." These trusts are such obligations as the law imposes on tortfeasors who are guilty of unjust enrichment. Brison v. Brison, 17 Pac. 689, 690, 75 Cal. 525, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189.

Direct or express trust distinguished.

See, also, "Express Trust."

A "direct" or "express" trust is one springing from the agreement of the parties, created by words either expressly or impliedly evincing the intention to create a trust. It is distinguished from a "constructive" or "implied" trust, which are trusts created by equity law—a trust not created by any words either expressly or impliedly evincing a direct intention to create a trust, but by the construction of equity in order to satisfy the demands of justice. Currence v. Ward, 27 S. E. 329, 330, 43 W. Va. 367.

Intention to create trust.

"Constructive trusts" include all those instances in which a trust is raised by the doctrine of equity for the purpose of working out justice in the most efficient manner, where there is no intention of the parties to create such a relation, and in most cases contrary to the intention of the one holding the legal title, and where there is no express or implied, written or verbal, declaration of the trust. Sandford v. Hamner, 22 South. 117, 119, 115 Ala. 406 (citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur.); Stubbins' Adm'r v. Briggs, 68 S. W. 392, 393, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 230; McVity v. Stanton, 30 N. Y. Supp. 934, 935, 10 Misc. Rep. 105; Graham v. King, 24 S. W. 430, 431, 96 Ky. 339.

In most cases of constructive trust, pure and simple, an element of fraud, actual or constructive, is the basis upon which the trust is founded. Equity sometimes proceeds upon the maxim that an intention to fulfill an obligation should be imputed, and assumes that the purchaser intended to act in pursuance of his fiduciary duty, as in case of a trustee who uses trust funds to pay for property furnished in his own name, though no doubt in many cases the intention is to violate duty. Fulton v. Jansen, 34 Pac. 331, 332, 99 Cal. 587.

As constructive trusts are imposed by equity, contrary to the trustee's intention and will, upon property in his hands, they are often termed "trusts in invitum," and this phrase furnishes a criterion generally accurate and sufficient for determining what trusts are truly constructive. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1044. Thus, where defendant accepted the agency of a town, and purchased for it certain property, was furnished by it with funds to pay in cash one-half the price, and on execution of such agency made the purchase, and paid with such funds the required cash payment, taking title in his own name as absolute owner, there was a constructive trust in favor of the town as trustee. Sandford v. Hamner, 22 South. 117, 119, 115 Ala. 406.

Where a person's acts amount to constructive fraud at least, equity will declare a constructive trust for the purpose of administering justice and right, though such a trust was not within the contemplation of the parties. Equity will impress a trust, contrary to the intention and will of a party, where a fund has been obtained by him in violation of his duty to another. In order to raise this duty, there need be neither a promise for the benefit of another nor express fiduciary relations between them. It may be raised by representations, conduct, and the like, that have been relied upon by another under such circumstances as create an equitable estoppel upon one to pursue thereafter an opposite course for his own advantage. Actual fraud, intentional as regards the party seeking relief, is not essential to the raising up of a constructive trust any more than an equitable estoppel. If one makes an appropriation of a fund, which, if permitted to stand, would, by reason of the circumstances pending the transaction, work a wrong to another having an equity therein, and give him an unconscientious advantage over that other, the act will be regarded as what is called a "constructive fraud" in equity. Barnes v. Thuet, 89 N. W. 1085, 1087, 116 Iowa, 359 (citing Anglo-American Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Campbell, 13 App. D. C. 581, 43 L. R. A. 622).

Constructive trusts depend on conclusions of law, independent of contract or intent, are commonly imposed in invitum, and embrace every trust arising by operation of law which is neither implied nor resulting. Beecher v. Foster, 42 S. E. 647, 651, 51 W. Va. 605.

Constructive trusts are those which exist by construction of law alone, without any actual or supposed intention that a trust should be created, but merely to assert the rights of parties or baffle fraud. Dunn v. Zwilling, 62 N. W. 746, 747, 94 Iowa, 233.

Wrongful acquisition of property.

Constructive trusts arise when the legal title to property is obtained by a person in violation, express or implied, of some duty owed to the one who is equitably entitled, and when the property thus obtained is held in hostility to his beneficial rights of ownership. Graham v. King, 24 S. W. 430, 431, 96 Ky. 339; Fulton v. Jansen, 34 Pac. 331, 333, 99 Cal. 587; Willson v. Louisville Trust Co., 44 S. W. 121, 123, 102 Ky. 522; Sandford v. Hamner, 22 South. 117, 119, 115 Ala. 406. Certain species of constructive trusts arise from actual fraud; many others spring from the violation of some positive fiduciary obligation. In all the remaining instances there is, latent perhaps, but none the less real, the necessary element of that unconscientious conduct which equity calls "constructive fraud." McVity v. Stanton, 30 N. Y. Supp. 934, 935, 10 Misc. Rep. 105 (citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1032, 1044, 1045).

Where any person clothed with some fiduciary character wrongfully or fraudulently conducts a transaction so as to gain an advantage to himself over another person interested, the law converts him into a trustee, contrary to his intention and against his will, and a constructive trust arises. Quinn v. Kellogg, 35 Pac. 49, 51, 4 Colo. App. 157.

There is a constructive trust, when lands are conveyed and no security is taken for the purchase money, that the purchaser shall be a trustee of the land for the vendor until the purchase money is paid. Morgan v. Dalrymple, 46 Atl. 666, 60 N. J. Eq. 466.

A constructive trust arises by operation of law from the act of the parties coupled with the transactions had. Thus, where an attorney of the assignee of an insolvent debtor purchased the property of the insolvent, a constructive trust arose in favor of the creditors of the insolvent. Broder v. Conklin, 53 Pac. 699, 700, 121 Cal. 282. And so in cases where solicitors or agents had purchased for their principals at judicial sale and taken title in their own names. Aller v. Crouter, 54 Atl. 426, 429, 64 N. J. Eq. 381.

Only a constructive trust arises where a trustee becomes purchaser of the trust property at a sale which he controls; and therefore where trustees, in order to protect their own interests in the property, purchased it at an execution sale which was alleged to be under their control, only a constructive trust could arise, and a failure of the cestui que trust to take any steps to enforce their rights for 15 years would be a bar to an action by them. Bruner v. Finley, 41 Atl. 334, 339, 187 Pa. 389.

A "constructive trust" is one implied by operation of law. Thus where M., as attorney in fact for a devisee residing in a distant city, received her share of the estate, remitted a portion, and retained the remainder, which he invested in real estate, took the title in his own name, and afterwards conveyed it to his wife, the devisee permitted him to retain her property at his request, and upon his representations that he could thereby obtain a greater profit, a constructive trust was created. McMonagle v. McGlinn (U. S.) 85 Fed. 88, 89, 91.

Where a wife's father, with her consent, for the purpose of making an equal distribution of his property, causes land to be conveyed to her husband by a deed of general warranty, the land is not charged with any trust in favor of the wife, since, to constitute a constructive trust, it must arise in either of two classes of cases—those which are raised in actual fraud, and those raised in presumptive or constructive fraud. Acker v. Priest, 61 N. W. 235, 239, 92 Iowa, 610.

Persons may become "trustees by construction" by intermeddling with and assuming the management of property without authority. They are held to be trustees de son tort, in the same manner that persons who deal with a deceased person's estate without authority are administrators de son tort. If one enters upon the lands of an individual, takes the rents, and manages and carries on the property, he may be charged as a guardian, trustee, or bailiff, and so may one who takes personal property. Bailey v. Bailey, 32 Atl. 470, 471, 67 Vt. 494, 48 Am. St. Rep. 828.

CONSTRUE—CONSTRUCTION.

See "Equitable Construction"; "Liberal Construction"; "Practical Construction"; "Strict Construction."

"Strictly, the term [construction] signifies determining the meaning and proper effect of language by a consideration of the subject-matter and attending circumstances in connection with the words employed." Johnson v. Des Moines Life Ins. Co., 105 Iowa, 273, 277, 75 N. W. 101, 102 (quoting Webster's Dict.).

Within the meaning of the rule that to constitute a "common error which makes the law" the error must be in the observing, construing, or interpreting law, and not one in direct disobedience of that which is law, "to construe or interpret a statute" is to read it for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning and effect. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 23 Pac. 1018, 1022, 9 Mont. 452, 8 L. R. A. 629.

The "construction" of a will is the ascertainment of the testator's express intention—what he meant by what he said—which is to be determined by the court as a question of fact, and not by the application of arbitrary rules of law. Stratton v. Stratton, 44 Atl. 699, 700, 68 N. H. 582.

"Construction," as applied to statutes, is an interpretation to ascertain the intention of the lawmakers. This is generally accomplished by a literal reading of the words used. There are many cases, however, where the words do not express the intention perfectly, when it is allowed to adopt what writers on the civil law sometimes call a "rational interpretation," and collect the intention from the rational or probable conjecture. It is also held that when it appears that the words of the law, however clear in themselves, lead to false consequences or unjust decisions, the palpable injustice which would follow from its literal sense compels an effort to discover an interpretation which is not what the law literally says, but what it means. People v. New York City Tax Com'rs, 95 N. Y. 554, 559.

The "construction" of deeds is the ascertainment from competent evidence of the intention of the parties. Bartlett v. La Rochelle, 44 Atl. 302, 68 N. H. 211 (citing Crawford v. Parsons, 63 N. H. 438; Johnson v. Conant, 64 N. H. 109, 7 Atl. 116); Johnson v. Conant, 7 Atl. 116, 123, 64 N. H. 109 (citing Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 592, 4 Sup. Ct. 566, 28 L. Ed. 527).

"Construction," as applied to written law, is said by Black in his Construction and Interpretation of Law to be the "art or process of discovering and expounding the meaning and intention of the authors of the law with respect to its application to a given case, where that intention is rendered doubtful either by reason of apparent conflicting provisions or directions, or by reason of the fact that the given case is not explicitly provided for in the law." Where a statute provided that the permitting of any one, not a member of the family, in a room where liquor is sold on a day when such liquor selling is illegal, shall be a misdemeanor, and an indictment charged that persons were so illegally permitted to be within a room where liquor was sold by virtue of the laws of the state of Indiana, a motion to quash the indictment in that it did not charge that the room was one where liquor was sold by virtue of a license was held not to present a question of a statutory construction, but rather of pleading, and was not appealable under a statute providing that questions concerning the proper construction of a statute shall be appealable. Deane v. State, 64 N. E. 916, 917, 159 Ind. 313.

Ambiguity implied.

The phrase "construction of a statute," as used in Acts 1901, p. 668, § 8, providing that every case in which there is in question the proper construction of a statute, and which case would be otherwise unappealable, shall be appealable directly to the Supreme Court, means to interpret, to elucidate, and to define and declare the meaning of that which is obscure and uncertain, and can have no application to a statute in which there is nothing doubtful or ambiguous in its terms. Construction can only be employed for the discovery of the true intent and meaning of an instrument, and when the language is plain there can be no construction, because there is nothing to construe. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Erdel, 62 N. E. 706, 707, 158 Ind. 344.

As drawing conclusions.

"Construction" has been defined by Dr. Lieber (Lieber on Political Hermeneutics, c. 1) as "the drawing of conclusions respecting subjects that lie beyond the direct expression of the text, conclusions which are in the spirit, though not within the letter, of the text." Jones v. Proprietors of Morris Aqueduct, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 206, 209; People v. New York City Tax Com'rs, 95 N. Y. 554, 559; State v. Smith, 35 Neb. 13, 23, 52 N. W. 700, 16 L. R. A. 791.

As effect.

Where a statute abolished powers as they then existed, and provided that thenceforth the creation, construction, and execution of powers were to be governed by the provisions of such statute, by the term "construction" the revisers and the Legislature meant not merely the meaning and force of the words used in creating the power; they had a wider notion in the use of the word, and intended by it what should be the effect, in law, of the creation and execution of the power upon the property which was the subject of it, and upon all persons interested therein, closely or remotely. Thus a "constructive trust" is one raised by operation of law, and distinguished from one created by the express words of some written instrument. Cutting v. Cutting, 86 N. Y. 522, 535.

Interpretation distinguished.

"Construction," as distinguished from "interpretation," involves the drawing of conclusions regarding subjects that are not always included in the direct expression, while "interpretation" is used for the purpose of ascertaining the true sense of any form of words. Bloomer v. Todd, 19 Pac. 135, 138, 3 Wash. T. 599, 1 L. R. A. 111.

As regarded.

"Construed," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 5, providing that the sections of the Code, so far as they are substantially the same as the common law, must be construed as a continuation thereof, and not as a new enactment, means "regarded" or "considered," and not "interpreted," "explained," or "translated." Churchill v. Pacific Imp. Co., 31 Pac. 560, 561, 96 Cal. 490.

CONSTUPRATE.

"Constuprate," which is given by Johnson as one definition of "ravish," is defined to mean to violate, to debauch, to defile, so that the word "ravish" implies sexual or carnal knowledge. Harper v. Delp, 3 Ind. 225, 230.

"Constuprate," from the Latin "constupro," to violate, is given by Worcester as an appropriate definition of "debauch," and hence such term implies more than seduce. Koenig v. Nott (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 323, 329.

CONSUETUDINES.

The word "consuetudines" generally means "tolls," but if the context raises a doubt, the expression may be interpreted by usage. The grant of a fair, "cum omnibus libertatibus et liberis consuetudinibus ad hujusmodi feriam pertinentibus," does not give a right to take tolls. Earl of Egremont v. Saul, 6 Adol. & El. 924.

CONSUL

Consuls are agents of their governments, and in the United States it belongs exclusively to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint consuls to such places as he and they may deem to be meet. They are officers created by the Constitution and law of nations, and not by act of Congress. Sidel v. Peschkaw, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 427, 429.

A consul is a commercial agent of a country, residing in a foreign seaport, whose duty it is to support commercial intercourse of the state, and especially of the individual citizens. Schunior v. Russell, 18 S. W. 484, 485, 83 Tex. 83.

A government commercial agent residing in a foreign seaport, whose duty it is to support commercial intercourse with the state, and especially to protect the rights of its individual citizens, is a "consul" or "consular officer," within a statute authorizing such officer to take and certify the depositions. Schunior v. Russell, 18 S. W. 484, 485, 83 Tex. 83.

A consul is a mercantile agent of the sovereignty by which he is appointed to protect the commercial interests of its citizens or subjects in foreign states. Seidel v. Besch-kaw, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 427, 429.

"A consul is a commercial agent with public functions, accredited to the national government by a foreign power, and is admitted to be under the particular protection of the law of nations." Sartori v. Hamilton, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 107, 109.

As all consular officers.

"Consul general," "consul," and "commercial agent," as used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to denote full, principal, and permanent consular officers, as distinguished from subordinates and substitutes. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1149.

"Deputy consul" and "consular agent," when used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals, exercising the powers and performing the duties within the limits of their consulates or commercial agencies respectively; the former at the same ports or places, and the latter at ports or places different from those at which such principals are located respectively. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1150.

"Consular officer," when used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to include consuls general, consuls, commercial agents, deputy consuls, vice consuls, vice commercial agents, and consular agents, and none others. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1150.

The word "consul," when used in the title on foreign relations, shall be understood to mean any person invested by the United States with and exercising the functions of consul general, vice consul general, consul, or vice consul. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2783.

The word "consul" has two meanings. In its more limited sense it denotes an officer of a particular grade in the consular service, but in the second article of the Constitution, authorizing the President to appoint "consuls," the word is used in a broader sense, and denotes all consular officers, of whatever grade. Dainese v. United States, 15 Ct. Cl. 64, 74.

The word "consul," as used in Comp. St. 1899, c. 73, § 6, is understood to mean any person invested by the national government with the functions of consul general, vice consul general, consul, or vice consul. Morris v. Linton, 85 N. W. 565, 566, 61 Neb. 537.

As magistrate.

See "Magistrate."

As public minister.

A consul is neither an ambassador nor a public minister. He is not the representative of his nation, nor is he employed in the management of national concerns. He is no more than a commercial agent attending to individual interests. The law of nations does not exempt a foreign consul from liability to the laws of the state in which he resides. State v. De La Foret (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 217, 218.

Consuls are not public ministers, withir the immunity of ambassadors and public ministers from suits in the courts of the country to which they are sent. Wilcox v. Luco, 50 Pac. 758, 759, 118 Cal. 639, 45 L. R. A. 579, 62 Am. St. Rep. 305.

A consul, though a public agent, is supposed to be clothed with authority only for commercial purposes. He has a right to interpose claims for the restitution of property belonging to the subjects of his own country, but he is not considered as a minister or diplomatic agent of his sovereign, intrusted, by virtue of his office, with authority to represent it in his negotiations with foreign states, or vindicate his prerogatives. The Anne, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 435, 445, 4 L. Ed. 428 (citing 1 Kent, Comm. 43); Seidel v. Peschkaw, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 427, 429. He has not the immunities of an ambassador, but in civil and criminal cases is subject to the local laws in the same manner as other foreign residents, owing temporary allegiance to the state to which he is accredited. Seidel v. Peschkaw, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 427, 429. His sovereign may sufficiently intrust him with such authority, but in such case his diplomatic character is superadded to his ordinary powers, and ought to be recognized by the government within whose domains he assumes to exercise it. The Anne, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 435, 445, 4 L. Ed. 428.

CONSULT—CONSULTING.

In a contract by a doctor to perform the necessary surgical service for the treatment of all injured employes of a railroad company, if required to do so by the chief surgeon as consulting oculist and aurist in any class of cases, "consulting" is a special technical term, and does not include actual treatment and prescriptions given by such doctor. The term "consulting" would include a diagnosis of the case, and advice as to the proper treatment to be pursued while under treatment. It does not require him to perform surgical and medical services for the treatment of persons placed under his care by the chief surgeon. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Graddy, 41 N. W. 809, 810, 25 Neb. 849.

In a postnuptial settlement providing that the trustee may hold the legal title for the wife's sole and separate use, with the absolute right of disposition as she may choose, upon "consultation with and getting advice from the trustee," the words quoted are equivalent to "consent of the trustee." Colyer v. Wheeler, 75 S. W. 1089, 1091, 110 Tenn. 58.

CONSULTING ENGINEER.

In an action against a corporation, where a juror, on his examination, stated that he was consulting engineer of an officer of the defendant corporation, this did not imply that he was a salaried officer of the corporation, but simply that he was a scientific expert, consulted by the corporation occasionally. Coppersmith v. Mound City Ry. Co., 51 Mo. App. 357, 368.

CONSULTATION.

The mere calling into a doctor's office for some medicine to relieve a temporary indisposition, or the calling at the home of the insured by the doctor for the same purpose, cannot be considered a "consultation of a physician," within the meaning of a question in an application for a life insurance policy as to the consultation of a physician. Billings v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 516, 518, 70 Vt. 477.

CONSUME.

"Consume," as used in a will giving testator's wife all his personalty, his son and daughter to take the portion remaining unconsumed at her death, is broad, and implies absolute power of sale in the wife. Cain v. Robertson, 61 N. E. 26, 27, 27 Ind. App. 198.

To "consume" is to destroy, to bring to utter ruin. Webster, Dict. A notice to a fire company by the insured that his house has been consumed is sufficient to show the entire destruction of the insured house. Campbell v. Monmouth Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 59 Me. 430-436.

An indictment alleging that defendant set fire to a barn, by the burning of which a dwelling house was burned and "consumed," does not require the state to show that the substance and fiber of the wood of such portion of the house as was on fire was actually destroyed. It was sufficient to find that some portion of the dwelling house had been actually on fire and burned. Commonwealth v. Tucker, 110 Mass. 403, 404.

CONSUMABLE ARTICLES.

"Consumable" or "perishable" articles are of two classes: (1) Those which are necessarily destroyed in their use, such as corn, hay, etc.; (2) those which are not so much so, as being productive, and the capital kept up by the increase, such as stock of horses, cattle, etc. Patterson v. Devlin (8. C.) McMull. Eq. 459, 466.

CONSUMMATE.

See "Curtesy Consummate."

Where a contract of sale was duly executed, containing conditions for deferred payments and for assuming debts, these sales were "consummated," so as to entitle the agent to commissions for effecting them, although the conditions were never complied with. Micks v. Stevenson, 51 N. E. 492, 493, 22 Ind. App. 475.

CONSUMMATION.

See "Final Consummation."

"Consummation," as applied to a marriage, means the commencement of true and open matrimonial cohabitation. The courts have used the word "consummation" generally as a completion of the marriage relation. It is not necessarily limited to the act of sexual intercourse, but means the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. Sharon v. Sharon, 22 Pac. 26, 37, 79 Cal. 633; Id., 16 Pac. 345, 360, 75 Cal. 1.

The word "consummating," as used in an agreement where a party pledges himself to come to a house for the purpose of consummating a compromise of a suit, means "completing." Hinchman v. Ballard, 7 W. Va. 152, 185.

CONSUMPTION.

It is a matter of common knowledge that consumption is not a disease of the mind, and that ordinarily such disease does not affect the mind of the sufferer, except by sympathy with the weakness of the body. Denny v. Stokes, 72 S. W. 209, 211, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 425.

"Consumption," within the meaning of a question in an application for a life policy whether the applicant's parents, etc., have been afflicted with consumption, scrofula, insanity, epilepsy, disease of the heart, or other hereditary disease, is to be construed only as an inquiry whether such relatives have been afflicted by such disease in a hereditary form, the word "other" in the question plainly indicating that the inquiry is so limited. Gridley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 2, 3.

"Contact with poisonous substances," in an insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for injuries to insured occasioned by contact with poisonous substances, is not limited to such contact resulting from the voluntary and conscious action of plaintiff. Meehan v. Traders' & Travelers' Acc. Co. of New York, 68 N. Y. Supp. 821, 822, 34 Misc. Rep. 158.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASE.

A "contagious" disease is one that is communicated by contact or touch. Stryker v. Crane, 50 N. W. 1132, 1133, 33 Neb. 690.

A "contagious" disease is one that is communicable by contact or bodily exhalation, as distinguished from an "infectious" disease, which originates from a cause acting from hidden influences, like the miasma of prison ships or marshes, or through the pollution of water or the atmosphere, or from the various dejections from animals. The word "contagious," however, is often used in a similar sense with "pestilential" or "poisonous," and is not strictly confined to influences emanating directly from the body. Grayson v. Lynch, 16 Sup. Ct. 1064, 1068, 163 U. S. 468, 41 L. Ed. 230.

A contagious disease may prevail to a greater or less extent and still there be no epidemic. "Contagious" disease simply means one communicable by contact, and the victim of such a disease may be so isolated from others of its species as to render contact and epidemic impossible. Pierce v. Dillingham, 67 N. E. 846, 849, 203 Ill. 148.

In Crim. Code, c. 10, § 76, prohibiting sales of domestic animals infected with contagious or infectious diseases, the words "contagious or infectious" were meant to describe a disease, and not distinctive diseases, though the definition of a standard English author is that "contagious disease" is communicated by contact or touch, and that infection is the subtle or virulent matter proceeding from diseased bodies, and imparting the same to others. Stryker v. Crane, 50 N. W. 1132, 1133, 33 Neb. 690; Wirth v. State, 22 N. W. 860, 862, 63 Wis. 51.

CONTAIN.

See "While Contained In."

Containing by estimation, see "By Estimation."

A statute provided, as a cause for demurrer, "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." A defendant demurred to a complaint for the reason that it did not "contain" facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In demurring to a pleading, it is not necessary to use the exact language of the statute. Other words of equivalent meaning may be employed. The word "contain," though not synonymous, is as broad in its meaning as used in such demurrer as the word "state," for, if a complaint does not "contain" facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, it certainly does not "state" such facts. State v. Younts, 89 Ind. 313, 314; Leach v. Adams (Ind.) 52 N. E. 813, 814.

As warranty of quantity.

The words of a deed describing the length of lines and boundaries, and concluding with the words "containing so many acres," do not import a warranty of quantity. Rickets v. Dickens, 5 N. C. 343, 346, 4 Am. Dec. 555; Powell v. Lyles, 5 N. C. 348, 350.

Where a contract for the sale of land "does not specify the number of acres sold or contracted to be sold, otherwise than by the general words 'containing so many acres,' this could hardly be looked on as a warranty, but rather as matter of description." Russell v. Keeran (Va.) 8 Leigh, 9, 14 (citing Keyton's Adm'r v. Brawford's Ex'rs [Va.] 5 Leigh, 48).

A conveyance of land described by metes and bounds, and said to contain "180 acres strict measure," is to be construed as a mere matter of description, which is subject to the description by metes and bounds; and hence a deficiency of 9 acres in the quantity of land is no breach of the covenants for title. Andrews v. Rue, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 402, 404.

CONTAINED IN.

"Contained," as used in a fire insurance policy insuring certain buildings and household furniture while located and contained as herein described, will not be held to apply to the buildings, but will relate only to personal property in the buildings, so that a removal of additions away from the dwelling does not violate the terms of the policy. Hannon v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 549, 550, 41 App. Div. 226.

The words "contained in," as used in an insurance policy insuring certain personal property, "all while contained in the above-described building," must be construed to limit the insurance to the property while contained in the building described, and not to extend to it while it is contained in any other building. Numerous cases, however, hold that the phrase "contained in," as so used, is descriptive of the place at which the property is located at the time of the insurance, while others hold that the phrase should be construed with reference to the use of the insured property; that is, if its ordinary use causes it to be absent from such place, and if, being so absent, it is destroyed by fire, the property is nevertheless protected by the policy. For such holding, see McCluer v. Girard Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 43 Iowa, 349, 22 Am. Rep. 249; American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Haws (Pa.) 11 Atl. 107; Mills v. Farmers'

Ins. Co., 37 Iowa, 400. But in these cases the terms of the policies were somewhat less definite than that of the one above mentioned, which has such an unequivocal expression as to prevent the application of the above-mentioned doctrine of construction according to use. British America Assur. Co. v. Miller, 44 S. W. 60, 62, 91 Tex. 414, 39 L. R. A. 545, 66 Am. St. Rep. 901.

The phrase "contained in," as used in a fire policy insuring property contained in a certain building, did not include property actually situated in nearby buildings, though they were used in connection with the business carried on in the building specifically covered by the policy. Liebenstein v. Aetna Ins. Co., 45 Ill. App. 303, 305.

In relation to animals.

A fire policy insured horses against loss by fire, "all contained in" assured's barn at a certain place. A lightning clause was attached which insured against any loss or damage caused by lightning to the property insured, subject in all respects to the terms and conditions of the policy. Held, that the words "all contained in," as used in the policy and as applied to the horses, did not imply that they should not be taken from the barn, and if they were they would not be covered by the policy, since such a construction would render the kind of property thus insured practically valueless to its owners; and hence the words should not be construed as limiting the company's liability to lightning causing the death of the horses only while they were in the barn, but covered a death while the horses were being pastured in a field on assured's farm. Haws v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 114 Pa. 431, 434, 7 Atl. 159.

In a policy of insurance on a number of mules, the policy stating them to be all contained in a certain barn, the words "contained in" were employed as matter of description, and not of warranty, and hence the insurance covered the mules, though they were outside of the barn. Holbrook v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 25 Minn. 229, 233.

A policy insured certain horses, describing them specifically, and contained the following clause: "All contained in his new 2-story frame barn situated," etc. It also contained a printed clause whereby the company agreed to indemnify the insured for such loss or damage as should happen by fire to the property so situated and specified. It also contained a condition as follows: "This policy shall be void and of no effect if the property insured be removed to any other building or location than that described herein." Held, that the clause "all contained in his new 2-story frame barn" is not to be construed so that the company will be exempt from liability for the death of one of the animals which occurred by reason of lightning while the animal was not within the barn. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Haws (Pa.) 11 Atl. 107, 110.

In relation to carriages and harness.

A policy of insurance described a phaëton as "contained" in a frame barn, and the phaëton was destroyed by fire while at a carriage shop undergoing repairs. In this case the word "contained" means the same as the word "kept," and meant that when not in use the phaëton was kept in the barn described as its ordinary place of deposit; but it did not mean that the carriage would not be removed from the barn, or that the risk assumed was limited to such time only as it should be in such barn. McCluer v. Girard Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 43 Iowa, 349, 351, 22 Am. Rep. 249.

A policy insuring horses, carriages, etc., "contained in" a certain frame stable building, should be construed to mean that the insurance was in force and insured against such of the articles as were contained in the stable at the time of the loss, and did not authorize a construction which would cover a hack once put into the stable, and then taken out, and burned while in another building for the temporary purpose of repairs. Bradbury v. Norwich Union Fire Ins. Soc., 15 Atl. 34, 36, 80 Me. 396, 6 Am. St. Rep. 219.

In an insurance policy on carriages and harnesses contained in a certain building, the words "contained in" were used to designate the usual place of deposit of the property when not in use or while being prepared for use, and the policy covered the property while at a repair shop, several hundred yards away from the place named, for the purpose of repair. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. v. Elliott, 85 Va. 962, 9 S. E. 694, 695, 17 Am. St. Rep. 115.

In relation to cars and engines.

In a policy of insurance against loss by fire, covering the buildings and certain passenger cars contained in car house No. 1, and an engine contained in engine house No. 2, the words "contained in" were not intended merely as a description of and to identify the property insured, but were a limitation of the risk; and where such engine and cars were destroyed by fire while in regular use by the owner on its road, at a distance from such car and engine house, the insurance company incurred no liability. Annapolis & E. Ry. Co. v. Baltimore Fire Ins. Co., 32 Md. 37, 41, 3 Am. Rep. 112.

In relation to furniture and goods.

Where a policy was issued on articles of furniture described as "contained in" a certain house, the phrase "contained in" was used in a descriptive sense, and not as a warranty that the furniture was to remain there; and hence, on a loss of such furniture after having been removed to another house, the insurer was liable. Lyons v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 14 R. I. 109, 111, 51 Am. Rep. 364; Lyons v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 13 R. I. 347, 349, 43 Am. Rep. 32.

In a policy insuring a "stock of goods, such as are generally kept in a country store, contained in" a certain described building, the term "contained in" limits the risk to the time the goods remain in the same building in which they were when the policy was issued. They constitute a restriction upon the risk, and make it continue only so long as the goods remained in that particular building. Maryland Fire Ins. Co. v. Gusdorf, 43 Md. 506, 512.

In relation to machinery.

A fire policy was on machinery, consisting of cards, pickers, etc., contained in the first story of a four-story and basement brick building. The pickers were in a one-story building, the floor being on a level with the four-story building, with bricks joining into the main building, entering from it through a frame building adjoining, and then through a large iron door, "as if going from the house into the kitchen." There were no pickers except in the one-story building. Held, that the words "first story" included the picker room. Meadowcroft v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 61 Pa. (11 P. F. Smith) 91, 94.

In relation to wearing apparel.

"Contained in," as used in a policy of insurance on personal property described as "contained in" a frame dwelling house, was not a warranty that all of the articles should always remain in the dwelling house, so as to preclude a recovery for loss of such articles while temporarily absent therefrom. Thus, where one of the articles insured under such a policy was a fur dolman intended for outdoor wear, the policy covered a loss of the same by fire in the shop of a furrier, where it had been sent for repairs. Noyes v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 64 Wis. 419, 421, 25 N. W. 415, 419, 54 Am. Rep. 631.

A policy of insurance on wearing apparel described the property as "contained in" a house on a certain lot in a city. Held, that the policy contemplated that the wearing apparel might be used in the ordinary way, and that the words "contained in" meant that the house was to be regarded merely as a place of deposit when the apparel was not in ordinary use, and hence that the company was liable for its loss by fire while being worn outside of the house. Longueville v. Western Assur. Co., 2 N. W. 394, 51 Iowa, 553, 33 Am. Rep. 146.

Where a policy insured wearing apparel "contained in a certain building," though the words "contained in," etc., must be construed in accordance with the nature of the article insured, and therefore would not require the property to be continuously kept in the place designated, which would be inconsistent with its use, the condition nevertheless required that the property should be kept in the place designated when not in use, and therefore it was not covered by the policy where it was taken by the insured to another town on her temporary removal thereto. Towne v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 27 Ill. App. 433, 437.

CONTEMNOR.

The name "contemnor" is used to designate a person guilty of contempt of court. Wyatt v. People, 28 Pac. 961, 963, 17 Colo. 252.

CONTEMPLEATE.

The primary signification of the word "contemplate" is to "consider attentively," or "meditate." A secondary meaning of the word is "to intend," and in ordinary conversation the word is frequently used as a synonym for the word "intend"; that is, to express a well-formed purpose. The word has been held to be synonymous with the words "expect" or "intend." Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 151, 167, 19 L. Ed. 90; Jones v. Howland, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 877, 41 Am. Dec. 525. As used in Rev. St. 1889, § 5955, providing that in all suits on policies of life insurance it shall be no defense that the insured "contemplated" suicide at the time he made application for the policy, it is equivalent to "intended" or "had resolved," and it is not sufficient to show that the insured at the time of his application had "considered" the subject of suicide. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Florida (U. S.) 69 Fed. 932, 935, 16 C. C. A. 618, 30 L. R. A. 87.

Agreement imported.

A deed of land, bounding on the passageway, two rods wide, which is to be laid out between the premises and land of A., the grantor to make and maintain all the fences between the said "contemplated passageway" and the premises, shows the agreement of the parties that there should be such a passageway as distinctly as if it had been already laid out, and has a like effect, by way of covenant and estoppel, as a description of a way already laid out. Tufts v. City of Charleston, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 271, 273.

Foreseen distinguished.

The word "contemplated," as used in a statement that a lessor should have contemplated the condition of the premises on which a third person was injured, means more than "foreseen," the latter word indicating that such lessor might regard many things as likely to happen for which he would not have to answer. The word "contemplated" means that he should have known of the probability of things likely to happen for which he would be responsible. Oxford v. Leathe, 43 N. E. 92, 93, 165 Mass. 254.

CONTEMPLATION OF ASSIGNMENT.

Sayles' Civ. St. art. 65, § 9, declares that all property conveyed or transferred by the assignor previous to and "in contemplation of the assignment" shall pass to the assignee, notwithstanding the transfer. Held, that the phrase "in contemplation of the assignment" means that the transfer must have been executed or a preference given with the intent then formed to make the assignment, and it will not be sufficient that the assignor at the time had the assignment under consideration. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Kaufman, 8 S. W. 283, 286, 77 Tex. 131.

CONTEMPLATION OF BANKRUPTCY.

"Contemplation of bankruptcy," as used in Bankr. Act 1867, making void any preference given by a creditor in contemplation of bankruptcy, means that the preferred creditor should know of the debtor's insolvency, or should co-operate with him to obtain the priority. Peckham v. Burrows (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 85, 89.

Within the meaning of 1 Rev. St. pt. 1, c. 18, tit. 4, § 4, which declares it unlawful for any incorporated company to make any "transfer or assignment in contemplation of the insolvency" of such company to any person, and declares such transfer or assignment to be utterly void, includes a transfer or assignment in contemplation of existing insolvency, as well as a transfer or an assignment made in contemplation or anticipation of future insolvency. It means merely a transfer or assignment because of existing or anticipated insolvency. It is not enough that the insolvency and the act of transfer or assignment coexist. Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co., 94 N. Y. 334, 339.

The phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy," as used in U. S. Bankr. Act 1841, providing that all payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, etc., made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, etc., shall be void, means that the payment or delivery must be with the intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy. It is not sufficient that it should be made in contemplation of insolvency. Jones v. Howland, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 377, 384, 41 Am. Dec. 525.

As an act of bankruptcy.

Rev. St. § 5110, subd. 9, providing that no discharge shall be granted a bankrupt if he has, "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt," made any pledge, payment, transfer, assignment, or conveyance of any part of his property for the purpose of defrauding any creditor or person having a claim against him, or being relieved of the satisfaction of his debt, means a transfer in contemplation of committing an act of bankruptcy. Such a transfer is in itself an act of bankruptcy if made with intention to cover up his property from his creditors and to prevent its distribution among them, and the fact "that the bankrupt did not then intend or expect to go into bankruptcy" does not relieve the transfer from being construed as done in "contemplation of becoming bankrupt," within the meaning of the statute. In re Duff (U. S.) 4 Fed. 519-522.

Bankr. Act 1867 (14 Stat. 518) § 39, providing that any person who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in "contemplation of bankruptcy" or insolvency, shall give any warrant to confess judgment or procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process with intent to give a preference, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, means in contemplation of committing what was made by the act an "act of bankruptcy." In re Craft (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 701, 702.

As condition of insolvency.

The words "in contemplation of bankruptcy" are not necessarily limited to acts done which would per se be acts for which the party might or would be declared a bankrupt under the bankrupt laws, but which must and would produce on his part a state of bankruptcy, in which he might become the proper subject of the bankrupt law. Mr. Justice Parke, in Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 B. & Ald. 289, says: "The meaning of these words I take to be that the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankrupt." Mr. Justice Patteson said: "The recent cases have gone to a great length, but they seem to have proceeded on the principle that if a party be insolvent at the time when he makes a payment or a delivery, and afterwards becomes bankrupt, he must be deemed to have contemplated bankruptcy at the time when he made the payment; but I think this is not correct, for a man may be insolvent and yet not contemplate bankruptcy." The general conclusion from the English cases seems to be that a conveyance by a person to one knowing himself to be insolvent to one creditor with a design of giving him a preference over the other creditors in the event of his own expected bankruptcy, was in itself a bankruptcy as a fraud upon the bankrupt act. But whether it be so or not, under those laws it is a natural, if not the necessary, intention deducible from the whole structure and policy of the bankrupt laws of the United States. Arnold v. Maynard (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 1181, 1183; Hutchins v. Taylor (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 1079, 1081; Wakeman v. Hoyt (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1350, 1351; Ashby v. Steere (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 15, 18; Atkinson v. Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 100.

Bankr. Act 1841, c. 9, providing that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given, by any bankrupt in "contemplation of bankruptcy," for the purpose of giving a preference to one not a bona fide creditor or purchaser, without notice, shall be void, is not limited to and does not mean contemplation on the part of the bankrupt of committing an act of bankruptcy, within the terms of the act, for which his creditor might proceed against him in invitum, or his own contemplation of voluntarily taking the benefit of the act, but it means contemplation of a state of bankruptcy or known insolvency and inability to carry on his business, and a stoppage of his business. "In other words, that he contemplated a breaking up and failure and stoppage of his trade or business, and thus to become, in the sense of the old law, a 'bankrupt,' or one whose trade in business is broken up, his counter or table being, in a figurative sense, bankus ruptus." Morse v. Godfrey (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 854, 862; Everett v. Stone (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 898, 901. As used in Bankr. Act 1841, c. 9, referring to acts done in "contemplation of bankruptcy," it has often been adjudged to mean contemplation of an insolvency and inability of the debtor to pay his debts, and also a contemplation of a total stoppage and destruction of his business consequent thereon. Winsor v. Kendall (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 320, 322; In re Smith, 13 Rep. 296, 297.

Bankr. Act 1841, providing that assignments made in "contemplation of bankruptcy" should be void, does not mean that there was in the bankrupt's mind an actual intention of becoming a bankrupt. If his pecuniary condition or act committed was such that he could not reasonably avoid becoming a bankrupt, the law considers him as acting in contemplation of bankruptcy. In re Smith (U. S.) 9 Fed. 592, 593; In re Smith, 13 Rep. 296, 297. The paramount question is, what was the pecuniary condition of the bankrupt when the gift was made? If one who is not insolvent makes a gift and shortly afterwards fails, but his failure can be traced to other causes, he will not be held to have made the gift in contemplation of bankruptcy, and so to have forfeited his right to his discharge. In re Smith, 13 Rep. 296, 297.

Bankr. Act 1841, § 2, making void all conveyances in "contemplation of bankruptcy," means conveyances made by one who is insolvent, and knows it, and expects to stop payment. Jones v. Howland, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 377, 385, 41 Am. Dec. 525.

Within the statute providing that all conveyances, etc., made or given by any bankrupt in "contemplation of bankruptcy," and for the purpose of giving any person a preference or priority over his general creditors, not made to a bona fide creditor or purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, shall be deemed utterly void the phrase "'contemplation of bankruptcy' does not mean a contemplation of applying for the benefit of a bankrupt law, or a proceeding in a court of bankruptcy, but a contemplation of the breaking up of one's business, or an inability to continue it. A knowledge of such a derangement of one's affairs as would prevent a party from carrying on his business is a contemplation of bankruptcy; not mere insolvency, for a party may be insolvent and not know it, and yet payments made or securities given by him not be in contemplation of bankruptcy, if at the time he fully expected to continue his business and retrieve his losses; but if he did not expect this, or if the derangement of his affairs was such as to make the inability to continue his business highly probable, then the act was 'in contemplation of bankruptcy' within the meaning of the bankrupt law." Atkinson v. Farmers' Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 100.

As proceedings in bankruptcy.

"Contemplation of bankruptcy," as used in reference to the conveyance of property by a bankrupt, means that the property must have been conveyed by the debtor in contemplation of a decree adjudging him a bankrupt, or an act of bankruptcy on an application by himself to be decreed a bankrupt, and cannot be construed as meaning a mere state of insolvency. Buskingham v. McLain, 13 How. 150, 167; In re Hanibel (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 431.

The words "contemplation of bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act in relation to the bankrupt's right to be discharged, meant contemplation on his part of becoming a bankrupt on his voluntary petition, or of doing an act or acts which will enable his creditors to obtain an adjudication against him. The contemplation merely of a condition of insolvency is not enough. In re Carmichael (U. S.) 96 Fed. 594, 596; In re Hirsch (U. S.) 96 Fed. 468, 477.

A debtor cannot be said to be "in contemplation of bankruptcy" at a time when no bankruptcy law is in existence, although a bill for a bankruptcy statute is then pending before Congress, and the debtor expects to take the benefit of it if it should become a law. In re Hirsch (U. S.) 96 Fed. 468, 477.

CONTEMPLATION OF DEATH.

The term "transfer of property in contemplation of death," in the transfer tax law, c. 908, providing that taxes shall be imposed on the transfer of property made in contemplation of death, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, refers to a gift causa mortis. In re Cornell's Estate, 73 N. Y. Supp. 32, 36, 66 App. Div. 162.

Within the meaning of the statutes imposing a tax on any transfer of property made in contemplation of death of the grantor, the conveyance by a man 72 years of age, not in good health, though then recovering from an illness, of the principal part of his property, to relatives who were required to, and did, give bonds to pay to him annually during his life in sums equal to or exceeding the income from the property so conveyed, the conveyance of such property taking effect immediately, and there being no power of revocation reserved, was not made "in contemplation of death," and was not subject to such tax. In re Edger-ton's Estate, 54 N. Y. Supp. 700, 703, 35 App. Div. 125.

This court has held that the words "in contemplation of death," as used in Gen. Tax Laws, § 220, subd. 3, imposing a transfer tax when the transfer is of property made in contemplation of death of the grantor or vendor, do not refer to that general expectation which every mortal entertains, but rather the apprehension which arises from some existing condition of body or some impending peril. In re Baker's Estate, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, 391, 83 App. Div. 530 (citing In re Spaulding's Estate, 49 App. Div. 541, 63 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed 163 N. Y. 607, 57 N. E. 1124).

CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

A statute which forbids any transfer or assignment of the property of a debtor "in contemplation of insolvency" does not refer merely to acts done in anticipation of insolvency—that is, in view of a future state of things expected or contemplated to take place after the act is done—but also includes assignments made in view or contemplation of present existing or contemplated insolvency. Robinson v. Bank of Attica, 21 N. Y. 406, 411. As used in Rev. St. 603, § 4, declaring a disposition of property "in contemplation of insolvency" unlawful and void, it does not mean simply an insolvency existing as a fact, but, to come within the prohibition of the statute, the act must be done with knowledge and because of existing or contemplated insolvency. Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co., 94 N. Y. 334, 338; Heroy v. Kerr, 21 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Bosw.) 194, 200; New Britain Nat. Bank v. A. B. Cleveland Co., 36 N. Y. Supp. 387, 391.

"Contemplation of insolvency," as used in 2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) 600, § 4, declaring transfers by corporations in contemplation of insolvency to be void, must also mean something more than mere expectation of its occurrence. It must include provision against its result, so far as the transferee is concerned, and that can only be applicable where he is already a creditor, and the object is to take his debt out of the equal ratable distribution of the assets of the company when insolvent. Heroy v. Kerr (N. Y.) 21 How. Prac. 409, 420. It must include provision against its results so far as a transferee is concerned, and that can only be applicable where he is already a creditor, and the object is to take his debt out of the equal ratable distribution of the assets of the company when insolvent. New Britain Nat. Bank v. A. B. Cleveland Co., 36 N. Y. Supp. 387, 391, 91 Hun, 447; Heroy v. Kerr, 21 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Bosw.) 194, 200.

If a debtor at any time, from the state of his circumstances, contemplates that he will not be thenceforth able to pay his debts as they mature, he "contemplates insolvency" within the meaning of the bankruptcy act. In re Dibblee (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 651, 654.

"Contemplation of insolvency," as used in Laws 1883, c. 349, § 2, providing that every sale, mortgage, hypothecation, lien, or other security given by any insolvent within 60 days prior to the making of any assignment for the benefit of creditors, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, means in contemplation of availing himself of the benefits of the state insolvent laws. Anstedt v. Bentley, 21 N. W. 807, 809, 61 Wis. 629.

Rev. St. c. 18, art. 1, §§ 7-9, prohibited any assignment or transfer, "in contemplation of insolvency," with an intent to prefer any particular creditor. Held, that an insurance company could not be said to act in contemplation of insolvency merely because the sums insured exceeded its capital. Holbrook v. Bassett, 18 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Bosw.) 147, 171.

Assignment for benefit of creditors.

An assignment by an insolvent debtor of all his property in trust for the benefit of all his creditors is not an assignment in "contemplation of insolvency," within the meaning of a statute declaring assignments made to any person in contemplation of insolvency void. Haxton v. Bishop (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 13, 17.

Transactions in due course of business.

The New York insolvent act, declaring that any transfer or conveyance, etc., made "in contemplation of insolvency," shall be void, does not include a mortgage executed by a corporation, after its insolvency, in pursuance of an agreement to secure advances made before there was any expectation of insolvency. Brower v. Husted, 21 N. Y. Supp. 324, 325, 66 Hun, 631.

An act done by a corporation in the ordinary and usual course of business, uninfluenced by the state of its affairs, cannot be said to have been done "in contemplation of insolvency." Thus, when a national bank indebted to another bank makes the remittances to it by mail in the ordinary course of business, if made in good faith, the latter may apply them to cancel the indebtedness, though the remitting bank fails before they are received. A bank or a business concern may be considered as acting in contemplation of insolvency when, in making some disposition of its assets, it is actuated by some knowledge of its insolvency. Hayden v. Chemical National Bank (U. S.) 84 Fed. 874, 876, 28 C. C. A. 548.

CONTEMPORANEOUS.

"Contemporaneous," as used in the statement that circumstances and declarations which are contemporaneous with the main fact under consideration are competent evidence as res gestæ, does not mean perfect coincidence of time between the declaration and the main fact. "It is enough that the two are substantially contemporaneous. They need not be literally so. The declaration must, however, be so proximate in point of time as to grow out of, elucidate, and explain the character and quality of the main fact, and must be so closely connected with it as to virtually constitute but one entire transaction, and to receive support and credit from the principal act sought to be elucidated and explained. The evidence offered must not have the earmarks of a device or afterthought, nor be merely narrative of a transaction which is really and substantially passed." Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hawk, 72 Ala. 112, 117, 47 Am. Rep. 403.

The rule of "contemporaneous exposition" is thus expressed: "When the language of an act is doubtful in its meaning, and cannot be made plain by the help of any other part of the same statute, or of any act in pari materia which may be read with it or in the course of the common law up to the time of its passing, the court may consider what was the construction put upon the act when it first came into operation." Dissenting opinion of Magie, J., in State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 1, 47.

"Contemporaneous," as used in a statement that memoranda are inadmissible to refresh the memory of a witness unless contemporaneous with the transaction about which witness is testifying, has apparently a very unsettled meaning. In Wood v. Cooper, 1 Car. & K. 646, a witness was allowed to look at his examination before commissioners in bankruptcy, signed by him, given within a fortnight of the time of the happening of certain occurrences, and when the facts were fresh in his memory. So, in State v. Colwell, 3 R. I. 132, a witness was allowed to refer to a memorandum made a day or two after a previous trial, when an interval of about eight days had elapsed from the time when the occurrence transpired concerning which the witness gave testimony. In Billingslea v. State, 85 Ala. 323, 5 South. 137, it was held proper to allow a witness to refresh his recollection by resort to the minutes of statements made to a grand jury within a week after the occurrence about which he was being interrogated. In Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 15 Md. 54, 74 Am. Dec. 555, it was held that a witness, who, five months after the occurrence of certain facts, and at the request of a party interested, made a statement in writing and swore to it, could not be allowed to testify to his belief in its correctness. Putnam v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 923, 927, 162 U. S. 687, 40 L. Ed. 1118.

CONTEMPT.

See "Civil Contempt"; "Consequential Contempt"; "Constructive Contempt"; "Criminal Contempt"; "Direct Contempt"; "Indirect Contempt"; "Private Contempt."

The principal ingredient of the definition of "contempt" is disregard of the authority of the court. It is provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 584, that certain stated acts or omissions are contempt of the authority of the court. Definitions taken from works of authority are as follows: "A willful disregard of or disobedience of a public authority." "Disrespect; willful disregard of the authority of a court or legislature." In re MacKnight, 27 Pac. 336, 338, 11 Mont. 126, 28 Am. St. Rep. 451 (citing Bouvier's and Anderson's Law Dicts.).

"Contempts" may be classified as contempts in the face of the court, and contemptuous words or writings concerning the court. 2 Hawk. P. C. 220. Territory v. Murray, 15 Pac. 145, 147, 7 Mont. 251.

"Blackstone says that contempt of court may be committed by speaking or writing contemptuously of the court or judges, acting in their judicial capacity, and by anything that demonstrates a gross want of that regard and respect which, once courts of justice are deprived of, their authority is entirely lost among the people." Territory v. Murray, 15 Pac. 145, 148, 7 Mont. 251; Kissel v. Lewis, 61 N. E. 209, 210, 27 Ind. App. 302.

"Contempt" is a disobedience of the rules and orders of a court, which has power to punish such offense. Contempts may arise by contemptuous behavior in the face of the court, or by disobedience to some rule, right, or process. Welch v. Barber, 52 Conn. 147, 156, 52 Am. Rep. 567.

"The Practical Register defines a 'contempt' to be a disobedience to the court, or an opposing order despising the authority, justice, and dignity thereof. Sometimes it arises from one or more opposing and disturbing the execution or service of the process of the court, and using force to the party that serves it." Conover v. Wood (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 84, 89.

"Contempts" were classified in City of Newport v. Newport Line Co., 92 Ky. 445, 17 S. W. 435, as follows: "Those which are in facie curiæ, or direct, or those which are constructive or consequential; or, as stated by some writers, civil or criminal." Nienaber v. Tarvin, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 451, 454, 46 S. W. 513, 515, 104 Ky. 149 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 284; Rap. "Contempts").

"Contempt" is a disobedience of the court by acting in opposition to the authority, justice, or dignity thereof. It commonly consists in a party doing otherwise than he is enjoined to do, or not doing what is commanded or required by the order or decree of the court, in all which cases the party disobeying is liable to be attached and committed for the contempt. Lyon v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 185, 198.

A "contempt" is an offense against a court as an organ of justice, and a court can rightfully punish it on summary conviction, whether the same act be punishable as a crime or misdemeanor on indictment or not. Yates v. Lansing (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 395, 417, 6 Am. Dec. 290.

Besides the various classes of contempts which are known to the common law of England and particularly described, and besides those relating to officers and others connected with the courts concerning which the law is plain and explicit, there are many which are claimed to be exclusively within the discretion of the court. The belief in the existence of such is alone in the breast of the court. They may be construed to spring from a gesture, a word, or a look. The offense is without specification and without definition. It may become an offense of opinion, of feeling, or of prejudice, an offense which has no other legislation than the imperfections of human nature, blinded and misled by the circumstances of the moment, notion of caprice, and the improper bias of passion, or by those powerful influences from which the most upright and enlightened mind cannot be considered or trusted to be wholly exempt. Ex parte Hickey, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 751, 774.

In treating of the subject of "Contempt," Bishop in his work on Criminal Law (volume 2 [7th Ed.] § 243) says: "No court of justice could accomplish the object of its existence unless it could in some way preserve order and enforce its mandates and decrees. The common method of doing these things is by the process of contempt. Therefore the power to proceed thus is incident to every judicial tribunal, derived from its very constitution, without any express statutory aid." The decisions of this court have approved and adhered to this doctrine. Fishback v. State, 30 N. E. 1088, 1090, 181 Ind. 304, 318.

In Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 395, the Supreme Court says: "Contempts are either direct, such as are offered to the court while sitting as such, and in its presence, or constructive, being offered not in its presence, but tending by their operation to obstruct and embarrass or prevent the due administration of justice." Erskine, in a letter to a member of the bar, very clearly stated the general principle: "Every act which tends to frustrate the mandates of a court of justice is a contempt of its authority. But I may venture to lay down this distinct and absolute limitation of the process of the court, namely, that it can only issue in cases where the court which issues it has awarded some process, given some judgment, made some legal order, or done some act which the party against whom it issues, or other on whom it is binding, have either neglected to obey, contumaciously refused to submit to, incited others to defeat by artifice or force, or treated with terms of contumely and disrespect in the face of the court." Gandy v. State, 13 Neb. 445, 449, 14 N. W. 143, 145 (citing 27 Howell, St. Tr. 1019).

Contempt of judge distinguished.

The term "contempt of court," and not "contempt of the judge," is applicable to a violation of a final decree creating a permanent injunction rendered by a special judge, and therefore such judge has no authority to punish such contempt. Kissel v. Lewis, 61 N. E. 209, 210, 27 Ind. App. 302.

As criminal offense.

Proceedings for contempt, prosecuted to preserve the power and vindicate the dignity of the court, and to punish for the disobedience of their orders, are criminal and punitive in their nature, and the government, the courts, and the people are interested in their prosecution. In re Nevitt (U. S.) 117 Fed. 448, 458, 54 C. C. A. 622.

A contempt of court is a quasi criminal offense against the court, for which a party may be fined and imprisoned as for a specific criminal offense, but it is not a "misdemeanor" in the strict sense of the term. In re Fil Kl, 22 Pac. 146, 147, 80 Cal. 201 (citing Ex parte Ah Men, 19 Pac. 380, 77 Cal. 198, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263; New Orleans v. New York Mail & S. Co., 87 U. S. [20 Wall.] 387, 392, 22 L. Ed. 354).

Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. But what class of criminal offenses "contempt" belongs to is nowhere defined. It may be punished by a fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, and there is no limit placed to the extent of either. So that a contempt incurred by violating an order of court prohibiting any one from interfering with the receivers of a railway with its operation is a criminal offense. In re Acker (U. S.) 86 Fed. 290, 292.

Contempt is in the nature of a criminal offense, and is so punished under Kentucky statutes, being placed in the chapter regulating crimes and punishments. The power to hear and determine this offense, and fix the punishment of it by fine or imprisonment, is necessarily a judicial power, which neither the mayor of a city nor the chairman of the board of trustees of a town can exercise. Roberts v. Hackney, 58 S. W. 810, 811, 109 Ky. 265.

Contempt of the court is a specific criminal offense, and a proceeding for contempt is in the nature of a criminal offense, and to be governed by the strict rules of construction which prevail in criminal cases. In re Reese (U. S.) 107 Fed. 942, 947, 47 C. C. A. 87 (citing Vanzandt v. Argentine Min. Co. [U. S.] 48 Fed. 770).

A contempt not committed in presence of the court is denominated by law as a "constructive contempt." It is a criminal offense, for which the punishment may be imprisonment without limit of duration, and one charged with it has the same inalienable right to be heard in his defense that he would if charged with murder or any other crime. Boyd v. Glucklich (U. S.) 116 Fed. 131, 134, 53 C. C. A. 451 (citing McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; State ex rel. De Buys v. Judges of Civil District Court, 32 La. Ann. 1256; In re Reese [U. S.] 47 C. C. A. 87, 107 Fed. 942).

Contempt of court is of two kinds: That which is committed in open court, and that which is committed out of the view and hearing of the court. For the punishment of the first by commitment and fine, no proceeding need be contradictorily with the offender; but for the punishment of the latter by the same means, the offender must be allowed to offer evidence and argument in his defense, otherwise any judgment which the court may pronounce will be absolutely void. Rapalje on Contempts, § 111. Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense, and a party charged therewith, though the proceeding is more or less summary in character, has the same inalienable right to be heard in his defense as he would against a charge of murder or any other crime. McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 51 Pac. 696, 698, 119 Cal. 413, 39 L. R. A. 691.

Proceeding for contempt is of two kinds: First, to punish the contemptuous conduct of the persons with respect to the authority and dignity of the court; second, as a method of affording relief inter partes. The first is a proceeding of a criminal nature, instituted by the court of its own motion, heard by it in a summary manner, and punishable by imprisonment until the contempt be purged, or by a fine payable to the state. The second is set on foot at the instance of parties aggrieved. Such a proceeding is remedial in its nature, and the relief afforded is by imprisonment until the party adjudged in contempt does justice to his adversary. Proceedings in contempt instituted by a petition of depositors in a savings bank, setting out the orders of the chancellor for the investment of the funds of the institution, and that the managers made investments in disregard of these orders, and that in consequence of the loss sustained thereby the institution became insolvent, in which answers were filed by the managers and testimony taken by commission, was a proceeding for contempt of the second class, and as such appealable. Dodd v. Una, 5 Atl. 155, 165, 40 N. J. Eq. 672.

A contempt of court is quasi criminal in its nature, and therefore an appeal from a sentence of fine and costs for contempt is not limited by Rev. St. § 5649, providing that the Supreme Court has not jurisdiction of appeals if the amount of the judgment is less than $300. Brimson v. State, 58 N. E. 803, 804, 63 Ohio St. 347.

In State ex rel. Van Orden v. Sauvinet, 24 La. Ann. 119, 18 Am. Rep. 115, Judge Taliaferro said: "A contempt of court is an offense against the state, and not against the judge personally." Again, in Ex parte Hickey, the court said: "The whole doctrine of contempt goes to the point that the offense is a wrong to the public, not to the person or the functionary to whom it is offered, considered merely as an individual." Const. art. 3, § 1, provides that the Governor "shall have power to grant pardons after conviction," etc. A judgment imposing a fine for contempt is a conviction. Therefore the Governor has the right to pardon a person committed for contempt. Sharp v. State, 49 S. W. 752, 753, 102 Tenn. 9, 43 L. R. A. 788, 73 Am. St. Rep. 851.

Contempt is an offense against the court as an organ of public justice. And the court can rightfully punish on a summary conviction, whether the same act be punishable as a crime or misdemeanor on indictment or not. A conviction on indictment will not purge the contempt, nor will a conviction for contempt be a bar to an indictment. Yates v. Lansing (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 395, 417, 6 Am. Dec. 290.

The idea of criminality, existing in the willful disobedience of orders and decrees made in the administration of justice, is so far a necessary ingredient of everything which is called a "contempt" that every contempt may be said to be a criminal contempt. Therefore it is said that proceedings to punish contempts are criminal proceedings. Under these principles the imprisonment of a constable until the payment of a fine levied by a justice for failure to serve process is authorized as a punishment for contempt, and does not constitute imprisonment for debt, although the fine inures to the benefit of the party injured by the refusal to serve the process. Ex parte Robertson, 11 S. W. 669, 670, 27 Tex. App. 628, 11 Am. St. Rep. 207.

Disrespectful language.

The employment of language by counsel in an appellate court, which is manifestly disrespectful toward a judge of an inferior court, is contempt of the appellate court. Friedlander v. Sumner Gold & Silver Min. Co., 61 Cal. 116, 117.

As felony.

See "Felony."

Pleadings.

"Contempt" is defined by Code, § 14, subd. 2, as any disdain or abuse of a mandate or proceeding of the court. A false answer does not constitute a contempt. Fromme v. Gray, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1107, 1108, 14 Misc. Rep. 592.

The mere drafting by an attorney of a petition by persons not parties to a cause, asking in respectful language a new trial, is not contempt. State v. Hansford, 28 S. E. 791, 792, 43 W. Va. 773.

Refusal to testify.

Contempt of court is a disobedience to the rules or orders of the court, which interferes with the due administration of the law. A refusal of a witness to answer any question which he may be lawfully required to answer is a contempt of court, and if he persists in the refusal he may be punished accordingly. Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 385, 45 N. E. 728. Thus a physician who has been subpoenaed, and is interrogated as an expert witness only, may be punished as for a contempt for refusing to testify, when no compensation greater than that allowed an ordinary witness has been paid or promised him, the fees prescribed in Rev. St. c. 53, § 47, being the only fees provided for by statute. Dixon v. People, 48 N. E. 108, 110, 168 Ill. 179, 39 L. R. A. 116.

Contempt of court is the refusal of a witness to testify at all, or to answer particular questions pertinent to the issue, before a court having jurisdiction of the controversy or proceedings in which the witness is required to give the evidence, he being competent, and is an offense against the state, and not an offense against the judge. Rudd v. Darling, 25 Atl. 479, 481, 64 Vt. 456.

CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS.

As an action, see "Action."

As civil action or suit, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

As criminal case, see "Criminal Case or Cause."

As remedy, see "Remedy."

As special proceeding, see "Special Proceeding."

In Ex parte Robinson, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 505, 22 L. Ed. 205, "contempt" is defined as an act in disrespect of a court or its process, and which obstructs the administration of justice or tends to bring the court into disrepute. In People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 163, it is said: "All acts which impede, embarrass, or obstruct a court or tend to produce such effects, whether done in or out of court, are to be considered as done in the presence of the court, and are contempts." State v. Hansford, 28 S. E. 791, 792, 43 W. Va. 773.

CONTENT.

An expression that "I am content to give" amounts to as much as "I promise to pay," and either the action of debt or covenant would lie thereon. Douglas v. Hennessy, 10 Atl. 583, 584, 15 R. L. 272 (citing Anon., 3 Leon. 119).

CONTENTION.

The word "contention" is employed in the English courts as a synonym for "point" or "proposition." Orvis v. Jennings (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 434, 446.

Strife.

The word "contention" in Gen. St. tit. 12, § 123, making it a crime to disturb or break the peace, or stir up and provoke contention and strife, by following and mocking any person, etc., does not necessarily imply blows. It may be evidenced by passionate looks, words, and gestures. Thus, the use of abusive language towards another was held to be a stirring up of contention and strife within the meaning of the act. State v. Warner, 34 Conn. 276, 279.

CONTENTIOUS.

"Contentious," as used in the statement of the rule that the possession necessary to give rise to a title by prescription must be a contentious one, means "opposition on good grounds." Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. McFarlan, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 605, 621.

CONTENTS.

Of account or note.

The "contents" of a note is the sum it shows to be due, and the same may be said without much violence to language of an account, and is so used in the judiciary act of 1789, declaring that no federal court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit could have been prosecuted in such court to recover the contents if no assignment had been made. Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1269.

The "contents" of a note is the sum it shows to be due, and the same may, without much violence to language, be said of an account. Sere v. Pitot, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 332, 335, 3 L. Ed. 240. The "contents" of a note is the amount it shows to be due, and the same may be said of an account. North American Transportation & Trading Co. v. Morrison, 20 Sup. Ct. 869, 872, 178 U. S. 262, 44 L. Ed. 1061; Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 193, 195.

In relation to commercial instruments, such as promissory notes, acceptances, and bonds, the sum promised to be paid is familiarly spoken of as the "contents." Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 193, 195.

In the eleventh section of the judiciary act, which provides that no district or circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, the word "contents," as employed with reference to promissory notes and similar writings, designates the specific sums named therein, and payable by the terms of the instruments themselves. Barney v. Globe Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 894, 897.

Rev. St. § 629 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 503], provides that no circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in case of foreign bills of exchange. Held, that the "contents" of a contract or chose in action, in the sense in which the term is used in section 629, are the rights created by it in favor of a party in whose behalf stipulations are made in it which he has a right to enforce in a suit founded on the contract, and therefore a suit to recover such stipulations is a suit to recover such contents. Corbin v. Black Hawk County, 105 U. S. 859, 665, 26 L. Ed. 1136; Republic Iron Min. Co.

v. Jones (U. S.) 37 Fed. 721, 723, 2 L. R. A. 746.

Of building or house.

A policy of insurance insured a granary and its contents, a barn and its contents, and a toolhouse and its contents, wherever situate. It was contended that the word "contents," when used in a policy which was not a shifting policy, was used as synonymous with the words "being in or stored in," and imparted sufficient description to the property, the use of which necessitated its temporary absence from the building, and that the word was used merely to indicate their place of deposit when not temporarily absent in the ordinary course. But the court held that such word should be confined to the property in the barn or insured building at the time of the loss (citing Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Kryder, 81 N. E. 851, 5 Ind. App. 430), and hence the policy did not cover property removed and placed in another building on the premises. Benton v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 60 N. W. 691, 102 Mich. 281, 26 L. R. A. 237.

"Contents," as used in a fire policy insuring a barn and butcher shop as one building for a certain amount, the contents for a certain amount, a smokehouse for a certain amount, and its contents for a certain amount, is not a certain and definite description of any particular class of goods. Its meaning must be ascertained by considering the context, the nature and methods of the business for which the building whose contents are to be insured is to be used, and the understanding and intentions of the parties as expressed at the time the insurance was contracted for. Graybill v. Penn Tp. Mut. Fire Ins. Ass'n, 32 Atl. 632, 633, 170 Pa. 75, 29 L. R. A. 55, 50 Am. St. Rep. 747.

Where a fire policy is issued on the contents of a certain building, the word "contents" does not cover the property in the building at the time the policy was issued after such property has been removed from the building. Shertzer v. Mutual Fire Ins. Co. of Hartford County, 46 Md. 506, 509; Benton v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 60 N. W. 691, 693, 102 Mich. 281, 26 L. R. A. 237.

The phrase "contents of a house" in a will devising the house, its furniture, and all contents thereof, does not include a safe in the house, containing securities, but the word is to be limited in its meaning by the word "furniture" to only include property of a similar kind. The rule, in brief, as well stated by the learned justice who decided the recent case of Ludwig v. Bungart, 67 N. Y. Supp. 177, 33 Misc. Rep. 177, holding that money and jewelry were not included, is that in the construction of wills, when certain things are mentioned or enumerated in a bequest, followed in the same clause by a more general description, that description is taken only to cover things of a like kind with those mentioned or enumerated; and this is so because it is presumed the testator had only things of that class in mind. The general phrase "contents of a house," following the specific one of household furniture, must therefore be confined to matters ejusdem generis. Fenton v. Fenton, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1083, 1087, 35 Misc. Rep. 479.

"Contents therein," as used in a fire policy on a barn and the contents therein, does not cover horses which, though stabled in the barn, are killed by lightning outside. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Kryder, 31 N. E. 851, 5 Ind. App. 430, 51 Am. St. Rep. 284.

CONTENTS UNKNOWN.

The phrase "contents unknown," as used in a bill of lading, so qualifies the description of the package contained in the bill that the carrier issuing the bill is not liable to account for the package as described. Miller v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 90 N. Y. 430, 433, 43 Am. Rep. 179 (citing Haddow v. Parry, 3 Taunt. 303; Shepherd v. Naylor, 71 Mass. [5 Gray] 591).

In a bill of lading the phrase "weight, contents and value unknown" does not place the burden upon the libellant to show in the first instance that the goods were put up in the cases by the manufacturer or shipper in good order and condition, and does not bind the court, in the absence of such proof, to presume that the injury to the goods arose from defects existing when they were packed for shipment, or which occurred previous to the shipment. English v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 719.

The term "contents unknown," in a bill of lading acknowledging the receipt in good order and condition of casks containing bristles, and stating "weight and contents unknown," cannot be construed as an admission by the master as to the condition of the goods beyond that visible to the eye; or apparent from handling the casks or boxes, or their outside protection, whatever it may be. The Columbo (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 178; The California (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1058.

A bill of lading reciting that a certain number of barrels of molasses marked, etc., were shipped in good order and condition, "contents and gauge unknown," cannot be construed as implying more than ignorance of the quantity or quality, not of the fact of there being molasses in the cask. Nelson v. Stephenson, 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 538, 552.

The words "contents unknown," written in a bill of lading, does not preclude either of the parties, on the loss of the goods, from showing the real contents of the package. Fassett v. Ruark, 3 La. Ann. 694.

The words "contents unknown," contained in a bill of lading, show that the master is ignorant as to the real character of the goods and as to the condition they are in, though the bill also specifies the goods to be 30 hogsheads of bacon. Consequently under such a bill the master cannot be presumed to agree that the goods are shipped in good order and condition. Vernard v. Hudson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1162, 1163.

The words "contents and weight unknown," added with pen and ink at the bottom of a bill of lading, exclude any inference that the owner is bound by a memorandum on the margin of the bill giving the weight, as the addition of the words at the bottom with a pen clearly indicate an intent on the part of the carrier not to be bound by any supposed ascertainment of the weight at the time by the shipper. The Andover (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 855.

The words "contents and value unknown," in the printed part of a bill of lading, only applies to packages mentioned therein, the contents of which are concealed from view, and does not apply to corn in bulk loaded into the car from an elevator. Tibbits v. Rock Island & P. Ry. Co., 49 Ill. App. 567, 571.

CONTEST.

See "Actual Contest"; "During Time of Contest."

To "contest" means to strive to win or hold; to controvert, litigate, oppose, call in question, challenge, dispute; to defend, as a suit or other proceeding. Parks v. State, 13 South. 756, 759, 100 Ala. 634; Robertson v. State, 10 N. E. 582, 600, 109 Ind. 79.

The word "contest" in constitutions and statutes is a word of art, having a distinct, defined meaning. It is a litigation. It implies a plaintiff and defendant, and a thing in controversy, and a board or other tribunal which decides such a contest is essentially a court. Pratt v. Breckinridge, 65 S. W. 136, 142, 112 Ky. 1.

Mr. Webster gives the following definition of the term "contest": "to make a subject of dispute; to call in question; to dispute; to dispute the declared result of an election." Oxford v. Frank, 70 S. W. 426, 429, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 343.

Of elections.

Const. art. 7, § 12, directing specific legislation for the trial of "election contests," means proceedings which are usually instituted, within a prescribed period after the election, for or on behalf of the successful candidate, for the purpose of establishing his right to the particular office in controversy. People v. Londoner, 22 Pac. 764, 767, 13 Colo. 303, 6 L. R. A. 444.

"The contest of an election" must be, what its name implies, an adversary proceeding by which the matters in controversy may be settled upon issues joined. In the contest of a county seat election it is necessary that some of the parties actually interested adversely to the contestant should be made parties thereto. Burke v. Perry, 42 N. W. 401, 402, 26 Neb. 414.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

As complaint, see "Complaint."

As a suit, see "Suit."

As case, see "Case."

As civil action or cause, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

A "contested election," within the meaning of Code, § 3177, in reference to contested elections, means a contest of the election, and includes every election in which the statutes provide for a contest, whether on account of the particular wrongs complained of or not. Parks v. State, 13 South. 756, 759, 100 Ala. 634.

"The primary meaning of the verb 'to contest,' as given by Webster, is to make a subject of dispute, contention, or litigation, or call into question; to controvert; to oppose; to dispute." It is further defined as meaning "to defend, as a suit or other judicial proceeding; to dispute or resist, as to claim by due course of law; to litigate." An election may be said to be contested whenever an objection is formally urged against it, which, if found to be true in fact, will invalidate it. Therefore the power to determine contested elections necessarily carries with it jurisdiction over every possible objection which may be urged against the election of the officer, which is the subject of the contest. Robertson v. State, 10 N. E. 582, 600, 109 Ind. 79.

Const. art. 8, § 3, providing that in all "contested election cases" the ballots cast may be counted, etc., means only statutory contests, in which the contestant seeks not only to oust the intruder, but to have himself inducted into the office, and does not mean any proceeding in which the election of one holding an office is contested. State ex rel Ewing v. Francis, 88 Mo. 557, 561.

"Contested elections," as used in Wag. St. p. 574, § 58, providing that costs of contested election may be adjudged against the unsuccessful party, and the payment thereof enforced as in civil cases, only applies to contests of elections which can be had before courts in which costs can be adjudged and the payments thereof enforced as in civil cases of execution on fee bill, or in some other manner provided for in the courts. It does not include election contests in the House of Representatives. Steele v. Wear, 54 Mo. 531, 535.

CONTESTED WILL.

A will is "contested" under the provision of Code, § 4298, providing that any person interested in a will who has not contested the same may, after its admission to probate, contest its validity in equity by a party in interest, by filing in the court where it is offered for probate allegations in writing that the will was not duly executed, or as to the soundness of mind of the testator, or of any other valid objections thereto. Breeding v. Grantland, 33 South. 544, 135 Ala. 497.

CONTIGUOUS.

"Contiguous property," as used in Act 1872, authorizing the corporate authorities of cities and villages to make local improvements by special assessments of contiguous property, means real property contiguous to and benefited by the proposed improvement. Rich v. City of Chicago, 38 N. E. 255, 260, 152 Ill. 18.

Abutting or adjacent.

"Contiguous property," as used in Const. art. 9, § 1, vesting the corporate authorities of cities and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessment or by special taxation, or both, of contiguous property, is used in its popular sense, and means, in the case of a street improvement, the property which abuts on the street or sidewalk, or is bounded by the street. Adams County v. City of Quincy, 22 N. E. 624, 627, 130 Ill. 568, 6 L. R. A. 155.

"Contiguous" means in actual contact or touching; and hence a deed conveying a saltworks and lands contiguous thereto does not convey land about three-fourths of a mile from the main body of the saltworks' land, and separated therefrom by the intervening lands of other persons. Holston Salt & Plaster Co. v. Campbell, 16 S. E. 274, 275, 89 Va. 396.

"Contiguous," as used in Const. art. 15, § 9, defining a homestead to be a person's dwelling place, with that part of his land and property which is about and contiguous to it, means touching sides, adjoining, adjacent. Linn County Bank v. Hopkins, 28 Pac. 606, 47 Kan. 580, 27 Am. St. Rep. 309.

Rev. St. art. 2754, which forbids the closing of public roads without the consent of the "contiguous property owners," means "those property owners through whose land the road passes, or, at all events, whose property is actually touching on the road." Baxendale v. Seip, 32 La. Ann. 435, 436.

Upton, in the Case of Municipality No. 2, 7 La. Ann. 76, says the word "adjacent" was given the force of "contiguous," and it was held that only land contiguous to the portion of the street improved was subject to assessment. McCormick v. City of Omaha, 56 N. W. 626, 627, 37 Neb. 829.

Land cornering.

"Contiguous," as defined in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, means "in actual or close contact to; touching; adjacent; near; lying adjoining." A tract of land is "contiguous" to another tract which corners with it. Clements v. Crawford County Bank, 40 S. W. 132, 133, 64 Ark. 7, 62 Am. St. Rep. 149.

Right of way in street.

Acts 1879, § 2, authorizing assessments for the improvement of public streets upon "contiguous" property, cannot be construed to authorize an assessment on a railroad in the street, for, if the interests or rights of the railroad in the street have a corporeal or physical existence, they must be represented by the street, and a street cannot be "contiguous" to itself. South Park Com'rs v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 107 Ill. 105, 108.

The right of way of a railroad in a public street is "contiguous property," so far as street improvements are concerned, within a statute subjecting contiguous property to such tax for the local improvements. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. City of Moline, 41 N. E. 877, 878, 158 Ill. 64.

Separation as affecting.

"Contiguous" means to touch or to be in actual contact, and where three lots are separated from five others by an alley they are not "contiguous" lots within the mechanic's lien law. Bolen Coal Co. v. Ryan, 48 Mo. App. 512, 515.

"Contiguous," as used in a fire insurance policy providing that the generating or evaporating in the building, or contiguous thereto, of any substance for a burning gas, or the use of gasoline for lighting, is prohibited, unless by special agreement indorsed on the policy, is a relative term, and, being employed in reference to a building, means in close proximity to such building. "Contiguous" is defined to be adjacent; in actual close contact; touching; near. Hence gasoline works of the insured, situated at least 50 feet from the building which contained the property insured, were not "contiguous" to the building. Arkell v. Commerce Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 191, 192, 25 Am. Rep. 168.

The term "contiguous" means adjacent, according to Webster's Dictionary, and as used in a fire policy providing that, if the risk shall be increased by the erection or use of any building contiguous thereto without the consent of the company indorsed thereon, the policy should be void, could not be held to mean and apply to the objects "near by" the building insured, and hence that an erection 25 feet distant from the building insured was not to be construed as "contiguous" thereto, within the meaning of the policy. Olson v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 29 N. W. 125, 35 Minn. 432, 59 Am. Rep. 333.

Where one driving on a highway turned off on a private road, and at a point 50 or 100 feet from the highway was injured owing to a defect in such private road, the place of the injury was not "contiguous" to such highway. Chapman v. Cook, 10 R. I. 304, 307, 14 Am. Rep. 686.

Same—Navigable water.

"Contiguous territory," as used in Mansf. Dig. § 922, authorizing municipal corporations to annex contiguous territory in the same county, includes territory separated from a city by a navigable river. Vogel v. City of Little Rock, 15 S. W. 836, 54 Ark. 335. Mansf. Dig. § 922, authorizing municipal corporations to annex "contiguous territory" in the same county, means territory "not separated from the corporation by outside land," and the fact that a navigable river intervenes is not conclusive that the land is not contiguous. Vestal v. City of Little Rock, 15 S. W. 891, 892, 54 Ark. 321, 11 L. R. A. 778.

As used in Act Cong. Aug. 2, 1882, c. 374, 22 Stat. 186 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2931], prohibiting the carrying of emigrant passengers from any port or place in a foreign country, except ports and places "in foreign territory contiguous to the United States," unless the spaces and accommodations therein mentioned be provided, "territory contiguous" meant the entire jurisdiction of a foreign country which had territory contiguous to the United States; therefore Vancouver's Island, B. C., is "territory contiguous" within the act. The Danube (U. S.) 55 Fed. 993, 995.

Const. art. 4, § 3, declares that each representative district shall consist of convenient and contiguous territory. Held, that the word "contiguous," as there used, did not necessarily mean contact by land, but simply meant that the territory was convenient of access. Thus territory might be "contiguous," within the meaning of the Constitution, though it be separated by wide stretches of deep and navigable waters. Houghton County Sup'rs v. Secretary of State, 52 N. W. 951, 92 Mich. 638, 16 L. R. A. 432.

Same—Sidewalk.

Land which is only separated by a sidewalk from the portion of the street to be paved is "contiguous" to the proposed improvement. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Quincy, 27 N. E. 192, 193, 136 Ill. 563, 29 Am. St. Rep. 334.

CONTIGUOUS LOTS.

"Contiguous lots," within the meaning of the mechanic's lien statutes, providing that but one lien shall be necessary when the separate buildings on which the lien is claimed shall be erected under one general contract and upon contiguous lots, means lots that are bounded and described on recorded plats of cities and towns, and such as lie adjacent to each other; and the fact that the two houses for which material is furnished have another house between them, and the half lots on which the houses are situated are mortgaged to different persons, does not prevent such lots from being contiguous. Bulger v. Robertson, 50 Mo. App. 499, 503.

CONTIGUOUS PERSON.

In New Orleans Waterworks Charter (Acts La. 1877, p. 51, § 18), providing that nothing in the act should be construed to prevent the city council from granting to any persons contiguous to the river the privilege of laying pipes to the river exclusively for his own use, the terms "contiguous person" means a person whose lot actually fronts on the river, or is separated from the river only by a public highway, with no private owner intervening or possible on the block or square so situated. There is no line of demarcation short of this, for in the broad sense the whole city of New Orleans is "contiguous" to the Mississippi river. The question of contiguity is to be determined by present circumstances. If an owner had been, but is not now, within the meaning of the term "contiguous," his former right would have passed from him along with all other rights dependent on continued present contiguity. New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Ernst (U. S.) 32 Fed. 5, 6.

CONTINENTAL.

The word "continental" is in general and prevalent use, and means "pertaining to or characteristic of a continent." As applied to or designating an insurance company, it would be descriptive of the bounds within which such company carried on its business. It is a generic term, and hence its exclusive appropriation will not be permitted. Continental Ins. Co. v. Continental Fire Ass'n (U. S.) 96 Fed. 846, 848.

CONTINENTAL CURRENCY.

"Continental currency" is paper money emitted under the authority of Congress. Wharton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Dall. 125, 126, 1 L. Ed. 65.

CONTINGENCY.

A "contingency" is a fortuitous event, which comes without design, foresight, or expectation. People v. Village of Yonkers (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 266, 272.

A stipulation between a shipper and a common carrier, stating that the shipper undertook all risk of loss, injury, or damage, and other "contingencies" in loading, would ordinarily be understood as referring only to accidents or casualties, and is designed only to exempt the carrier from his common-law liability as insurer against accidents unattended by negligence. Keeney v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 104, 140.

St. 1869, c. 368, concerning the apportionment of rent, provided that when lands are held by lease of a person having an estate therein determinable on a life or on any contingency, and such estate shall be determined before the day on which any rent is required or made payable, then such rent may be apportioned. The words "or any contingency" meant the happening of some event affecting the nature and character of the estate itself, and an essential and necessary part of it, on which the continuance of the estate depends. Adams v. Bigelow, 128 Mass. 365, 366.

12 & 13 Vict. c. 107, § 178, relating to cases where a bankrupt has contracted a "liability to pay money on a contingency" which has not happened at the time of issuing the fiat or filing the petition, would not include liability on a promise to restore leased premises to their original state at the determination of the tenancy. Maples v. Pepper, 18 C. B. 177, 189.

Contingent liability or demand distinguished.

A contingent liability is one thing, and contingency, the happening of which may bring into existence a liability, is another and a very different thing. In the former case there is a liability which will become absolute on the happening of a certain event; in the latter there is none until the event happens. Fernald v. Johnson, 71 Me. 437, 440.

"There is a distinction between a contingent demand and a contingency whether there will ever be a demand. The former is a demand which might have been proved under the late bankruptcy law of the United States, but the latter is not." Woodard v. Herbert, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 358.

As an estate.

See "Estate."

In attachment statutes.

"Contingency," as used in V. S. 1071, providing that money or other things due to the defendant may be attached by trustee process, if it is due absolutely and without contingency, will be construed to mean a contingency affecting the debt itself, and not merely its time of payment. Rowell v. Felker, 54 Vt. 526, 529.

Rev. St. 1841, c. 119, § 63 (Rev. St. 1857, c. 86, § 55), provides that no person shall be adjudged trustee by reason of any money or other thing due from him to the principal defendant, unless it is at the time of the service of the writ due absolutely, and without depending on any contingency. Held, that the word "contingency," as there used, meant in the event which might prevent the principal from having any claim on the trustee or right to call on him to account, and not one which, though the principal may require the trustee to account, may show that there is nothing due on settlement made. Cutter v. Perkins, 47 Me. 557, 569; Dwinel v. Stone, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 384, 389.

CONTINGENT.

Contingent "is the quality of being casual; the possibility of coming to pass; an event which may occur; a possibility; a casualty. All anticipated future events which are not certain to occur are 'contingent' events, and may be properly denominated mere 'possibilities,' more or less remote, while anticipated events which are certain to occur, or must necessarily occur, are in no degree 'contingent.'" Verdier v. Roach, 31 Pac. 554, 556, 96 Cal. 467.

The word "contingent" ordinarily means "liable to occur." In law its meaning is dependent upon an uncertain future event. The words "contingent as an indorser," in a compromise deed, are equivalent to saying that the defendant is liable as an indorser to an extent dependent upon the future acts of the prior obligors of the note indorsed, and the language implies that at the time the deed was executed plaintiff regarded the note as a valid independent obligation, enforceable, to some extent at least, against the maker and prior indorsers, and that he intended thereby to reserve to himself any benefits to be derived therefrom, and also the right to collect of and from the defendant, in accordance with the provisions of the deed, such sum as might fall upon the defendant to pay. Bowns v. Stewart, 59 N. Y. Supp. 721, 723, 28 Misc. Rep. 475.

Contingent "implies a possibility, and when applied to a use, remainder, devise, bequest, or other legal right or interest, implies that no person in interest exists, and that whether such interest or right ever will exist depends on an uncertain future event." Jemison v. Blowers (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 686, 692; Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104.

The word "contingent," when used with reference to the vesting of a use or remainder, means that the vesting of the estate depends on an uncertain event, as on the death of a person, or on the taking effect of a certain event. Taylor v. Gould (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 388, 396.

CONTINGENT BEQUEST.

The general rules for determining whether a gift is vested or contingent are that, where the time of division or payment is of the substance of the gift, then the legacy is contingent; when the time is mentioned only as a qualifying clause in the payment or division, then the legacy is vested. A second rule is that the law inclines to regard legacies as vested rather than contingent. Andrews v. Russell, 28 South. 703, 705, 127 Ala. 195.

CONTINGENT CLAIM.

A "contingent claim" is one which has not accrued, and which is dependent on the happening of some future event. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co., 50 N. W. 1117, 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637.

A "contingent claim" against an estate, within the statute providing for the settlement thereof, is one where the absolute liability depends on some future event which may never happen, and which therefore renders such liability uncertain and indeterminate. Austin v. Saveland's Estate, 45 N. W. 955, 956, 77 Wis. 108; Jorgenson v. Larson, 88 N. W. 439, 440, 85 Minn. 134; Greene v. Dyer, 32 Me. 460, 463. It is where the liability depends on some future event after the debtor's death which may or may not happen, and therefore makes it now wholly uncertain whether there will ever be a liability. Stevens v. Stevens, 72 S. W. 542, 545, 172 Mo. 28 (citing Sargent's Adm'r v. Kimball's Adm'r, 37 Vt. 320).

"Contingent claim," as used in the statute excluding contingent claims from the operation of a trustee process, did not mean debts certain as to liability and uncertain only as to amount, but the contingency related to the liability. Downer v. Topliff, 19 Vt. 399, 402.

A "contingent claim," within the rule that claims against an estate which are not contingent are barred if not presented within a certain time, is one depending upon something thereafter to happen. Such a claim is not contingent after the happening of the event. In re Halleck's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 46, 49.

A "contingent claim," within Comp. St. c. 23, § 258 et seq., is a claim against a decedent, not absolute or certain, but depending upon some event after the death of the testator or intestate which may or may not happen. A subsisting demand against the estate of a deceased person which had matured and was capable of being enforced during the lifetime of the deceased is not a contingent claim. Slichter v. Cox, 72 N. W. 848, 849, 52 Neb. 532.

A "contingent claim," as used in relation to the presentation of claims to the administrator of an estate, is one which does not become absolute and capable of liquidation before the expiration of the time limited by order of the probate court for the presentation of claims against the estate of one deceased, for consideration and allowance or disallowance. Hantzch v. Massolt, 63 N. W. 1069, 1070, 61 Minn. 361; State v. Probate Court, 68 N. W. 1063, 1065, 66 Minn. 246.

The term "contingent claim," as used in Gen. St. c. 63, § 45, concerning the proof of claims against estates, means a claim of such character that it may become absolute during the time limited for the proof and allowance of such claims, and, to entitle the claimant to share in the assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, it must become absolute within the time limited for the payment of such claims. Clark v. Winchell, 53 Vt. 408, 415.

Where a promise to pay rent is absolute, it is not a "contingent claim," and therefore is subject to garnishment. Rowell v. Felker, 54 Vt. 526, 529.

Absolute distinguished.

As used in an insurance policy, the terms "interest" and "title" are not synonymous. A mortgagor in possession and a purchaser holding under a deed defectively executed have both of them absolute as well as insurable interests in the property, though neither of them has the legal title. "Absolute" is here synonymous with "vested," and is used in contradistinction to "contingent" or "conditional." Loventhal v. Home Ins. Co., 112 Ala. 108, 116, 20 South. 419, 83 L. R. A. 258, 57 Am. St. Rep. 17.

Administrator's liability.

A claim against an estate of an administrator who had failed to pay funds in his hands to creditors after a decree directing such payment is not a "contingent claim" within the meaning of a statute providing that contingent claims against a decedent might be proved before the probate court, and if the claim becomes absolute within two years the creditor should be entitled to payment out of the estate. A contingent claim depends upon some fact found which may or may not happen, and therefore makes it now wholly uncertain whether there ever will be a liability. In this case the creditor's debt was an absolute debt against the administrator, enforceable against him personally and against his own property. Sargent's Adm'r v. Kimball's Adm'r, 37 Vt. 320, 321.

2 Wds. & P.—32

Claim payable on third person's death.

"Contingent claims," as the term is used in reference to claims against the estate of a decedent, mean claims which may never accrue. A claim depending upon a future contingency, upon a happening of an event that may never happen, does not accrue until the event happens; until then it is not a claim. A claim payable on the death of a third person is an absolute and not a contingent claim. Farris v. Stoutz, 78 Ala. 130, 133.

Contractor's or seller's liability.

Pub. Acts 1879, p. 272, providing that the garnishee shall be liable on any contingent claim against him in favor of the principal defendant, cannot be construed to include the 10 per cent. of the estimated contract price for the erection of a building, which was to be retained from the payments made, as the work progressed, until after completion, there being a stipulation for a forfeiture in the event that the work was not done by the time stipulated. Webber v. Bolte, 16 N. W. 257, 51 Mich. 118.

Where a person had purchased and paid for lands, but the wife of the vendor had not joined in the contract, and, after the vendor's death, refused to execute a deed for her dower interest, the purchaser's claim against the estate ceased to be a contingent claim upon her refusal. Jorgenson v. Larson, 88 N. W. 439, 440, 85 Minn. 134.

Indorser's and surety's liability.

Rev. St. c. 109, § 13, requiring that in the settlement of an estate a fund should be kept in the hands of the administrator for contingent claims, means those only concerning which it is uncertain or contingent whether they will ever become debts. Of that kind is the liability of a surety. Greene v. Dyer, 32 Me. 460, 463.

The statute places contingent claims against the estate of a decedent, which are duly proved, in such a position that if they become absolute within two years from the close of the commission their holder shall receive payment to the same extent as other creditors. Such claims may be presented and proved as contingent before either the probate court or the commissioners, while absolute claims are proved and allowed only before the commissioners, except on appeal. Where a claimant indorsed a note for the deceased for his accommodation, and the note became due after his death, and was paid by such indorser while the commission remained open, the claim was then an absolute claim, and must be proved before the commissioners as such, and the right to prove it as a contingent claim did not then exist. Lytle v. Bond's Estate, 39 Vt. 388, 391.

A contingent claim or demand is one dependent on future events which may never happen, such as a contract of indorsement which is conditional and contingent, imposing no liability and no right to demand of the indorser until the indorsee, at maturity, makes demand of the maker and he fails to pay, of which due notice shall be given the indorser. The liability of the surety on an administrator's bond is contingent until the principal shall fail in the performance of the duty required of him by law; but whenever there is a failure it is absolute, and he is bound to answer to this, saving the ultimate interest in the assets from whatever injury they may sustain from the breach of the conditions of the bond. The right of action against such surety accrues at the time of the breach by the principal, and the statute of limitation commences to run from such time, and not from the time when such breach has been judicially determined. McDowell v. Jones, 58 Ala. 25, 32.

An indorser stands in substantially the same relation to the debt of an intestate as a surety, so far as concerns the element of contingency. He is liable to the holder, yet has no absolute claim against the estate of the maker until he pays the note. His claim is contingent upon the enforcement of the note against him, and it comes within the definition of a contingent claim as given in Sargent's Adm'r v. Kimball's Adm'r, 37 Vt. 320, where it is said, "A contingent claim is where the liability depends upon some future event which may or may not happen, and therefore makes it now wholly uncertain whether there ever will be a liability." Curley v. Hand's Estate, 53 Vt. 524, 525.

Partnership claim against partner.

Under the rule that, unless the affairs of a firm are wound up and all the debts paid, neither partner has any remedy against or liability to the other for payment from one to the other of what may have been advanced or received in the business, a claim by one partner against the estate of a deceased partner on a partnership claim is a contingent claim against the estate until the settlement of the firm's business. Logan v. Dixon, 41 N. W. 713, 715, 73 Wis. 533.

Personal liability on secured debts.

A claim against the estate of a decedent on his assumption of a mortgage is, before foreclosure, only a contingent claim, which cannot be proved as a debt against his estate. Terhune v. White, 34 N. J. Eq. (7 Stew.) 98, 99.

A note payable absolutely and secured by mortgage on land is not, as between the holder and the estate of the maker, a "contingent claim," within the provision of the statute that if any person shall be liable as security for the deceased, or shall have any other contingent claim against his estate which cannot be proved as a debt before the commissioners, the same may be presented, with proper proofs, etc., to the probate court. Osmun v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 64 N. W. 949, 950, 107 Mich. 27.

Gen. St. c. 99, §§ 5, 6, relating to "contingent" claims against estates, could not be construed to include a claim which was due absolutely, and could have been proved at any time, the only resemblance to a contingency in which was that the claimant thought he had a lien as security for the debt which he did not have. Sears v. Wills, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 430, 431.

Stockholder's liability.

Where the deceased had subscribed for stock in a corporation, but he only paid a portion of the amount of his subscription, though all was due and payable, the claim for the balance was not a contingent claim. State v. Probate Court, 68 N. W. 1063, 1065, 66 Minn. 246.

In the absence of statutory provisions, a claim of a creditor of an insolvent corporation against a stockholder therein, to compel the payment of a balance due on bonus stock, depends on whether the creditor was defrauded by the issuance of such stock, and as to whether he comes into equity with clean hands, and such a claim, as against an estate of a deceased stockholder, and before the assets of the corporation are fully administered, is a "contingent claim," within the meaning of chapter 53, Gen. St. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co., 50 N. W. 1117, 1122, 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637.

The liability of the estate of a deceased stockholder for corporate debts, under article 10, § 3, of the Constitution, providing that each stockholder of any corporation shall be liable to the amount of the stock owned by him, cannot be allowed by the probate court as a contingent claim. The only contingency, or, to speak more accurately, the only uncertainty, would be as to the amount of the claim, which could only be determined upon a full settlement of the affairs of the corporation and an adjustment of all the rights and liabilities of the stockholders and creditors. National German-American Bank v. Tapley, 57 N. W. 1065, 1066, 56 Minn. 420.

The claim by a receiver of a national bank against the estate of a deceased stockholder is a contingent claim, where at the time of the death of such stockholder the bank was open and transacting business in the usual way, and continues so until after the year in which claims against the estate can be presented. Wickham v. Hull, 71 N. W. 352, 353, 102 Iowa, 469.

Warrantor's Liability.

Actions of covenant for breaches of a warranty made by the ancestor during his lifetime, and where the breaches may not occur until long after the expiration of the limitation provided by statute for the bringing of suit against the heir, and liabilities as sureties upon bonds, where the liability of the surety is not fixed until long after the close of the estate in the probate court, are examples of contingent liabilities which are not barred by a statutory limitation of time within which to exhibit claims against a decedent's estate. Payson v. Hadduck (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 23.

CONTINGENT DEBT OR LIABILITY.

Contingency distinguished, see "Contingency."

Anderson's Law Dictionary defines a "contingent liability" to be a liability which is not absolute, but depends upon an uncertain event, as the liability of an indorser. The liability of an indorser or surety is contingent, and not actual, until default by the payee or principal. State v. Sheets, 72 Pac. 334, 335, 26 Utah, 105.

A statute providing that the trustee process shall not extend to debts which are contingent means that, to prevent the trustee process from attaching, the contingency must be such as to affect the debt itself, which is supposed to be due, and not simply the liability of the trustee to have the effects or credits called out of his hands in a particular manner. Downer v. Curtis, 25 Vt. 650, 654.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5068, authorizing contingent debts to be proved against the estate of a bankrupt, does not mean demands whose existence depend on contingency, but existing demands, the cause of action for which depends on a contingency. Sayre v. Glenn, 6 South. 45, 46, 87 Ala. 631 (citing French v. Morse, 68 Mass. [2 Gray] 111; Woodard v. Herbert, 24 Me. [11 Shep.] 358).

Rev. St. U. S. § 5068, relating to the contingent liabilities of a bankrupt, cannot be construed to mean the possibility that, by means of proceedings not yet instituted, the bankrupt may have enforced against him a liability created by statute, which can be enforced only by methods provided for by the statute, and which does not grow out of any contract on the part of the bankrupt with the person or persons for whose benefit the statute may be invoked. First Nat. Bank v. Hingham Mfg. Co., 127 Mass. 563, 568.

A "contingent liability" contracted by a bankrupt, in its legal signification, means an obligation of the bankrupt arising from his contract, the duty to perform which is dependent as to when and whether the obligation shall become absolute on the occurrence of an event, the happening of which is a matter of some uncertainty. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5068, providing that all cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities, contracted by the bankrupt and not otherwise provided for, may be allowed, etc., means "such as can become fixed and absolute, and do so become, by the happening of the contingency before the order for the final dividend, and such as, under an order of the court prescribing the manner, are of a character to be susceptible of ascertainment and liquidation." Steele v. Graves, 68 Ala. 21, 27.

The act of bankruptcy providing that, in cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities contracted by the insolvent, the creditor may make claim therefor, and have his claim allowed with the right to share in the dividends, if the contingency happens before the final order, did not include a contract given by one partner to another to assume all the debts of the firm, and save him harmless therefor, the contingency depending on a breach of a contract by one of the parties before there would be a debt or liability. Fernald v. Johnson, 71 Me. 437, 440.

"Contingent liability," in the law of negotiable paper of an accommodation indorser on the part of the person making a gift of land, is not of itself conclusive proof that the gift was made for the purpose of defrauding the holder of the note. The settled rule is that, as to all existing creditors, voluntary conveyances are fraudulent, without regard to the existence of an actual intent to defraud. Long Branch Banking Co. v. Dennis, 39 Atl. 689, 690, 56 N. J. Eq. 549.

CONTINGENT DEMAND.

Bankr. Act 1841, § 5, providing that all persons having contingent demands against a bankrupt should be permitted to come in and prove such debts or claims and to have the same allowed them, was construed to include only actual contingent debts, and not mere personal obligations imposing no debt or duty which is capable of being estimated in value. Woodard v. Herbert, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 358, 361.

Bankr. Law 1841, § 5, authorizes the proof of contingent demands against a bankrupt, and declares that the holders thereof shall be entitled to a dividend thereon on their claims having become absolute. Held, that the term "contingent demand," as there used, meant debts payable on a future contingency which did not happen before the issuing of the commission. Thus, the claim of the grantee in a deed on a covenant of quiet enjoyment before breach is a contingent demand against the grantor which may be proved under the act. Jemison v. Blowers (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 686, 687.

A demand against a bankrupt by his grantee or assignee, upon a covenant of seisin in a conveyance, founded upon a possible claim for dower in the land conveyed, is not such a contingent demand as could have been exhibited against the estate of a bankrupt, under Bankr. Act 1841, § 5. Magwire v. Riffin, 44 Mo. 512, 514.

CONTINGENT ESTATE.

"An estate is contingent while the person to whom it is limited is uncertain, i. e., while it is uncertain who will take if the precedent estate then terminates." Sheridan v. House (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Dec. 218, 225.

Contingent estates are estates which come into enjoyment or possession on the happening of some uncertain event. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104; Smith v. West, 103 Ill. 332, 337.

An estate is contingent while the person to whom or the event upon which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain. Thorn-ton v. Zea, 55 S. W. 798, 799, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 509; In re Davis' Estate, 36 N. Y. Supp. 822, 826, 91 Hun, 53; Augustus v. Seabolt, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 155, 162; Hopkins v. Hopkins (N. Y.) 1 Hun, 352, 354; Leslie v. Marshall (N. Y.) 31 Barb. 560, 564; Hersee v. Simpson, 46 N. Y. Supp. 755, 756, 20 App. Div. 100; Smaw v. Young, 20 South. 370, 375, 109 Ala. 528; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8795; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4374; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1116; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 695; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2358; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2037.

It is provided by statute that future estates are either vested or contingent, and that they are vested when there is a person in being who would have immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate, but are contingent whilst the person to whom or the event upon which they are limited to take effect remains uncertain. Wadsworth v. Murray, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1038, 1043, 29 App. Div. 191.

An estate is vested in interest when there is a present fixed right of future enjoyment, and an estate is contingent when a right of enjoyment is to accrue on an event which is dubious and uncertain. Thus, the interest of the children of the grantor in a conveyance of land to trustees in trust for his wife, with directions that at her death the trustee shall sell the land, and divide the proceeds equally among the children, creates a contingent, and not a vested, estate. Strode v. McCormick, 41 N. E. 1091, 1093, 158 Ill. 142.

CONTINGENT EXPENSE.

A contingent expense must be deemed to be an expense depending on some future uncertain event. People v. Village of Yonkers (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 266, 272.

The adjective "contingent," as used in appropriation bills to qualify the word "expenses," has a technical and well-understood meaning. It is usual for Congress to enumerate the principal classes of expenditure which they authorize, such as clerk hire, fuel, light, postage, telegrams, etc., and then to make a small appropriation for the minor disbursements incidental to any great business, which cannot well be foreseen, and which it would be useless to specify more accurately. For such disbursements, a round sum is appropriated under the head of "contingent expenses." Dunwoody v. United States (U. S.) 22 Ct. Cl. 289, 280.

CONTINGENT INTEREST.

A contingent interest is an actual creation, whose existence may be cut off by few or many contingencies, but whose very existence gives it a possible value, in which respect it differs from an expectancy. In re Robbins' Estate, 49 Atl. 233, 199 Pa. 500.

The term "contingent interest," as used in the rule of law that all contingent interests are assignable in equity, will be construed not to include a right of reverter in case of the breach of a condition subsequent. Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., 12 N. Y. 121, 132.

It is not the uncertainty of enjoyment in the future, but the uncertainty of the right to that enjoyment, which makes the difference between a vested and a contingent interest. Temple v. Scott, 143 Ill. 290, 296, 32 N. E. 366 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 206); Hawkins v. Bohling, 48 N. E. 94, 95, 168 Ill. 214; Lewis v. Howe, 66 N. E. 975, 977, 174 N. Y. 340.

The mere fact that power was given to the trustee to sell on the request of the life tenant, and to use the proceeds, did not make the interest of the remainderman contingent, the interest vesting subject to the power. Hawkins v. Bohling, 48 N. E. 94, 95, 168 Ill. 214.

CONTINGENT LEGACY.

Where a legacy is directed to be paid at a future time or on a future event, it is vested or contingent, according to the intent of the testator as expressed in his will. If the time or event is annexed to the payment of the legacy, it is vested; if to the substance or gift of the legacy, it is contingent. A legacy bequeathed to a person to hold in trust to pay the interest to A. during her natural life, and after her death to pay the principal sum to her children, is a vested legacy. Rubencane v. McKee, 6 Atl. 639, 641, 6 Del. Ch. 40.

A legacy is contingent, and not vested, when the payment thereof is deferred for reasons personal to the legatee. Thus, a will directing the trustee, on the death of a life tenant, to pay out of the residuary estate a certain amount to each of two nephews of testatrix when they shall reach majority, and, in case either die before that age, to pay his legacy to the survivor, creates contingent, and not vested, legacies. In re Engle's Estate, 31 Atl. 76, 78, 166 Pa. 280.

CONTINGENT LIABILITY.

See "Contingent Debt or Liability."

CONTINGENT LIMITATION.

When a remainder in fee is limited upon any estate which would by the common law be adjudged a fee tail, such remainder is valid as a contingent limitation upon a fee, and vests in possession on the death of the first taker without issue living at the time of his death. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3328.

CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

As an estate, see "Estate"

A remainder is contingent while the person to whom or the event upon which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain. Hennessy v. Patterson, 85 N. Y. 91, 100; City Council of Augusta v. Radcliffe, 66 Ga. 469, 473; Taylor v. Gould (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 388, 396; Poor v. Considine, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 458, 474, 18 L. Ed. 869; Owen v. Eaton, 56 Mo. App. 563, 567.

Contingent remainders are estates which come into enjoyment or possession on the happening of some uncertain event. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104; Newton v. Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 74 S. W. 180, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2310.

A contingent remainder is one which is limited to take effect on an event or condition which may never happen or be performed until after the determination of the preceding particular estate. Griswold v. Greer, 18 Ga. 545, 546; Wallace v. Minor, 10 S. E. 423, 425, 86 Va. 550; Leslie v. Marshall (N. Y.) 31 Barb. 560, 566.

A contingent remainder is one the vesting or taking effect in interest of which is by the terms of its creation made to depend on some contingency which may never happen at all. City of Peoria v. Darst, 101 Ill. 609, 618 (citing 2 Washb. Real Prop. 519).

"Where it is doubtful and uncertain whether the use of the estate limited in fact will ever vest in an estate or interest or not, there the use or estate is said to be 'contingent.' It may either vest or never vest, as the contingency may happen." Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 96 (quoting Lovie's Case, 10 Coke, 85).

A remainder is contingent when it is limited to take effect on an event which may never happen, or which may not happen until after the preceding particular estate ends, or is limited to a person not in being or not ascertained. Williamson v. Field's Ex'rs (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 533, 552; Woodman v. Woodman, 35 Atl. 1037, 1038, 89 Me. 128; Robinson v. Palmer, 38 Atl. 103, 104, 90 Me. 246; Schuyler v. Hanna, 31 Neb. 307, 310, 47 N. W. 932 (citing Brown v. Lawrence, 57 Mass. [3 Cush.] 390, 397; Thomson v. Ludington, 104 Mass. 193; Smith v. Rice, 130 Mass. 441).

A contingent remainder is an "estate in remainder limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person or upon a dubious and uncertain event, so that the particular estate may never be determined and the remainder never take effect." Bunting v. Speck, 21 Pac. 288, 290, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L. R. A. 690; Jemison v. Blowers (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 686, 692; Marvin v. Ledwith, 111 Ill. 144, 150, Harvard College v. Balch, 49 N. E. 543, 544, 171 Ill. 275; Temple v. Scott, 32 N. E. 366, 367, 143 Ill. 290; Haward v. Peavey, 21 N. E. 503, 505, 128 Ill. 430, 15 Am. St. Rep. 120; Phinlzy v. Foster, 7 South. 836, 837, 90 Ala. 262; Owen v. Eaton, 56 Mo. App. 563, 567 (approved in De Lassus v. Gatewood, 71 Mo. 371); Poor v. Considine, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 458, 474, 18 L. Ed. 869; Hauptman v. Carpenter (D. C.) 16 App. Cas. 524, 528; Richardson v. Penicks (D. C.) 1 App. Cas. 261, 264; Throop v. Williams, 5 Conn. 98, 100. The principle is that the precedent particular estate and the remainder are one estate in law, and hence the rule is they must subsist and be in esse at one and the same time, either during the continuance of the first estate or at the very instant when that is determined, so that no other estate can come between them. Marvin v. Ledwith, 111 Ill. 144, 150.

"A remainder is contingent, though the remainderman is in being and ascertained, so long as it remains uncertain whether he will be absolutely entitled to the estate limited to him in remainder if he lives, and such estate continues until all the precedent estates have ceased." Price v. Slisson, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Bensl.) 168, 176; Hawley v. James (N. Y.) 5 Paige, 318, 467.

"A contingent remainder is that part of an estate in fee bestowed conditionally upon one of two or more persons—which one is not certain—the rest of which is bestowed definitely upon some other person or persons named. The part thus not definitely disposed of to some particular person or persons is provided to go to some other person or persons of the two or more named—which of the two or more is left uncertain, and is to be fixed and made certain by succeeding events. The remainder itself is certain, but the person who is to have it is uncertain until it is determined by the events named.' Chancellor Kent says the definition of a contingent remainder in 1 Rev. St. N. Y. 723, § 13, is brief and concise. 'A remainder,' says the statute, 'is contingent whilst the person to whom or the event upon which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain.'" Yocum v. Siler, 61 S. W. 208, 209, 160 Mo. 281.

"Contingent remainders may be divided into two classes, the distinguishing element being the character of the event upon the happening of which is made to depend the vesting of the remainder. The first class, according to this classification, would include all those remainders which are contingent because the persons who are to take are not ascertained or are not in being. Such would be remainders to the heirs of a living person or to an unborn child. In the first case the remainder is contingent, because 'nemo est hæres viventis.' The heirs cannot be ascertained until the death of the ancestor, and the remainder will become vested only upon the death of that person. In the second case the remainder is contingent until the child is born. If the remainder is to a class, as to children, it will vest in the first born, subject to be opened upon the birth of a second to let it in, and so on. If the particular estate terminated after the birth of the first, the remainder would vest completely in that child, free from the claims of any child born thereafter." Shannon v. Bonham, 60 N. E. 951, 953, 27 Ind. App. 369 (quoting Tiedeman, Real Prop. 412; 4 Kent, Comm. 207); Temple v. Scott, 32 N. E. 366, 367, 143 Ill. 290.

A contingent remainder may be limited in conveyances at common law. It relates only to lands, tenements, and hereditaments, real or mixed. It requires a freehold to precede and support it, and must vest, at farthest, at the instant the preceding estate determines. St. Amour v. Rivard, 2 Mich. 294, 303.

A contingent remainder is not an estate in lands, since it is merely the chance of having; but it is an interest in land which has long remained inalienable, simply because it has never been thought worth legislating about; so that, as Williams says (Real Prop. 257), "the circumstances of a contingent remainder having been so long inalienable at law was a curious relic of the ancient feudal system." Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. 122, 131, 20 S. W. 972.

A "contingent remainder does not rise to the dignity of an estate in the land, and confers no interest in the seisin. Strictly speaking, it is not an estate at all, but a mere chance of having one if the contingency turn out favorably to the remainderman." Butterfield v. Sawyer, 58 N. E. 602, 603, 187 Ill. 598.

Under 4 Rev. St. p. 2432, pt. 2, c. 1, tit. 2, § 13, a conveyance of a life estate, with remainder to the heirs of the grantee surviving her, creates a contingent remainder, because both the person to whom and the event upon which the estate is limited to take effect are uncertain. Hall v. La France Fire Engine Co., 53 N. E. 513, 514, 158 N. Y. 570. The interest of children during the mother's life, in lands conveyed to a trustee to collect the rents and pay them to a certain woman during her life, and after her death to convey the land to her children, if they shall survive, is a contingent remainder. Temple v. Scott, 32 N. E. 366, 367, 143 Ill. 290; Robinson v. Palmer, 38 Atl. 103, 104, 90 Me. 246.

Executory devise distinguished.

Where an estate has been devised to a person in fee, defeasible in case he dies without leaving any lawful issue surviving him, with the remainder in fee to the use of testatrix, such a disposition of the property would have been termed at common law a "conditional limitation by way of an executory devise," but under the system prevailing in this state may be denominated a "contingent remainder." The executory devise was at common law in the nature of a contingent remainder, but could be created only by will, and not by grant. One of the distinctions between an executory devise and a contingent remainder at common law was that a contingent remainder could not be created upon a fee, but under Code, § 773, providing that a fee may be limited on a fee, upon a contingency which, if it should occur, must happen within the period prescribed. A contingent remainder may be limited on a fee. Jewell v. Pierce, 52 Pac. 132, 133, 120 Cal. 79.

In Beardsley v. Hotchkiss, 96 N. Y. 201, 213, the court, in speaking of the limitation which created a contingent future estate and expectancy, said: "Before the Revised Statutes the limitation would have been called an 'executory devise.' Now it is more properly called a 'contingent remainder.' Future estates are contingent while the person to whom or the event upon which they are limited to take effect remains uncertain, and such estates are descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as the estates in possession." Pickert v. Windecker, 28 N. Y. Supp. 437, 438, 73 Hun. 476.

As uncertainty of possession.

A contingent remainder is defined as a remainder limited to an uncertain person or on an uncertain event, or so limited to a certain person or on a certain event as not to possess the present capacity to take effect in possession should the possession become vacant. Wallace v. Minor, 10 S. E. 423, 425, 88 Va. 550.

A contingent remainder is an estate which is not ready, from its commencement to its end, to come into possession at any moment when the prior estate may happen to end, and, if it is at any time ready to come into such possession, it becomes a vested remainder. The uncertainty which distinguishes it is not the uncertainty whether the remaindermen will ever enjoy it, but the uncertainty whether there will ever be a right to such enjoyment. If the person to take a remainder is in esse and ascertained, and it is to take effect by words of express limitation on the determination of the preceding particular estate, it will be vested. Citing Scofield v. Olcott, 120 Ill. 362, 11 N. E. 351. Thus, where a testator bequeathed property to a trustee to invest and use the income to support a son, the latter to have power to dispose of the property of the will in the family, and, if not so disposed of, the whole sum remaining on the death of the son to be divided among testator's other children, the latter took a vested remainder, subject to be divested by the execution of the power. Harvard College v. Balch, 49 N. E. 543, 544, 171 Ill. 275.

It is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession that makes a remainder contingent, for to this extent every remainder is and must be liable, since the remainderman may die without heirs before the distribution of the particular estate. Moore's Adm'r v. Sleet (Ky.) 68 S. W. 642, 643; Roe v. Davis (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 332, 340.

An estate in remainder is not rendered contingent by the uncertainty of time of enjoyment. The right and capacity of the remainderman to take possession of the estate if the possession were to become vacant, and the certainty that the event upon which the vacancy depends must happen some time, and not the certainty that it will happen in the lifetime of the remainderman, determines whether or not the estate is vested or contingent. Bruce v. Bissell, 119 Ind. 525, 528, 22 N. E. 4, 12 Am. St. Rep. 436; Heilman v. Heilman, 28 N. E. 310, 311, 129 Ind. 59.

It is the uncertainty of the right of enjoyment, and not the uncertainty of its actual enjoyment, which renders a remainder contingent. Smith v. Block, 29 Ohio St. 488, 497 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 206).

Vested remainder distinguished.

"The broad distinction between vested and contingent remainders is this: In the first, there is some person in esse, known and ascertained, who, by the will or deed creating the estate, is to take and enjoy the estate upon the expiration of the existing particular estate, and whose right to such remainder no contingency can defeat. In the second, it depends upon the happening of a contingent event whether the estate limited as a remainder shall ever take effect at all." In re Moran's Will, 96 N. W. 367, 370, 118 Wis. 177.

A remainder is a remnant of an estate, depending upon a particular prior estate created at the same time and by the same instrument, and limited to arise immediately on the determination of that estate, and not an abridgment of it. It is a vested remainder where there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the precedent estate; and it is contingent when it is limited to take effect, either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious or uncertain event. Wood v. Griffin, 46 N. H. 230, 234.

A future estate dependent upon a precedent estate is termed a "remainder." It is either vested or contingent. It is vested when there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate. It is contingent whilst the person to whom, or the event upon which, it is limited to take effect, remains uncertain. Dana v. Murray, 26 N. E. 21, 24, 122 N. Y. 604.

In speaking of the test as to whether a remainder is vested or contingent, Chancellor Kent says: "It is the present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, that distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder. When the event on which the preceding estate is limited must happen, and when it also may happen before the expiration of the estate limited in remainder, that remainder is vested—as, in the case of a lease to A. for life, remainder to B., during the life of A. the preceding estate determines on an event which must happen; and it may determine by forfeiture or surrender before the expiration of A.'s life, and the remainder is therefore vested. A remainder limited upon an estate tail is held to be vested, though it must be uncertain whether it will ever take place." Smaw v. Young, 20 South. 370, 371, 109 Ala. 528 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 203); Walters v. Crutcher, 54 Ky. (15 B. Mon.) 2, 10; Moore's Adm'r v. Sleet (Ky.) 68 S. W. 642, 643; Railey v. Millam (Ky.) 5 S. W. 367, 368; Johnson v. Robertson (Ky.) 45 S. W. 523, 524; Roe v. Davis (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 332, 340. Again, in defining a contingent remainder, the same author says: "It is not the uncertainty of enjoyment in the future, but the uncertainty of the right of that enjoyment, which marks the difference between a vested and contingent interest." Smaw v. Young, 20 South. 370, 371, 109 Ala. 528; Paul v Frierson, 21 Fla. 529, 533; Phinizy v. Foster, 7 South. 836, 837, 90 Ala. 262.

The term "remainder" is a relative expression, and implies that some part of the thing is previously disposed of. Vested remainders are remainders executed whereby a present interest passes to a party, or where the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate is spent, and contingent or executory remainders are those whereby no present interest passes, or where the estate in remainder is limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person or upon a dubious and uncertain event. Hudson v. Wadsworth, 8 Conn. 348, 359.

A vested remainder is an estate in present, although to be enjoyed in the future, while a contingent remainder is an estate to vest upon the happening of some future event. A contingent and not a vested remainder is created in the children of the devisees by a will in which the testatrix gives property to her sisters, to hold the same during their lives, and at their decease to descend to their children respectively, and to be equally divided among them or the survivors of them. Spear v. Fogg, 32 Atl. 791, 792, 87 Me. 132.

A contingent remainder is a remainder in which it "depends upon the happening of a contingent event whether the estate limited shall ever take effect at all. The event may either never happen, or it may not happen until after the particular estate upon which it depended shall have been determined, so that the estate in remainder will never take effect." It is distinguished from a vested remainder, which is a remainder limited to some person in esse known and ascertained, who, by the will or deed creating the estate, is to take and enjoy the estate, and whose right to such remainder no contingency can defeat. Bunting v. Speck, 21 Pac. 288, 296, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L. R. A. 690.

"A contingent remainder is where the estate in remainder is limited to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon the happening of a dubious and uncertain event." A vested remainder is where a present interest passes to a certain and definite person, but to be enjoyed in futuro. Byrne v. France, 33 S. W. 178, 180, 131 Mo. 639 (quoting Poor v. Considine, 73 U. S. [6 Wall.] 458, 18 L. Ed. 869).

By statute it is provided that where a future estate is dependent on a preceding estate it may be termed a "remainder," and may be created and transferred by that name. It is further declared that future estates are either vested or contingent. They are vested when there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate. They are contingent while the person to whom, or the event upon which, they are limited to take effect, remains uncertain. Palmer v. Dunham, 6 N. Y. Supp. 46, 47, 52 Hun, 468.

CONTINGENT RIGHT.

A vested right is an immediate, fixed right of present or future enjoyment. Rights are vested in contradistinction to being expectant or contingent. They are vested when the right to enjoyment, present or prospective, has become the property of some particular person or persons, as a present interest. They are expectant when they depend on the continued existence of the present condition of things, until the happening of some future event. They are contingent when they are only to come into existence on an event or condition which may not happen or be performed until some other event may prevent their vesting. Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co., 16 Sup. Ct. 705, 713, 161 U. S. 646, 40 L. Ed. 838.

It is said in Mason v. Mason, 140 Mass. 63, 3 N. E. 19, that an inchoate right of dower is a vested right of value; but it would seem that the word "contingent," which was used in Bullard v. Briggs, 24 Mass. (7 Pick.) 533, 537, 19 Am. Dec. 292, would more accurately describe the nature of the estate. Flynn v. Flynn, 50 N. E. 650, 651, 171 Mass. 312, 42 L. R. A. 98, 68 Am. St. Rep. 427.

CONTINGENT TAX.

See "County Contingent Tax."

CONTINGENT TRUST.

An express trust may depend for its operation upon a future event, and is then a contingent trust. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3154.

CONTINGENT USE.

Contingent uses are rights and estates which come into enjoyment or possession on the happening of some uncertain event. Haywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 94, 104. They are such as may by possibility happen in possession, reversion, or remainder. Jemison v. Blowers (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 686, 692.

CONTINUANCE.

The continuance of a cause is an adjournment to a time certain. Commonwealth v. Maloney, 13 N. E. 482, 484, 145 Mass. 205.

"Continuance," as used in speaking of the continuance of legal proceedings, is synonymous with "postponement." State v. Underwood, 76 Mo. 630, 639.

CONTINUANCE IN OFFICE.

See "During Continuance in Office."

Const. art. 24, prohibits the Legislature from increasing the salary of any public officer during his continuance in office. Held, that the words "continuance in office" meant a continuing office under one appointment, or the term for which an officer was elected and held his office under a single appointment; and the fact that an officer became his own successor did not constitute him "continuing in office," within the Constitution, from the time he was appointed to the conclusion of his second term. Smith v. City of Waterbury, 7 Atl. 17, 54 Conn. 174.

Where the by-laws of a loan and building association provided that the officers should be elected annually and hold until their successors are elected and qualified, a treasurer's bond guarantying his good faith and honesty during his "continuance in office" does not mean that the sureties are bound for an indefinite period, if he should be re-elected or no successor should be elected, but only for the term for which he was elected, and such reasonable time as he should continue in office thereafter to enable his successor to qualify. Mutual Loan & Building Ass'n v. Price, 16 Fla. 204, 214, 216, 26 Am. Rep. 703.

A contract of security to answer for one during his "continuance in office" would require that it be under successive elections, and, if he ceased to be continuously re-elected, the liability of the surety was at an end. Borough of Berwick Upon Tweed v. Oswald 3 El. & Bl. 653, 671.

Under a constitutional provision that county commissioners shall be appointed by the Governor for two years, and continue in office until their successors are appointed, there is no doubt that an incumbent of such an office remains in office until his successor is duly qualified. The words "continue in office" imply, not the beginning of a new and different holding, but the prolongation of the one already existing. To continue in office means to remain in it, for the word "continue" means to remain in a given place or condition, to remain in connection with, to abide, to stay. State v. Murphy, 13 South. 705, 723, 32 Fla. 138.

CONTINUANDO.

An action is said to be laid with a continuando when the injuries are alleged to have been committed by continuation from one day to another, or at divers days and times between such day and such a day. The words in a declaration for assault and battery, "there afterwards continuing his said assault," does not constitute a continuando. The word "continuing" does not necessarily imply the technical sense of a continuando. Benson v. Swift, 2 Mass. 50, 52.

Bishop, in his Criminal Procedure (volume 1, § 394), defines a continuando as "an allegation in any appropriate form of words that an offense whereof a day of beginning is stated is continuing to another day stated." And in section 395 he says, "An allegation on such a day and on divers other days and times between that day and some other, which was held good in civil pleadings, * * * is not a continuando." People v. Sullivan, 33 Pac. 701, 702, 9 Utah, 195.

CONTINUE.

At a time when there was no daily paper printed in the state, except in one city therein, a statute provided that notice to creditors of an intestate's estate should be published in one or more of the public newspapers of the state, and continued in such public newspapers for four weeks. The statute was general, and applied to the whole state, no distinction being made as to such city, and, while a daily continuance could not have been in the contemplation of the Legislature elsewhere than in such city, an objection that a notice published in a daily paper in such city should be continued daily for the full period of the four weeks is not without plausibility, and to obviate it the court recommended that administrators continue their notice daily for such period. In re Smith (Pa.) 1 Ashm. 352, 354.

Rev. St. § 2247, provides that nothing contained in the preceding sections (providing periods of limitations of actions) requiring the acknowledgment or promise to be in writing, in order to be "evidence of a new or continuing contract to take the case out of the operation of the statute," "shall alter, take away or lessen the effect of a payment or interest," etc. Held, that the word "continuing" was there used in its natural, ordinary sense, meaning perpetuating, protracting, or prolonging from one time to another. Engmann v. Immel's Estate, 18 N. W. 182, 185, 59 Wis. 249.

In the several provincial statutes of 1692, 1701, and 1767, in reference to settlements for the purpose of the poor laws, the terms "coming to sojourn or dwell," "being an inhabitant," "residing and continuing one's residence," and "coming to reside and dwell," are frequently and variously used, and we think they are used indiscriminately to mean the same thing, namely, to designate the place of a person's domicile. This is defined in Const. c. 1, § 1, for another purpose, to be the place where one dwelleth or hath his home. Inhabitants of Abington v. Inhabitants of North Bridgewater, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 170, 176.

In an act authorizing a city to construct and continue a railroad from a certain fixed point to another, "continue" obviously means "to extend." City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 253, 263.

As obtain.

"Continuing," as used in an averment that a conspiracy was to prevent a certain person from obtaining work or employment or continuing in his said work and employment, he being already employed, is synonymous with "obtaining." The two words convey a conjunctive, and not a disjunctive, meaning. Any other signification than that the conspiracy was to prevent the person from having employment would be forced and unnatural. State v. Dyer, 32 Atl. 814, 818, 67 Vt. 690.

As remain.

"Continue," as used in Act Feb. 24, 1849 (P. L. p. 105), providing that the act should be commenced within 2 years, and continue in full force for the term of 50 years, should be construed in the sense of "remain," and as having no reference to any prior term to which the 50 years are to be added. Grey v. Newark Plank Road Co., 46 Atl. 606, 607, 65 N. J. Law, 51.

An order denying a motion to dissolve an injunction is not an order "continuing" the injunction, within the statute authorizing an appeal from any judgment in which an injunction is granted or continued. Dreutzer v. Frankfort Land Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 642, 646, 13 C. C. A. 73.

As renew.

The word "continue," in a lease providing that, if this lease cannot be continued after the expiration of said 10 years by mutual agreement of the parties, the lessor shall pay for the improvements, is not used in the sense of "renewed," so as to signify a renewal of the original term of 10 years, but will be answered by holding over, thus creating a tenancy from year to year as well as by renewal. Parker v. Page, 69 Pac. 822, 824, 41 Or. 579.

As uninterrupted.

In a statute providing for the drainage of swamp lands, and authorizing the inspectors, should they find it necessary, "to continue such ditch or ditches through lands adjoining any such tracts of swamp for the purpose of draining the same more effectually," the word "continue" does not admit of any intervening substance to break the continuity. It implies uninterrupted connection, and, where a ditch empties into a pond at one end thereof, the deepening of the outlet of such pond at the other end, and a mile from the end of such ditch, is not a continuation of such ditch. Belknap v. Belknap (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 463, 466, 7 Am. Dec. 548.

"Continued and uninterrupted use," as applied to land, sufficient to give rise to a claim of right by adverse possession, means a use not interrupted by the act of the owner of the land or by a voluntary abandonment by the party claiming the right. It is not necessary that the use should have been continuous in the person asserting the right, but it will be sufficient if such use has been continuous in him and those under whom he claims. If there has been a use of an easement for the requisite time unexplained, it will be presumed to have been under a claim of right and adverse, and be sufficient to establish title by prescription. Fankboner v. Corder, 26 N. E. 766, 767, 127 Ind. 164.

What is meant by "continued change of possession" has been the subject of much comment, and has never yet been nor never can be reduced to any fixed, certain rule. What would be regarded in law as continued possession under one state of circumstances would not be under other conditions of fact. It was said in Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503, 76 Am. Dec. 500, the word "continued" was designed to exclude the idea of a mere temporary change, but it never was the design of the statute to give such extension of meaning to the phrase "continued change of possession," and to require, upon penalty of the forfeiture of the goods, that the vendor should never have any control over or use of them. Roberts v. Burr (Cal.) 54 Pac. 849, 851; Porter v. Bucher, 33 Pac. 335, 336, 98 Cal. 454; Dodge v. Jones, 14 Pac. 707, 710, 7 Mont. 121. If such were the case, absurd results would follow; as, if a livery stable keeper hired a horse to the original vendor, it would, under such construction, become liable for the vendor's debts. Dodge v. Jones, 14 Pac. 707, 710, 7 Mont. 121. Thus, where it appeared that a husband and son composing a firm transferred to the wife certain property in payment of a debt, the mere fact that afterwards she permitted them to have temporary possession of it for the purpose of selling it did not prevent her possession from constituting a "continued change of possession," under the statutes. Roberts v. Burr (Cal.) 54 Pac. 849, 851.

In the provision of the statutes providing that every transfer of personal property, if made by a person having, at the time, possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred, is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, the word "continued" was designed to exclude the mere idea of a mere temporary change. Morris v. McLaughlin, 64 Pac. 219, 221, 25 Mont. 151.

The terms "habitual drunkenness," "habitual intemperance," "habitual intoxication," and "continued habits of intoxication" are equivalent and capable of the same definition, and are defined as the fixed and irresistible habit of getting drunk. It is a habit of using intoxicating liquors to excess, and does not include excessive use of opiates and drugs. Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854 (citing 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law [2d Ed.] 813).

CONTINUING CAUSE OF FORFEITURE.

We think the phrase, "a continuing cause of forfeiture," found in some of the reported cases, is not strictly accurate, and is misleading. Leases may contain continuing covenants and continuing conditions—that is to say, covenants and conditions which are to continue throughout the term—which, being violated by the lessee at any time during the term, give to the landlord, under the re-entry clause, a right to terminate the lease. But any breach of the condition or covenant creating a forfeiture must consist of some specific act or omission, which act or omission is the cause of the forfeiture, and continues only until the landlord shall elect whether to affirm or disaffirm the lease. When committed by the lessee, if the lease gives the landlord the right to re-enter for such breach, he has a right of election. He may elect to terminate the lease because of the breach, or he may elect to affirm it notwithstanding the breach. If he elects to terminate it, the relation of landlord and tenant ceases. He is not entitled to claim or demand rent, for rent flows from the lease, and there is no lease. If he elects to affirm, the affirmation is equivalent to a new lease with the same continuing covenants and conditions. No past breach can be used upon which to hinge a right of re-entry. Such right can again arise only in case of a new and positive breach of the covenants or conditions of the lease occurring subsequent to its affirmation. Conger v. Duryee (N. Y.) 12 Abb. N. C. 43, 47; Id., 90 N. Y. 594, 600.

CONTINUING DEBT.

Where a debt exists at the time a voluntary conveyance is made by the debtor, and subsequently the debtor gives a note for an account or in lieu of a note, the original debt still continues, and will hold preference over the voluntary conveyance, as if no change in the debt had been made. Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 103; Brown v. McDonald (S. C.) 1 Hill, Eq. 297, 304. But the authorities are uniform to the effect that, where the debt existing at the making of the voluntary conveyance is in fact paid by the debtor, no debt subsequently created between the same parties, although in the transaction of the same character of business, will be considered as a debt existing at the date of the conveyance—that is, as a continuing debt. Gonzales v. Adoue, 58 S. W. 951, 952, 94 Tex. 120.

CONTINUING GUARANTY.

A guaranty relating to a future liability of the principal, under successive transactions, which either continue his liability, or from time to time renew it after it has been satisfied, is called a "continuing guaranty." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2814; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4640; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1984; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3640; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3106.

A continuing guaranty is an undertaking to be responsible for moneys to be advanced or goods to be sold to another from time to time. Such guaranty may, however, be terminated by a giving of notice on the part of the grantor that he will not be liable after a certain time. Buck v. Burk, 18 N. Y. 337, 340 (citing Add. Cont. 668).

A continuing guaranty is one in which the parties look to a future course of dealing for an indefinite time; hence, where the continuance of a guaranty is expressly limited, it is not a continuing guaranty. German Sav. Bank v. Drake (Iowa) 79 N. W. 121. In some cases the amount fixed in the instrument is a restriction upon the guarantor's liability only, and not upon the amount of credit that may be given to the debtor. Thus, a writing that, "in consideration that F. & Co. will and do sell to C. upon credit certain goods from time to time as she may purchase or order, I hereby guaranty and promise payment of all bills at their maturity, hereby waiving any and all notice of times or amount of sale or defaults and delays in payment therefor, not exceeding $400," is a continuing guaranty to the amount of $400. D. B. Fisk & Co. v. Rickel, 79 N. W. 120, 108 Iowa, 370.

A writing in the words, "I agree to be responsible for the price of goods purchased of you either by note or account by H. H. at any time hereafter to the amount of $1,000," is a continuing guaranty to that extent for goods to be at any time sold to H. H. before the credit is recalled. Bent v. Hartshorn, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 24, 25.

CONTINUING NUISANCE.

By "continuing nuisance," "constantly recurring grievance," or "permanent injury" is not meant the constant, unceasing nuisance or injury, but a nuisance which occurs so often and is so necessarily an incident of the use of property complained of that it can fairly be said to be continuing, although not constant or unceasing. Farley v. Gate City Gaslight Co., 31 S. E. 193, 199, 105 Ga. 323.

CONTINUING OFFENSE.

A continuing offense is a transaction or a series of acts set on foot by a single impulse, and operated by an unintermittent force, no matter how long a time it may occupy. People v. Sullivan, 33 Pac. 701, 704, 9 Utah, 195.

CONTINUOUS.

The word "continuous" implies without interval or interruption. Railroads connected by intervening roads are not continuous, but if directly connected they are continuous. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co., 22 N. J. Eq. (7 O. E. Green) 130, 402.

A claim for a pan having its perpendicular sides provided with a continuous loop, to form continuous parallel flanges, and an intermediate continuous zinc plate, is infringed by a vessel made of two tin plates and two zinc strips soldered together. Such strip is "continuous," in a mechanical and an electrical sense, and also according to the ordinary dictionary meaning of the word. Many pieces of twine may be tied together to form a continuous kite string, many different breadths may be united to form a continuous carpet, and surely two pieces of zinc may be soldered together to form a continuous strip. Brown v. Reed Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 48, 49.

"Continuous," as used in Act April 14, 1855, relating to mechanics' liens, and declaring that mechanics shall have liens for work done in the erection of a building continuous to the work previously done, does not mean that the work must be prosecuted without delay or interruption from day to day, but requires merely that the work should be prosecuted with reasonable diligence from beginning to completion. Thus, where materials are furnished and work done in the erection of a building as ordered by the owner or contractor from time to time in the ordinary progress of the work, the work done later is continuous to that previously done, within the statute. Appeal of Hofer, 9 Atl. 441, 116 Pa. 360.

To render an act continuous, its performance must be carried on without interruption, for, when its performance ceases, the act is complete and distinct, and, if afterwards a similar act is performed, it cannot be regarded as a continuation of the former. To make it continuous it must be the result of a single impulse, and performed or carried on without intermittence. People v. Sullivan, 33 Pac. 701, 702, 9 Utah, 195.

"Continuous," within the meaning of the rule that, to constitute title by adverse possession, the possession must be long, continuous, and peaceable, means, according to the doctrine of the law of England as cited by Lord Coke in Bracton, uninterrupted by any lawful possession. Ingraham v. Hough, 46 N. C. 89, 43.

As consecutive.

While the term "consecutive days" primarily means that many days directly following one another, it is also defined as meaning successive; but, in cases of contracts, that significance should be given it which the parties evidently intended it should have. A contract providing for publication in a paper for 10 consecutive days must mean publication in consecutive numbers as such paper is published. We do not regard the word "consecutive" as any more forcible than the word "continuous." Both signify "unbroken," and the fact that the newspaper published no issue on Sunday did not render the publication other than consecutive. City of El Paso v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank (Tex.) 71 S. W. 799, 802.

CONTINUOUS ACCOUNT.

An account, to be continuous, must be without break or interruption, and the term "open" means something that is not closed, and "current" signifies running, passing, or connected series; and hence a "continuous, open, and current account" is one which is not interrupted or broken, and not closed by settlement or otherwise, and is a running, connected series of transactions. Tucker v. Quimby, 37 Iowa, 17, 19; Morse v. Minton, 70 N. W. 691, 692, 101 Iowa, 603.

Where all the items of an account relate to one transaction, it constitutes a "continuous account," regardless of intervening statements of balance. Lamb v. Hanneman, 40 Iowa, 41, 43.

An account which has been closed by giving a note for the amount due is not a continuous, open, current account, so as to affect the running of the statute of limitations. Morse v. Minton, 70 N. W. 691, 692, 101 Iowa, 603.

CONTINUOUS CRIME.

A continuous crime is one consisting of a continuous series of acts, which endures after the period of consummation, as the crime of carrying concealed weapons. In the case of instantaneous crimes the statute of limitations begins to run with the consummation, while in the latter it only begins with the cessation of the criminal conduct or act. United States v. Owen (U. S.) 32 Fed. 534, 537.

CONTINUOUS CURRENT.

An electric current which is periodically reversed by a commutator, which thus breaks the current between the changes in direction, and takes off the current in sections, is known as a "reversed" or "alternated" current. This distinction between an alternating and an alternated current should be carefully noted. An alternating current continues to act in opposite directions as originally generated. An alternated current has been so reversed that the whole flows in one direction, and is then known as a "continuous" current. Every mechanically generated current is naturally and originally an alternating current. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. New England Granite Co. (U. S.) 103 Fed. 951, 952.

CONTINUOUS EASEMENT.

A continuous easement is an easement which is self-perpetuating, independent of human intervention, as the flow of a stream. Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505, 516.

A continuous easement is one which may be enjoyed without any act on the part of the person entitled thereto; as, for instance, a water spout which discharges the water whenever it rains, a drain by which surface water is carried over land, windows through which light and air enter, etc. Bonelli v. Blakemore, 5 South. 228, 231, 66 Miss. 136, 14 Am. St. Rep. 550. A continuous easement is an easement to the enjoyment of which no act of the party is necessary; as, for instance, a water course, whether natural or artificial, and water pipes to bring water upon or carry it off of the premises. Providence Tool Co. v. Corliss Steam Engine Co., 9 R. I. 564, 571.

A continuous easement is sometimes termed an "apparent easement," or one depending upon some artificial structure upon or natural formation of the servient tenement, obvious and permanent, which constitutes the easement or is the means of enjoying it; as the bed of a running stream, an overhanging roof, a pipe for conveying water, a drain or sewer. Fetters v. Humphreys, 18 N. J. Eq. (8 O. E. Green) 260, 262.

The word "continuous," as used in reference to a continuous and apparent easement, means no more than this: that the structure which produces the change in the tenement shall be of a permanent character and ready for use at the pleasure of the owner of the dominant tenement, without making an entry on the servient. Larsen v. Peterson, 30 Atl. 1094, 1097, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 88.

Easements are divided into two classes—those which are apparent and continuous, and those which are not. The former will pass on the severance of the two tenements, as appurtenant, without the use of the word "appurtenant," but the latter will not be created unless the grantor uses language in the conveyance sufficient to create the easement de novo. An easement which is continuous, and is made apparent by a permanent structure by means of which the right is enjoyed, is an easement which will be created as an appurtenant without words of grant de novo; as, for instance, the flow of water through a trunk constructed and used for that purpose. Whalen v. Manchester Land Co., 47 Atl. 443, 444, 65 N. J. Law, 206.

Easements or servitudes are divided by the Civil Code of France into continuous and discontinuous. "Continuous" are defined to be those of which the enjoyment is or may be continual without the necessity of any actual interference by man, as a water spout, or right to light or air. "Discontinuous" are those the enjoyment of which can be had only by the interference of man, as rights of way or a right to draw water. Outerbridge v. Phelps, 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. (13 Jones & S.) 555, 570; Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505, 516.

CONTINUOUS INJURY.

"A continuous injury is an injury recurring at repeated intervals, so as to be of repeated occurrence. It does not mean an injury that never ceases." Wood v. Sutcliffe, 8 Eng. Law & Eq. 217, 220.

CONTINUOUS LINE.

Rev. St. Ohio, § 3379, authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies where the road so consolidated would form a "continuous line," means a line all of which must be necessarily used in order to complete transportation between terminal points. The lines, to be continuous, must not be in any sense competitive. "The phrase 'continuous line' does not suggest to the popular mind or to any class of persons the idea of any two or three sides of a triangle or square, or of a line turning back on its own general course, so as to duplicate the means of communication between the same termini." State v. Vanderbilt, 37 Ohio St. 590, 598.

"Continuous," as used in Act N. J. March 17, 1870, authorizing the United Railroads & Canal Companies of New Jersey to consolidate their respective capital stocks, or to consolidate with any other railroad or canal company whose works shall form with their own continuous lines, means without interval or interruption. The term "continuous" is not synonymous with "connected." Railroads can be connected, either directly or by intervening roads, and they can be connected by some intervening or connecting road without being continuous. Black v. Dela- ware & R. Canal Co., 22 N. J. Eq. (7 C. E. Green) 130, 402.

"Continuous," as used in Laws 1875, c. 108, relating to the establishment of a continuous line of railroad, means a line without any interruption in space. Thus, where the routes of two roads were consolidated, and one joined the other, they were made continuous by a change of the terminus of one of the roads. People v. Brooklyn, F. & C. I. R. R. Co., 12 Wkly. Dig. 375.

CONTINUOUS RIDE.

"Continuous ride," under Acts 1900, p. 463, c. 313, requiring the street car company of Baltimore City to give, on request, to each passenger paying a fare, a transfer for a continuous ride, does not mean a ride interrupted by considerable interval of time, and hence does not prohibit the company from limiting the time within which a transfer may be used. Garrison v. United Railways & Electric Co., 55 Atl. 371, 372, 97 Md. 347.

CONTINUOUS ROUTE.

"Continuous route," as used in Act 1870, requiring the lessor and lessee railroads to form a continuous route, does not require an absolute passage of the same car from one road to the other without break or interruption. Hampe v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co., 30 Atl. 931, 932, 165 Pa. 468.

CONTINUOUS SERVITUDE.

Continuous servitudes are those whose use is or may be continual without the act of man. Such are aqueducts, drains, views, and the like. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 727.

CONTINUOUS TRIP.

A railroad ticket obligates the holder to pursue his journey between the stations named in the ticket by a train which will carry him continuously from one station to the other, both in going and returning, and does not authorize him to stop at intermediate stations. Johnson v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 63 Md. 106, 109.

In a passenger check issued by a railroad company, and providing "that this check is good only for continuous passage on regular passenger trains and must be used before twelve o'clock midnight," the term "continuous passage" does not refer to a continuous passage of the railroad trains or of the check, but to a continuous passage of a passenger to whom it is issued. If it referred only to a continuous passage of the train or check, as many men could station themselves along the line of the railroad as there are stopping places between the point where such check is issued to the passenger and the point for which the check has been purchased. The first holder of the check could get off at the first stopping place with his baggage, and hand the check to the man there in waiting, and he could get on the train with his baggage, ride to the next stopping place, leave the train with his baggage, hand the check to the man there in waiting, who might repeat the operation, and so on, from man to man, until the whole transit was completed; in the course of which 50 different passengers might be carried over 50 segments of the route, and the defendant's baggagemen might be obliged to handle baggage a hundred times. The continuous passage referred to in the check is the continuous passage of the person to whom it was first issued, and of no other person; and this person cannot, without the consent of the carrier, introduce a person in his stead. Walker v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 15 Mo. App. 333, 341.

CONTINUOUSLY.

The use of a stream of water continuously for more than the time requisite to acquire a prescriptive right thereto is not synonymous with the uninterrupted use of such stream, which is also essential to constitute the prescriptive right. The use might be continuous without being uninterrupted. Alta Land & Water Co. v. Hancock, 24 Pac. 645, 646, 85 Cal. 219, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217.

In the requirement of the act of 1902 authorizing corporations, and providing that no corporation shall take advantage of the act which has not continuously paid dividends on its preferred stock at a certain rate, the word "continuously" evidently means that dividends at such rate must be paid for a continuous period of one year, so that, where dividends are paid quarterly, the quarterly dividend cannot be passed without losing the benefit of the act; and where a dividend at the statutory rate was paid for the first quarter, and a like dividend for the second, third, and fourth quarters, for the year next preceding the meeting of the stockholders, it was continuously paid. United States Steel Corp. v. Hodge, 54 Atl. 1, 6, 64 N. J. Eq. 807.

CONTRABAND.

"Against law or treaty; prohibited. Goods exported from or imported into a country against its law. Articles the importation or exportation of which is prohibited by law." Black, Law Dict.

CONTRABAND LIQUORS.

The word "contraband," as used in the state dispensary law, means any alcoholic liquors which have not been purchased at a dispensary, or, if imported for personal use, have not, attached to the vessels in which the liquors are poured—bottles or baskets or jugs or boxes or crates or kegs, or the like—certificates which the state commissioner, under the law, is permitted to furnish, to throw the protection of the law around such liquors. State v. McGee, 33 S. E. 353, 354, 55 S. C. 247, 74 Am. St. Rep. 741.

Dispensary Act March 6, 1896, § 37, providing that "any person handling contraband liquors in the nighttime or delivering the same shall be guilty of misdemeanor," refers to any liquors other than dispensary liquors; and where one purchases liquors for his own use from persons outside the state and carries them into the state, and does not comply with the regulations of the dispensary law after his arrival in the state, such liquors are contraband. State v. Holleyman, 31 S. E. 362, 365, 55 S. C. 207, 45 L. R. A. 567.

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

"The classification of goods as contraband or not contraband has much perplexed text-writers and jurists. A strictly accurate and satisfactory classification is perhaps impracticable, but that which is best supported by American and English decisions may be said to divide all merchandise into three classes. Of these classes, the first consists of articles manufactured and primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war; the second, of articles which may be and are used for purposes of war or peace, according to circumstances; and the third, of articles exclusively used for peaceful purposes. Merchandise of the first class, designed to the belligerent country or places occupied by the army or navy of the belligerent, is always contraband; merchandise of the second class is contraband only when actually designed to the military or naval use of the belligerent; while merchandise of the third class is not contraband at all, though liable to seizure and condemnation for violation of blockade or siege." The Peterhoff, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 28, 58, 18 L. Ed. 564.

Goods contraband of war are of two descriptions—munitions of war, the property of a neutral bound from a neutral port to a territory of either of the belligerents after the existence of the war is known; and every species of neutral goods bound from a neutral port to a port belonging to either of the powers at war, and known to be blockaded by the other power. The principle, therefore, on which the belligerent will capture and condemn as prize the goods of a neutral bound to a port known by him to be blockaded, arises from the consideration that all such goods are contraband of war. Richardson v. Maine Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102, 114, 4 Am. Dec. 92.

Provisions.

A recent American author on international law says that "by the term 'contraband of war' we now understand a class of articles of commerce which neutrals are prohibited from furnishing to either one of the belligerents, for the reason that, by so doing, injury is done to the other belligerent," and he treats the subject chiefly in its relation to commerce on the high seas. Halleck, Int. Law, 570, 592. What articles are contraband of war has not been ascertained or accurately defined by publicists. Wheaton says that "the almost unanimous authority of elementary writers, of prize ordinances and treaties, agrees to enumerate, among these, all warlike instruments or materials, by their own nature fit to be used in war." Kent says that "the modern established rule is that provisions are not generally contraband, but may become so under the circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war, or the condition of the parties engaged in it." 1 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) pp. 138, 139. Halleck says, "It is universally admitted that provisions are not in their own nature contraband," but proceeds to show that, if adapted to military purposes, they may become so by their special destination and intended use. Halleck, Int. Law, 587. Elrod v. Alexander, 51 Tenn. (4 Helsk.) 342, 345.

Provisions, neutral property, but the growth of the enemy's country, and destined for the supply of the military and naval forces, are contraband, but provisions, neutral property, and the growth of a neutral country, destined for the general supply of human life in the enemy's country, are not contraband. The Commercen, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 382, 4 L. Ed. 116 (quoted with approval in The Benito Estenger, 20 Sup. Ct. 489, 490, 176 U. S. 568, 44 L. Ed. 592).

A contract—from "contrahere, contractum"—is a bringing together or meeting of two minds to a common intent, of which the written instrument is the legal evidence. Wilcox v. Cherry, 31 S. E. 369, 370, 123 N. C. 79.

Blackstone defines a contract to be an agreement upon a sufficient consideration to do or not to do a particular thing. Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 496, 1 Am. Rep. 576; Languille v. State, 4 Tex. App. 312, 321; Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 599, 24 L. Ed. 793; Brothers v. Brothers, 66 Pac. 901, 29 Colo. 69; Komp v. Raymond (N. Y.) 67 N. E. 113, 115; *Bishop v. It is defined by Chitty as a mutual assent of two or more persons competent to contract, founded on a sufficient and legal motive, inducement, or consideration, to perform some legal act, or to omit to do anything, the performance of which is not enjoined by law. Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 497, 1 Am. Rep. 576; Price v. Treat, 45 N. Other definitions are: The result of an agreement with some other mind. Thomas v. Kelly, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 210, 212, 16 Am. Rep. 716. An agreement or covenant between two or more persons in which each party binds himself to do or forbear some act, and each acquires a right to what the other promises. Edgerton v. Hodge, 41 Vt. 676, 680. A bargain or agreement voluntarily made upon good consideration, between two or more persons capable of contracting, to do or forbear to do some lawful act. Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 497. An agreement between parties whereby one of them acquires a right to an act by the other, and the other assumes the obligation to perform that act. *Skelly v. Bristol Sav. A promise made by one person, who is able by law to make a promise, to another person, who must be able by law to receive such promise, to do or forbear to do a certain particular thing, or it may be to do or to forbear to do several things; a transaction in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to what is promised by the other. State, to Use of Gentry, v. Fry, 4 Mo. 120, 179 (citing Powell, Cont. 6); Franklin County Grammar School v. Bailey, 20 Atl. 820, 822, 62 Vt. 467, 10 L. R. A. 405. An agreement between two or more persons competent to contract, upon a sufficient consideration, to do or not to do some particular thing, the essential elements of which are the existence of two or more contracting parties, and meeting of their minds by which each party gives his voluntary assent to the thing agreed upon, and an obligation, either created or dissolved, which constitutes the subject-matter of the undertaking. Cockrell v. McIntyre, 61 S. W. 648, 650, 161 Mo. 59. Statutory definitions are: An agreement to do or not to do a certain thing. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1549; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, §

2090; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 730; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 3835, 3836; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 1188, 1189. An agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some specified thing. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3631; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 396, 8 L. R. A. 189.

A "contract," in its more extensive sense, includes every description of agreement or publication whereby one party becomes bound to another to pay a sum of money or to do or omit to do a certain act; or a contract is an act which contains a perfect obligation. Quinn v. Shields, 17 N. W. 437, 442, 62 Iowa, 129, 49 Am. Rep. 141 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

Contracts have a leading, primary obligation—to do a specified act, to perform a specified service, or to pay or deliver a specified thing of value. Mobile Life Ins. Co. v. Randall, 74 Ala. 170, 176.

A contract is a mutual consent of the minds of the parties concerned, respecting some property or right that is the object of the stipulation, or something that is to be done or foreborne; a transaction between two or more persons in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally requires a right to whatever is promised or stipulated by the other; and any words manifesting that congregatio mentium are sufficient to constitute a contract. "Contract" and 'compact' are convertible terms, and no technical words are necessary to constitute a contract or compact." Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 1, 129.

The several stages and essentials of contract are perhaps nowhere more clearly expressed than in the interpretation clause of the Indian contract act of 1872, which will be found in Pollock's Principles of Contracts, 7, as follows: "(a) When one person signifies to another his willingness to do or to abstain from doing anything, with a view to obtaining the assent of that other to such act or abstinence, he is said to make a proposal. (b) When the person to whom the proposal is made signifies his assent thereto, the proposal is said to be accepted. A proposal, when accepted, becomes a promise. (c) The person making the proposal is called the 'promisor'; the person accepting the proposal is called the 'promisee.' (d) When, at the desire of the promisor, the promisee, or any other person, has done or abstained from doing, or does or abstains from doing, or promises to do or to abstain from doing, something, such act or abstinence or promise is called a 'consideration' for the promise. (e) Every promise, and every set of promises forming the consideration for each other, is an agreement." Williams v. Rogan, 59 Tex. 438, 440.

A contract is the meeting of two minds. It involves an offer and acceptance, and it must bind both parties. The essentials of a contract are said to be a person able to contract, a person able to be contracted with, a thing to be contracted for, a good and sufficient consideration, clear and explicit words to express the contract, and the assent of both the contracting parties. Durlacher v. Frazer, 55 Pac. 306, 309, 8 Wyo. 58, 80 Am. St. Rep. 918; Haney v. Caldwell, 43 Ark. 184, 189; Komp v. Raymond, 67 N. E. 113, 115, 175 N. Y. 102; Bristol v. Mente, 80 N. Y. Supp. 52, 55, 79 App. Div. 67.

It is essential to the existence of a contract that there should be (1) parties capable of contracting; (2) their consent; (3) a lawful object; and (4) sufficient cause or consideration. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 3835, 3836; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 1188, 1189.

A contract in writing contains, in express terms or by natural inferences, the stipulation into which the parties have thought proper to enter. Wright v. Latham, 7 N. C. 298, 301.

The intention of the parties, which is not communicated to either the one or the other, forms no agreement or contract, although they may correspond. Coleman v. Roberts, 1 Mo. 97, 101.

Three classes of obligations are known in the law as "contracts," and are so distinguished for the purpose of remedial justice, namely, express contracts, implied contracts, and constructive contracts. Wickham v. Weil, 17 N. Y. Supp. 518, 519.

Agree synonymous.

See "Agree"; "Vice Commercial Agent."

Appointment distinguished.

See "Appoint—Appointment."

Application for life insurance.

Propositions, negotiations, correspondence, or conversations do not make a contract unless the minds of the parties meet upon the same stipulations, and they consent to comply with them. An application for life insurance is not a contract. It is only a proposal to contract on certain terms, which the company to which it is presented is at perfect liberty to accept or to reject. Travis v. Nederland Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 486, 487, 43 C. C. A. 653.

Assent or acceptance.

A contract includes a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who on his part accepts such promise. Gallagher v. White (N. Y.) 31 Barb. 92, 99.

"An offer or proposal made by one party, and the acceptance thereof by the other, constitute a contract. In other words, a contract is thereby concluded so that it may be enforced." Cochrane v. Justice Min. Co., 26

Pac. 780, 782, 16 Colo. 415 (quoting Pom. Spec. Perf. § 59).

It is an elementary principle of law that to constitute a legal contract there must be an agreement in the minds of the parties or the consent and harmony of their intentions; and they must propose and mean the same thing and in the same sense. Lewis v. Wells (U. S.) 85 Fed. 896, 900. It is essential that there must be reciprocal assent to a certain and definite proposition. A mere offer not assented to constitutes no contract. So long as a proposal has not been acceded to it is binding upon neither party, and may be rectified. The parties must assent to the same thing in the same sense, and the proposition must be met by an acceptance which corresponds with it entirely and adequately. Blum v. Daly, 49 N. Y. Supp. 136, 137, 22 Misc. Rep. 342. The minds of the parties must assent to the same thing in the same sense. There must be a mutual assent to all the propositions. The acceptance must be unequivocal, unconditional, and without any variance of any sort between it and the proposal. Taylor v. Von Schraeder, 107 Mo. 206, 16 S. W. 675. The rule is well settled that the acceptance to close a contract on an offer must be absolute, unambiguous, unequivocal, without condition or reservation, and in exact accordance with the offer. Scott v. Davis, 42 S. W. 714, 719, 141 Mo. 213. To constitute a contract by letters between two parties, a definite proposition must be made by one party, and an absolute and unconditional acceptance of it by the other party. There must be a meeting of two minds of one and the same intention. Bowen v. Hart (U. S.) 101 Fed. 376, 380, 41 C. C. A. 390. The gist and meaning of the word "contract" is that the minds of the parties must meet and agree upon a given proposition. One must make a definite and absolute offer, and the other an unconditional acceptance, before a legal contract can be made. McCormick v. Bonfils, 60 Pac. 296, 299, 9 Okl. 605. There must be a meeting of the minds of the contracting parties; and, where there is no express contract, the party sought to be charged must have such knowledge, or what is equivalent thereto, before his mind can act on the subject, and assent to the terms of the contract. Atwater v. Lockwood, 39 Conn. 45-49. A contract is made when, and not before, it has been executed or accepted by both parties, so as to become binding upon both. Holder v. Aultman, Miller & Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 269, 272, 169 U. S. 81, 42 L. Ed. 669. It does not become such until the minds of the contracting parties meet. Shuenfeldt v. Junkermann (U. S.) 20 Fed. 357, 359. Wherever there is not an assent, expressed or implied, to the terms of the proposed contract by both parties, there is no mutuality and no contract. Smith, Cont. (3d Ed.) 171. So, where the inhabitants of a town voted to take stock in a railroad company, provided its railroad should be located through that town, and, upon the directors so establishing the line of road as not to pass through the town, rescinded their vote to take the stock, there was never any such proposition by one party, accepted unconditionally by the other, as to constitute a completed contract. Belfast & M. L. Ry. Co. v. Inhabitants of Unity, 62 Me. 148, 153. "Every contract, whether express or implied, includes a concurrence of intention between two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who on his part accepts such terms." So, the mere occupancy of land does not of itself imply a lease, as a lease must be created by contract, express or implied. Dixon v. Ahern, 14 Pac. 598, 599, 19 Nev. 422 (citing 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 70, 72).

A binding contract, enforceable in equity, may be constituted by the proposal of one party and the acceptance of the other. Thus, where a contract provided that, in consideration of a certain rental, defendant agreed to let plaintiff certain premises, that the agreement should be binding for six months from date, and that defendant would give plaintiff a lease for 99 years on the terms specified, it was held that though such writing was a mere offer to contract, which defendant, before acceptance, could revoke at any time, acceptance by plaintiff within the time limited, and before notice of revocation, would bind defendant. Pettibone v. Moore, 27 N. Y. Supp. 455, 457, 75 Hun. 461.

The word "contract," as used in the Constitution of the United States forbidding state legislation impairing its obligation, is used in its ordinary sense, signifying agreement of two or more minds, for considerations proceeding from one to the other, to do or not to do certain acts. Mutual assent to its terms is of its very essence. Livingston v. Livingston, 66 N. E. 123, 127, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L. R. A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600 (citing Chase v. Curtis, 113 U. S. 452, 464, 5 Sup. Ct. 554, 559, 28 L. Ed. 1038); Louisiana v. City of New Orleans, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 213, 109 U. S. 285, 27 L. Ed. 936. Where the transaction is not based on any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it, and no question arises for the operation of the constitutional prohibition. Morley v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 54, 57, 146 U. S. 162, 36 L. Ed. 925.

However imperfect and incomplete, as a legal obligation, an agreement might be when made, if the party subsequently acts upon it, and purchases and sales are made in accordance with it, it becomes, as to such transactions and dealings, the contract between them. Holtz v. Schmidt, 59 N. Y. 253, 256.

Award.

The term "contract" neither in technical parlance nor ordinarily includes an award. Celley v. Gray, 37 Vt. 136, 138.

The obligation to pay an award in proceedings for the condemnation of land does not rest on contract, but on necessity imposed by the Legislature and arising from constitutional prohibition. Platt v. Bright, 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 81, 87.

Bequest.

A bequest falls under the term "contract," and, when the will is admitted to probate, it is to be regarded as a contract of record. Quinn v. Shields, 17 N. W. 437, 441, 442, 62 Iowa, 129, 49 Am. Rep. 141.

Bills and notes.

The term "contracts," as used in a statute requiring that both the president and the cashier of certain banking corporations sign contracts made by such association and all bills and notes by them issued, was employed in a limited sense, and did not include bills of exchange, which were binding though signed by the president only. Allison v. Hubbell, 17 Ind. 559, 564; Jones v. Hawkins, 17 Ind. 550, 553.

Bonds.

A bond is nothing more nor less than a contract, and the sureties on a bond are simply parties to a contract, within the rules governing constructions of instruments. Eureka Sandstone Co. v. Long, 39 Pac. 446, 11 Wash. 161.

A replevin bond is a contract, within the meaning of the clause in the federal Constitution which prevents states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Lapsley v. Brashears, 14 Ky. (4 Litt.) 47, 53.

Under Act Jan. 22, 1841 (Hutchinson's Code, p. 917, art. 17), exempting from seizure or sale, under any execution, judgment, or decree founded on any contract made, etc., certain property therein mentioned, a delivery bond is not a contract. The statute refers to a contract made between the parties, upon which judicial proceedings should be or had been instituted, and not to the legal steps or process which might be allowed the defendant in the course of suit, judgment, and execution to enforce that contract. Smith v. Brown, 28 Miss. (6 Cushman) 810, 813.

When a state officer was elected and gave his bond, a contract was entered into between him and his sureties and the state. A state may contract with its citizens. Woodruff v. State, 3 Ark. 285, 301.

A bond is a contract to pay a certain sum of money, but having a clause that payment may be avoided by the performance by some one or more of the parties of certain acts. In re Fitch (N. Y.) 3 Redf. Sur. 457, 458.

Capacity to assent or accept.

The term "contract" implies the existence of a physical and moral power of as-senting, as well as a deliberate and free exercise of such power. The absence of any of these capacities in either of the parties to a contract renders the person laboring under it incapable of binding himself thereby. Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 25 S. W. 75, 78, 58 Ark. 407, 23 L. R. A. 264, 41 Am. St. Rep. 109.

A contract is an agreement between two or more parties, each being capable of assenting to its terms; and, as one devoid of reason cannot assent, of course he cannot make a legal contract. Ashley v. Holman, 15 S. O. 97, 108.

Charter of corporation.

Ever since the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward was decided by the national court, recognizing the charters of private corporations as contracts, protected from invasion by the Constitution of the United States, no other court in this country has disregarded the doctrine; and we consider it now as obligatory and settled beyond our reach either to deny or disregard, even if any of us should doubt its original propriety. Washington Bridge Co. v. State, 18 Conn. 53, 64.

"The generally accepted and technical meaning of the word 'contract' is given by Blackstone, vol. 2, p. 442. He thus defines the term: 'An agreement upon sufficient consideration to do or not to do a particular thing.' This was then, as now, its legal meaning. If this be true—and its correctness will not be questioned—where are the elements, or a single element, of a contract in the grant of a charter to a corporation? I fail to perceive any. I have said the government does not agree, promise, or covenant to perform a single act when a corporate body receives its charter, and it agrees to perform no duty. Then how can this charter or any other in any just sense be said to be a contract? Not by any rule or definition of which I am aware." Separate opinion by Walker, J., in City of East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas, Light & Coke Co., 98 Ill. 415, 449, 38 Am. Rep. 97.

"A contract is a compact between two or more persons, and is either executory or executed. A charter of a corporation alterable at the will of the legislature is not a contract." Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 575, 581, 86 Am. Dec. 240.

Const. art. 1, § 10, prohibiting the states from passing any laws impairing the obligation of contracts, includes a charter granted by a state and accepted by a corporation. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Stone (U. S.) 20 Fed. 270; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Harris, 27 Miss. (5 Cushman) 517, 536.

The term "contract," within the constitutional rule forbidding the impairment of contracts, includes an act incorporating a railroad company and exempting it from taxation. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 48 Md. 49, 70.

A charter incorporating a bank is a contract; but, unless an exemption from taxation is included therein, it will not be implied. Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 514, 558, 7 L. Ed. 939.

The term "contract," as used in the federal Constitution, prohibiting states from passing laws impairing the obligation of a contract, includes a bank charter issued by the state, wherein the state either voluntarily tenders or grants, on the application of individuals, to an artificial or legal person, certain powers on condition of acceptance and investment for the purposes of carrying out the objects of the charter. When it is accepted and acted under, the privileges secured or granted are irrevocable—as much so as if they had been made by a private individual; and it is immaterial whether the benefit to the state or the public is actual or ideal, and it may even prove injurious. Payne v. Baldwin, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 661, 675.

A charter given to a bridge company, authorizing it to build and maintain a toll bridge, is a "contract," within the meaning of that term as used in the federal Constitution, prohibiting states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. As a property right it is, however, like all other property rights, subject to the power of eminent domain of the state. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. (6 How.) 507, 518, 12 L. Ed. 535.

The charter granted by the British crown to the trustees of Dartmouth College in New Hampshire is a "contract," within the clause of the Constitution declaring that no state shall make any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 527, 4 L. Ed. 629.

Where a county grammar school was incorporated and established under an act of the Legislature appropriating to the school lands in trust for the use of the school, an attempt by a subsequent act to place the lands in charge of the selectmen, and appropriating the rents to the support of a graded school, was void, as impairing the obligation of a contract. Franklin County Grammar School v. Bailey, 20 Atl. 820, 822, 62 Vt. 467, 10 L. R. A. 405.

A contract is an agreement between two or more competent parties touching a legal subject-matter for a valuable consideration; and the act of the Missouri Legislature repealing so much of a former act as appropriated fines, forfeitures, and penalties accruing to a certain county to the support of a seminary incorporated thereby was not unconstitutional, as impairing the obligation of a contract, since the seminary was incorporated by public authority, and not by private incorporators, and the appropriation was of public funds, and the state not being able to make a contract with itself. Watson Seminary v. Pike County Court, 50 S. W. 880, 883, 149 Mo. 57, 45 L. R. A. 675.

A charter granting to certain individuals the right to organize and form a corporation, with power to construct a turnpike road, is a "contract," within the protection of the clause of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Backus v. Lebanon, 11 N. H. 19, 22, 35 Am. Dec. 466.

The act of June 30, 1837, establishing a bridge company to build a toll bridge over a river, is a contract by which the state grants certain franchises to the corporators in consideration that they agree and bind themselves to erect the bridge and keep it in repair, and permit the passage of the citizens of the state and their property over it at certain specified rates of toll. Such a contract is within the constitutional provision against laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Micou v. Tallassee Bridge Co., 47 Ala. 652, 656.

Charter or resolution of municipality.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in interpreting the clause of the Constitution forbidding states to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, has always held that the word "contract," as there used, meant a voluntary agreement of minds upon a sufficient consideration to do or not to do certain things. Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, 24 L. Ed. 760; Louisiana v. City of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936; Fisk v. Police Jury of Jefferson, 116 U. S. 131, 6 Sup. Ct. 329, 29 L. Ed. 587. Under such definition a charter providing that, when a street has once been improved under the charter, such street shall not be again improved, but may be repaired, does not constitute a contract between a property owner on this street so improved and the public that his property shall for all time thereafter be exempt from special assessment. Ladd v. City of Portland, 51 Pac. 654, 655, 32 Or. 271, 67 Am. St. Rep. 526.

A charter of a municipal corporation and the legislative acts regulating the state property held by it do not constitute "contracts," within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution. City of Lexington v. Thompson (Ky.) 68 S. W. 477, 479, 57 L. R. A. 775; Coler v. City of Cleburne, 131 U. S. 162, 9 Sup. Ct. 720, 33 L. Ed. 146; Goodwin v. Town of East Hartford, 38 Atl. 876, 884, 70 Conn. 18; State v. Barker (Iowa) 89 N. W. 204, 206, 57 L. R. A. 244.

The charter of a city is so far a contract between the state and the corporation that its right to hold and enjoy its property cannot be impaired or destroyed by subsequent legislation. But the Constitution does not exempt municipal charters from remedial legislation or general laws. The state may make laws concerning chartered corporations so long as they remain publici juris. Consequently, Laws 1855, c. 428, providing for the recovery of damages against a city by those whose property had been destroyed by a mob within the city, but making no provision for the collection of such judgment, save by the exercise of the taxing power, did not impair the obligation of any contract existing between the state and city. Davidson v. City of New York, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 230, 245.

A contract is an agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. The law binds him to perform his undertaking, and this is, of course, the obligation of his contract. Chief Justice Marshall, in Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 4 L. Ed. 529; Pfaff v. Gruen (Mo.) 69 S. W. 405, 406; Beverly v. Barnitz, 42 Pac. 725, 726, 55 Kan. 466, 31 L. R. A. 74, 49 Am. St. Rep. 257; Swinburne v. Mills, 50 Pac. 489, 490, 17 Wash. 611, 61 Am. St. Rep. 932.

"A government office is different from a government contract. The latter, from its nature, is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects. The terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither may depart from them without the assent of the other." United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393, 18 L. Ed. 830, 832 (cited with approval in Vincenheller v. Reagan, 64 S. W. 278, 284, 69 Ark. 460); Moll v. Sbisá, 25 South. 141, 142, 51 La. Ann. 290.

The charter of the board of commissioners known by the name of "The Mobile School Commissioners," an irregular quasi corporation, public in its nature, created for public ends and purposes, and not for private benefit or emolument, the corporators of which had no property therein, and paid nothing to the state amounting to a valuable consideration for such charter, did not constitute a contract between the state on the one hand and the said school commissioners on the other, the obligation of which is secured and protected from impairment by the Constitution of the United States. Mobile School Com'rs v. Putnam, 44 Ala. 506, 509, 528.

A proposition made by one contracting party and accepted by the other constitutes a contract. It evidences the meeting of their minds upon the terms of their agreement, and binds them both. Thus, a resolution of a city council that the waterworks erected by the company under an ordinance "be and are hereby accepted by the city," the same having been finished and ready for operation, and that "the company, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby released from the bonds and all liabilities under such ordinance," constitutes a contract. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Arkansas City (U. S.) 76 Fed. 271, 285, 22 C. C. A. 171, 34 L. R. A. 518.

Compact between states.

The term "contract," in the clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting the states from impairing contracts, includes a compact between different states. In the case of Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 1, 5 L. Ed. 547, this court held that a law of the state of Kentucky, which was in violation of a compact between Virginia and Kentucky, that the navigation of the Ohio should always be free, was void, and they say that this court has authority to declare a state law unconstitutional upon the ground of its impairing the obligation of a compact between different states of the Union. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 54 U. S. (13 How.) 518, 566, 14 L. Ed. 249.

Conditional acceptance.

To constitute a valid contract there must be a mutual assent of the parties thereto, and they must assent to the same thing in the same sense. Therefore an absolute acceptance of a proposal, coupled with any qualification or condition, will not be a complete contract, because there at no time exists the requisite mutual assent to the same thing in the same sense. Egger v. Nesbitt, 27 S. W. 385, 386, 122 Mo. 607, 43 Am. St. Rep. 596.

"To constitute a valid contract of sale, it is always essential that the parties mutually assent to its terms. An offer to sell or to buy does not become a contract until it is approved or accepted unconditionally, upon the exact terms by the other party; thus an order for goods subject to approval at your office does not constitute a contract." Reid v. Northwestern Implement & Wagon Co., 82 N. W. 672, 79 Minn. 369.

Constitution and laws of state.

The clause of the Federal Constitution prohibiting the states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not include a state constitution. Church v. Kelsey, 7 Sup. Ct. 897, 898, 121 U. S. 282, 30 L. Ed. 960.

The entire stock of the Bank of Arkansas was owned by the state. It furnished the capital and received the profits, and, in addition to the credit given to the notes of the bank by the capital provided, the state declared in the charter that they should be received in all payments of debts due to it. Is this a contract? A "contract" is defined to be an agreement between competent persons to do or not to do a certain thing. The undertaking on the part of the state was to receive the notes of the bank in payment from its debtors. This comes within the definition of a contract. It is a contract founded upon a good and valuable consideration—a consideration beneficial to the state, as its profits were increased by sustaining the credit, and consequently extending the circulation of the paper of the bank. With whom was this contract made? We answer, with the holders of the paper of the bank. The notes were made payable to the bearer; consequently every bona fide holder had a right under the charter to pay to the state any debt he owed it in the paper of the bank. Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 190, 205, 13 L. Ed. 383.

The clause in the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the passage of state laws "impairing the obligation of contracts" applies only to contracts which impose obligations under the general principles of law. It does not extend to those which are void in their origin under the state constitution, nor to those entered into without authority from the parties sought to be bound. A statute of the state exempting $500 worth of property from taxation when belonging to persons who had served seven years in the militia was unconstitutional; hence the statute repealing such law was not a law impairing the obligation of the contract. People v. Roper, 35 N. Y. 629, 631.

As contract in issue.

In a statute providing that where an original party to a "contract or cause of action" is dead, or where an executor is a party to the suit, action, or other proceeding, either party may be called as a witness by his opponent, the terms "contract or cause of action" mean the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial. Robertson v. Mowell, 8 Atl. 273, 274, 66 Md. 530.

Conveyance.

A conveyance is a contract under seal. There is often a difference between a power to contract and the power of making conveyances. But the power to contract given under the section, providing that contracts may be made by the wife in the same manner and to the same extent as if she were unmarried, will not be held to be limited to such contracts as are included in a section providing that a conveyance, transfer, or lien, executed by either husband or wife to or in favor of the other, shall be valid to the same extent as between other persons, and a section providing that a husband or wife may constitute the other his or her attorney in fact to control or dispose of his or her property for their mutual benefit, and under such first section the wife is authorized to enter into parol contracts with her husband. Grubbe v. Grubbe, 38 Pac. 182, 185, 26 Or. 303.

The term, "contract or cause of action in issue and on trial," in the provision that where one of the original parties to such contract or cause of action is dead or is shown to be insane the other party shall not be admitted to testify either in his own favor or in favor of any party to the action claiming under him, includes a deed relied upon by one of the parties in an action of ejectment. Davis v. Wood, 61 S. W. 695, 697, 161 Mo. 17 (citing Chapman v. Dougherty, 87 Mo. 617, 58 Am. Rep. 469; Messimer v. McCray, 113 Mo. 382, 21 S. W. 17).

As creation of debt.

The word "contracted," in a statute providing that a homestead shall not be liable to forced sale "for any death or liability contracted after the first day of January," etc., does not mean "founded upon a contract," but was used in its more general sense, as equivalent to "incurred." Smith v. Omans, 17 Wis. 395, 397.

The word "contracted," in Bill of Rights, § 22, providing that "all privileges of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted," is to be understood as referring to contracts in the legal sense of that word. Mr. Webster, in his Unabridged Dictionary, gives the legal definition of the word "contract" as being "the agreement of two or more persons, upon a sufficient consideration or cost, to do or abstain from doing some act; an agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing; a formal bargain and compact." To give this word its broadest signification would extend this section to every moneyed liability whatever, either criminal or civil. This section applies only to debts growing out of contracts express or implied. It does not apply to a penal statute. Lower v. Wallick, 25 Ind. 68, 70.

The word "contracted," in Gen. Mfg. Act 1848, § 12, as amended by Laws 1875, c. 510, providing that every such company shall within 20 days from the first day of January in each year make a report of its assets and liabilities, and if any such company shall fail so to do the trustees shall be held jointly and severally liable for the debts then existing, and for all that shall then be contracted before any such report is made, means the same as "incurred," and the statute covers every debt for which the corporation may become bound. Allen v. Clark, 15 N. E. 387, 389, 108 N. Y. 269.

The word "contract" is not used with reference to liabilities, but to debts. Men contract debts and incur liabilities. In the one case they act affirmatively; in the other the liability is incurred or cast upon them by act or operation of law. Crandall v. Bryan (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 162, 169.

To "contract a debt," in its general sense, is to incur a liability for the payment of money. Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 188, 197.

The purchase of stock by a married woman is not a contract, within the terms of the statute providing that no woman during coverture shall be capable of making any contract to affect her real and personal estate without the consent of her husband. The contract intended by such statute is a contract charging such property with a debt or liability specifically ascertained at the time it is entered into. Robinson v. Turrentine (U. S.) 59 Fed. 554, 559.

Definiteness and certainty.

The fundamentals of a legal contract are parties, subject-matter, consideration, and assent. There can be no contract, if any of these three is lacking. Thus, where a promise is made to give terminal rates, to a city it will not constitute a contract, the parties being indefinite and uncertain. Clark v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 282, 283.

"Every contract, in order to be enforced, must be intelligible. It must express the intention of the parties with a reasonable degree of certainty. If the terms of the agreement be so vague or indefinite, or its provisions be so defective, that the intention of the parties cannot be ascertained, the contract is void for uncertainty." Rue v. Rue, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 369, 375.

Where two writings, relied upon by the parties to constitute a contract, disclosed an agreement by the vendor to sell to himself certain live stock, and by the vendee to buy of himself the same stock, there was no contract, as it is no part of the duty of courts to make contracts for parties, and there is no rule of construction by which the writings could be held to be a contract by the vendor to sell, and the vendee to buy, the stock. Canterberry v. Miller, 76 Ill. 355, 357.

An agreement to deliver rock at a certain price, but in which no quantity is fixed that the one party is to furnish, or the other is obliged to accept, does not constitute contract. American Bridge & Contract Co. v. Bullen Bridge Co., 46 Pac. 138, 139, 29 Or. 549.

A contract is an agreement which creates an obligation, an offer to sell, not certain as to quantity nor capable of being made certain, does not constitute a contract. Ashcroft v. Butterworth, 136 Mass. 511, 514.

Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, imposes a penalty for assisting or encouraging the immigration of laborers under contract. Held, that the word "contract," as there used, meant a binding engagement to employ the laborers on their arriving in the United States, which agreement was made previous to their immigration or migration, and that the mere fact that a manufacturer in the United States replied to a letter asking for employment in a certain business from a laborer in England, by inclosing tickets from Liverpool to St. Louis, and stating that he could give the applicant steady work, nothing being said on either side as to time or compensation, did not constitute a contract prohibited by the statute. United States v. Edgar (U. S.) 48 Fed. 91, 96, 1 C. C. A. 49.

As executory contract.

Act 1861, § 10, concerning railroad corporations, and providing that no contract shall be binding on a company unless made in writing, is limited to contracts wholly executory, and cannot refer to those liabilities which the law itself implies from benefits received and actually enjoyed, where the services have been performed on the one side and received and enjoyed on the other. Foulke v. San Diego & G. S. P. R. Co., 51 Cal. 365, 367.

Exemption statute.

A legislative act requiring that certain lands which should be purchased for the Indians should not thereafter be subject to any taxes constitutes a contract which could not be rescinded by subsequent legislative act, such attempted rescission being void under the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligations of contracts. State of New Jersey v. Wilson, 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 164, 166, 3 L. Ed. 303.

"Contracts," within the meaning of the prohibition in the federal Constitution against laws impairing the obligation of contracts, meant contracts by which perfect rights—certain, definite, fixed, private rights—of property are vested. These are clearly distinguished from measures or engagements adopted or undertaken by the body politic or state government for the benefit of all, and from the necessities of the case, and according to the universal understanding, to be varied or discontinued as the public good shall require; and the term as so used would not include a provision in a general militia act, extending limited immunity from taxation to members of certain volunteer companies. People v. Roper, 35 N. Y. 629, 638.

As formal contract.

Pub. St. c. 191, § 1, in relation to mechanics' liens, provides that the lien shall not be of force against a mortgage actually existing and duly recorded prior to the date of the contract under which the lien is claimed. Held, that the word "contract" includes not only formal bilateral contracts, oral or written, but also contracts created by an agreement on one side and action under it on the other, such as to bring the parties into a contractual relation before the mortgage is recorded. Batchelder v. Hutchinson, 37 N. E. 452, 453, 161 Mass. 462.

The charter of an insurance company, requiring its contracts, bargains, agreements, policies, and other instruments to be in writing and executed by certain officers, has reference only to executed contracts or policies of insurance by which the company is legally bound to indemnify against loss, not to those initial or preliminary arrangements which necessarily precede the execution of the formal instrument by the officers of the company. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Colt, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 560, 567, 22 L. Ed. 423.

Franchise.

See "Franchise."

Government contracts.

The clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting the states from impairing the obligation of contracts covers the obligation of its own contracts as well as the obligation of the contracts of individuals. Buckner v. Finley, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 586, 589, 7 L. Ed. 528.

Imprisonment for debt as part of contract.

A contract "is an agreement by one or more persons to do or not to do some particular thing. Imprisonment for debt is no part of the contract to pay, and may be abolished without impairing its obligation." Mason v. Haile, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 370, 379, 6 L. Ed. 660; Wood v. Mallin, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 208, 209.

Injuries from breach as part of contract.

The term "contracts," as used in the rule of law that one of the classes of acts or admission of which the law takes cognizance is contracts, includes agreements and the injuries resulting from their breach. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 30 S. E. 968, 970, 104 Ga. 692.

Insurance policy.

In an insurance policy wherein it was provided that "this policy is made and accepted on the express terms herein, and no part of this contract can be waived except in writing," the term "contract" was used synonymously with "policy." Wilkins v. State Ins. Co., 45 N. W. 1, 43 Minn. 177.

Judgment.

Though a judgment is said by Bouvier to be a contract of the highest obligation, a judgment cannot with strict accuracy be regarded as a contract. It is not an agreement or covenant between two or more persons; it is not a mutual promise upon mutual consideration, creating obligations; it is not an agreement between two or more to do or not to do a particular thing. A judgment or decree by consent comes nearer to a contract than any other, but even such is only the result of an antecedent contract, liability, or penalty. Sprott v. Reid (Iowa) 3 G. Greene, 489, 494, 56 Am. Dec. 549.

A judgment "is a contract in the sense that it may be sued upon in another judicial tribunal, but it is not a contract in that it can only be rendered against a party then capable of contracting a specialty debt. It is not true that a judgment rests either upon the will or the capacity to contract of the party against whom it is rendered. Freem. Judgm. § 4. If a judgment is a contract, and can only be rendered against one who is then capable of contracting, by the laws of the forum there could not be a judgment on a contract made in another state, unless by the law of the forum that contract would be valid. This would destroy the rule of comity and international law which makes the validity of a contract and the capacity of the contractor depend on the place where the contract is made or is to be performed, or the domicile of the contractor, as the case may be, and not upon the law of the forum." Wadsworth v. Henderson (U. S.) 16 Fed. 447, 451.

A judgment is essentially different from a contract in its nature and elements, and is deemed in law an obligation of record. Wells v. Edmison, 22 N. W. 497, 499, 4 Dak. 46.

A decree or judgment at law is not a contract. Contracts are made between the willing; judgments and decrees are rendered against the unwilling, and they extinguish the contract. Contracts must be statutized to be made with reference to the remedies the Legislature may from time to time afford to enforce them. Williams v. Waldo, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 264, 269.

A judgment, when it is granted upon a contract, determines what the contract is, and closes it, giving the party in whose favor the judgment is rendered the means of enforcing the contract thus determined, or redress for its breach. A judgment of this sort involves two ideas, the contract upon which it is rendered and the judgment itself. The one is the act of the party, the other is the act of the court. They are entirely separate and distinct, so that, a statute authorizing a penalty for the taking of usury under any contract for the hiring of money, etc., will not be held to apply to a judgment on a contract allowing a usurious rate of interest. Ryan v. Southern Mut. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 27 S. E. 618, 620, 50 S. C. 185, 62 Am. St. Rep. 831.

In Morse v. Toppan, 3 Gray, 411, it is said that a judgment is in the nature of a contract. It is a specialty, and creates a debt, and to have that effect it must be taken against one capable of contracting a debt. A judgment is a contract in the sense that it may be sued upon in another judicial tribunal, but it is not a contract in that it can only be rendered against a party then capable of contracting a specialty debt. Wadsworth v. Henderson (U. S.) 16 Fed. 447, 451.

A judgment is properly classified as a "contract" with reference to actions or remedies upon it, and is a "contract" within the meaning of a statute authorizing an attachment in an action on a contract, expressed or implied. Meyer v. Brooks, 44 Pac. 281, 282, 29 Or. 203, 54 Am. St. Rep. 790.

It has been stated by many judges and text-writers that a judgment is a "contract," but we think that is true only, as stated in an Alabama case, in a very recondite and remote sense of the term. Keith v. Estill (Ala.) 9 Port. 669. In this sense all men, as members of society, enter into a "contract" to perform whatever the laws prescribe, and a judgment inflicting a punishment and a judgment for money are alike "contracts" in this sense. But it cannot be properly said that one convicted of a felony serves a term of imprisonment in performance of a contract, or that a pardon of the executive is a mere release of his contract to serve such term. A judgment does not come within the definition of a "contract" as the term is used in our Constitution and statutes. It is lacking in the elements of an agreement or convention of parties, the meeting of the minds of the parties, which is essential to a valid contract, for, usually at least, a judgment is against the will of the defendant. A judgment is not a contract in such a sense that the rate of interest thereon cannot be reduced by a subsequent statute. Wyoming Nat. Bank v. Brown, 53 Pac. 291, 292, 7 Wyo. 494, 75 Am. St. Rep. 935.

"A domestic judgment is a contract of record. It is the highest form of obligation. In one sense it may be termed a 'contract by specialty.' 1 Pars. Cont. *7; Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S. 245, 248, 26 L. Ed. 729. In another, it may be regarded as raising an implied contract. Denison v. Williams, 4 Conn. 402, 403." But a judgment is not a contract under seal, nor implied contract, within the meaning of Gen. St. § 1371, limiting actions on simple or implied contract to six years. Barber v. International Co. of Mexico, 51 Atl. 857, 858, 74 Conn. 652, 92 Am. St. Rep. 246.

In the accepted text-books contracts are divided into three classes: First, contracts of record, such as judgments, recognizances, and statutes staple; second, specialties which are under seal, such as deeds and bonds; third, simple contracts, or contracts in parol. So that "An act entitled an act relating to contracts and promises" is broad enough to embrace judgment debts. Hager v. McDonald (U. S.) 65 Fed. 200, 202.

Sometimes the word "contract" would include a judgment, sometimes not. Generally it does not include a judgment. Louis- ana v. City of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936. But in the definition of contracts the books include as contracts, contracts of record, such as judgments, recognizances, and statutes staple. 1 Story, Cont. §§ 1, 2. "When a specific sum is adjudged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff in an action or suit at law, this is a contract of the highest nature." 2 Bl. Comm. p. 465. Under this authority we can readily say that in the construction of Code 1899, c. 125, § 46, allowing plaintiff a judgment on affidavit in "actions for the recovery of money arising out of contract," the word includes a judgment. Marsteller v. Ward, 43 S. E. 178, 181, 52 W. Va. 74.

A judgment for money is not, stricti juris, a "contract." Bank of United States v. Dallah, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 574, 578.

Alk. Dig. 270, declares that all actions on contract, without specialty, shall be commenced within six years after a cause of action shall have accrued. Held, that the word "contract" as used in the statute is employed in its popular signification, and hence does not embrace a judgment rendered in another state. Keith v. Estill (Ala.) 9 Port. 669, 670. So, also, under a similar statute, Burnes v. Simpson, 9 Kan. 658, 664.

Code, § 2523, providing that the assignee of a "contract for the payment of money" shall be entitled to maintain an action thereon in his own name, does not include a judgment. Johnson v. Martin, 54 Ala. 271, 273. See, also, under Code, § 2540, Johnson v. Maxey, 43 Ala. 521, 538.

As the term is used in Code Civ. Proc. § 51, providing that a promise in writing, etc., shall be received as evidence of a new and continuing "contract" to repel the statute of limitations, it does not include a judgment, there being nothing in a judgment from which a voluntary payment, etc., could be inferred, and a judgment for money is not strictly a contract at all, but is a judicial imposition of a civil liability, and is a more conclusive evidence of an indebtedness than a contract by specialty. A judgment is not an agreement, contract, or promise in writing, nor is it in a legal sense a specialty; therefore an action thereon is not within the statute of limitations. McDonald v. Dickson, 87 N. C. 404, 408. So, also, under a like statute, Rev. St. 1876, p. 128, Niblack v. Goodman, 67 Ind. 174, 180.

A judgment is properly classified as a "contract" with reference to actions or remedies upon it, and is a contract within the meaning of a statute authorizing an attachment in an action on a contract, expressed or implied. Meyer v. Brooks, 44 Pac. 281, 282, 29 Or. 203, 54 Am. St. Rep. 790.

The term "contract," as used in Rev. St. § 2647, subd. 2, providing that several causes of action may be united when they arise out of contract, express or implied, is used in its enlarged sense, and as so used includes a judgment, an action on which, by such construction, may be joined with an action for breach of an express contract. Childs v. Harris Mfg. Co., 32 N. W. 43, 68 Wis. 231 (citing Barnes v. Smith [N. Y.] 16 Abb. Prac. 420; Mahaney v. Penman, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. [4 Duer] 603).

An action upon a judgment in another state is an action arising on "contract," within the meaning of the provision of the Code of Oregon providing that in such action any other cause of action arising also on contract and existing at the commencement of the action may be pleaded as a counterclaim. Rose v. Northwest Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 71 Fed. 649, 651. So, also, under statutes which provide only for a set-off of claims founded on contract. Sawyer v. Villas, 19 Vt. 43, 47.

Laws 1879, c. 538, reduced the rate of legal interest to 6 per cent., but provided "that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to in any way affect any contract or obligation made before the passage of this act." Held, that the words "contract or obligation" meant those which rested on the voluntary mutual agreement of the parties, and hence did not embrace a judgment. O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 435, 47 Am. Rep. 64; Wyoming Nat. Bank v. Brown (Wyo.) 53 Pac. 291, 292, 75 Am. St. Rep. 935. Contra, see Prouty v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 546, 549.

Act March 3, 1876 (18 Stat. 470, c. 437), providing that no Circuit or District Court of the United States shall have cognizance of any "suit founded on contract" in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, should be construed to include a suit on a judgment. Metcalf v. City of Watertown, 9 Sup. Ct. 173, 128 U. S. 586, 32 L. Ed. 543.

The word "contract" in 2 Rev. St. 3, §§ 1, 2, authorizing an attachment to be issued against persons indebted on contract, means and includes a judgment. Oakley v. Aspinwall, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 1, 45.

Const. art. 8, § 35, providing that "no citizen of the state who aided or participated in the late rebellion shall be liable in any proceedings, civil or criminal, nor shall his property be seized or sold under final process issued upon judgments or decrees heretofore rendered, or otherwise, because of any act done according to the usages of civilized warfare in the prosecution of said war by either of the parties thereto," does not impair the "obligation of contract," a judgment founded on tort not being a contract. Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 564, 578.

In order to constitute a contract, there must be an agreement between parties for the doing or not doing of some specific thing. Code, § 2714. It is essential to a contract that the parties assent to its terms. Id. §§ 2720-2727. A judgment rendered in an action for a tort, growing out of the wrongful conversion of personal property, is not a contract within the meaning of that clause of the federal Constitution forbidding the state to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. McAfee v. Covington, 71 Ga. 272, 273, 51 Am. Rep. 263.

A judgment, whether founded on tort or contract, is a contract within New York Code, § 635, providing that judgment may be granted in actions for money, as damages for "breach of contract," express or implied. Gutta-Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. v. City of Houston, 108 N. Y. 276, 15 N. E. 402, 403, 2 Am. St. Rep. 412.

License.

"A license is merely an authority to do an act or a series of acts on the land of the licensor. It needs no consideration to support it, and transfers no interest in the land, and is from its nature revocable at the will of the licensor. A contract, on the other hand, requires a consideration to support it, and confers rights which may be enforced by law." Baltimore & H. R. Co. v. Algire, 63 Md. 319, 322.

A license to practice law is not a contract investing the person to whom it is granted with rights which cannot be interfered with by the state. None of the essential elements of a contract are to be found in the grant of a license to practice law. There is no engagement between the state and the individual that he will follow the practice of law for a livelihood, and no legal consideration paid for the license. The grant of the license is a mere naked privilege without consideration, and which the applicant may or may not, at his option, avail himself of. Languille v. State, 4 Tex. App. 312, 320 (quoting Simmons v. State, 12 Mo. 268, 49 Am. Dec. 131).

An annual license fee imposed by a state on corporations is not a contract, express or implied, within the meaning of Bankr. Act, § 63, cl. 4, and provable as such. In re Danville Rolling Mill Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 432, 433.

A license to retail liquor is nothing more than a mere permit. It is not a contract nor a grant. The person who receives it takes it with the tacit condition and the full knowledge that the matter is at all times within the control of the sovereign power of the state. Shea v. City of Muncie, 46 N. E. 138, 142, 148 Ind. 14. The license by a town for the sale of intoxicating liquors therein is not a contract. A license confers a right to do that which without the license would be unlawful. People v. Raima, 39 Pac. 341, 342, 20 Colo. 489.

As making and contents of contract.

The phrase "as to such contract," as used in Gen. St. 1866, c. 3, § 8, providing that, when the original parties to one side of a contract are dead, the other parties thereto shall not be allowed to testify as to such contract, is equivalent to the words "as to what took place between the parties to the contract at the time of making the same," and includes, with perhaps other things, the making and contents of the contract. Johnson v. Coles, 21 Minn. 108, 109.

Marriage or promise of marriage.

See, also, "Marriage."

Const. art. 13, prohibiting negroes or mulattoes from coming into the state, and providing that all contracts made with those coming in, contrary to such prohibition, shall be void, will be construed to include marriage. Barkshire v. State, 7 Ind. 389, 390, 65 Am. Dec. 738.

Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 442, providing that whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to the "contract on which the action is brought," he may file, in addition to his answer, a cross-complaint, is not confined to suits affirming the validity of a contract and seeking to enforce it. A cross-complaint may be filed in a suit for divorce, for it relates to the contract on which the action is brought, though the marriage state is a status, for such status results from a contract, and when the status is dissolved the contract is certainly not left in force, and, not being left in force, it is dissolved by decree making the suit, at least in part, for the dissolution of a contract. Wadsworth v. Wadsworth, 22 Pac. 648, 650, 81 Cal. 182, 15 Am. St. Rep. 38.

"Contract," as used in Const. U. S. 14th Amend., prohibiting the states from impairing the obligation of a contract, means contracts with respect to property, or some object of value, which confer rights capable of being asserted in a court of justice, and as so defined does not include a contract of marriage, so as to preclude the state from passing an act prohibiting white and colored persons intermarrying. State of Georgia v. Tutty (U. S.) 21 Fed. 753, 757, 7 L. R. A. 50.

"Contract," as the term is used in the clause of the Constitution forbidding laws impairing the obligation of contracts, includes marriage, which is a civil contract, though it is also a relation, and hence a legislative divorce is invalid. State, to Use of Gentry, v. Fry, 4 Mo. 120, 180.

2 Rev. St. 138, providing "that marriage, so far as its validity in law is concerned, shall continue in this state a civil contract to which the consent of parties capable in law of contracting shall be essential," does not attempt to define the nature, attributes, or distinguishing features of marriage. Marriage is more than a contract. It partakes more of the character of an institution regulated and controlled by public authority for the benefit of the community. Judge Story says: "It is rather to be deemed an institution of society, founded upon the consent and contract of the parties." It has been held not to be a contract within the provision of the United States Constitution prohibiting states from passing laws impairing the obligations of contracts. White v. White (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 480; Fuller v. Trustees of Plainfield Academic School, 6 Conn. 540; Maguire v. Maguire, 37 Ky. (7 Dana) 181; Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87. Moreover, in actions on contract the motives for violation are immaterial, while in an action for breach of promise of marriage the motives of the defendant and other intrinsic circumstances may be given in mitigation or aggravation of damages. In view of these principles, an action for breach of promise of marriage is not an action on a contract, within the meaning of the statute providing that actions upon contract may be maintained by and against executors wherever they might have been maintained by or against their respective testators. Wade v. Kalbfleisch, 58 N. Y. 282, 284, 17 Am. Rep. 250.

Necessity of consideration.

"A contract is a promise made on a consideration. Without a consideration there can be no contract, express or implied. There must be a subject-matter in respect to which there has been a meeting of the minds of the parties. A contract involves an offer and an acceptance." Davis v. Town of Seymour, 21 Atl. 1004, 59 Conn. 531, 13 L. R. A. 210.

A contract is said by Mr. Parsons to be "an agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some particular thing." Such an agreement, to be a contract, must be based on a sufficient consideration, and this is made a part of the definition by many elementary writers. Trustees of Howard College v. Turner, 71 Ala. 429, 432, 46 Am. Rep. 326.

"A contract is an agreement between two or more persons whereby, in consideration of something done or promised to be done by the party on one side, the party on the other side undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. A valuable consideration is an essential element." Wheeler v. Glasgow, 11 South. 758, 760, 97 Ala. 700; Price v. Treat, 45 N. W. 790, 792, 29 Neb. 536.

A contract implies the assent of two minds. The parties must understand that one party has made an offer and the other has accepted it. But if A. promised B. to pay him a certain sum of money if he would call for it at a particular time, and B. calls accordingly, the promise is binding, the calling for the money being a sufficient consideration. It is not necessary that the consideration should exist at the time of making the promise, for if a person to whom the promise is made should incur any loss or liability in consequence of the promise, and relies upon it, the promise thereupon becomes obligatory. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, 253.

The word "contract," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring every contract for the sale of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, etc., to be in writing (Laws 1869, p. 363), may be said to be a broader term in this regard than "agreement," and to more imperatively demand the construction that it embraces the consideration. A contract would seem to import something more than an agreement. It is defined to be "an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing." A consideration is a necessary element to the contract. Under this statute the consideration, as well as the promise itself, must appear in writing in a contract for the sale. Patmor v. Haggard, 78 Ill. 607, 610.

Three things must concur to constitute a valid and binding contract, namely, competent parties, subject-matter, and a valuable consideration. A contract for the sale of a mileage book, which provided that it would be good only when presented to the train conductor with a passage ticket issued in exchange for coupons detached from the book, and reciting as a consideration that the book was sold at a reduced price, whereas it was sold at the price fixed by law, is not a valid contract. Corcoran v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 861, 863, 20 Misc. Rep. 197.

Obligations implied by law or quasi contracts.

Though, in its popular signification, the word "contract" is generally limited to actual agreements between determinate contracting parties, it has in law a much more extended signification, and embraces not only the agreements of parties actually to do or refrain from doing something lawful, but also many other legal applications which the law creates or implies from certain relations of the parties to each other. Umlauf v. Umlauf, 103 Ill. 651, 654.

The word "contract," strictly speaking, does not include obligations imposed by law as quasi contract, such as the obligation of a trustee to pay over moneys in his hands, which obligation grows out of a duty which the law imposes. Quasi contracts are not contracts at all, but are mere obligations based on the doctrine of unjust enrichment, which the law imposes on a person who has received money or property of another, which he in equity and good conscience ought not to retain to his own use, to repay the same to the person equitably entitled thereto. Appeal of Pierce, 103 Pa. 27, 31.

An action on contract includes not only actions on contracts in fact, but also actions on quasi or implied contracts which arise by operation of law. Thus an action to recover money due from an insurance agent to a city fire department for a percentage of insurance premiums received by him under a liability imposed by statute to pay the sum was clearly an action on contract. Chitty says: "Though a statute may in some respects be considered as a specialty, yet assumpsit may be supported for money, etc., accruing, due to the plaintiff under the provisions thereof, he not being thereby restricted to any other particular remedy." Fire Department of the City of Oshkosh v. Tuttle, 50 Wis. 552, 7 N. W. 549 (citing 1 Chit. Pl. [16th Am. Ed.] 118).

The word "contract" is almost universally employed to denote an undertaking voluntarily entered into between the parties, not drawing into contemplation any creation of the law. Bish. Cont. § 191. All true contracts grow out of the mutual intention of the parties; and if in a particular instance there is evidence arising from the situation, conduct, or family relationship of the parties tending to show that the service was rendered without expectation of any payment, or without other payment than such as was received as the service progressed, it cannot be said as a matter of law that a contract is implied on the part of the defendant to pay for such services." Saunders v. Saunders, 38 Atl. 172, 173, 90 Me. 234 (citing Cole v. Clark, 85 Me. 336, 338, 27 Atl. 186, 21 L. R. A. 714, and authorities there cited).

Obligation included.

A contract consists not only of the stipulations which the parties have expressed in words, but also of the obligations that are reasonably implied as concomitants of those stipulations. Bloomfield v. New York & N. J. Tel. Co., 52 Atl. 240, 241, 68 N. J. Law, 207.

Obligation of contract distinguished.

A well-recognized distinction is drawn between a contract itself and its obligation. The contract is the agreement of the parties; the obligation is the remedy which the law affords for its enforcement. Moore v. Collins, 16 S. C. 15, 29.

A contract "is an agreement between two or more persons to do or not to do a particular thing. The obligation of the contract is founded in the terms of the agreement, sanctioned by moral and legal principles."

Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 420, 572, 9 L. Ed. 773, 998.

Parties.

A contract is an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing. A man cannot pass a consideration from himself to himself, and hence no man can make a contract with himself; the thing is impossible. Allin v. Shadburne's Ex'r, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 68, 80, 25 Am. Dec. 121.

Partnership.

The word "contract," in its ordinary legal sense, implies two opposite parties or sets of parties, each having in the subject-matter of the contract a right distinct and different from that of the other. Indeed, so marked is the difference, the right of the one is the duty of the other. If one is the vendor, the other is the vendee; if one is bailor, the other is bailee; and the law of contract was first developed through the allowance of actions for the breach. A right of action is often the test of the existence of a legal contract. The word "contract," as used in a statute allowing a married woman to make a contract with her husband, does not include a business partnership between them. Haggett v. Hurley, 40 Atl. 561, 562, 91 Me. 542, 41 L. R. A. 362.

Patent.

See "Patent."

Pawnbroker's ticket.

Under Internal Revenue Act 1864. § 170 (13 Stat. 297), providing for the taxation of contracts and agreements, a pawnbroker's ticket, given under the statute of California, containing the names of the parties, a description of the property pledged, the sum loaned, the length of time for which the loan is made, and the rate of interest which it bears, is a contract. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1174.

Political relations or functions.

The word "contract," in its largest sense, would comprehend political relations between the government and its citizens, would extend to offices held within a state for state purposes, and to many of those laws concerning civil institutions which must change with circumstances and be modified by ordinary legislation, together with all agreements between one man and another, based on mutual promises or promises based on consideration; but as the term is used in the federal Constitution, prohibiting the state from passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts, the word "contract" must be understood in a more limited sense to mean simply contracts respecting property under which some individual could claim a right to something beneficial to himself, and includes merely agreements between individuals and corporations. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 627, 4 L. Ed. 629.

"Contracts," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, means contracts "by which perfect rights, certain, definite, fixed, and private rights of property, are vested. These are to be distinguished from measures or engagements adopted or undertaken by the body politic or state government for the benefit of all, and from the necessity of the case, and according to universal understanding, to be varied or discontinued as the public good shall require." A statute providing that, before a county seat may be moved an assessment must be made for the owners of the lots at such county seat for their lots and improvements, is not a contract between the state and such owners. Moses v. Kearney, 31 Ark. 261, 265.

See "Property."

Public office.

Public offices are delegations of portions of the sovereign power of the state for the welfare of the public. They are created for the purposes of government. They are not the subjects of contract, but are agencies for the state, revocable at pleasure by the authority creating them, unless such authority be limited by the power which conferred them. As stated by Judge Cooley in Wyandotte v. Drennan, 46 Mich. 478, 480, 9 N. W. 500: "Nothing seems better settled than that an appointment or election to a public office does not establish a contract relation between the person appointed or elected and the public." Attorney General v. Jochim, 58 N. W. 611, 613, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606.

Public office is not a contract; it is in the nature of a trust or agency. The distinction between a "contract" and a "public office" is marked. If the former is not fully executed, the delinquent is liable, and must respond in damages; while in the latter the officer may lay aside his office by resignation, at pleasure, and with it all further liability. A county officer accepts his office subject to whatever regulations the Legislature may afterwards make respecting it. New duties may be imposed upon an incumbent without additional compensation, and his compensation, as fixed by law when elected, may be either increased or decreased. It is settled that public office is accepted cum onere. Sudbury v. Monroe County Com'rs, 62 N. E. 45, 48, 157 Ind. 446.

The words "public or fiducial office, trust or employment," in St. § 3752, providing that the recovery on a bond required by law for the discharge or performance of any public or fiducial office, trust, or employment shall not be limited by the amount of the penalty named, does not include the relation arising between a county and one contracting with it, and therefore that portion of the statute has no application to a bond executed by a road contractor for the faithful performance of his contract, and the obligors in such a bond are liable only according to its terms and to the actual extent of the amount specified therein. Moss v. Rowlett, 65 S. W. 153, 154, 112 Ky. 121.

The distinction between a contract and a public office is marked. If the former is not fully executed, the delinquent is liable, and must respond in damages; while in the latter the officer may lay aside his office by resignation at pleasure, and with it all further liability. A county officer accepts his office subject to whatever regulations the Legislature may afterwards make respecting it. New duties may be imposed upon an incumbent without additional compensation, and his compensation, as fixed by law when elected, may be either increased or diminished. It is settled that public office is accepted cum onere. Sudbury v. Moore County Com'rs (Ind.) 62 N. E. 45, 48.

Same—Compensation and term of office.

The term "contracts," within the meaning of the clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting the states from impairing obligation of contracts, does not include a law by which an existing officer is to receive a certain compensation, and therefore the reduction of his compensation during his term is not in violation of the clause. "The contracts designed to be protected are contracts by which perfect rights, certain, definite, fixed, private rights of property, are vested." Butler v. Pennsylvania, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 402-416, 13 L. Ed. 472.

An obligation to pay the salary of an officer is not a contract between the officer and the municipality, but arises by operation of law. State v. Police Jury of Jefferson, 34 La. Ann. 41, 45.

The term "contract," within the meaning of the rule that the obligations of contracts cannot be avoided by the state, includes an employment by the board of water commissioners of a city of a general superintendent for a term of years at a fixed salary, and therefore the commissioners cannot terminate the relation, and defeat the superintendent's right to compensation, before the expiration of the term, on the ground that the employment created a public office and not a mere contract of employment. Speaking of the compensation of municipal officers, Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (section 171), says: "But where the services to be performed are professional or private, rather than public or official, an employment under an ordinance for a fixed time, at a fixed sum for the period, has been held to be a contract, and subject to be impaired by the corporation." Cramer v. Water Com'rs of

New Brunswick, 31 Atl. 384, 385, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 478.

It has been well settled that public officials are merely agents of the state for the carrying out of public purposes, and that their election and the fixing of the length of time for which they shall serve are matters of public convenience or necessity, and do not fall within the scope of the term "contract," as applied to transactions between individuals, out of which definition a voter's rights of property arise. Duer v. Dashiell, 47 Atl. 1040, 1041, 91 Md. 660.

Railway tickets.

Act April 19, 1835, requiring owners of railroads and steamboats to provide each ticket agent with a certificate of authority to redeem tickets which are wholly or partly unused, and forbidding persons not having such certificate to sell such tickets, except that any one who has bought a ticket from a certified agent with a bona fide intention of traveling on same may sell it, is not unconstitutional as depriving any person of property without due process of law, or as impairing the obligation of contracts; for even if it be conceded that a ticket is a contract, notwithstanding the fact that it has been held that it is merely the evidence of a contract, or a mere receipt taken, or voucher, adopted for convenience to show that a passenger has paid his fare from one place to another, the statute would only be inoperative and of no effect as to contracts existing at the time of its passage, and it would be valid and constitutional as to future contracts. Burdick v. People, 149 Ill. 600, 36 N. E. 948, 950, 24 L. R. A. 152, 41 Am. St. Rep. 329.

Railway tickets for passage over several routes, which do not purport to be contracts, are not contracts, but are rather in the nature of receipts for the separate portions of the passage money, and their office is to serve as tokens to enable the persons having charge of the vessel and carriages of the company to recognize the bearers as parties who were entitled to be received on board. Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 306, 313, 72 Am. Dec. 469.

Recognizance.

A recognizance is not a contract between individuals to which the statute of frauds will apply; neither is it a contract of any kind. Gay v. State, 7 Kan. 394, 402.

"Contracts," as used in Comp. Laws 720, c. 146, § 2, providing that a minor shall be bound on his contracts unless he disaffirms them within reasonable time after attaining his majority, will not be construed to include a recognizance, and hence he cannot disaffirm such instrument. State v. Weatherwax, 12 Kan. 463, 465.

Remedy as part of contract.

The doctrine that the remedy provided by law to enforce a contract is part of the contract and incorporated into it has long been exploded. A decree or judgment at law is not a contract. Contracts are made between the willing; judgment and decrees are rendered against the unwilling, and they extinguish the contract. Contracts must be statuted to be made with reference to the remedies the Legislature may from time to time afford to enforce them. Accordingly, an act providing that in mortgage foreclosure proceedings the lands must be valued before sale, and that the premises shall be subject to redemption in the manner allowed for the redemption of lands sold by virtue of executions, though applicable to prior mortgages, did not take away from those holding such mortgages any rights secured to them by contract. Williams v. Waldo, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 264, 269.

Simple and special contracts included.

"Contract," in its widest sense, includes records and specialties, but the term is usually employed to designate only simple or parol contracts. Pelham v. State, 30 Tex. 422, 426.

"Though the term 'contract' is usually employed to designate either special or simple contracts, yet custom has affixed to the term all species of obligation, and in Sturges v. Scrwinshield, 4 Wheat. 122, Justice Marshall has defined a contract to be an agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. In this definition the consideration is omitted, and it was no doubt intended to embrace all kinds of contracts, whether by record, special, or parol." Sawyer v. Vilas, 19 Vt. 43, 47.

"The term 'contract' comprises, in its full and more liberal significance, every description of agreements, obligations, or legal ties whereby one party binds himself or becomes bound, expressly or impliedly, to pay a sum of money, or perform or omit to do a certain act." Woodruff v. State, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 285, 301.

Special assessment.

The term "contract," as used in a clause of the Constitution prohibiting the states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, does not include a special assessment. Essex Public Road Board v. Shinkle, 11 Sup. Ct. 790, 792, 140 U. S. 334, 35 L. Ed. 446.

Statutory penalty.

"A 'contract' is defined to be a deliberate engagement between competent parties, on a legal consideration, to do or to abstain from doing some act." "A drawing together of minds until they meet, and an agreement is made to do or not to do some particular thing." As so defined, a liability imposed by statute is not a contract, since it wants all the elements to it, viz., consideration, and mutuality, as well as the assent of the parties. McCoun v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 50 N. Y. 176, 180; Furber v. McCarthy, 7 N. Y. Supp. 613, 614, 54 Hun, 435.

A contract is an agreement between two or more to do or not to do a particular thing. An obligation arising under a statute giving a penalty for bringing negro slaves into the county and selling the same is not an obligation arising by contract, and therefore the Legislature may enact a law releasing such penalty, as it is not the impairment of a contract. Coles v. Madison County, 1 Ill. (Breese) 154-157, 12 Am. Dec. 161.

A contract is a drawing together of minds until they meet, and an agreement is made to do or not to do some particular thing. It may be express, or it may be implied or inferred from circumstances, and this implication is but the record of the ordinary and universal experience of mankind. If A. borrows money of B., the courts may imply a promise to repay the money, for the universal experience is that in such a case a promise is exacted and made. An implied promise or contract is but an express promise proved by circumstantial evidence. An action to recover a penalty imposed by statute upon telegraph companies for undue delay in the transmission and delivery of messages is not one for a breach of contract. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 396, 397, 8 L. R. A. 189.

Stipulation distinguished.

See "Stipulate."

Stockholder's liability.

The obligation which the stockholders of a corporation recognize in law which makes them liable for an amount equal to the amount of stock owned constitutes a contract with the creditors of the corporation. Pfaff v. Gruen (Mo.) 69 S. W. 405, 406.

As written contract.

The word "contract" does not necessarily import that there is a written instrument evidencing it. Pierson v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 550, 551.

"A 'contract' (con-tra-ho) is a drawing of minds till they meet. Agreement to do a par-particular thing is a contract." The writing in which the agreement of the party is expressed is frequently called the "contract," but, more properly speaking, it is but the evidence thereof. McNulty v. Prentice (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 204, 207.

"Contract" is a term which may mean either "an agreement between two parties, upon valid consideration, to do or not to do a certain thing, or a written instrument which embodies the agreement." Starkey v. City of Minneapolis, 19 Minn. 203, 207 (Gil. 166).

CONTRACT FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY ONLY.

Kan. Gen. St. 739, providing that in an action arising on "contract for the payment of money only," notwithstanding the execution of the undertaking to stay proceedings, if the defendant in error gives adequate security to make restitution in case the judgment is reversed or modified, or may, on leave obtained from the court or a judge thereof, proceed to enforce the judgment, cannot be construed to include a contract by which one agreed to repay another for letting a certain person and his family have whatever they might want for their support. A promissory note is a contract for the payment of money only; so also would any other contract be a contract for the payment of money only, if nothing was to be done under it by either party except to pay money; but where something else is also to be done under the contract, the contract can hardly be called a "contract for the payment of money only," and this is especially true where the payment of money depends on whether this something is done or not. Grant v. Dabney, 19 Kan. 390, 392.

Prac. Act, § 120, declaring that a plaintiff may have an attachment in an action on a contract, express or implied, for the "direct payment of money," means where the debt is liquidated. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, 166.

A judgment is not a contract, express or implied, "for the payment of money," according to Code 1852, § 2129 (Rev. Code, § 2523). Masterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56, 57 (citing Smith v. Harrison, 33 Ala. 706).

CONTRACTS FOR REAL ESTATE.

A contract for real estate is defined as "an agreement to sell or convey an interest, title, or estate in lands," and does not include an agreement for something in relation thereto. Hence, Gen. St. 1889, par. 4854, declaring that justices shall not have cognizance of any action on any "contracts for real estate," did not preclude the justice from taking jurisdiction of an action for money which the vendee in a contract for the sale of real estate had promised to pay to liquidate expenses incident to the sale, which he failed to complete. Duff v. Morrison, 24 Pac. 1105, 1106, 44 Kan. 562.

Actions for the purchase price of real property, when founded on a contract of sale, are actions "on contracts for real estate," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 591, providing that justices of the peace shall not have cognizance of actions on contracts for real estate. Such actions are not limited to actions to compel a conveyance of the land, or for damages for the failure to execute the conveyance or other breach of a contract by the seller, but include all matters founded on any stipulation of a contract, whether to be performed by the seller or purchaser. An action for the purchase price of the land is therefore within the class of actions named in the statute, and is not taken out of such class by the fact that the seller has executed a conveyance and fully performed his part of the contract. It is nevertheless necessary to resort to the contract for the terms of the purchaser's obligation, which is the foundation of the action. We do not hold that actions on promissory notes given for the purchase price of land are within the operation of the section. On the contrary, we think they are not, for such action would be founded on the note, and not on a contract. Crafts v. Prior, 36 N. E. 1070, 1071, 51 Ohio St. 21.

CONTRACT IMPLIED IN FACT.

The terms "express contract" and "contract implied in fact" are used to indicate a difference in the character of the evidence by which a simple contract is proved. The source of the obligation in each case is the intention of the parties. Keener, Quasi Cont. 5; Bliss v. Hoyt's Estate, 41 Atl. 1026, 1027, 70 Vt. 534.

CONTRACT IMPLIED IN LAW.

A "contract implied in law" denotes, not the evidence, but the source of the obligation. Keener, Quasi Cont. 5. It is a quasi contract created by the law without the intent of the parties to the contract, and even against their intention. Bliss v. Hoyt's Estate, 41 Atl. 1026, 1027, 70 Vt. 534.

CONTRACT IN ISSUE.

The phrase "contract in issue," in a statute enabling parties to testify as to such contracts, should not be restricted to contracts formally put in issue by the pleadings. The words mean, in such statute, the same as "contract in dispute," and relate to the substantial issues made by the evidence, as well as to the issues joined by the pleading. Hollister v. Young, 42 Vt. 403, 408.

CONTRACT IN RELATION TO LAND.

"Contract in relation to land," as used in Pasch. Dig. § 4989, providing that every title bond or other written contract in relation to land may be proved, certified, or acknowledged and recorded in the same manner as deeds for the conveyance of land, will be construed to include purchase-money notes given for land, and dated on the day of the execution of the deed, and which show on their face that they were given for the purchase price, and which expressly retain a vendor's lien on the land. Saunders v. Hartwell, 61 Tex. 679, 685.

CONTRACT JUDGMENT.

A "contract judgment," as a consent judgment is sometimes called, is where the parties agree upon the terms of the judgment—that is, as to what shall be put in the judgment—but an agreement between the parties that an award of arbitrators shall be filed in another county than that in which the case was tried does not constitute such a judgment. Henry v. Hilliard, 27 S. E. 130, 132, 120 N. C. 479.

CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT.

See "Affreightment."

CONTRACT OF AGENCY.

A contract which exists between the principal and agent is called a "contract of agency," while the right of the agent to act in the name or on behalf of the principal is termed his "authority" or "power." Frank v. Roe, 11 Pac. 820, 824, 70 Cal. 296.

CONTRACT OF BOTTOMRY.

See "Bottomry."

"Contracts of bottomry" are so called because the bottom or keel of the vessel is figuratively used to express the whole body thereof. Maitland v. The Atlantic (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 522, 523.

CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE.

A contract of carriage is a contract for the conveyance of property, persons, or messages from one place to another. Civ. Code Cal. 1903. § 2085; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4174; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 650.

CONTRACT OF HIRING.

A contract of hiring is not a sale of the thing for the period of hiring. The property remains as it did before. It is a contract for the use of the thing hired. The hirer is a mere bailee or locum tenens for the owner, and only holds the property for him; but the owner retains such a possession that he may either sell or give the property. Whitaker v. Whitaker, 12 N. C. 310, 311.

CONTRACT OF INSURANCE.

See "Insurance."

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.

The terms "contract of marriage" and "contract to marry" are used to express the same idea, though perhaps it may not be strictly accurate to so use them. There is no reason for distinguishing the "contract of marriage," if by that term is meant the marriage relation, from all other contracts, that does not equally apply to the contract of marriage which precedes and is the foundation of the consummated agreement. Lewis v. Tapman, 45 Atl. 459, 461, 90 Md. 294, 47 L. R. A. 385.

CONTRACT OF RECORD.

A "contract of record" is one which has been declared and adjudicated by a court having jurisdiction, or which is entered of record in obedience to, or in carrying out, the judgment of a court. Rev. Code, § 2674; Hardeman v. Downer, 39 Ga. 425, 451.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

See "De Facto Contract of Sale."

A contract of sale is an agreement by which one gives a thing for a price in current money, and the other gives the price in order to have the thing itself. Three circumstances concur to the perfection of the contract, to wit, the thing sold, the price, and the consent. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2439.

Inasmuch as a sale is a contract or agreement, it is frequently spoken of as a "contract of sale" or an "agreement of sale," two phrases which in the law mean no more and no less than the word "sale." No amount of offering to sell will make a contract of sale unless some one accepts the offer by agreeing to buy, so that a call or memorandum or writing executed for a valuable consideration, giving the bearer a right to call upon the subscriber for a certain share of stock therein within a stated time and at a given price, is not a contract or agreement to sell. White v. Treat (U. S.) 100 Fed. 290, 291.

A "contract on sale and return" is an agreement by which goods are delivered by a wholesale dealer to a retail dealer, to be paid for at a certain rate if sold again by the latter, and, if not sold, to be returned. Story, Sales, § 249. If the vendee returns the goods, the contract of sale is at an end. If he does not, the sale of the goods becomes absolute, and the price of the goods may be recovered in an action for goods sold and delivered. House v. Beak, 30 N. E. 1065, 1068, 141 Ill. 290, 33 Am. St. Rep. 307.

Assumpsit to pay for land is not a contract for the sale of land. Neither the letter, policy, nor object of the statute of frauds and perjuries should be deemed to embrace or apply to a promise, express or implied, to pay for land which the vendor had conveyed or covenanted to convey. Lewis v. Grimes, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 336.

The phrase "contract for sale," in a clause of the statute of frauds requiring contracts for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandise to be in writing, except, etc., embraces all contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, including sales at auction. Davis v. Robertson (S. C.) 1 Mill, Const. 71, 72, 12 Am. Dec. 611.

A "contract for the sale of goods," within the statute of frauds, is an absolute sale where the vendor is to receive payment and the vendee the goods purchased, and hence a chattel mortgage in which it is not intended that the mortgagee shall pay anything nor take possession until the security requires it is a contract in which neither payment nor delivery is accepted, and hence not a "sale" within the meaning of the statute. Gleason v. Drew, 9 Me. (9 Greenl.) 79, 82.

A contract is not deprived of its character as a contract of sale by the fact that the goods must be transferred from one place to another merely for the purposes of delivery. Downs v. Ross (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 270, 275.

Where a contract is, in its essential character, not a bailment, but a contract of sale, a provision therein that it shall not be considered a sale is of no effect. Ott v. Sweatman, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 97, 115.

A contract by which the plaintiffs undertook to make for the defendants 10 stove machines, and find the material therefor, for the price of $150 each, to be paid therefor by the defendants, is an agreement for the furnishing of labor and materials, and not a contract of sale. It was therefore not required by the statute of frauds to be in writing. Spencer v. Cohen, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 283, 284.

Bailment distinguished.

The contract may not constitute a sale, but be a bailment, with an option on the part of the bailee to buy; or it may be a sale with an option on the part of the vendee to return the goods, such a contract being termed a "contract of sale or return." An option to purchase if he like is essentially different from an option to return a purchase if he should not like. In one case the title will not pass until the option is determined; in the other the property passes at once, subject to the right to rescind and return. Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198. If the owner of goods deliver them to another with the understanding that there is to be no sale until the happening of a certain condition, this is a bailment, and the title does not pass until the condition happens. If the goods be delivered with the understanding that under certain circumstances the vendee may return them, this is a conditional sale, and title immediately passes, although under the contract the vendee may have the right to rescind and return the goods. In the one case the condition is precedent, in the other subsequent. Under a contract of sale or return the title passes and remains in the vendee until the option to return is exercised. A bailee with an option to purchase does not become a purchaser until he exercises such option. Furst Bros. v. Commercial Bank, 43 S. E. 728, 729, 117 Ga. 472.

As contract of sale or contract to manufacture.

The phrase "contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in statutes of frauds, requiring contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to be reduced to writing, should be construed to mean contracts for such articles ready for delivery, and not to include contracts for the sale of goods on which work and labor is to be performed, notwithstanding by the terms of the agreement the goods are not to be delivered until a future day. Winship v. Buzard, 9 S. C. (9 Rich. Law) 103, 105. It should be construed to mean goods already manufactured and in a condition for present sale and delivery, and not to include goods to be thereafter manufactured, that being a contract for work and labor. A contract for the purchase of articles deliverable on a future day, to be manufactured by the vendor, is not a "contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise," within the meaning of the statute, but is a contract for work and labor even though all the materials are furnished by the manufacturer. Robertson v. Vaughn, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 1, 5. It cannot be construed to include an article not existing at the time, but which is to be made according to order, and is distinguished from the general business of a maker. Finney v. Apgar, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 266, 268. It applies only to sales of property actually in existence at the time the sale was made, and does not include an agreement with a workman to put materials together and construct an article, whether at an agreed price or not. Mixer v. Howarth, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 205, 207, 32 Am. Dec. 256. As distinguished from "contracts for work and labor," they are such contracts as tend primarily to contemplate work and labor to be done, the material furnished by the seller at the instance of the purchaser and for his use and benefit, and in which work and labor are not the essential consideration, although work and labor may be necessary to make the goods, or to fit and prepare them for delivery. Cason v. Cheely, 6 Ga. 554, 555. The phrase may include a contract for the sale of goods not yet manufactured. "The distinction, we believe, is now well understood, when a person stipulates for the future sale of articles which he is habitually making, and which at the time are not made or finished, it is essentially a contract of sale, and not a contract for labor; otherwise when the article is made pursuant to the agreement." Lamb v. Crafts, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 353, 356. A contract for the sale of articles not in existence at the time of the contract, where the labor and skill of a workman are of the essence of the contract, is not a contract for the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise" within the statute of frauds, although the labor and skill are to be expended in the production of goods, wares, and merchandise, and from the workman's own raw materials. Pitkin v. Noyes, 48 N. H. 294, 303, 97 Am. Dec. 615, 2 Am. Rep. 218. If the article which is the subject of a verbal sale exist at the time in the condition in which it is to be delivered, the contract is a sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise"; but if labor and skill are to be applied to existing materials, it is a contract for the manufacture of articles to which the labor and skill are to be applied, and is not a "contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise" within the statute of frauds. Hight v. Ripley, 19 Me. (1 App.) 137, 139. So a contract, for delivery at a future date, of an article to be thereafter manufactured, is not a "contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise" within the statute of frauds, and void because not in writing. Donovan v. Willson (N. Y.) 26 Barb. 138, 140. An agreement to manufacture certain articles and furnish materials is not "a contract for the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise" within the second section of the statute of frauds and perjuries. Allen v. Jarvis, 20 Conn. 38, 52. And it has been held that an agreement to purchase gin, to be manufactured and to be delivered at a future date (Winship v. Buzzard, 9 S. C. [9 Rich. Law] 103, 105); a contract for the sale of a marble monument, consisting of several pieces, standing in the vendor's shop, which the vendor agreed to polish, letter, and finish (Mead v. Case [N. Y.] 33 Barb. 202); a contract to procure and deliver at a certain time and place one-half of a frame for a vessel, to be hewn and fashioned according to certain moulds (Abbott v. Gilchrist, 38 Me. 260); a contract by which the plaintiffs undertook to make for the defendants 10 stave machines, and find the material therefor, for the price of $150 each, to be paid therefor by the defendants (Spencer v. Cone, 42 Mass. [1 Metc.] 283, 284); an application made to a mechanic or manufacturer for articles in his line of business, where the mechanic or manufacturer undertakes to prepare and furnish them within a given time (Cummings v. Dennett, 26 Me. [13 Shep.] 397, 401); an agreement to raise three acres of potatoes and deliver them to the other party at a fixed price per bushel (Pitkin v. Noyes, 48 N. H. 294, 303, 97 Am. Dec. 615, 2 Am. Rep. 218); a contract providing that plaintiff was to furnish material for, and prepare and fit for putting up at defendant's mill, four portable, patent houses of certain dimensions, for a specified price (Phipps v. McFarlane, 3 Minn. 109, 116 [Gil. 61] 74 Am. Dec. 743)—were not contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, so as to require them to be in writing. On the other hand, it has been held that a contract which, though nominally a bill of sale of lumber, discloses that the lumber was to be thereafter sawed from specified logs, and in such manner as the vendee in the bill of sale should direct (Cain v. Weston, 26 Wis. 100, 103); an agreement to take all the wood another would put on the line of a road that season, at the same price paid to him for wood theretofore (Edwards v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 48 Me. 379, 380); a contract to sell all the broom corn which should be raised on 25 acres, at the rate of $60 per ton (Bowman v. Conn, 8 Ind. 58, 59); a contract to sell and deliver cider at a future time, which the seller is to procure from farmers, and refine to fit for market (Seymour v. Davis, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. [2 Sandf.] 239); a contract for the purchase of candles at 21 cents a pound, to be made and delivered (Gardner v. Joy, 50 Mass. [9 Metc.] 177, 179); a contract for the sale of a quantity of wheat, part of which was threshed and in the bin, the other being unthreshed, the vendor agreeing to get ready and deliver the same, together with the wheat in the granary (Downs v. Ross, 23 Wend. 270, 275); a sale of flour by a miller, although not yet ground when the bargain was made (Garbutt v. Watson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 613); an agreement for the sale of a chariot not yet manufactured (Towers v. Osborne, 1 Strange, 506); an agreement for the sale of timber, the trees from which it was to be cut then standing on the vendor's land (Smith v. Surman, 9 Barn. & C. 561)—were contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, and void unless in writing. See, also, Smith v. N. Y. Cent. Ry. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 180, 200.

As conveyance.

See "Conveyance."

License distinguished.

From contract for sale of land, see "License."

Option distinguished.

The distinction between a "contract of sale or lease" and an "option" is broad and plain. An option is an unaccepted offer. It states the terms and conditions on which the owner is willing to sell or lease his land, if the holder elects to accept them within the time limited. If the holder does so elect, he must give notice to the other party, and the accepted offer thereupon becomes a valid and binding contract. If an acceptance is not made within the time fixed, the owner is no longer bound by his offer, and the option is at an end. A contract of sale or lease fixes definitely all the relative rights and obligations of both parties at the time of its execution. The offer and the acceptance are concurrent, since the minds of the contracting parties meet in the terms of the agreement. McMillan v. Philadelphia Co., 28 Atl. 220, 159 Pa. 142.

CONTRACT OF SURETYSHIP.

See "Suretyship."

CONTRACT PRICE OR VALUE.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 90, relating to mechanics' liens, and providing that every mechanic or other person performing any work or furnishing materials for the erection of any building shall have a lien "for the value or contract price" of such labor and material, could not mean that the owner's contract carried with it an implied consent that the contractor should bind him to pay whatever he might promise for labor and materials, or more than a reasonable price or value. The words must be limited to meaning the reasonable value of the labor or materials furnished. Laird v. Moonan, 20 N. W. 354, 456, 32 Minn. 358.

CONTRACT RATE.

Where a statute provides for 6 per cent. interest, but that the rate may be made 8 per cent. by contract, the former is generally termed the "legal rate," and the latter the "contract rate." Arbuthnot v. Brookfield Loan & Bldg. Ass'n, 72 S. W. 132, 134, 98 Mo. App. 382.

CONTRACT SYSTEM.

The "contract system" of labor in prisons is a system whereby the profits of the labor of convicts were secured by contractors or private parties. People v. Hawkins, 51 N. E. 257, 260, 157 N. Y. 1, 42 L. R. A. 490, 38 Am. St. Rep. 736.

CONTRACT WITH THE PUBLIC.

The expression "contract with the public," as relating to such obligations as were imposed on a canal and navigation company by statute, was metaphorical. The obligation in these cases is a duty rather than a contract. Reg. v. York & N. M. Ry. Co., 1 El. & Bl. 178, 197.

CONTRACTING.

"Contracting," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 32, § 76, relating to liens on logs and timber, and providing that the act shall not inure to the benefit of any person interested in "contracting, cutting, hauling, banking, or driving logs by the thousand," should be read "contracting for." King v. Kelly, 25 Minn. 522, 524.

CONTRACTING MARRIAGE.

"Contracting marriage," as used in How. St. § 5209, declaring males of 18 and females of 16 legally capable of contracting marriage, means the actual form of the marriage relation, and does not empower infants to make executory contracts of marriage that will sustain a breach of promise suit. Frost v. Vought, 37 Mich. 65, 66.

CONTRACTOR.

See "General Contractor"; "Independent Contractor"; "Original Contractor"; "Subcontractor."

A person who enters a charitable hospital is not a contractor; neither is the hospital a contractor with that person. The person who enters is a mere licensee, and like a guest who enters one's house, and must take the service as he finds it. No person who accepts the bounty of a charitable corporation, or accepts the bounty of any charity, can maintain a suit on account of the method of the administration of the bounty which is accepted. This is putting into the law the homely but expressive phrase, "You must not look a gift horse in the mouth." It is absolutely inconsistent with the underlying idea of charity, as recognized by the law, to hold that the same rule applies to a person employed for compensation to do a certain service as to the distribution of charity, and a patient in a public hospital chartered as a charitable corporation cannot recover from such corporation for injuries resulting from the negligence of a nurse employed therein. Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital (U. S.) 101 Fed. 896, 898.

"Although in a general sense every one who enters into a contract may be called a 'contractor,' yet that word has come to be used with special reference to a person who, in pursuit of an independent business, undertakes to do specific jobs of work for other persons without submitting himself to their control with respect to all petty details of the work." McCarthy v. Second Parish in Town of Portland, 71 Me. 318, 322, 36 Am. Rep. 320 (citing S. & R. on Neg. § 70); Knoxville Iron Co. v. Dobson, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 367, 373; Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 58 N. E. 347, 349. The true test, as it seems to us, by which to determine whether one who renders services to another does so as a "contractor" or not, is to ascertain whether he renders the services in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is to be accomplished. One who contracts to do a specific piece of work, furnishing his own assistants, and executing the work, either entirely according to his own ideas or in accordance with a plan previously given him by the person for whom the work is done, without being subject to the latter with respect to the details of the work, is clearly a "contractor," and not a servant. McCarthy v. Second Parish in Town of Portland, 71 Me. 318, 322, 36 Am. Dec. 320 (citing S. & R. on Neg. § 77); Knoxville Iron Co. v. Dobson, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 367, 373.

Within a materialman's lien statute providing that every contractor, builder, or person having in charge, either in whole or in part, any building or improvement, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter the term "contractor" is ordinarily and prima facie understood to be descriptive of a person having charge or superintendence of the construction work. Pacific Rolling-Mill Co. v. Hamilton (U. S.) 61 Fed. 476, 477.

A contractor is one who contracts or covenants, either with a public body or private parties, to construct works or erect buildings at a certain price or rate. Brown v. German-American Title & Trust Co., 34 Atl. 335, 343, 174 Pa. 443 (citing Cent. Dict.).

Within Laws 1872, c. 136, relating to a recovery for services rendered by "contractors" aiding in the construction of a railroad, a bridge builder who worked on one of the railroad's bridges, upon estimates made by the companies' agents as the work progressed, is a "contractor." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. R. Co. v. McConnell, 25 Kan. 370, 372.

The term "contractor," as well as the term "mechanic," in a suit giving liens to mechanics and contractors, applies to a carpenter building a storehouse under a contract with the owner of real estate, and therefore he is entitled to a lien in either capacity. Thrumman v. Pettitt, 72 Ga. 38, 39.

A contractor who does not perform any work or labor personally does not come within the statute providing a lien for "every mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor" on a railroad. Little Rock, H. L. & T. Ry. Co. v. Spencer, 65 Ark. 183, 194, 47 S. W. 196, 197, 42 L. R. A. 334 (citing Sand. & H. Dig. § 6521).

"It is not altogether easy to give an accurate definition of the word 'contractor' as it is used in the reports, and as we shall use it hereafter. * * * The true test, as it seems to us, by which to determine whether one who renders service to another does so as a contractor or not, is to ascertain whether he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished." Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, §§ 76, 77. A person employed by the agent of the owner of a street railway at a stipulated sum per month to run a car and furnish a driver, the car and the road being controlled and the work directed by the agent, is not an independent contractor, and the owner is liable for the negligence of such employé's servants. Jensen v. Barbour, 15 Mont. 582, 591, 39 Pac. 906, 909.

Under Pub. Acts 1891, No. 179, § 4, providing that a contractor shall furnish the owner a statement of laborers and materialmen under his contract, with the amounts due each, before he shall have a right of action to enforce a mechanic's lien therefor, etc., one whose lien statement shows the furnishing of a large number of articles and materials entering into the construction of parts of a building, and the construction of such parts by his skilled workmen, is a "contractor." Sterner v. Haas, 108 Mich. 488, 66 N. W. 348.

Any person rendering personal services for wages or otherwise, or by the use of machinery, teams, or otherwise, shall be deemed a "contractor" or "subcontractor" of either degree, as the case may be, as well as any person doing work by the job or piece. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2867.

The word "contractor," as used in the mechanic's lien laws, means one who by contract or agreement, express or implied, with the owner or the one who acts for the owner, plans or superintends the structure or other improvement, or any part thereof, or furnishes labor, skill, or superintendence thereto, or supplies or hauls materials reasonably necessary for and actually used therein, or any or all of them, whether as an architect, superintendent, builder, or materialman. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1150, § 3.

The word "contractor," as used in an act relating to municipal liens, means the person or persons who, under contract with the legal plaintiff, performed the work for which the lien is given. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1269, § 55.

Whoever shall do work or furnish materials by contract, express or implied, with the owner as provided in the mechanic's lien law, shall be deemed an original contractor, and all other persons doing work or furnishing materials shall be deemed subcontractors. Rev. St. Utah, 1898, § 1383.

Materialman as.

The term "contractor," as used in a mechanic's lien statute authorizing liens in favor of contractors performing labor, etc., in building a house, and in favor of materialmen, but distinguishing between the two as to the matter of remedy, only includes persons who work on the house, and does not include those furnishing materials without performing labor thereon, though the latter may be "contractors" in the general sense of the term. Mulrine v. Washington Lodge, No. 5, I. O. O. F. (Del.) 6 Houst. 350, 353.

The term "contractor," in the mechanic's lien law authorizing liens for services or materials performed or furnished under a contract with the owner or with a contractor, does not include one who merely furnishes lumber or other materials toward the erection of a building. There is no privity between him and the owner through which those from whom he may purchase the materials may subject the building to a lien. Brown v. Cowan, 1 Atl. 520, 521, 110 Pa. 588.

A person who has a contract of sale and delivery of goods to a street railway company is not a "contractor" within the statute giving contractors a lien on the structure. Pacific Rolling-Mills Co. v. James Street Const. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 966, 971, 16 C. C. A. 68.

One who agrees to sell machinery, to be delivered free on board cars at his factory and set up by the buyer, is a materialman, and not a "contractor" for the furnishing thereof, so as to entitle the person from whom he subsequently buys the machinery, and who delivers it to him, to a mechanic's lien as a subcontractor under Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 7255, the lien in favor of a materialman not applying to a person from whom the materialman buys the machinery furnished by him, where the materialman is not authorized by the owner to purchase it or place it in the factory, and does not place it therein. Caulfield v. Polk, 46 N. E. 932, 933, 17 Ind. App. 429.

Subcontractors.

A "contractor," within the meaning of the Kentucky lien act, is one who does work or furnishes material for the owner, and upon a contract with the owner for the payment of the contract price. Thus, where a railroad let the contract for building its road to a contracting company, which let out a portion of said contract to a construction company, resolutions of the railroad company which did not obligate the railroad company to pay the construction company for the work and materials which it was to do and furnish, and for the lien claims which it was to purchase and hold, did not constitute the construction company a contractor in relation to the railroad company. Richmond & I. Const. Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 105, 109, 15 C. C. A. 289, 34 L. R. A. 625.

The term "contractor," in the mechanic's lien law, which provides that a person who contracts with the owner of lands to furnish material, machinery, etc., to be used in erecting buildings on the land or improving the same, shall be known as a "contractor," includes one who contracts to furnish an engine to be placed in a lighting plant constructed by a private individual on his own land, to be conveyed to the city when the plant is completed. City of Salem v. Lane & Bodley Co., 60 N. E. 37, 39, 189 Ill. 593, 82 Am. St. Rep. 481.

A "contractor" is one who agrees to do anything for another; and this general term has been held to include either those who have made contracts directly with the owner of the premises or those who have contracted with the contractor. Lester v. Houston, 8 S. E. 366, 369, 101 N. C. 605.

"The word 'contractor,' when standing alone or not restrained by the context or particular words, may mean a subcontractor, or any person remotely engaged under contract and doing the work, as well as the original contractor. Such a person is a contractor as well as the original contractor. This has been frequently so decided, and such is the generic or more comprehensive meaning of the term." Mundt v. Sheboygan & F. du L. R. Co., 31 Wis. 451, 457.

The term "contractor," as used in a bond given by a railroad contractor conditioned to pay all laborers, mechanics, and materialmen, and persons who supply such contractor with provisions or goods of any kind, will not be construed to include subcontractors. Wells v. Mehl, 25 Kan. 205, 206.

Act April 9, 1872, pl. 47, provides that those employed by a contractor in any work on an oil well shall be entitled to a lien for their services. Held, that the word "contractor" meant only persons employed by the owner or lessees of the well, and did not embrace those who undertake to perform some special service in the construction of the well or opening of the same. Appeal of Gibbs & Sterrett Mfg. Co., 100 Pa. 528, 531.

Within Laws 1850, c. 140, § 12, providing that, as often as any contractor for the construction of any part of a railroad which is in progress of construction shall be indebted to any laborer for 30 or less number of days' labor performed in constructing the road, the laborer may fix liability by giving certain notice, the term "contractor" means any one who may enter into a contract to construct a portion of a railroad, though he may not have entered into a contract with the company, though the statute does not use the term "subcontractor." Kent v. New York Cent. R. Co., 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 628, 630. In other words, the word "contractors" is to be understood to embrace all who have employed laborers, whether they be original contractors or subcontractors. Warner v. Hudson R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 454, 456.

CONTRACTOR'S LIEN.

A contractor's lien, per se, is one that arises by operation of law independently of the expressed terms of a contract. It springs out of the obligation to pay for the stipulated labor and the promised materials when furnished, provided the contractor shall give the notice required by statute. McMurray v. Brown, 91 U. S. 266, 23 L. Ed. 321. Thus, a resolution of a railroad company providing that a construction company which was a subcontractor should have a contractor's lien upon the railroad for work done and material furnished and claims purchased, implies simply a lien by contract, and not a contractor's lien. Richmond & J. Const. Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 105, 110, 15 C. C. A. 289, 84 L. R. A. 625.

CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE; CONTRARY TO LAW; CONTRARY TO STATUTE.

See pages 1547, 1548, 1549, post.

CONTRIBUTE—CONTRIBUTION.

In a statute authorizing a religious body to take and hold subscriptions or contributions in money or otherwise, only a power to take by gift is given, and not power to take by will. Brown v. Tompkins, 49 Md. 423, 431.

"Contribution is the act of giving to a common stock, or in common with others; that which is given to a common stock or purpose." Parks' Adm'r v. American Home Missionary Soc., 20 Atl. 107, 109, 62 Vt. 19.

"Contribute," as used in an agreement by which the parties recited that they subscribed and contributed, implied that the donations of each were parts, the whole of which was to form a common fund. Murray v. McHugh, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 158, 166.

"Contribute," as used in Rev. St. 1893, § 1169, providing that any person who shall receive bodily injury or damage to his person or property from a defect of the highway, causeway, or bridge may recover, in an action against a county, the amount of actual damages sustained by him, provided such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his own act or negligently contributed thereto, necessarily implies that there was another cause to which the plaintiff's negligence might contribute, and though plaintiff's negligence might not alone be sufficient to cause the injury, yet if it contributed to such other cause—for example, the defendant's negligence—then the plaintiff could not, under the second contingency, recover; and in an action against a county for injuries received on a highway it was error for the judge to instruct the jury that, if "the injury resulted immediately from the defendant's negligence, then the defendant would be held liable in damages, even though to a certain degree the plaintiff has been negligent." McFall v. Barnwell County, 35 S. E. 562, 567, 57 S. C. 294.

The word "contribute" means to give to a common stock or for a common purpose; to give or supply a part; to lend assistance; to have a share in any act or effect. Webst. Int. Dict. It is in the latter sense that it and the word "contributory" are used when applied to the negligence of a plaintiff; and necessarily contributory or assisting negligence can only be the partial, and not the entire, cause of an injury. Citizens' R. Co. v. Creasy (Tex.) 27 S. W. 945.

As dues.

In the by-laws of an insurance company providing that contributions of the members should not be less than a certain sum per year, and in a subsequent section providing that every member shall pay his monthly dues on or before a certain date, "contributions" will be held to mean the same thing as the word "dues." Mueller v. Grand Grove, U. A. O. D., 72 N. W. 48, 50, 69 Minn. 236.

Loan implied.

"Contribute," as used in an agreement by the manager of a certain business to contribute certain money to the business in consideration of a percentage of the profits, which were guaranteed to amount to a certain sum annually, does not mean "loan," so as to entitle the manager to recover the same on severance of his connection with the business. Mack v. Wurmster, 36 S. W. 221, 223, 135 Mo. 58.

As substantial assistance.

Under a statute providing that no person shall be permitted to vote at a meeting of an incorporated church unless he shall have contributed to the support of such church is meant that he must contribute to its support according to the usages and customs thereof. This undoubtedly means substantial and vital aid and support. Personal attendance and countenance might in one sense contribute to the support of such an organization, but this is not the contribution intended by this statute. The statute means the necessary material support, without which the organization cannot exercise its ordinary functions and perform its customary and appropriate duties and ministrations. It means the parting with, and contribution of, a portion of one's worldly substance, in the usual and customary way, to be used in meeting and defraying the expenses incurred by the church in the support of public and divine worship. Merely attending as a worshiper, or taking a leading or a subordinate part in the exercises, or rendering some special gratuitous service, will not answer this requirement of the statute. If the service rendered, however, is such as is usually and customarily hired and paid for by such organizations, and is by some understanding or agreement, express or implied, rendered as an equivalent or in lieu of a contribution in money or property, such service would undoubtedly be a contribution to the support of the church, within the sense and meaning of the statute. The test is, does the contribution, whatever it may be, go immediately and directly to the support of the public worship maintained by the church? In this view, contributions made, not for the support and maintenance of the religious incorporation, but for the support or promotion of some other object or enterprise in which the church may be engaged, however valuable or praiseworthy, as Sunday schools, missions, and the like, will not be sufficient. People v. Tuthill, 31 N. Y. 550, 561.

CONTRIBUTE TO INTOXICATION.

Under St. 1872, c. 63, § 4, providing that "every wife, child, parent, etc., or other person who shall be injured in person, property, etc., by any intoxicated person, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, shall have a right of action * * * against any person * * * who shall, by selling or giving any intoxicating liquors, * * * have caused or contributed to the intoxication of the person by whom an injury has been done," refers to the direct and immediate result of the selling or giving the intoxicating liquors by which the intoxication was caused. The liability attaches to the person selling or giving, and to no one else, and the selling or giving must be to the person intoxicated, by whom the injury to the person or property was done, and must cause his intoxication. Bush v. Murray, 66 Me. 472.

CONTRIBUTING CAUSE.

A contributing cause of an accident "is one which under the same circumstances would always be an element aiding in the production of the accident." Broschart v.

Tuttle, 21 Atl. 925, 929, 59 Conn. 1, 11 L. R. A. 33.

In commenting on an instruction that, if the person's negligent act solely contributed to bring about the injury of which he complained, he cannot recover, the court say: "The criticism is in the use of the word 'solely,' and the contention is that the court should have told the jury that, if both plaintiff and the company were negligent, the plaintiff could not recover. To give to the word 'contribute' its legal signification would make the charge unintelligible, as one act cannot contribute solely to effect a given result, but only in connection with some other act, and there can be no sole contributory cause of an accident. We may assume, therefore, that the trial judge meant, if the negligent act of the plaintiff produced or was the sole cause of the injury, she could not recover." Memphis St. R. Co. v. Shaw, 75 S. W. 713, 714, 110 Tenn. 467.

CONTRIBUTING MEMBER.

In the certificate of membership of a mutual benefit association declaring that the member, having complied with the conditions, is entitled to the benefit of said association in the sum of one dollar for each "contributing member," such term meant members in good and regular standing who had not forfeited their membership. Neskern v. Northwestern Endowment Ass'n, 15 N. W. 683, 684, 30 Minn. 406.

CONTRIBUTING WRONG.

A wrongdoer is not necessarily an outlaw, but may justly complain of wanton and malicious mischief. Therefore, where one was shot and killed while attempting to rob a chicken roost, his wrong in so doing did not constitute contributing negligence or wrong, so as to release the person shooting from liability therefor. Marks v. Borum, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 87, 93, 25 Am. Rep. 764.

CONTRIBUTION (In Practice).

See "Voluntary Contributions."

"Contribution" is defined as a payment made by each, or by any, of several having a common interest of liability of his share in the loss suffered, or in the money necessarily paid by one of the parties in behalf of the others. It is well settled that for the purposes of an action to recover the proportion of the debt, whether at law or in equity, the right of one is regarded as maturing when he has paid more than his share of the debt, and until that time there is neither equitable obligation nor implied contract to make contribution. Canosia Tp. v. Grand Lake Tp., 83 N. W. 346, 347, 80 Minn. 357.

The right and duty of contribution is founded in the doctrine of equity. The doc trine of contribution is not founded on contract, but comes from the application of the principles of equity to the condition in which the parties to the contract are found in consequence of some of them, as between themselves, having done more than their share in performing the common obligation. That principle was first recognized and enforced in courts of equity, and it was only after it had been long and firmly established in those courts that the courts of law undertook to enforce it. Dysart v. Crow, 70 S. W. 689, 691, 170 Mo. 275.

The doctrine of contribution rests on the principle that, when the parties stand in equal juri, the law requires equality, which is equity, and one of them shall not be obliged to bear the burden in ease of the rest. It is not founded on contract, but on the principle that equality of burden as to common right is equity, and the obligation to contribute arises from the nature of the relation between the parties. The claim for contribution has its foundation in the clearest principles of natural justice and in morals, since no one ought to profit by another's loss where he himself has incurred a like liability; and it seems but just that, where all are equally bound and are equally released, all should contribute in proportion toward a benefit obtained by all. Aspinwall v. Sacchi, 57 N. Y. 331, 336; Campbell v. Mesler (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 342, 8 Am. Dec. 570. The right of contribution lies where there are tenants in common, who jointly hold a mill and take the profits only, and the mill falls into decay, and one of them will not repair it again. Campbell v. Mesler (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 337, 8 Am. Dec. 570.

It is a doctrine well established that, when land is charged with a burden, the charge ought to be equal, and one part ought not to bear more than its due proportion; and equity will preserve this equality by compelling the owner of each part to a just contribution. Stevens v. Cooper (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 425, 431, 7 Am. Dec. 499.

Contribution is the division which is made among the heirs of the succession of the debts with which the succession is charged, according to the proportion which each is bound to bear. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1420.

Contribution is said of the partition by which the creditors of an insolvent debtor divide among themselves the proceeds of his property, proportionably to the amount of their respective credits. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3550, subd. 9.

The mere paying of money one hour into a firm towards its capital, and receiving it back the next by a check of the firm, cannot be said to be a "contribution" to the capital stock of a limited partnership in any legitimate sense of the word. To satisfy the statute, the special partner must pay his money into the common stock, and leave it there at the risk of the business. On payment the devotion must be actual and absolute, not apparent and illusory. Moorhead v. Seymour, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1059.

Indemnity distinguished.

The doctrine of contribution is not founded on contract, but on the principle that equality of burden as to a common right is equity; that wherever there is a common right the burden is also common. Indemnity, on the contrary, springs from contract, express or implied, and in a general way may be defined as the obligation or duty resting on one person to make good any loss or damage which another has incurred while acting at his request or for his benefit. Vandiver v. Pollak, 19 South. 180, 181, 107 Ala. 547, 54 Am. St. Rep. 118.

Between joint tortfeasors.

Contribution is allowed only between defendants standing in equal juri; and there is no contribution, either at law or in equity, between joint trespassers. Peck v. Ellis (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 131, 136.

Contribution is the sharing of a loss or payment among several; but among tortfeasors who are knowingly such there can be no contribution. This rule applies to persons directly participating in or authorizing any willful trespass or any wrongful acts, or acts obviously of an unlawful character; but the rule is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act. The Hudson (U. S.) 15 Fed. 162, 167.

Contribution is the sharing of a loss or payment among several. But there can be no contribution between trespassers or wrongdoers. The exception is where the act is not clearly illegal in itself. Where a tort is a known, meditated wrong there can be no contribution, but where the party is acting under the supposition of innocence, and the tort is one by construction or inference of law, there may be contribution. Bailey v. Bussing, 28 Conn. 455, 460.

Wrongdoers are not entitled to claim contribution against each other, although the party injured obtains full satisfaction for his damages from a part of them only. Miller v. Fenton (N. Y.) 11 Paige, 18, 20.

Contribution is bottomed and fixed on general principles of natural justice, and does not spring from contract. Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Cox, 318. Where a traveler, in passing over a bridge which was maintainable by two counties, was injured by its breaking down, and recovered damages in an action for negligence against one of the counties, the other county was liable for contribution. The rule that there cannot be contribution between wrongdoers is confined to cases where the plaintiff must be presumed to know that he was doing an unlawful act. Armstrong County v. Clarion County, 66 Pa. (16 P. F. Smith) 218, 222, 5 Am. Rep. 368.

Between sureties.

"Contribution," as the term is applied to sureties, means that all sureties must contribute to the payment of the obligation in case of a default of a principal. "The right of contribution among sureties is founded, not in the contract of suretyship, but is the result of a general principle of equity, which equalizes burdens and benefits. The common law has adopted and given effect to this equitable principle, on which a surety is entitled to contribution from his co-surety. This equitable obligation to contribute having been established, the law raises an implied assumpsit on the part of the co-surety to pay his share of the loss, resulting from a concurrent liability to pay a common debt. This jurisdiction by an action at law is therefore resorted to when the case is not complicated, and the more extensive and efficient aid of a court of equity is thus rendered unnecessary." Russel v. Fallor, 1 Ohio St. 327, 329, 59 Am. Dec. 631.

The right of one security to call upon his co-security for contribution, like the right of all the securities to call upon the principal for indemnity, arises from the principle of equity growing out of the relation which the parties have assumed toward each other. The equity springs up at the time of entering into that relation, and is fully consummated when the security is compelled to pay the debt. Wayland v. Tucker (Va.) 4 Grat. 267, 268, 50 Am. Dec. 76.

Sureties have the right to claim contribution from each other in proportion to the amount paid by each upon the common debt, and this right is the result, not of any implied contract between the parties, but of an acknowledged principle or natural justice which requires that those who voluntarily assume a common burden should bear it in equal proportions. Burge, Sur. 384; Story, Eq. § 493. It is upon this principle that sureties are entitled to the benefit of all securities which have been taken by any one of them to indemnify himself against the principal debt; but, if one surety should obtain indemnity for a consideration paid by him, the other could not claim the benefit of such indemnity without paying his proportion of the consideration. White v. Banks, 21 Ala. 705, 712, 56 Am. Dec. 283.

The liability of co-sureties for contribution originally grew out of a rule of equity which at length ripened into a principle of law, so that at this day courts of law and chancery entertain concurrent jurisdiction in giving a remedy to the surety paying the debt. Hickman v. McCurdy, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 555, 559.

CONTRIBUTION PLAN.

A "contribution plan," as used in life insurance, is a plan by which the policy holder is allowed as a dividend the amount contributed by his policy to the surplus. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Currier, 4 Atl. 866, 58 Vt. 229.

CONTRIBUTORY INFRINGEMENT.

Contributory infringement is the intentional aiding of one person by another in the unlawful making or selling of a patented invention. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Kelsey Electric Railway Specialty Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 1016, 1017. And this is usually done by making or selling a part of the patented invention with the intent and purpose of so aiding. The essence of contributory infringement lies in concerting or planning with others in an unlawful invasion of the patentee's rights. A contributory infringer necessarily only makes or sells a part of the patented invention, so that contributory infringement cannot be predicated on the rebuilding or replacing of the parts of a patented machine by a purchaser for his own use. Goodyear Shoe Mach. Co. v. Jackson (U. S.) 112 Fed. 146, 148, 50 C. C. A. 159, 55 L. R. A. 692.

One who makes and sells an element of a combination covered by a patent with the intention and for the purpose of bringing about its use in such a combination is guilty of contributory infringement, and equally liable to the patentee with him who in fact organizes the complete combination. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Ohio Brass Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 712, 721, 26 C. C. A. 107.

A person who sells, to a licensee of a patent on a machine for setting lacing studs, studs of his own manufacture, knowing that they are to be used in the patented machine in violation of the license, and intending that they shall be so used, is guilty of contributory infringement. Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. v. O'Brien (U. S.) 93 Fed. 200, 203.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

See "Imputable Contributory Negligence."

The rule of contributory negligence is based not so much upon considerations of what is just to the defendant as upon those of public policy, which require that every one shall take reasonable care of his own person and property; and, upon the fundamental principle that both parties are at fault, the law, as a general rule, will withhold its aid, and leave them to the consequences of their own wrong. St. Louis &

S. F. Ry. Co. v. Herrin, 26 S. W. 425, 427, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 718 (citing Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Smith, 52 Tex. 184).

Contributory negligence is nothing more or less than negligence on the part of a person injured, and the laws applicable to negligence of a defendant are applicable thereto. Pitman v. City of El Reno, 37 Pac. 851, 853, 2 Okl. 414.

The rule that there is no fixed standard in the law by which a court is enabled to say arbitrarily in every case where the line must be drawn between negligence and ordinary care; that what may be deemed ordinary care in one case may under different circumstances be gross negligence—applies equally to the question of contributory negligence, as there is no more of an absolute standard of ordinary care and diligence by which the conduct of the plaintiff is to be judged as a contributing cause to its injury than in the case of the negligence of the defendant. Tacoma Ry. Co. v. Hays (U. S.) 110 Fed. 496, 499, 49 C. C. A. 115.

The general statement that contributory negligence is such negligence on the part of plaintiff as helped to produce the injuries complained of includes the idea of both acts and omissions, and is not a misstatement of the law. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Young, 54 N. E. 791, 793, 153 Ind. 163.

Contributory negligence that will bar a recovery for injury by the plaintiff is such negligence as amounts to an absence of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff. Johnson v. International & G. N. R. Co., 57 S. W. 869, 870, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 148; Dell v. Phillips Glass Co., 32 Atl. 601, 602, 169 Pa. 549.

The "contributory negligence" which will prevent a recovery is nothing more than the absence of proper care—such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under similar circumstances. Fowler v. Randall, 73 S. W. 931, 933, 99 Mo. App. 407 (citing Barton v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co., 52 Mo. 253, 14 Am. Rep. 418).

Negligence has been defined to be absence of care according to the circumstances, and that applies to negligence on the part of the defendant as well as to contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. Stokes v. Ralpho Tp., 40 Atl. 958, 961, 187 Pa. 333.

Assumption of risk distinguished.

An assumption of risk is a matter of contract. Contributory negligence is a question of conduct. If a servant would be defeated of a right of recovery for an injury by the rule of assumed risk, it would be because he agreed, long before the accident happened, that he would assume the very risk from which his injury arose. If he were to be defeated by the rule of contributory negligence, it would be because his conduct at the time of the accident, and under all the attendant circumstances, fell short of ordinary care. If the one circumstance of the employé's knowledge of the employer's failure to provide the statutory safeguards were held, as a matter of law, always to overcome the other circumstances characterizing the employé's conduct at the time of the accident, assumption of risk would be successfully masquerading in the guise of contributory negligence. If assumption of risk is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions and acquiescence therein are fatal. If contributory negligence is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions and acquiescence therein may be fatal or may not be, depending upon whether a person of ordinary prudence, under all the circumstances, would have done what the injured person did. If the risk is so great and immediately threatening that a person of ordinary prudence, under all the circumstances, would not take it, contributory negligence is established. D. H. Davis Coal Co. v. Pollard, 62 N. E. 492, 497, 158 Ind. 607.

The doctrine of "assumption of risk" by a servant is that it is a term of the contract of employment, expressed or implied. Assumption of risk in such cases is the acquiescence of an ordinarily prudent man in a known danger—the risk which he assumes by contract. It is distinguished from contributory negligence, which is that action or nonaction in regard to personal safety by one who, treating the known as a condition, acts with respect to it without due care of its consequences. Thus, in Hesse v. Columbus S. & H. R. Co., 58 Ohio St. 167, 169, 50 N. E. 355, it is said that "acquiescence with knowledge is not synonymous with contributory negligence. One having full knowledge of defects in machinery with which he is employed may yet use the utmost care to avert the danger which they threaten." Assumption of risk and contributory negligence approximate where danger is so obvious and imminent that no ordinarily prudent man would assume the risk of injury therefrom. But where the danger, though present and appreciated, is one which many men are in the habit of assuming, and which prudent men who must earn a living are willing to assume for extra compensation, one who assumes the risk cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence, if, having in view the risk of danger assumed, he uses care reasonably commensurate with the risk to avoid injurious consequences. One who does not use such care, and who by reason thereof suffers such injury, is guilty of contributory negligence. Narramore v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 298, 304, 37 C. C. A. 499, 48 L. R. A. 68.

Contributory negligence rests in the law of torts as applied to negligence, and, when such defense is established, the plaintiff's action is defeated, not because of any agreement, express or implied, but because his own misconduct was the proximate cause of the injury. Bodle v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 61 S. C. 478, 39 S. E. 715. The defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence are so similar that they may fit into each other. Nearly every case of contributory negligence on the part of an employé involves, in a general sense, some assumption of risk, because, in order to be guilty of contributory negligence, there must be the risk of apparent danger. Barksdale v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 44 S. E. 743, 745, 66 S. C. 204.

Contributory negligence and assumption of risk are entirely different, although the two questions may arise under the facts of the same case. Every person suing for a personal injury must show that he was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution for his own safety, so that the question of contributory negligence may arise in every case. But an employé may have assumed a risk by virtue of his employment, or by continuing in such employment with knowledge of the defect and danger; and if he is injured thereby, although in the exercise of the highest degree of care and caution, and without any negligence, yet he cannot recover. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Heerey, 68 N. E. 74, 77, 203 Ill. 492.

Contributory negligence implies the existence of negligence of an injured servant, co-operating with that of the master, and thus aiding in producing the injury. It is distinguished from the doctrine of assumed risk, which is that, if the servant, with knowledge of the defect in the master's premises and the danger and risk incident thereto, continues in the service of the master without proper notice to the latter, he assumes the risk incident to the service and growing out of the existence of the defect, and this without regard to the degree of care which he may exercise in the performance of his labor. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bryant, 27 S. W. 825, 826, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 134.

Contributory negligence is a breach of the legal duty imposed by law upon the servant, however unwilling or protesting he may be; and it differs in this respect from assumption of risk, which is not a duty, but purely voluntary on the part of the servant. Dempsey v. Sawyer, 49 Atl. 1035, 1036, 95 Me. 295.

As confession and avoidance.

Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff necessarily implies negligence on the part of the defendant. It implies that the concurring negligence of the two parties caused the injury, and but for this concurrence it would not have occurred. Contributory negligence is therefore a plea of confession and avoidance; a defense which confesses and avoids the plaintiff's cause of action as stated in the complaint. Watkins v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 711, 713, 4 L. R. A. 239; Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Thomas' Adm'r, 79 Ky. 160, 164, 42 Am. Rep. 208.

The term "contributory negligence," instead of implying such a denial of the material allegations in a complaint for damages caused by the negligence of the defendant as is made by pleading the general issue, implies just the contrary. The theory of this special defense is that the defendant was negligent, but that the negligence of the plaintiff conducted to the injury complained of. The defense is in the nature of a confession and avoidance. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 11 South. 262, 267, 95 Ala. 412; McDonald v. Montgomery St. Ry., 20 South. 317-321, 110 Ala. 161, 176.

Contributory negligence is a defense which confesses and avoids the plaintiff's case. McDonald v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex.) 21 S. W. 774, 777.

Though a plea of contributory negligence is a plea of confession and avoidance, admitting the negligence on the part of defendant, and seeking to avoid liability therefor by alleging that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, yet under the Code, permitting a defendant to set up as many defenses, whether of law or of fact, as he may see fit, a defendant may plead a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence. Leavenworth Light & Heating Co. v. Waller, 70 Pac. 365, 366, 65 Kan. 514.

Contributory act.

Negligence implies something more than mere disobedience of the master's commands when injury results to the servant. It implies a disregard of proper care for one's safety. It is contributory negligence, not a contributory act, which defeats a recovery. Skaarup v. Stover, 9 N. Y. Supp. 92, 94, 56 Hun, 86.

Contributing or proximate cause.

"Contributory negligence," in its legal signification, is an act or omission on the part of a plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care, or concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant as a proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of. To constitute contributory negligence there must be a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff and a proximate connection between that and the injury. Perhaps, besides these two, there are no other necessary elements. Plant Inv. Co. v. Cook (U. S.) 74 Fed. 503, 505, 20 C. C. A. 625 (citing 1 Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 7); Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Watts (U. S.) 66 Fed. 460, 466, 13 C. C. A. 579; Heckman v. Evenson, 73 N. W. 427, 429, 7 N. D. 173; Wardlaw v. California R. Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac. 1075, 1076; Redmond v. Maitland, 49 N. Y. Supp. 128, 130, 23 App. Div. 194; Arthur v. City of Charleston, 32 S. E.

1024, 1026, 46 W. Va. 88; Thackston v. Port Royal & W. C. Ry. Co., 18 S. E. 177, 178, 40 S. C. 80; Martin v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 26 S. W. 1052, 1054, 87 Tex. 117; Paris, M. & S. P. R. Co. v. Nesbitt (Tex.) 38 S. W. 243, 244; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Phillips (Tex.) 37 S. W. 620, 622; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Henning (Tex.) 30 S. W. 302, 304; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Casseday, 50 S. W. 125, 126, 92 Tex. 525; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Anchonda (Tex.) 75 S. W. 557, 559; Paris, M. & S. P. R. Co. v. Nesbitt (Tex.) 38 S. W. 243, 244; Texas Cent. Ry. Co. v. Yarbrough (Tex.) 74 S. W. 357, 358; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Rice, 11 S. W. 699, 700, 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173; Groves v. Louisville Ry. Co., 58 S. W. 508, 515, 109 Ky. 76, 52 L. R. A. 448; Montgomery & E. R. Co. v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 338, 344; Montgomery Gaslight Co. v. Montgomery & E. Ry. Co., 5 South. 735, 737, 86 Ala. 372; Wastl v. Montana Union Ry. Co., 61 Pac. 9, 15, 24 Mont. 159; Schweinfurth v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 54 N. E. 89, 90, 60 Ohio St. 215; St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards v. Godfrey, 65 N. E. 90, 93, 198 Ill. 288; Krenzer v. Pittsburg, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 52 N. E. 220, 223, 151 Ind. 587, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252 (citing Whart. Neg. §§ 300, 322); Ferris v. Hershheim, 51 La. Ann. 178, 180, 24 South. 771.

Contributory negligence is a want of ordinary care upon the part of the person injured by the actionable negligence of another, combining and concurring with that negligence and contributing to the injury as a proximate cause thereof, without which the injury would not have occurred. Contributory negligence must have in it the element of being a proximate cause—not a remote cause, but a proximate cause from which the accident or the injury, in whole or in part, directly and immediately resulted, and but for which, either by itself or by the presence of the negligence of the defendant, the injury would not have occurred. Cooper v. Georgia, C. & N. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 543, 545, 61 S. C. 345; Id., 34 S. E. 16, 17, 56 S. C. 91; Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 715, 719, 61 S. C. 463; Easler v. Southern Ry. Co., 37 S. E. 938, 941, 59 S. C. 311; Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co., 36 S. E. 590, 592, 58 S. C. 222; Emison v. Owyhee Ditch Co., 62 Pac. 13, 14, 37 Or. 577; O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552, 557; Monkier v. Willamette Val. Ry. Co., 22 Pac. 948, 949, 18 Or. 189, 6 L. R. A. 656, 17 Am. St. Rep. 717; San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Manning, 50 S. W. 177, 178, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 504; Zumault v. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co., 74 S. W. 1015, 1021, 175 Mo. 288 (citing Montgomery Gaslight Co. v. Montgomery & E. Ry. Co., 86 Ala. 372, 5 South. 735; Woodell v. West Virginia Imp. Co., 38 W. Va. 23, 17 S. E. 386). The test of contributory negligence is whether or not it contributed in any degree to produce the injury complained of. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. v. Miles, 40 Ark. 298, 322, 48 Am. Rep. 10.

A failure to use ordinary care by the party injured, if the same contributed to the injury received, would make him guilty of contributory negligence, and be an absolute bar to the recovery of damages for such injuries. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Shieder (Tex.) 26 S. W. 509, 510. The term "contributory negligence" means the negligence of the party injured which contributed to the injury. Jung v. City of Stevens Point, 43 N. W. 513, 514, 74 Wis. 547. Contributory negligence is a want of care by the party injured through the negligence of another, which contributes to the injury. Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 23 N. W. 67, 69, 56 Mich. 430. "Contributory negligence" means a failure to exercise ordinary care for one's own safety, helping to cause his own injury. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Lyons (Tex.) 53 S. W. 96, 97.

By "contributory negligence" is meant such a want of reasonable care and caution on the part of the person injured as directly contributed to cause the injury, and without which such injury would not have occurred. Fritz v. Western Union Tel. Co., 71 Pac. 209, 215, 25 Utah, 263.

"Contributory negligence" means the failure to observe that degree of care which ordinarily careful and prudent persons usually observe under the same or similar circumstances to protect themselves from harm, which failure helped or caused the injury. McLaughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co., 37 S. W. 851, 100 Ky. 173, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 693, 699, 34 L. R. A. 812.

"Contributory negligence" is defined as being negligence of plaintiff concurring with that of the defendant to bring about the injury complained of; and an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover for the negligent killing of her husband unless the jury find that he was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to his death contains no error. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Gormley (Tex.) 35 S. W. 488, 489.

"Contributory negligence" is such negligence on the part of the plaintiff as directly contributes to and in part causes the injury. Riley v. West Virginia Cent. & P. Ry. Co., 27 W. Va. 145, 164; Woodell v. West Virginia Imp. Co., 17 S. E. 386, 392, 38 W. Va. 23. It is such negligence, strictly speaking, as operates with other negligence in producing the injury. McKelvy v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry. Co., 51 N. W. 172, 173, 84 Iowa, 455.

Contributory negligence is the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, and a proximate connection between that and the alleged injury. Henry v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. (U. S.) 67 Fed. 426.

429; Chicago G. W. Ry. Co. v. Bailey, 71 Pac. 246, 247, 66 Kan. 115; Russell v. Town of Monroe, 21 S. E. 550, 551, 116 N. C. 720, 47 Am. St. Rep. 823.

To constitute contributory negligence it is necessary that the act of negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury. Central Texas & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoard (Tex.) 49 S. W. 142, 143; Gerlach v. Edelmeier, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. (15 Jones & S.) 292, 296.

Contributory negligence is where one so acts as to contribute by direct consent to or any participation in the wrong complained of. Bryant v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 104 Mich. 307, 316, 62 N. W. 365 (citing Moorney v. Peak, 57 Mich. 259, 23 N. W. 804).

Contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff is a bar to an action only when it approximately contributes to the infliction of the injury; and if the damage is not the necessary or ordinary or likely result of such contributory negligence, but is due to some wholly unlikely fact and unexpected event, which could not reasonably have been anticipated or regarded as likely to occur, such contributory negligence is too remote to be set up as a bar to an action. East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Hull, 12 S. W. 419, 88 Tenn. 33.

The act or omission of a party injured, which amounts to what is called "contributory negligence," must be a negligent act or omission, and in the production of the injury it must operate as a proximate cause, or one of the proximate causes, and not merely as a condition. Smithwick v. Hall & Upson Co., 21 Atl. 924, 925, 59 Conn. 261, 12 L. R. A. 279, 21 Am. St. Rep. 104.

Contributory negligence is where the evidence shows that the negligence of both parties contributed to the cause of the action, and this defeats the right of recovery upon the part of the person injured. This doctrine is based upon the principle that the law does not attempt to separate the consequences of an act which has been brought about by the combined negligence of the two parties. Grant v. Union Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 45 Fed. 673, 675.

If an accident which occasioned an injury would have happened, and would have been attended with the same results to the passenger, if he had been in his proper place on the train, then his negligence is not contributory negligence in a sense that would preclude a recovery, because it in no manner or degree contributed to the injury, and is therefore wanting in the element of proximate cause essential to constitute contributory negligence. Kansas & A. V. R. Co. v. White (U. S.) 67 Fed. 481, 482, 14 C. C. A. 483.

In order that the contributory negligence of plaintiff should defeat his recovery, it must be the proximate cause of his injury; and if, without certain remote negligence, he still would have suffered damage, the same was not contributory in a legal sense. O'Connor v. North Truckee Ditch Co., 30 Pac. 882, 886, 17 Nev. 245.

The term "contributory negligence" means such negligence as contributed to the injury. If the accident would have happened irrespective of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, then there can be a recovery. Hatfield v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 16 N. W. 336, 338, 61 Iowa, 434.

By "contributory negligence" is meant any negligence upon the part of the person injured which proximately or naturally contributed to his injury. McLeod v. City of Spokane, 67 Pac. 74, 76, 26 Wash. 346.

To constitute contributory negligence the negligence must not be a remote cause in the chain of circumstances resulting in the injury. Lowrimore v. Palmer Mfg. Co., 38 S. E. 430, 436, 60 S. C. 153 (citing Disher v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 33 S. E. 172, 55 S. C. 192).

Contributory negligence is taking such part in an act of injury to person or property, either by action, or omission to act when required by common prudence to act, as is a cause of resultant mischief. But it must be what the law calls the "proximate cause" of it; that is, that it produced it. If it did not, then if the plaintiff's negligent act was the remote or nonproducing, and not the efficient, cause, operating at the time or then existing, it was only a remote cause of the trouble, and does not bar him of his claim to a verdict. Jones v. Carey (Del.) 31 Atl. 976, 978, 9 Houst. 214.

To constitute contributory negligence it is necessary that the act of negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury, though not necessarily the nearest cause thereto. So, where a party alights from a moving train and is injured, the alighting from the train is the immediate cause of the injury. No question of proximate cause would be involved. Central Texas & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Hoard (Tex.) 49 S. W. 142, 143.

Contributory negligence of a servant consists in the performance of some negligent act or the negligent omission to perform some duty which materially contributed to, and in conjunction with the negligence of the master was one of the elements of the proximate cause of, the injury to the servant. Faulkner v. Mammoth Min. Co., 66 Pac. 799, 801, 23 Utah, 437.

In order to constitute contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff which will bar his recovery, it must have been so far an efficient cause of the injury that unless he had been negligent the injury would not have happened; or, as the rule is often expressed, although there must have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet unless he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he is entitled to recover. To disentitle the plaintiff to recover, two things must concur: (1) A want of ordinary care on his part; (2) a proximate connection between this ordinary care and the injury. Williams v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 14 N. W. 97, 99, 3 Dak. 168; Montgomery Gaslight Co. v. Montgomery & E. Ry. Co., 5 South. 735, 737, 86 Ala. 372.

Degree of negligence.

If plaintiffs are guilty of some act which in itself is negligent and contributed to the injury they received, or the death complained of, it would make no difference how slight the negligence may be. If it contributed to the result, it is such contributory negligence as defeats recovery absolutely. Benedict v. City of Port Huron, 83 N. W. 614, 616, 124 Mich. 600.

To constitute contributory negligence there must be a want of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff, and it must be a proximate cause of the injury—that is, a concurring cause; or, in other words, plaintiff must be guilty of want of ordinary care, and this want of care must proximately contribute to the injury. If such negligence was slight, and contributed only remotely it would not be contributory negligence in such sense as to prevent a recovery, providing there was negligence on the part of a defendant that was the immediate and direct cause of the injury. Gulf, O. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Danshank, 25 S. W. 295, 297, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 385.

"Contributory negligence is the want of such care as a prudent man would ordinarily take under similar circumstances, and must, in its natural results, immediately concur in producing the injury. The degree of care required would depend upon the peculiar circumstances in each case, since, as is said in Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Ives, 12 Sup. Ct. 679-683, 144 U. S. 408, 36 L. Ed. 485, what may be deemed ordinary care in one case may, under different surroundings and circumstances be gross negligence." McLamb v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 29 S. E. 894, 898, 122 N. C. 862.

Error of judgment in extremis.

Where the acts complained of as contributory negligence are done in the excitement of the moment and in extremis, for the purpose of extricating the person charged from the dangerous position in which he has been placed by defendant's fault, contributory negligence cannot be based thereon. If the acts were unwise, they were error, and not false, and the law in its wisdom will give absolute. The City of Paris, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.)

634, 639. Under these principles the act of a passenger on board a river steamer, in leaping through a window as the boat capsized, cannot be attributed to him as contributory negligence, though it afterward proved that, had he remained on the boat, he would have escaped the injury complained of. Ladd v. Foster (U. S.) 31 Fed. 827, 831.

The term "contributory negligence" does not include errors in judgment on the part of a plaintiff in trying to escape imminent danger brought about by the defendant's negligence, if the acts done were such as ordinarily prudent persons might have been expected to do under like circumstances, even though the injury would not have happened if the acts had not been done. So, the act of a passenger, who, apprehending a collision, rushes out of the car, where he would have been safe, and goes upon the platform, where he is hurt, does not constitute contributory negligence. Nor is it contributory negligence for one lawfully on a railway track, when a train suddenly appears, to jump the wrong way in the excitement of the moment. Baumler v. Narragansett Brewing Co., 50 Atl. 841, 843, 23 R. I. 430.

A mere error of judgment is not of itself contributory negligence; and where an automobile came upon deceased under circumstances calculated to produce fright or terror, and such fright or terror was produced thereby, and this caused an error in judgment, by which the boy ran in front of the automobile, it was not contributory negligence. Thies v. Thomas, 77 N. Y. Supp. 276, 278.

Failure to avoid danger.

"It has been a rule of law from time immemorial that there can be no recovery for an injury caused by the mutual fault of both parties. When it can be shown that it would not have happened except for the negligence of the party injured concurring with that of the other party, no action can be maintained, and what is such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery is a question of law and fact to be determined by the jury; but, where the undisputed facts show that by the exercise of ordinary care a party might have avoided injury, he cannot recover. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 79 Va. 241, 249 (citing Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. Ed. 506, 17 Am. Ry. Dec. p. 123).

When the question of contributory negligence depends on a variety of circumstances, from which different minds may arrive at different conclusions as to whether plaintiff exercised proper care and caution, the question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. The plaintiff's right of recovery in an action for injuries is not precluded in all cases where he omits to employ his senses to discover and avoid injury, even though the omission be regarded as negligence. It does so apply only when the omission contributes to the injury; that is, when by their employment he might have avoided the injury. Cleveland, C. & C. R. v. Crawford, 24 Ohio St. 631, 638, 15 Am. Rep. 633; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Whitacre, 35 Ohio St. 627, 630.

Contributory negligence is the doing or the omitting to do that which, under the circumstances, a reasonable man would not have done or would not have omitted to do to avoid any injury resulting to himself from the negligence of the defendant. If the plaintiff or party injured by the exercise of ordinary care, under the circumstances, might have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, but did not, the case is one of mutual fault. Hubbard v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 43 Atl. 550, 551, 72 Conn. 24.

The term contributory negligence is properly applied to cases where one injured through the negligence of another failed to take steps to avoid the danger, although it was apparent. Such a person is held in law to have contributed to the damage he sustains, and is barred from all remedy. Robinson v. Simpson (Del.) 32 Atl. 287, 8 Houst. 398.

The term "contributory negligence," in an action for personal injuries, means negligence on the part of the plaintiff such as contributed to cause the accident, which by ordinary care plaintiff could have avoided. Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. (Del.) 32 Atl. 643, 644, 9 Houst. 306.

Contributory negligence is negligence in not avoiding the consequences arising from the negligence of some other person when means and opportunity are offered to do so. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jones (U. S.) 95 Fed. 370, 373, 37 C. C. A. 106.

A servant is charged with actual notice as to the matters concerning which it is his duty to inquire, and, when the circumstances make it his duty to inquire, it is contributory negligence on his part not to inquire. Wright v. Pacific Coast Oil Co. (Cal.) 53 Pac. 1086, 1090; Magee v. Northern Pac. C. R. Co., 21 Pac. 114, 116, 78 Cal. 430, 12 Am. St. Rep. 69.

One who in broad daylight, with abundant means to ascertain his situation, steps into a descending elevator and is injured, is guilty of contributory negligence so as to prevent his recovery. Hutchins v. Priestly Express Wagon & S. Co., 28 N. W. 85, 61 Mich. 252.

Joint negligence.

"Contributory negligence," as the designation itself implies, can only exist where the injury is the result of the combined negligence of plaintiff and defendant. Where plaintiff's negligence is the sole cause of the injury, it is not contributory. Connor v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 59 Mo. 285, 305.

"Contributory negligence," as the words import, implies the concurring negligence of both plaintiff and defendant. The phrase is defined by Beach as follows: "Contributory negligence in its legal significance is such an act or omission on the part of plaintiff amounting to an ordinary want of care as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is a proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of." The definition given by Shearman & Redfield is in substance and effect the same. If the negligence of either defendant or plaintiff alone is the sole cause of the injury, there can be no contributory negligence. It is clear that there can be no contributory negligence unless there was also negligence to which that of plaintiff could contribute. Unless the negligence of plaintiff was the proximate cause of the injury, his action on the ground of contributory negligence could not be defeated. Payne v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 31 S. W. 885, 888, 129 Mo. 405.

Contributory negligence consists of negligence by the party inflicting the injury and negligence on the part of the injured person, when the negligence of each contributed proximately to the injury, and when the injury would not have occurred, notwithstanding the negligence of the party inflicting the injury, if the injured person had not been negligent. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Patterson, 48 S. W. 747, 748, 749, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 255.

Contributory negligence is negligence not only upon the part of the one committing the injury, but also on the part of the one who is killed or injured, and by which they both contribute thereto. Weatherford, M. W. & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Duncan, 31 S. W. 562, 565, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 479; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kelley, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 7, 34 S. W. 809, 811.

Contributory negligence implies some negligence by both parties. Felton v. Aubrey (U. S.) 74 Fed. 350, 354, 20 C. C. A. 436.

"Contributory negligence" means that both the plaintiff's and the defendant's negligence were to blame directly for the injury; and, when both are to blame, one cannot be held, in law, to blame the other. Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 715, 719, 61 S. C. 468. The principle is that, in order that there may be any contributory negligence on plaintiff's part, there must be negligence also on the part of the defendant having a direct and proximate causal relation to the injury. Wastl v. Montana Union Ry. Co., 61 Pac. 9, 15, 24 Mont. 159.

Contributory negligence exists only when both parties have combined and concurred in producing the injury. There must always be negligence on the part of the defendant, or else it cannot be said that a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence. And as to a carrier of goods there is no such thing as contributory negligence by the owner of the goods. McCarthy v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 14 South. 370, 371, 102 Ala. 193, 48 Am. St. Rep. 29.

Knowledge of danger involved.

Contributory negligence involves, as a necessary element, a knowledge of the probable danger, or a sufficient reason to apprehend it. Hadley v. Lake Erie & W. Ry. Co., 51 N. E. 337, 341, 21 Ind. App. 675.

Negligence distinguished.

See "Negligence."

Negligence of co-employees.

Negligence of co-employees has never been regarded as contributory negligence. Cooper v. New York, O. & W. R. Co., 82 N. Y. Supp. 98, 100, 84 App. Div. 42.

Prior negligence of plaintiff.

In speaking of the rule that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff will not disentitle the plaintiff to recover if it appears that the defendant might by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence, it is said that the rule is but the statement, in another form, of a proposition that antecedent misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, such as could not have had any influence upon the conduct of the defendant, will not defeat a recovery for injuries inflicted by the immediate negligence of the defendant, and that it is a misuse of terms to speak of such negligence as contributory negligence. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Reed (U. S.) 60 Fed. 694, 696, 9 C. C. A. 219.

The negligence of a person does not place him beyond the protection of the law, and does not excuse another for a failure to exercise care to avoid injuring him. Consequently, where the negligence of a defendant in a personal injury case intervenes between the plaintiff's negligence and the injury, and becomes the proximate cause of the injury, the defendant will not be exempted from liability on the ground of contributory negligence. But this does not mean that contributory negligence will not exempt the defendant where his negligence was gross. The cases cited to support this rule, as thus laid down by some writers, almost invariably show that the negligence of defendant intervened between the negligence of plaintiff and the injury complained of. McDonald v. International & G. N. Ry. Co., 22 S. W. 939, 943, 86 Tex. 1, 40 Am. St. Rep. 803.

By "contributory negligence" is meant such negligence on the part of the plaintiff as contributes to the injury; that is, directly in part causes it. It is, therefore, not contributory negligence for the plaintiff to be guilty of a negligent act which might have produced the injury, if, before it actually results, the defendant is guilty of some negligent act which was the immediate cause of the injury, even though no damage could have resulted to the plaintiff had he not been originally negligent. Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 190, 196.

"While it is generally a defense to an action of tort that the plaintiff's negligence contributed to produce the injury, still, where the negligent acts of the parties are distinct and independent of each other, the act of the plaintiff preceding that of the defendant, it is considered that the plaintiff's conduct does not contribute to produce the injury if, notwithstanding his negligence, the injury could be avoided by the use of ordinary care at the time by the defendant." O'Brien v. McGlinchy, 68 Me. 552, 557.

In law of agency.

In regard to the duty of a person dealing with an agent to inquire as to his authority, it is said that if a person is careless in exhibiting confidence in an agent, yet this does not make him liable to a third party, who in dealing with such agent fails to apply the diligence usual with good business men under the circumstances. The case becomes, in such a view, one of what is called "contributory negligence"; in other words, the causal connection between the negligence in giving color to the employment of A., and B.'s loss by dealing with A., is broken by B.'s own negligence in trusting A. without due inquiry. Hurley v. Watson, 36 N. W. 726, 729, 68 Mich. 531.

CONTRIVANCE.

Other contrivance, see "Other."

CONTRIVING.

The words "contriving, propagating, and spreading," in an indictment charging the defendants with conspiring to occasion a fall and decline in the market price of certain stock by contriving, propagating, and spreading divers false and injurious rumors, statements, imputations, etc., regarding and impugning the management and financial condition of the corporation, is equivalent to the word "circulating," as used in Pen. Code, § 435, making it criminal for any one, with intent to affect the market price of stocks, to knowingly circulate any false statement, rumor, or intelligence; and they further charge motive, intent, and guilty knowledge. People v. Goslin, 73 N. Y. Supp. 520, 523, 67 App. Div. 16.

CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE.

A verdict may be said to be "contrary to the evidence" when it is so clearly against its weight as to make it apparent that the jury were misled or were influenced by partiality, passion, or undue bias. So, too, a verdict is contrary to the evidence when it is founded solely upon the testimony of an interested plaintiff, who is discredited to such an extent as to make it apparent either that the jury misapprehended the scope and effect of the discrediting circumstances, or that, apprehending, they disregarded them capriciously or from bias. Streicher v. Third Ave. R. Co., 57 N. Y. Supp. 716, 720, 39 App. Div. 658.

CONTRARY TO LAW.

The expression "contrary to law," in a complaint averring that defendant sold liquor contrary to the law, is a conclusion at law, and states no fact. Village of Cortland v. Howard, 37 N. Y. Supp. 843, 844, 1 App. Div. 131.

"Contrary to law" means contrary to the general principles of the law as applicable to the facts. Candy v. Hanmore, 76 Ind. 125, 128.

2 Rev. St. 1853, p. 117, providing that where a verdict is contrary to law a new trial shall be granted, does not mean a verdict "that is defective or insufficient in law merely. A verdict may be defective and insufficient in law, and yet not be contrary thereto. We think that a verdict which is contrary to law is one which is contrary to the principles of law as applied to the facts which the jury were called upon to try, and the principle of law which should govern the cause." Bosseker v. Cramer, 18 Ind. 44, 45. See, also, Candy v. Hanmore, 76 Ind. 125, 127, 128.

In Rev. St. § 3082, making it an offense to fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in doing so, any merchandise, contrary to law, the words "contrary to law" clearly relate to legal provisions not found in the section itself, and hence, in an indictment under such section, the acts violated should be alleged. Keck v. United States, 19 Sup. Ct. 254, 255, 172 U. S. 434, 43 L. Ed. 505.

As contrary to statute.

The phrase "contrary to law," as used in an indictment in which the conclusion recites that the act complained of is contrary to law, is equivalent to the phrase "contrary to statute." Hudson v. State (Ind.) 1 Blackf. 317, 318.

As referring to instructions.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 253, subd. 5, authorizing a new trial when the verdict is "contrary to law," should be construed to mean "contrary to the instructions"; and in order to obtain a new trial on that ground it must be made to appear that there was an instruction which was disregarded, it not being sufficient that a principle of law not embodied in an instruction was disregarded by the jury. Valerius v. Richard, 59 N. W. 534, 57 Minn. 443.

A statement in a motion for a new trial that the verdict is contrary to law presents a question whether the finding of the jury is in accord with the law embodied in the instructions, and does not present for review any errors in the instruction. Drexel v. Daniels, 68 N. W. 399, 49 Neb. 99.

Code Civ. Proc. § 999, authorizing a new trial where the verdict is "contrary to law," does not refer to an erroneous decision by the court as to the law of the case. The phrase, as used in reference to a verdict, means that the verdict is one which the law does not authorize the jury to render upon the evidence presented to them, and does not refer to any act of the court in giving to the jury directions upon which their verdict is to be based; for though such verdict may be contrary to the law in the sense that it is not authorized by the law, yet it is not an error for which the jury is responsible. Where in any case the evidence is examined, and found to be such as warrants the verdict in the case, the verdict cannot be said to be contrary to law. Swartout v. Willingham, 26 N. Y. Supp. 769, 771, 6 Misc. Rep. 179.

CONTRARY TO STATUTE.

An allegation in a criminal complaint that the acts are against the peace and contrary to the statute is equivalent to an allegation that the act was unlawfully or maliciously done. State v. Tibbetts, 29 Atl. 979, 86 Me. 189.

The object, in the averment, of the phrase "contrary to the form of the statutes," is to show that the action is brought upon the statutes, and that it is not an action at common law. If that otherwise appears upon the face of the declaration, the averment is at most a mere formal averment. And where the declaration in the first instance referred to certain statutes, and it appeared throughout that the action was brought on them, the fact that each count concluded "contrary to said statutes," rather than "contrary to the statutes of 18—," was not objectionable. Blydenburgh v. Miles, 39 Conn. 484, 496.

Where there were two statutes relative to assaults and batteries, one merely abridging or limiting the discretion of the court with respect to the amount of fine and the duration of the imprisonment, but in no wise attaching any penalty or punishment to the offense, an indictment for assault and battery, concluding "contrary to the form of the statute," instead of "to the statutes," is proper. State v. Berry, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 374, 376.

CONTROL

See "Exclusive Control"; "Immediate Control"; "Superintending Control"; "Supervisory Control"; "Under Control."

The words "control" and "manage" are synonymous. Youngworth v. Jewell, 15 Nev. 45, 48.

A person who, as guardian, has the management of the estate of an insane person, has the "control" thereof, within the meaning of St. 1890, c. 410, which provides for the punishment of one trespassing upon land against the order of one having the lawful control of the premises, since "management" means "control," as the latter word is used in the statute. Gray v. Parke, 39 N. E. 191, 162 Mass. 582.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1417, providing that no bill shall be dismissed for failure to file a transcript when such failure is owing to the fault or omission of the clerk, or other circumstances over which appellant has no control, "does not require the circumstances to be absolutely beyond appellant's control, but allows relief for appellant's own delay or neglect where the same is fairly excusable." Smith v. Arthur, 31 Pac. 757, 5 Wash. 356.

As in charge of.

As used in various clauses of appropriation acts passed by Congress since 1872, in which divers sums of money have been appropriated for the care and repair of buildings and furniture, etc., in the customhouses, courthouses, post offices, marine hospitals, and other public buildings, under the control of the Treasury Department, the words "under the control of" mean "in charge of," and nothing more. The control referred to in all the acts is simply a control as respects repairs, care, maintenance, etc., and confer no authority to control the use and occupation of the buildings. In re Lyman (U. S.) 55 Fed. 29, 40.

As giving power of disposition.

A will providing that the testator's trustees should retain certain property in their hands and under their control, and should "manage and control" the same to produce an income, etc., does not, unaided by other considerations, confer a power to sell, and the power to sell cannot be derived from such words. Blanton v. Mayes, 58 Tex. 422, 429.

In a will where testator bequeathed to his wife all his property, both real and personal, to be at her control during her natural life, the word "control" cannot mean that she shall have an absolute fee simple or power of sale, so as to pass a fee during her natural life; it cannot have been used in a different sense from its usual signification and import. The testator, it is manifest, did not use it in any other sense. He intended that she should have authority over it—the management and superintendence and use of it—during her natural life. Porter v. Thomas, 23 Ga. 467, 472.

Within the meaning of a will giving the executors absolute control of testator's estate, the word "control" means to manage, which is to have authority over the particular matter, to check, to restrain, to govern with reference thereto. The language used is in legal effect the same as if it had been "the entire control of my estate," so far as it is accorded and permitted by the law, and the extent of the power as thus conferred would be to do whatever was necessary in and about the administration of the estate. But it is not believed that the executor would have power to sell and convey the lands of the estate at his discretion, or for any other purpose than the payment of debts or carrying into execution executory contracts made with reference to the lands by the testator. Anderson v. Stockdale, 62 Tex. 54, 61.

When used in a will giving a wife exclusive control over testator's property, "control" is not to be construed as giving the power to make absolute disposition thereof, and use and enjoy it as her own, but only to give her the management and control thereof. Wolfe v. Loeb, 13 South. 744, 746, 98 Ala. 426.

The words "control and management," as used in a will devising property to the testator's son, and declaring that he shall have the control and management of the same during life, means that the son should have the use, possession, superintendence, and direction of the property, and the power of exercising a general restraint over the same during the continuance of his estate, or until the happening of the event that will determine the taker of the fee in the same, and manifestly does not include a power of disposal. Randall v. Josselyn, 10 Atl. 577, 579, 59 Vt. 557.

In a provision in a will giving a widow "control" of certain lands, with a remainder to children, a tenancy without impeachment or waste is not imported by the use of the word "control." Hogan v. Hogan, 61 N. W. 73, 74, 102 Mich. 641.

As imposing duty.

In Acts 1853, c. 339, § 1, constituting and declaring the county commissioners a corporation and body politic, and enacting that they shall have charge and control over public roads and bridges and the property owned by the county, the phrase "charge and control" should be construed as equivalent to "duty and obligation," since the statute conferred a power upon the corporation to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of which is not discretionary, but imperative, and the commissioners are not at liberty to exercise a discretion as their sense of duty to their constituents dictate, without coercion or liability for its nonuser. The power vested in the county commissioners was a ministerial one, which they were obliged to exercise, and they are liable to an action for damages at the suit of one injured by a defect in a road or bridge. Anne Arundel County Com'rs v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 475, 88 Am. Dec. 557.

As govern or regulate.

Const. art. 9, § 7, provides that county superintendents and boards of education shall have control of the examination of teachers and the granting of teachers' certificates. By the use of the word "control" it was not meant that the Legislature could not prescribe the rules by which the qualification of teachers should be determined. The word was not used as synonymous with "govern," "rule," or "regulate," so as to give the board of education unlimited and exclusive authority, and does not imply that the power of legislation on the subject in question was prohibited to the Legislature. Mitchell v. Winnek, 49 Pac. 579, 580, 117 Cal. 520.

Guardianship implied.

A devise which provided that the executors shall have "control and direction" over defendant's son means that they shall have the power of guardianship over such son. Rock River Paper Co. v. Fisk, 10 N. W. 344, 346, 47 Mich. 212.

As power to license, prohibit, or restrain.

The word "control" means power or authority to check or restrain; and, being a synonym of "management," a statute giving a city management of certain industries gives it power to restrain them. City of St. Louis v. Howard, 24 S. W. 770, 771, 119 Mo. 41.

In the charter of the city of Portland, giving authority to the council to control and regulate washhouses and public laundries, the words "control and regulate" ex vi termini imply to restrain, to check, to rule and direct; and the power to do either of these implies the right to license as a convenient and proper means to that end. In re Wan Yin (U. S.) 22 Fed. 701, 702.

The title of an ordinance as "An ordinance to regulate and control the driving of cattle through the streets of Jersey City" meant "to establish rules and limits," but did not import that the driving of cattle should be prohibited. McConvill v. Jersey City, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 88, 44.

As applicable to mandamus.

The word "control" seems in itself to imply that the party to be controlled has power to exercise his functions or discharge his duty in several different ways. It is not the word, therefore, which expresses correctly the kind of power or authority asserted by a court when it issues its mandamus. To control properly means to keep under check, to govern, to restrain. A mandamus is simply a demand to a person to do an act which he is bound by law to do, and which he has no lawful right to refuse to do. United States v. Kendall (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 702, 750.

Possession implied.

The control of papers as securities implies such a possession thereof under a delivery to the holder and such acceptance as will perfect the security. Bank of Monroe v. Gifford, 44 N. W. 558, 560, 79 Iowa, 300.

A conveyance in trust, with power to hold and control the property, involves the custody and possession of the trust property, both real and personal. Ure v. Ure, 56 N. E. 1087, 185 Ill. 216.

As repeal.

"Control" means to exercise a directing, restraining, or governing influence over, counteract, regulate, but does not embrace the idea of repealing, extinguishing, or doing away with. Thus, provisions of a city charter framed under Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that charters of cities framed under this Constitution shall be subject to and controlled by general law, are not repealed by general law contrary to such provisions, but merely suspended during the existence of such law. Byrne v. Drain, 60 Pac. 433, 127 Cal. 663.

Of billiard table.

The "control, care, or management of any billiard table," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting any person having the control, care, or management of any billiard table from allowing minors to congregate in his place, is not shown in an indictment describing defendant as having the control and management of a saloon in which were kept billiard tables. Hanrahan v. State, 57 Ind. 527, 528.

Of building.

If a building is let to a tenant, who enters into possession under a lease, the building is not under the control of the landlord, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 101, § 9, making it criminal for any one to knowingly permit a building under his control to be used for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, but is under the control of the tenant, while he continues in possession under the lease, unless there are special provisions in the lease which give the control to the landlord. Commonwealth v. Wentworth, 15 N. E. 138, 141, 146 Mass. 86.

Rev. St. c. 17, § 4, prohibits any person who has control of a tenement to permit the same to be used as a house of ill-fame and for the illegal keeping and selling of intoxicating liquors with his knowledge, permission, or consent. Held, that the word "control," as there used, includes one who had authority to let a tenement and receive the rents from it; but the mere fact of control was not sufficient to charge a person with aiding in the illegal use thereof, it being required that he, having control, consented with knowledge of the purpose for which the house should be used. State v. Frazier, 8 Atl. 347, 79 Me. 95.

Of expenditure.

In a statute providing that, where money is contributed by a county to assist a town in building a bridge, the fund shall be expended by and under the control of the commissioners, and to persons to be appointed by the county board, such appointees have the right to participate, not merely in the disbursement or paying out of the fund, but also to the free exercise of judgment and choice between all the different specific objects presented as necessary and proper to effectuate the general purpose of the expenditure. To control the expenditure is to hinder, restrain, or check it in the exercise of the free will. Board of Sup'rs of Mercer County v. Town of New Boston, 13 Ill. App. (13 Bradw.) 274, 279.

Of railroad.

A contract made by a railroad company concerning all roads which it then did or might thereafter control by ownership, lease, or otherwise, meant an immediate or executive control exercised by the officers chosen by and acting under the direction of the contracting road. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri R. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. 634, 636.

Of religious observances.

To compel men to refrain from labor solely from regard to the imputed holiness of a particular day is not, within the meaning of the Constitution, to "control" the religious observance, and to interfere with and constrain the consciences of those who honestly disbelieve the asserted sanctity of the selected day. So long as no attempt is made to force upon others the adoption of the belief of the governing power, or to compel a practice in accordance with it, so long is conscience left in the enjoyment of its natural right of individual decision and independent religious action. Act April 22, 1794, prohibiting the performance of any ordinary employment or business on the Lord's day, commonly called "Sunday," works of necessity or charity only excepted, is not in conflict with Const. art. 9, § 3: " * * * No human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship." Specht v. Commonwealth, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 312, 324, 49 Am. Dec. 518.

Of schools.

"Control," as used in Rev. St. 1879, art. 3783, and Gen. Laws 1883, p. 112, providing that in certain cities the council may appoint trustees, who shall have power to control the schools in such cities, includes the fixing of the salary of the superintendent. Board of Trustees of Public Schools v. City of Sherman, 42 S. W. 546, 548, 91 Tex. 188.

The word "control" means to check or restrain, and as used in a statute investing school district trustees with the care and custody of schoolhouses and other school property belonging to their districts, with full power to control the same as they may think best, the word "control" is confined to the care and custody of the schoolhouses or other property. There is nothing that hints at authorizing the school trustees to impose any incidental fees on the pupils; for while the word "regulate" has been defined, in relation to the power to regulate commerce, as the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed—that is, the condition upon which it shall be conducted, to determine when it shall be free, and when subject to duties or other exactions—and the word "regulate" is one of the meanings of "control," still, in its primary sense, the word "control" imports a check by a counter check or register or duplicate account, and gradually came to have an enlarged meaning, so that it means to exercise a restraining influence over, to check, to counteract, to restrain, to regulate; and it is essential that the idea of check or restrain in some shade of meaning shall appear. Young v. Trustees of Fountain Inn Graded School, 41 S. E. 824, 827, 64 S. C. 131.

Of separate property of married woman.

The married women's act, giving a married woman the sole and exclusive "control" of her separate property, does not enable her to make all and every sort of contract, so that it be as to her "separate property," but merely enables her to make simple contracts in connection therewith, such as sales, etc., and could not be construed to extend to contracts of suretyship. Stiles v. Lord, 11 Pac. 314, 316, 2 Ariz. 154.

A piano in the house occupied by the husband, who had such control over it as he had of his wife's clothing or personal jewelry, and which he could by physical force have taken back, in view of the domestic relations, is in no legal sense of the word in his "control." Norbeck v. Davis, 27 Atl. 712, 714, 157 Pa. 399.

"Control," as used in a will providing that portions of property given thereby to the testatrix's granddaughters should be so secured for their use and benefit as not to be subject to the control and disposition of their husbands, means the legal control on the part of the husband by virtue of his marital rights, and not the just and natural influence arising from the marital relation. Deering v. Tucker, 55 Me. 284, 288.

St. 1887, c. 270, providing that an employé of a railway company may recover for injuries due to the negligence of the person in charge or control of a train, etc., means a person who, for the time being, at least, has immediate authority to direct the movements and management of the train as a whole, and of the men engaged upon it; and hence a brakeman on cars which are moving from the impetus imparted by a locomotive shortly detached therefrom has not "charge or control" of the cars, within the meaning of the statute. Caron v. Boston & A. R. Co., 42 N. E. 112, 113, 164 Mass. 523. It includes the engineer of the train, but does not include the station agent and the tower man in charge of the track, since they have charge of the switches. Fairman v. Boston & A. R. Co., 47 N. E. 613, 617, 169 Mass. 170.

Generally, when the engineer is on and running the engine, or has the actual custody, he has control of it. It may be, however, when he is not in active manipulation of it, that other persons control it. It will not do to say, as a matter of law, who has control of an engine for any particular time, when it is fairly inferable from the evidence that either one or the other of two persons may have such control. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Richardson, 14 South. 209, 211, 100 Ala. 232.

The words "person in charge or control of the train," within the meaning of section 1, cl. 3, of the employers' liability act, no doubt for many purposes applies to the conductor, but, if the statute is to be of any use in the cases of running down or collision, the engineer must be regarded as the person in charge, so far as giving signals or slackening speed at the approach of danger is concerned. Davis v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 34 N. E. 1070, 1071, 159 Mass. 532.

The term "person in charge or control of any locomotive or train," in the master's liability act, in reference to injuries caused by the negligence of persons having charge or control of any railroad locomotive, engine, or train, does not include the conductor of a switch engine having charge of making up freight trains in the yard, in so far as his negligent acts in making up the train relate to and are the cause of an accident occurring after it is started on the road and outside of his control. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co., 30 N. E. 169, 170, 156 Mass. 13, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425.

In construing the statute relative to the liability of a railroad company for personal injuries by reason of the negligence of any person who has charge or control of any train upon a railroad, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether the brakeman who, in signaling a train to back when he and the engineer were the only persons on the train, was not acting under the orders of any immediate superior, was to be considered a person in charge or control of a train, the court saying that the language of the statute implies that some one is to be regarded as in charge. Steffe v. Old Colony R. Co., 30 N. E. 1137, 1138, 156 Mass. 262.

CONTROLLER.

A will providing that testator's wife shall be the sole controller of all his property, "just the same as if I was alive," does not imply that the wife had control of the property of testator during his life, but that after his death she should have the management of it as he had in his lifetime, and the word "controller" does not imply the power in her to make absolute disposition of the property and use and enjoy it as her own, but to have the management and authority over it. Wolffe v. Loeb, 13 South. 744, 746, 98 Ala. 426.

In machinery.

A "controller" is the easily recognized cylinder-shaped electric mechanism of an electric car at the left hand of the motor-man, which is operated by a handle which is constantly being swung to and fro, and is the visible means by which the speed of the car is retarded or is promoted. The controller, as a whole, is a device for regulating or controlling the current delivered to an electric motor, and thereby regulating the speed of the car. Electric Car Co. of America v. Nassau Electric R. Co. (U. S.) 91 Fed. 142, 33 C. C. A. 420.

CONTROLLING CAUSE.

A controlling cause of an accident is that without which the accident would not have occurred. Nashville R. Co. v. Norman, 67 S. W. 479, 481, 108 Tenn. 324.

CONTROVERSY.

See "Amount in Controversy"; "Matters in Controversy"; "Sum in Controversy."

See "Separable Controversy"; "Separate Controversy."

A controversy is a dispute arising between two or more persons. Barber v. Kennedy, 18 Minn. 216 (Gil. 196, 206) (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 309).

Controversy is a disputed question; a suit at law. State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte, 156 Mo. 513, 519, 57 S. W. 281 (citing Standard Dict.).

In Smith v. Adams, 130 U. S. 173, 9 Sup. Ct. 566, 32 L. Ed. 895, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said that the terms "cases" and "controversies" in the Constitution, giving jurisdiction to the United States courts, embrace the claims or contentions of litigants before the courts for adjudication by regular proceedings established for the protection or enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 14 Sup. Ct. 1125, 1132, 154 U. S. 447, 38 L. Ed. 1047.

The term "controversy" in Rev. St. U. S. § 639, subd. 3, as amended by 24 Stat. 553, giving the right to remove to the federal courts a suit in the state courts involving a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, means a dispute concerning rights or wrongs cognizable by law, and which may therefore be the subject of an action or involved therein. Fisk v. Henarie (U. S.) 32 Fed. 417, 423.

"Controversy," in Act Cong. March 5, 1875, providing for the removal of causes from a state court to the federal court in any suit where there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states and which can be fully determined as between them, means an actual controversy in which both parties have an interest. Sheldon v. Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 789, 794.

To constitute a "controversy" in an action at law, there must be an allegation on one side and a denial on the other, making an issue of fact or an issue of law. Gudger v. Western N. C. R. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 81, 83 (citing Boyd v. Gill [U. S.] 19 Fed. 145).

Where there are parties and a contest in reference to property, and informal pleadings under which the disputed matters are to be settled by the court, it is a "controversy" that may be removed to the federal courts under Act Cong. March 3, 1875. Craigie v. McArthur (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 736, 737.

Where, in a proceeding in a court of bankruptcy to marshal assets in the hands of a trustee as between partnership and individual creditors, a distinct and separable issue is raised between parties intervening, involving substantial rights, and which might arise at common law or in equity, there is a "controversy" within the meaning of Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 24a, 30 Stat. 545, which gives the several Circuit Courts of Appeals appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising in bankruptcy proceedings from the courts of bankruptcy from which they have appellate jurisdiction in other cases. Burleigh v. Foreman (U. S.) 125 Fed. 217, 219, 60 C. C. A. 100.

Case or suit distinguished.

Within the provision of the Constitution giving United States courts jurisdiction of cases in law and equity, cases in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and controversies to which the United States shall be a party, and controversies between two or more states, or between citizens of one state and another state, etc., the Supreme Court, in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, determine that the word "suit" is not so broad as the word "controversy," because it determined that a writ of error could be maintained though it was not a suit, and yet it could not be denied that it was a controversy. Mr. Justice Iredell, in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 431, 432, 1 L. Ed. 440, distinguished between the word "controversies" and the word "cases" in this connection, by confining the former to such as are of a civil nature; but this change in language from the word "cases" to the word "controversies" will be found to have been a mere matter of style, and to have no relation to any limitation or extension of the class of questions to be adjudicated. So long as this section of the Constitution speaks especially with reference to the nature of the questions involved, it uses the word "cases"; but when it considers more particularly proceedings having relation to the existence of parties, it uses the word "controversies," probably because, when parties are speaking of a raid against each other, the literary style suggested the change. King v. McLean Asylum of the Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 64 Fed. 331, 336, 12 C. C. A. 145.

The Constitution of the United States gives jurisdiction to the courts of the United States over cases in law and equity, cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, controversies between two or more states, and controversies between citizens of different states. This language makes a distinction between "cases" or "suits" on the one hand, and "controversies" on the other, and the Supreme Court has repeatedly and explicitly recognized the distinction thus made. The doctrine has been settled in various decisions of that court that if a suit embraces but one controversy, and the parties to it on either side are not wholly residents, respectively, of different states, the suit cannot be removed; yet if in the suit there is a separable controversy, the parties to which actually interested in the decision of it are on each side wholly citizens of different states, then the suit may, on the petition of one or more such parties to the separable controversy, be removed into the federal court. Snow v. Smith (U. S.) 88 Fed. 657, 658 (citing Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336, to the former point, and Barney v. Latham, 103 U. S. 205, to the latter).

The term "controversies," as used in the provision of the federal Constitution that the judicial power shall extend to certain cases, and to controversies to which the United States shall be a party, and to controversies between two or more states, is broader in its meaning than the word "case," which it supersedes. Home Ins. Co. v. North Western Packet Co., 82 Iowa, 223, 238, 7 Am. Rep. 183.

A "controversy," in the sense of a statute giving Circuit Courts jurisdiction of any controversy in which the United States are petitioners or plaintiffs, is a case at law or in equity brought before some competent court of justice for forensic discussion and judicial decision. United States v. Henderlong (U. S.) 102 Fed. 2, 4.

A "controversy," as used in Act March 3, 1875, cl. 2, providing for the removal of a cause commenced in a state court to a United States court when there is a controversy in the suit wholly between citizens of different states, should be construed to exist whenever any property, or the claim of the parties capable of pecuniary estimation, is the subject of litigation and is presented by the pleading for judicial determination. Bybee v. Hawkett (U. S.) 5 Fed. 1, 2 (citing Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 20, 23 L. Ed. 524).

"Controversies and disagreements," as used in Act 1862 (Laws 1862, p. 743, c. 412), authorizing justices of the Supreme Court to refer controversies and disagreements arising between receivers and members of mutual insurance companies, include actions regularly commenced by summons and complaint, and in which an answer has been put in. Sands v. Harvey (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Dec. 147, 148.

"Controversy" has been defined as follows: 'A dispute arising between two or more persons.' It differs from 'case,' which includes all suits, criminal as well as civil, whereas 'controversy' is a civil and not a criminal proceeding." 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 309. One of the definitions of "controversy" is "a lawsuit," as given in the American Encyclopædic Dictionary. The United States Constitution (article 3, § 2) declares its judicial power shall extend to "controversies" between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of different states, and between a state, or citizen thereof, and a foreign state, citizen, or subject. The United States judiciary act of 1789 (section 13) provides "that the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party," except in certain specified cases. See DeLafield v. Illinois, 2 Hill, 159, 163. "The term in Code Civ. Proc. § 46, providing that a judge shall not sit as such in, or take any part in the decision of, a cause or matter if he is related by consanguinity or affinity to any party to the 'controversy' within the sixth degree, is synonymous with 'civil action' or 'proceedings at law.'" Matthews v. Noble, 55 N. Y. Supp. 190, 191, 192, 25 Misc. Rep. 674.

As cause of action.

As employed in Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 137, relating to federal jurisdiction and removal of causes to the federal courts from state courts, the word "controversy" and the words "separate controversy" are not identical in meaning with "a separable cause of action." There may be separate remedies against several parties for the same cause of action, but there is only one subject-matter of controversy involved. Where there are separate and distinct causes of action in the same suit, either of which might have been sued on alone, then there are "separate controversies" within the meaning of the statute. Gudger v. Western N. C. R. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 81, 83 (citing Boyd v. Gill [U. S.] 19 Fed. 145).

Act 1875, § 2, cl. 2, declaring that when, in any suit between citizens of different states, "there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states and which can be fully determined as between them," then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants may remove the cause to the United States courts, cannot be construed as restricting the right of removal to suits which contained two or more controversies. The language is doubtless designed to embrace suits which do contain two or more controversies, and to authorize removal at the instance of any one plaintiff or necessary defendant, provided the necessary conditions exist as respects any one distinct controversy in the suit; but it does not follow that such is its only purpose. The phrase "and which can be determined as between them" only shows that the clause was designed to embrace suits which do contain two controversies, as well as suits which contain but one controversy, and that, when applied to a suit containing several controversies, the same conditions must exist as to that controversy which necessarily exist when there is but one controversy in the case. As the language of the clause, instead of indicating any exclusion of the cases having but a single controversy, appears rather to have been chosen so as to cover all suits having several plaintiffs or several defendants which have either one controversy or several, the clause should not be narrowed by construction, but should be applied to both cases alike. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Champlin (U. S.) 21 Fed. 85, 86.

Compelling production of evidence.

The issue made before the Circuit Court on the application of the civil service commission for an order to compel the giving of testimony or the production of books and papers is a "case" or "controversy" within the meaning of the federal Constitution. People v. Kipley, 49 N. E. 229, 237, 171 Ill. 44, 41 L. R. A. 775 (citing Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447, 14 Sup. Ct. 1125, 38 L. Ed. 1047).

Construction of will.

A question involving the construction of a will and the administration of its trusts, of the most profound moment to the estate and its legatees and distributees, which is a real, unfeigned, actual contention between the parties, is a "controversy" within the jurisdiction of a federal court of chancery, if there are jurisdictional facts sufficient to give it jurisdiction. Woodfin v. Phœbus (U. S.) 30 Fed. 289, 292.

Criminal cases.

Const. art. 3, § 2, providing that the judicial power should extend to "controversies" between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, and between a state and foreign states and citizens or subjects, cannot be construed to include any proceedings that relate to criminal cases. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 430, 1 L. Ed. 440.

Act 1790, speaking of perjury as being an offense which may be committed in any "suit, controversy, matter or cause depending" in any of the courts of the United States, should be construed to include an indictment, with issue joined on a plea of "not guilty," found for an act which does not constitute an offense under the laws of the United States. United States v. Reese (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 746, 748.

Habeas corpus.

A petition for a writ of habeas corpus by a citizen of one state seeking release from illegal restraint by a citizen of another state is a suit or "controversy" between said parties, within the meaning of the federal Constitution giving the federal court jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different states. King v. McLean Asylum of the Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 64 Fed. 331, 336, 12 C. C. A. 145.

CONTOVERTSY BETWEEN CITIZENS OF DIFFERENT STATES.

A controversy between citizens of different states is none the less such a controversy because they are not the only parties to it. To confine the operation of the words "controversies between the citizens of different states" to cases wherein the controversy is exclusively between citizens of different states is to interpolate a word into the grant of judicial power which materially limits and restrains its operation. Flask v. Henarie (U. S.) 32 Fed. 417, 423.

CONTOVERTSY CONCERNING PROPERTY.

A controversy concerning the amount of compensation to be paid for land tax for a public use is a "controversy concerning property" within the meaning of article 20, Bill of Rights. Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 187, 20 Am. Rep. 194.

CONTOVERTSY OF CIVIL NATURE.

The expression "controversies of a civil nature," as used in the judiciary act of 1789, § 13, providing that the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, is broad and comprehensive, and by no obvious meaning or necessary implication can be construed to exclude a suit between two states in relation to the boundary between such states. Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 657, 723, 9 L. Ed. 1233.

CONTOVERTSY TOUCHING AN ACCOUNT.

The legal term "controversy touching an account," within the meaning of Revision, p. 875, § 177, providing that all actions in which matters of account are in controversy may by rule of court be referred, etc., is a legal term which has a definite signification. It denotes the necessity of adjustment and settlement of items, some of which are controverted. The subject is illustrated and explained by a perception of such matters of account as are cognizable by a court of equity, or that can be embraced in the ancient common-law action of account. The term does not apply to a case where the sole question is with respect to certain forgeries. American Saw Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 34 Atl. 1, 2, 58 N. J. Law (29 Vroom) 438.

CONTOVERT.

To "controvert" means more than to "deny," and, by provision of the Code, new matter or counterclaims set up in the answer must be controverted or they will be deemed true. A plaintiff cannot deny the truth of the facts averred in the counterclaim and then introduce evidence in avoidance. Swenson v. Kleinschmidt, 26 Pac. 198, 199, 10 Mont. 473.

"Controvert" means to "deny." It is not necessary, however, that the word "controvert" or "deny" should be necessarily used in a pleading purporting to deny the allegation to a bill, it being sufficient if the allegations thereof are such that if true those of the bill could not be true. Henny Buggy Co. v. Patt, 35 N. W. 587, 589, 73 Iowa, 485.

Rev. St. c. 110, § 89, declares that no assignment of error shall be allowed in the Supreme Court which calls in question the determination of "controverted" questions of fact by the lower court. Held, that the word "controverted" meant such facts as tended, either as evidentiary or subordinate facts or as the ultimate fact, to sustain the issue made by the pleading in the cause, irrespective of whether the evidence in itself is or is not conflicting. La Salle County v. Milligan, 32 N. E. 196, 197, 143 Ill. 321 (citing American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Chicago Nat. Bank, 131 Ill. 547, 22 N. E. 523; Cothran v. Ellis, 125 Ill. 496, 16 N. E. 646).

CONVENIENCE—CONVENIENT.

See "As Nearly as can be Conveniently Done"; "As Soon as Convenient"; "Public Convenience."

The words "conveniently found," in Mills' Ann. St. 1891, § 2794, authorizing a justice of the peace to appoint a special constable whenever no qualified constable can conveniently be found in the township, must be construed to have a restricting significance, and the justice may not of his own motion appoint a special officer, nor may he do it on request of a litigant unless there exist a legal necessity for the appointment. In other words, it must be made to appear to the justice, before he is authorized to appoint a special constable, that some legal right is liable to be jeopardized, or some substantial detriment or harm come to the litigant. Cunningham v. Bostwick, 43 Pac. 151, 153, 7 Colo. App. 169.

A contract for the insertion of an advertisement in a publication, the price to be "payable as convenient," cannot be construed as intended to excuse the parties contracting in any event from making any payment at all, but can only mean that some indulgence as to the length of credit was to be allowed to them. Black v. Bachelder, 120 Mass. 171.

The use of the phrase "as soon as they can conveniently locate and construct," in the charter of a railroad company authorizing them, as soon as they conveniently can, to construct a road with one or more tracks, and to make or erect warehouses, etc., is not a limitation upon the power to compel the company to exercise its whole authority in the very beginning. It would be an unreasonable construction of its charter to require provision to be made for all the unknown wants of the future. The increase in trade and business, and the changes taking place, often require new and increased facilities. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Williams, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 103, 107.

What is covered by the word "convenience," as used in relation to the subject of the duty of carriers in furnishing conveniences to the public, it might be difficult to define for all cases; but an opportunity to purchase a 1,000-mile ticket for less than the standard rate, we think, is improperly described as a "convenience." Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 19 Sup. Ct. 565, 568, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. Ed. 858.

In an action against the indorser of a note payable at a bank, the judge instructed the jury that a demand of payment in some reasonable and convenient time before the doors were closed would be sufficient. Held, that the word "convenient" was too indefinite, inasmuch as it must mean the convenience of the notary. Harrison v. Crowder, 14 Miss. (6 Smedes & M.) 464, 474, 45 Am. Dec. 290.

The word "convenient" is defined by lexicographers to be "fit, suitable, proper, adapted," as its primary and ordinary meaning. This required the assignee in a voluntary assignment, directing him to sell, etc., "as soon as conveniently may be," to make sale in a fit, suitable, or proper manner. In doing so it is required to be done at a suitable time, for a proper price, after giving a fit opportunity for competition, all adapted to the interest of the parties, the nature of the property, and to effectuate the objects of the trust. By applying the secondary meaning of the word, it might be held to apply to the mere convenience of the assignee; but the rules of construction require that the intention of the parties must be ascertained from the instrument itself, and to ascertain that intention the primary and popular meaning of the words will be adopted, unless it is obvious from the context that they are not employed in that sense. When the popular meaning is applied to this term, it is as apt and proper as any word that could have been employed by the draftsman. Finlay v. Dickerson, 20 Ill. (19 Peck) 9, 20.

As fit or suitable.

"Convenient," as used in a charter empowering the trustees of an almshouse to appoint and remove 24 inmates "as often as it shall seem to be convenient to them," means as often as it seems fit to the commission. Davis v. Waddington, 7 Man. & G. 37, 45.

The word "convenient" in Rev. St. § 5033, authorizing a change of venue to the adjoining county most convenient for both parties, is to be taken in the sense of most suitable, becoming, or appropriate, and not in the sense of physical ease. Wilson v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 9 Ohio Dec. 640, 641.

"Convenient," as defined by Webster, is fit or adapted to an end; suitable; becoming; appropriate. "Fit" or "suitable" is probably the proper meaning as applied to a sidewalk. This does not necessarily apply to any particular material out of which it is to be constructed, but it must be placed in such condition that people in the exercise of ordinary care will not in the night season fall into an excavation or place left in a dangerous condition. City of Grand Island v. Oberschulte, 55 N. W. 301, 302, 38 Neb. 696.

An exception in a partition deed of "all places which may be found convenient for erecting mills" on a certain creek, etc., should be construed to mean only natural mill sites or falls in the creek, and not places where mills might be erected and supplied with water by means of sluices or other works of art. Jackson v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 191, 192.

No place can be "convenient" for the carrying on of a business which is a nuisance and which causes substantial injury to the property, nor can any use of one's own land be reasonable which deprives an adjoining owner of the lawful enjoyment of his property. Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Malone, 20 Atl. 900, 902, 73 Md. 268, 9 L. R. A. 737, 25 Am. St. Rep. 595.

As nearest or most handy.

"Convenient," as used in a statute requiring notice of incorporation to be published in some newspaper as convenient as practicable to the principal place of business of the corporation, means that it must be published in the nearest or most handy paper suitable therefor. Berkson v. Anderson, 87 N. W. 402, 403, 115 Iowa, 674.

As necessary.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, provides that the "land upon which any building is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof," is subject to mechanics' liens. It was held that the expression should be construed to mean such space or area of land as is necessary to the enjoyment of the building for the purpose in view in its construction, it being said in explanation that the uses to which a building is to be put must manifestly, many times, determine the quantity of land necessary for the convenient use and occupation thereof. If erected as a sawmill for sawing lumber, the space required for a log and lumber yard would be regarded as necessary to its use, while like space around a similar building for a watch factory might not be at all necessary. Pursuant to this principle, it is decided that a decree establishing mechanics' liens on the entire premises constituting the fair grounds of an agricultural society, consisting of about 60 acres of land, with race track, grand stand, corrals, stables, and other improvements thereon, in favor of persons who constructed a building on the grounds to be used as an hotel, clubhouse, and saloon, is erroneous. Tunis v. Lakeport Agricultural Park Ass'n, 33 Pac. 63, 98 Cal. 285.

The words "convenience, use and improvement of a city," in a city charter authorizing the city to purchase property required for the use, convenience, and improvement of the city, operating to limit the power of the city, it cannot purchase property by reason of collateral advantages incidentally resulting in the city's commercial or business prosperity. It is not contemplated or permitted that such property shall be acquired in aid of any public enterprise not of a public character, however laudable may be its purpose, or however useful may be its encouragement. A city cannot purchase for an agricultural society. City of Eufaula v. McNab, 67 Ala. 588, 591, 42 Am. Rep. 118.

As reasonable time.

Where it was agreed between the holder and maker of a note that the time for payment should be extended until it should be convenient for the maker to pay it, the word "convenient" meant that it should be extended for such a period as, under the circumstances of the case, would be reasonable. Newsam v. Finch (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 175, 177.

A note was in the following form: "June 20, 1855. For value received I promise to pay to the order of T. ninety five dollars, when I can make it convenient." Held, that the phrase "when I can make it convenient" imported that it should be payable within a reasonable time after its date. Lewis v. Tipton, 10 Ohio St. 88, 91, 75 Am. Dec. 498.

The statute of 1862 (page 398, § 2) provides that in case of assessments for street improvements the contractor for such improvement shall call upon the persons assessed and make demand for sums assessed against them if he can conveniently do so. Held, that "conveniently" means if he may do so by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Guerin v. Reese, 33 Cal. 292, 297.

In the pre-emption laws requiring a pre-emptor who temporarily leaves the land to return thereto as early as "convenient," the law means as early as he reasonably can. He has no right to keep possession, without a residence, for the mere purpose of preventing others from making a settlement on the land. Jacobs v. Figard, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 45, 47.

A promise to pay the balance due, "when-ever it is convenient to make a final settlement," is in legal effect a stipulation that the act shall be done within a reasonable time. It cannot mean that the thing shall be done on the demand of the party, for then he might demand immediately, and before a proper time had elapsed. "Convenient," as here used, must mean such a time for doing the act as, under all the circumstances of the case, should be reasonable. Howes' Ex'r v. Woodruff (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 640, 642.

Where a father promised a daughter and her proposed husband, in contemplation of their marriage, that he would do equal justice to all his daughters as fast as it was in his power "with convenience," the true meaning was that he would do it in a reasonable time, taking into consideration the circumstances of his estate, and the length of time that elapsed between the marriages of his other daughters and his advances to them respectively. Chicester's Ex'x v. Vass' Adm'r (Va.) 1 Munf. 98, 117, 4 Am. Dec. 531.

The words "when convenient," in a note so payable to order at Cincinnati, cannot be construed to nullify the words "On demand I promise to pay." If any force be given to them, it will be that the maker binds himself to pay within a reasonable time after date. Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa, 340, 343.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors, in trust, to the purpose that the assignee shall "as soon as convenient" sell, etc., means as soon as he reasonably can do so. The word "convenient" ordinarily signifies fit, suitable, proper, without difficulty, and is used in this sense in the assignment, as directing the assignee to sell and dispose of the property in such time as it is fit, suitable, and proper for him to do under all the circumstances, or as soon as it can be done without difficulty. McClung v. Bergfeld, 4 Minn. 148 (Gil. 99, 103).

As reasonably convenient.

Where the charter of a railroad company provided that the corporation should have power to acquire and hold such lands as necessary and convenient, the words "necessary or convenient" should be liberally construed, and include all lands found to be reasonably necessary or convenient for the purpose of operating the road. Boston & N. Y. Air-Line R. Co. v. Coffin, 50 Conn. 150, 155.

The meaning of the term "convenient privilege of passing" in a deed of a gristmill located upon land at a distance from a highway, and providing that the grantee shall have a convenient privilege of passing to the mill, which privilege is not defined in the deed, is for the jury. To determine that question they would be authorized to ascertain from evidence aside from the deed, not only what description of way would be convenient for the purposes of the grant, but also to ascertain the character of the way which actually existed, if any, at the time of the grant, as indicating what the parties then understood to be a convenient way. Simpson v. Norton, 45 Me. 281, 290.

In a private act of Parliament for inclosing the waste lands of a manor, reserving to the lord all mines, together with "convenient and necessary" ways then made or thereafter to be made, in liberty of laying wagonways, and to do such other works as might be necessary or convenient for the complete enjoyment thereof, held, that on the construction of the words "convenient and necessary" the question was not whether a road which had been laid out by the lord over one of the allotments had been made in the direction or in the manner least injurious to the owner of the allotment, or in that direction or by that mode which a strict and rigid necessity would point out, much less whether it had been made in that direction or by that mode which, on a view of the work when accomplished, and when a better judgment might be formed than could have been formed before, might be thought by persons possessing the highest degree of skill to be the best that could have been devised, but the question was whether the direction chosen had been such as a person of reasonable and ordinary skill and experience would have selected beforehand, and whether the mode adopted had been such as a prudent and rational person would have adopted if he had been making the road over his own land, and not on the land of another. Abson v. Fenton, 1 Barn. & C. 195, 203.

CONVENIENT CERTAINTY.

"Convenient certainty," within a statute requiring the declaration in ejectment to describe the property with convenient certainty, means not with the strict rules of common-law special pleading, but such certainty as in the usual sense of the word is convenient. Kemble v. Herndon, 28 W. Va. 524, 530.

CONVENIENT COURTHOUSE.

A good and convenient courthouse may necessarily mean a courthouse with shade trees surrounding it, and therefore a statute requiring the board of supervisors of each county to keep in repair a "good and convenient courthouse" may be construed to be an authorization for the making of an appropriation for shade trees on the courthouse grounds. Allgood v. Hill, 54 Miss. 666, 667.

CONVENIENT DISPATCH.

An order directing the settlement of a bill of exceptions "promptly and with all convenient dispatch" meant such reasonable dispatch as is consistent with the nature of the act required. State v. Cunningham, 11 S. E. 76, 82, 33 W. Va. 607.

CONVENIENT PLACE.

The term "convenient place" in which a factory, which would otherwise be a nuisance, may be maintained, does not mean the one best for the profit and convenience of the owner of the offensive factory, but the one where it shall cause no actionable injury to others. One nuisance does not justify another; still it may be taken as one of the surrounding circumstances to be considered in determining whether or not the other be a nuisance. Powell v. Bentley & Gerwig Furniture Co., 34 W. Va. 804, 807, 12 S. E. 1085, 1087, 12 L. R. A. 53.

CONVENIENT SECTIONS.

How. Ann. St. § 1740d, providing that, after a public grade shall be located, the commissioner shall divide the route into convenient sections for the allowing of the work, does not compel the allowing to be done in sections, but gives the commissioners the right to allow any one section at his discretion. Smith v. Carlow, 72 N. W. 22, 24, 114 Mich. 67.

CONVENIENT SPEED.

A stipulation in a charter party that the vessel should proceed "with all convenient speed" from a certain place to enter on the charter was equivalent to a stipulation that she should proceed without unnecessary delay. Olsen v. Hunter-Benn & Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 530, 531.

A charter party describing a ship as "now trading," and providing that she should sail to a specified port with "all convenient speed," meant that she should proceed with all reasonable diligence with reference to the voyage which she had already undertaken. Gill & Fisher v. Browne (U. S.) 53 Fed. 394, 396, 3 C. C. A. 578.

CONVENIENT TIME.

A covenant in a lease, for the landlord to be allowed to come into a house to see the state of its repairs at "convenient times," requires a notice of the coming, and if he does not give notice it is not to be considered a "convenient time." Wetherell v. Bird, 6 Car. & P. 195, 200.

CONVENIENT USE.

"Convenient use" of land for a right of way of a railroad company means fit, appropriate, and advantageous use. The adjective "convenient" does not limit the word "use" so as to make it apply to the actual running of trains upon the track, that being done by virtue of the meaning of the word "use" itself. The use of a thing is not the use of an appurtenant thereto, and hence the convenient use of a railroad does not include the use of an appurtenance thereto. Vermilya v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 24 N. W. 234, 235, 66 Iowa, 606, 25 Am. Rep. 279.

CONVENTION.

See "Mass Convention"; "Political Convention."

A convention is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party or organization. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 1186.

An assembly or "convention of delegates," within the meaning of the act relating to elections, is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party which at the last general election before the holding of such convention or assembly, polled at least 1 per cent. of the entire vote cast in the state or county, or other division or district for which the nomination is made. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 39.

A "convention of delegates" is a convention of delegates of any political party which, at the last general election before such convention, polled as a party at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote cast in the state, county, or subdivision for which the nomination is made. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 7081.

A convention is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party which, at the last election before the holding of such convention, polled at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote cast in the state, county, town, or other political division for which the nomination is made. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 1694.

The word "convention," as employed in the act relating to elections, shall mean an assembly of delegates chosen at a caucus in accordance with the usage of any political party. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 140, c. 78, § 1.

A convention is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party or principle which cast 5 per cent. of the total number of votes cast for member of Congress at the last general election. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 498.

A convention is an organized assemblage of voters or delegates representing a political party which, at the last election before the holding of such convention, polled at least 2 per cent. of the entire vote cast in the state, county, or other political division or district for which the nomination may be made. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 822.

A convention is an organized assemblage of voters or delegates of any political party, for the purpose of nominating a candidate or candidates for public office, which, at the last general election before such convention, polled at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote of the state, or any division or subdivision thereof for which the nominations are made. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 69, c. 3, § 18.

A "convention" or "primary meeting," within the meaning of the election laws, is an organized assemblage of electors or delegates representing a political party. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 219.

A "convention" or "primary meeting," within the meaning of Pol. Code, § 1310, providing that any convention or primary meeting held for the purpose of making nominations to public office, or the number of electors required in this chapter, may nominate candidates for public office, to be filled by election in the state, is defined in the statute as an "organized assembly of electors or delegates representing a political party or principle." State v. Tooker, 46 Pac. 530, 531, 18 Mont. 540, 34 L. R. A. 315; Same v. Hogan, 62 Pac. 583, 586, 24 Mont. 383; Price v. Lush, 24 Pac. 749, 10 Mont. 61, 9 L. R. A. 467.

"Convention" is defined by Sess. Laws 1891, p. 143 (3 Mills' Ann. St. § 1625c), as any organized assembly of voters or delegates representing a political party which, at the last election before the holding of such convention, polled at least 10 per cent. of the entire vote cast in the state, county, or other political division or district for which the nomination may be made. Schafer v. Whipple, 55 Pac. 180, 181, 25 Colo. 400.

A convention must be a representative body. The very underlying principle of convention organization is in representation. This principle pervades every political system in our form of popular government. It was recognized in May, 1787, when the federal system was revised by the Philadelphia convention of delegates from the states, at the outset of the government. As political parties have grown and become the medium of declarations of principles of electors, so the convention system has become a common part of political machinery as the means of putting candidates before the people, and the statutes of many states, including those of Montana, have briefly put in definite form the rule that a convention is an organized assemblage of electors or delegates representing a political party or principle. State v. Johnson, 46 Pac. 533, 534, 18 Mont. 548, 34 L. R. A. 313.

As used in Rev. St. § 2116, providing that no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands from an Indian nation shall be valid unless made by treaty or convention pursuant to the Constitution, the words "treaty or convention" are employed in the sense of compacts between states and organized communities or their representatives. This is the ordinary signification of those words—the first meaning which is suggested by their use. This is not doubted as to the word "treaty," and scarcely admissible of doubt as to the word "convention" when used in connection with the word "treaty."

United States v. Hunter (U. S.) 21 Fed. 615, 616.

The term "convention," as used in an act for the protection of submarine cables, shall be taken to mean the International Convention for the Protection of Submarine Cables, made at Paris on the 14th day of May, 1884, and proclaimed by the President on the 22d day of May, 1885. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3589.

CONVENTIONAL INTEREST.

"Conventional interest" is that interest which is agreed upon and fixed by the parties to a written contract, not to exceed 10 per cent. per annum. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3099.

"Conventional interest" is the rate general and usual by custom at a given time and at a given place, without regard to the legal rate of interest, meaning that rate fixed by law. Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568, 570.

CONVENTIONAL MORTGAGE.

A "conventional mortgage" is that which depends on covenants. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3287.

A "conventional mortgage" is a contract by which a person binds the whole of his property, or a portion of it only, in favor of another, to secure the execution of some engagement, but without divesting himself of the possession. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3290.

To create a "conventional mortgage" two things are essential, namely, the intention to create it on the part of the parties to the contract, and, in order to have it take effect in regard to third parties, the expression of that intention with sufficient clearness to serve as notice to them when the instrument is recorded. Succession of Benjamin, 2 South. 187, 189, 39 La. 612.

CONVENTIONAL SUBROGATION.

The term "conventional subrogation" is applied to a subrogation arising when one pays the debt of another under an agreement, existing at the time of payment, with either the debtor or the creditor, that the person paying shall be subrogated to the liens existing as security for the debt. It differs from "legal subrogation," which exists only in favor of the surety for the payment of the debt, or one who is compelled to pay the debt to protect his own rights. It is entirely settled that one who advances money to pay a claim, for the security of which there exists a lien, in default of an agreement cannot be subrogated to the rights of the lienor. Sceley v. Bacon (N. J.) 34 Atl. 139, 140.

"Conventional subrogation" is a term used to designate a subrogation arising by reason of an express or implied agreement between a third person paying a debt and either the debtor or creditor. The mere payment of a debt by one not bound to see that it is paid, or by one who is affected in his property by its nonpayment, will not entitle the payor to subrogation; nor will an understanding existing in the mind of the payor that he will be entitled to subrogation so entitle him, unless this mental condition is produced by some conventional arrangement between the payor and either the creditor or debtor that this will be the consequence of the payment. Gore v. Brian (N. J.) 35 Atl. 897, 898.

"Conventional subrogation," as its name imports, results from agreement of the parties, and can take effect only by agreement. The agreement is of course with the party to be subrogated, and, it seems, may be either by debtor or creditor. Under this doctrine a stranger paying off the vendor's lien at the instance of a debtor, and upon agreement that he shall have a lien for his reimbursement, stands in the shoes of the vendor in respect to the lien. It is purely a conventional subrogation. It results directly from the agreement. Allen v. Caylor, 24 South. 512, 513, 120 Ala. 251, 74 Am. St. Rep. 31.

"Conventional subrogation" results from an equitable right springing from an express agreement of the debtor by which one advances money to pay a claim for the security of which there exists a lien, and by which agreement he is to have an equal lien to that paid off. Then he is entitled to the benefit of the security which he has satisfied, with the expectation of receiving an equal lien. Coe v. New Jersey M. Ry. Co., 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 105; Tradesmen's Building Ass'n v. Thompson, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 133; Tyrrell v. Ward, 102 Ill. 29. Thus one who makes a loan to discharge a first mortgage, pursuant to an agreement with the mortgagor that he shall have a first mortgage on the same land to secure it, but there is at the time another mortgage on the land, of which the lender is ignorant, will be subrogated to the rights of the first mortgagee. Home Sav. Bank v. Bierstadt, 48 N. E. 161, 162, 168 Ill. 618, 61 Am. St. Rep. 146.

A "conventional subrogation" is where an agreement is made with the person paying the debt that he shall be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the original creditor. A conventional subrogation can result only from a direct agreement, express or implied, made with either the creditor or the debtor. And it is not sufficient that a person paying the debt of another should have merely the understanding, on his part, that he is to be subrogated to the rights of a creditor. Wilkins v. Gibson, 38 S. E.

374, 379, 380, 113 Ga. 44, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204.

A "conventional subrogation" occurs when the creditor formally transfers his claim to a third person. Connecticut Mutual Ins. Co. v. Cornwall, 25 N. Y. Supp. 848, 350.

CONVENTIONAL TRUSTEE.

A "conventional trustee" is a trustee appointed under a decree. Generally speaking, where there are no restrictions imposed by the testator, a trustee named by him is vested with a discretion which a conventional trustee does not ordinarily possess; and, where a discretion is expressly conferred by will, its exercise in good faith and with proper diligence, though resulting in a pecuniary loss, presents quite a different situation from that which would arise were the loss to follow from an unauthorized act, or from the exercise of an assumed discretion not intrusted to a conventional trustee. And this is so because the power of the one is broader than the power of the other, and the accountability of each is measured by a totally different standard. Loss resulting from an act of a conventional trustee, though the act were done in the utmost good faith, if it were not an act permitted by the instrument creating or defining the trust, or were done without proper judicial sanction, would fall on the trustee. Gilbert v. Kolb, 37 Atl. 423, 85 Md. 627 (citing Zimmerman v. Fraley, 70 Md. 561, 17 Atl. 560).

CONVERSATION.

See "Private Conversations."

The conversation between a husband and wife concerning which one cannot testify in an action for divorce does not include all language between husband and wife, but it must be construed to include a private conversation between them in which the husband requested the wife to return home, though the conversation explained the wife's act in going away and her mental attitude in the act. Fuller v. Fuller, 58 N. E. 588, 589, 177 Mass. 184, 83 Am. St. Rep. 273.

The word "conversation," when employed to denote an interchange of sentiments, or a talking together, implies mutuality. The notion ordinarily conveyed by its use is an oral discourse, or talk, in which two or more participated, as distinguished from the word "admission," which is applicable to a statement or declaration made by one person alone. Jackson v. Ely, 49 N. E. 792, 794, 57 Ohio St. 450.

"Conversation" means more than answering questions; it means familiar intercourse and exchange of thoughts or sentiments; and is so used by a witness as to the mental condition of testatrix when she said that she would not engage in any conversation, but appeared to be in a study. In re Fenton's Will, 97 Iowa, 192, 200, 66 N. W. 99.

"Communicate" means substantially the same as "converse," so that an oath administered to an officer not to allow a jury to converse, etc., is substantially the same as not to allow them to communicate. Scott v. State, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 232, 233.

Acts.

Gen. Laws 1877, c. 40, provides that it shall not be competent for any party to an action, or interested in the event thereof, to give evidence of or concerning any conversation with a deceased person relating to any matter in issue between the parties. Held, that the term "conversation," as so used, meant oral admissions, only spoken words, between the witness and a deceased person, and did not include acts of the deceased which might be evidence of an admission. Chadwick v. Cornish, 1 N. W. 55, 57, 26 Minn. 28.

As manner of living.

"Conversation," as used in a statute providing that in an action for abduction the prosecuting witness would be presumed to have led a chaste life and "conversation," means manner of living, habits of life, conduct. Bradshaw v. People, 38 N. E. 652, 653, 153 Ill. 156.

CONVERSE.

The word "converse," as used in speaking of a shop "wherein any person doth converse," means "to be employed or engaged with." Quinn v. People, 71 N. Y. 561, 568, 27 Am. Rep. 87.

CONVERSION.

See "Constructive Conversion"; "Equitable Conversion"; "Fraudulent Conversion."

See, also, "Trover."

"The term 'conversion' was defined by Lord Holt in Baldwin v. Cole, 6 Mod. 212, as the assuming to one's self the property and right of disposing of another man's goods. Such definition was adopted and sanctioned by Lord Ellenborough in the case of McCombie v. Davies, 6 East, 540." Murray v. Burling (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 172, 175; Covell v. Hill, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 374, 383.

"Conversion" at law is defined to be an unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of the owner's rights. Industrial & General

Trust Co. v. Tod, 63 N. E. 285, 288, 170 N. Y. 233; Thorp v. Robbins, 33 Atl. 896, 897, 68 Vt. 53 (citing 15 Am. Law Rev. 363); Boyce v. Brockway, 81 N. Y. 490, 493; Smith v. Smalley, 46 N. Y. Supp. 277, 279, 19 App. Div. 519; Tenny v. State, 7 South. 50, 88 Ala. 105 (citing Conner v. Allen, 33 Ala. 515, 516; Thweat v. Stamps, 67 Ala. 96); Zion v. De Jonge, 81 N. Y. Supp. 491, 39 Misc. Rep. 839 (citing Laverty v. Snethen, 68 N. Y. 522, 524, 23 Am. Rep. 184).

"Every unauthorized taking of personal property, and all intermeddling with it, beyond the extent of the authority conferred, in case a limited authority has been given with intent so to apply and dispose of it as to alter the condition or interfere with the owner's dominion, is a conversion." Laverty v. Snethen, 68 N. Y. 522, 524, 53 Am. Rep. 184 (quoted and approved in Industrial General Trust Co. v. Tod, 170 N. Y. 233, 63 N. E. 285; Field v. Sibley, 77 N. Y. Supp. 252, 255, 74 App. Div. 81).

Conversion is an unauthorized act which deprives a man of his property, permanently or for an indefinite time. Newlin v. Prevost, 90 Ill. App. 515, 526 (citing Union Stockyards & Transit Co. v. Mallory, Son & Zimmerman Co., 157 Ill. 554, 563, 41 N. E. 888, 48 Am. St. Rep. 341); Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477. In order to establish conversion, it must appear that the plaintiff was deprived of his property by an unauthorized act of the defendant. Kreher v. Mason, 33 Mo. App. 297, 315 (citing Add. Torts, 525).

A "conversion," in the sense of the law of trover, is defined by Mr. Greenleaf to consist in either the appropriation of a thing to the party's own use and beneficial enjoyment, or its destruction, or in exercising dominion over it in exclusion or defiance of the plaintiff's right, or in withholding the possession of the plaintiff under a claim of title inconsistent with his own. University of North Carolina v. State Nat. Bank, 3 S. E. 359, 361, 96 N. C. 280; Tinker v. Morrill, 39 Vt. 477, 480, 94 Am. Dec. 345; Allen v. Bicknell, 36 Me. 436, 439; Rhea v. Deaver, 85 N. C. 337, 340; Ferguson v. Clifford, 37 N. H. 86, 101; King v. Franklin, 31 South. 467, 468, 132 Ala. 559; Hunter v. Cronkhite, 36 N. E. 924, 925, 9 Ind. App. 470; Davis v. Hurt, 21 South. 468, 469, 114 Ala. 146; Roach v. Turk, 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 708, 715, 24 Am. Rep. 360; Baker v. Beers, 6 Atl. 35, 37, 64 N. H. 102; Thorp v. Robbins, 33 Atl. 896, 897, 68 Vt. 53; Mahaney v. Walsh, 44 N. Y. Supp. 969, 971, 18 App. Div. 601; Union & Planters' Bank v. Farrington, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 333, 336. It may therefore be either direct or constructive. Every unlawful taking with intent to apply the goods to the use of some other person than the owner, or destroying or altering their nature, is a conversion. Tracy v. Cloyd, 10 W. Va. 19, 23, 24; Sparks v. Purdy, 11 Mo. 219, 226.

A "conversion" consists of some act of dominion exerted over one's property in denial of his right or inconsistent with it. Crosby v. Stratton (Colo.) 68 Pac. 130, 131 (citing Cooley, Torts, 448); Velsian v. Lewis, 16 Pac. 631, 632, 15 Or. 539, 8 Am. St. Rep. 184; Budd v. Multnomah Ry. Co., 7 Pac. 99, 101, 12 Or. 271, 53 Am. McDuffie*, 48 N. H. 402, 406 (citing Woodman v. Hubbard, 25 N. H. [5 Fost.] 67, 71, 57 Am. Dec. 310).

"Conversion" is any dealing with the thing which impliedly or by its terms excludes the owner's dominion. State v. Rigall, 70 S. W. 150, 151, 169 Mo. 659; Spalding v. People, 172 Ill. 40, 56, 49 N. E. 993, 998.

Mr. Bigelow says that the assertion of a title to or an act of dominion over personal property inconsistent with the rights of the owner is a conversion. Bigelow, Torts, 428. Every assuming by one to dispose of the goods of another is a conversion. Ramsby v. Beezley, 8 Pac. 288, 11 Or. 49 (citing Bacon's Abr.); Budd v. Multnomah Ry. Co., 7 Pac. 99, 101, 12 Or. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 355. "A 'conversion' of personal property takes place whenever one person assumes the ownership or control of another's property in contravention of and against the rights of such other person and against his consent." Hill v. Finigan, 19 Pac. 494, 497, 77 Cal. 267, 11 Am. St. Rep. 279.

"A conversion is defined to be any act of the defendant inconsistent with the plaintiff's right of possession or subversive of his right of property." Omaha & Grant Smelting & Refining Co. v. Tabor, 21 Pac. 925, 930, 13 Colo. 41, 5 L. R. A. 236, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185 (citing Harris v. Saunders [S. C.] 2 Strob. Eq. 370, note; Webber v. Davis, 44 Me. 147, 69 Am. Dec. 87; *Gilman v. The legal signification of the word "conversion" is an appropriation of and dealing with the property of another as if it were one's own, without right. Land v. Klein, 50 S. W. 638, 639, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 3; Ramsby v. Beezley, 8 Pac. 288, 11 Or. 49. "Conversion" means the wrongful taking of or an appropriation by one person of the property of another. Stough v. Stefani, 27 N. W. 445, 446, 19 Neb. 468. Conversion is a wrongful or unauthorized deprivation of property.

Mohr v. Langan, 63 S. W. 409, 416, 162 Mo. 474, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503.

Conversion is the unauthorized assumption or exercise of acts of ownership over the personal property of another. "Whoever undertakes to deal with the property of another as his own or detains it from the owner is, in contemplation of law, guilty of a conversion of it." Watt v. Potter (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 438; Louisville & N. Ry. Co. v. Lawson, 11 S. W. 511, 513, 88 Ky. 496.

A conversion of property is an act of malfeasance, not of mere nonfeasance; a positive wrong, and not the mere omission of what was right. A wrongful taking or assumption of a right to control or dispose of property constitutes a conversion. Indeed, any wrongful act which negatives or is inconsistent with the owner's right is per se a conversion. It is not necessary that the party guilty of the conversion should have made use of the property in any way. "Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of plaintiff's right? If he does, that is in law a conversion, be it for his own or another person's use." Schroepel v. Corning (N. Y.) 5 Denio 236, 240 (citing Bristol v. Burt [N. Y.] 7 Johns. 254, 5 Am. Dec. 264).

The action of trover is founded on the right of property and possession, and any act of a party other than the owner, which militates against this conjoint right, in law is a "conversion." Bristol v. Burt (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 254, 257, 5 Am. Dec. 264; Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274. It is conversion if one takes the property of another and sells or otherwise disposes of it without the owner's authority; or if he takes it for a temporary purpose only, in disregard of the owner's right, it is conversion. Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274.

Conversion has acquired a technical meaning; that is, detaining goods so as to deprive the owner or person entitled to the possession of them of his dominion over the same. Cannon v. State, 42 S. W. 981, 982, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 322; Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274.

"A conversion may be either, first, by wrongfully taking a personal chattel; second, by some other illegal assumption of ownership, or by illegally using or misusing goods; or, third, by a wrongful detention." Ascher-mann v. Philip Best Brewing Co., 45 Wis. 262, 266; Davis v. Hurt, 21 South. 468, 469, 114 Ala. 146.

An assertion of right inconsistent with that of the owner to exercise dominion over his property is a conversion. Abrahams v. Southwestern R. Bank, 1 S. C. (1 Rich.) 441, 445, 7 Am. Rep. 33 (citing 6 Bac. Abr. 677).

To make out a "conversion," there must be proof of a wrongful possession, or the exercise of a dominion over it in exclusion or defiance of the owner's right or authority, or injury, use, or unlawful detention after demand. Fernald v. Chase, 37 Me. 289, 291.

If one person disposes of the goods of another for the benefit of a third person, this is a "conversion." "Every unlawful intermeddling with the rights of another is a conversion, it being a disposition pro tanto of the goods of another as if they were the goods of the intermeddler." United Society of Shakers v. Underwood, 72 Ky. (9 Bush) 609, 619, 15 Am. Rep. 731 (citing Bac. Abr. tit. "Trover," subd. "B").

Appropriation to converter's use.

Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exercised over one's property in denial of his right or inconsistent with it is a "conversion," and this is true whether such wrongful act be exercised for the wrongdoer's own or for another's use. Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 Pac. 637, 638, 8 Colo. 17; Bristol v. Burt (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 254, 257, 5 Am. Dec. 264; Mahaney v. Walsh, 44 N. Y. Supp. 969, 971, 16 App. Div. 601; Donahue v. Shippee, 8 Atl. 541, 542, 15 R. I. 453; Budd v. Multnomah St. Ry. Co., 7 Pac. 99, 101, 12 Or. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 355; McIntire v. Blakeley (Pa.) 12 Atl. 325, 327; Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274; Tuttle v. Hardenberg, 38 Pac. 1070, 1071, 15 Mont. 219; Mohr v. Langan, 63 S. W. 409, 416, 162 Mo. 474, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503; Cernahan v. Chrysler, 83 N. W. 778, 779, 107 Wis. 645.

"Conversion is an appropriation of another's property; change of ownership is implied by it. The change may be temporary or perpetual, but so strongly has our court insisted on this change as resulting from conversion, that when a verdict in trover is rendered whilst the chattel remains out of the possession of the plaintiff, the judgment for the plaintiff is itself without satisfaction (which satisfaction is insisted on elsewhere, 8 Cow. 43), considered here to be an acknowledgment by plaintiff that the title has by conversion been transferred from him." "Any act in exclusion or defiance of the plaintiff's right, any assumption of property and of the right of disposition, any intermeddling indicating a claim of ownership, any assertion of the control which belongs to the owner, whether for the benefit of the defendant or of a third person, may furnish proof of the conversion. But the idea of property is of the essence of a conversion." Nelson v. Whetmore (S. C.) 1 Rich. Law, 318, 322.

Asportation.

Any carrying away of a chattel for the use of one without the owner's consent, or for a third party, amounts to a conversion, because it is inconsistent with the general right of dominion which the owner has in it, who is entitled to the use of it at all times and in all places. Such an asportation is conversion. Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274.

Asportation is not an essential element of conversion, and therefore the act of a party in changing the lock on a store door to bar out the owner of property contained therein, and the leaving of orders that the latter shall be ejected if he gains entrance, constitutes a conversion. Simon v. Simon, 55 N. Y. Supp. 915, 38 App. Div. 85.

Lord Mansfield says: A mere wrongful asportation of the chattel does not amount to a conversion, unless the taking or detention of the chattel is with intent to convert it to the taker's own use, or that of some third person, or unless the act done has the effect of destroying or changing the quality of the chattel. Rogers v. Hule, 2 Cal. 571, 572, 56 Am. Dec. 363.

Assertion of title.

"Conversion is based upon the idea of an assumption by the defendant of a right of property, or of a right of dominion over the thing converted which casts upon him all the risks of an owner, and it is therefore not every wrongful intermeddling with, or wrongful asportation, or wrongful detention of personal property, that amounts to a conversion. Acts which themselves imply an assertion of title, or of a right of dominion over personal property, such as a sale, letting, or destruction of it, amounts to a conversion, even though the defendant may have honestly mistaken his rights. The acts which do not in themselves imply an assertion of title, or of a right of dominion over such property, will not sustain an action of trover, unless done with the intention to deprive the owner of it permanently or temporarily, or unless there has been a demand for the property and a neglect or refusal to deliver it." Spooner v. Manchester, 133 Mass. 270, 273, 43 Am. Rep. 514.

To constitute conversion there must be a claim of ownership asserted against the true owner, or, in case the property has come into the possession of another, there must be a demand for its return by the owner or his authorized agent. A demand by a third person who has no relation to, or does not stand in privity with, the owner, is insufficient. Castle v. Corn Exch. Bank, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1035, 1039, 75 Hun. 89.

The mere assertion of ownership of property without in any way interfering with it or the owner's right to control it is no evidence of a conversion. Thorp v. Robbins, 33 Atl. 896, 897, 68 Vt. 53 (citing Irish v. Cloyes, 8 Vt. 30, 30 Am. Dec. 446).

Authority of third person.

Lord Ellensborough, in Stephens v. Ellwall, 4 Maule & S. 259, lays it down as clear law "that a person is guilty of conversion who intermeddles with the property of another and disposes of it; and it is no answer that he acted under authority from some other person, who had himself no authority to dispose of it." Bonaparte v. Claggett, 27 Atl. 619, 624, 78 Md. 87.

One acting under an authority from a person having no right to give such authority in relation to certain goods may be guilty of conversion if he disposes of them. Mohr v. Langan, 63 S. W. 409, 416, 162 Mo. 474, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503. Neither is it any defense to say that he acted as agent. Thus, plaintiff purchased a horse and buggy from a widow, who delivered the property at a certain livery stable. The widow having run away leaving the children, their uncle took charge of them, and came to town to get any property she might have left. Defendant, who was under-sheriff, having discovered the horse and buggy at the stable, directed those in charge not to allow any one to remove them, and returned with the uncle and directed that the property be delivered to him, which was done. Held that, though defendant was ignorant of plaintiff's ownership, and later had the property redelivered to plaintiff, he was guilty of conversion. Cernahan v. Chrisler, 83 N. W. 778, 779, 107 Wis. 645.

Conversion, in the sense of the law of trover, consists either in the appropriation of the thing to the party's own use and beneficial enjoyment, or in its destruction, or in exercising dominion over it in exclusion or defiance of the plaintiff's right, or in withholding possession from the plaintiff under a claim of title inconsistent with his own. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 642. A commission merchant or warehouseman, to whom goods are consigned or delivered for sale, and who, in ignorance of any claim by other parties thereto, or want of title in his principal, sells the goods and pays over the proceeds to his principal, who, it is afterwards discovered, was not the owner or authorized to sell them, is not liable to the real owner for the value of the goods. Abernathy, Long & Co. v. Wheeler, Mills & Co., 13 Ky. Law Rep. 730, 732.

Change in condition.

Conversion is the unlawful appropriation or exercise of acts of ownership over the personal property of another. Conversion is complete when the party in possession has appropriated the property as his own. The term does not imply any change in the condition of the goods. Wells, Repl. 351. Thus, if one originally in the rightful possession of goods refuses to deliver them to the owner on demand, the refusal is evidence of a conversion, although the goods have neither been sold nor changed in form, but remain in the possession of the wrongdoer just as they were before. Wood v. McDonald, 6 Pac. 452, 453, 66 Cal. 546.

Conversion through agent.

Any actual wrongful exercise or assumption by a person himself, or by another by his procurement, over the goods of the real owner, by which he is deprived of them, is a conversion for which the action of trover will lie. Therefore, where defendant caused plaintiff's property to be sold under a distress warrant as the property of another person, to collect a debt due from such person, such act was a conversion. Hale v. Ames, 18 Ky. (2 T. B. Mon.) 143, 144, 15 Am. Dec. 150.

The term "conversion" does not necessarily import a manual taking of the property of another, but includes a direction of defendant to his servant to feed his cattle from the plaintiff's hay, as such conduct is an act of dominion wrongfully exerted over plaintiff's property, inconsistent with his right. Brown v. Ela, 30 Atl. 412, 413, 67 N. H. 110.

Demand necessary.

"It is believed that all conversions may be divided into four distinct classes: (1) By a wrongful taking; (2) by an illegal assumption of ownership; (3) by an illegal user or misuser; and (4) by a wrongful detention. In the three first named classes there is no necessity for a demand and refusal, as the evidence arising from the acts of the defendant is sufficient to prove the conversion. In the latter class alone is such evidence (of demand and refusal) to be required, as the mere detention of a chattel furnishes no evidence of a disposition to convert it to the holder's own use, or to divest the true owner of his property." Strauss v. Schwab, 16 South. 692, 104 Ala. 669.

To constitute a conversion of chattels there must be some exercise of dominion over the property in repudiation of, and inconsistent with, the owner's right. Evans v. Mason, 64 N. H. 98, 5 Atl. 766. A demand and refusal are sufficient evidence of a conversion, and a demand is only necessary when the circumstances do not themselves amount to a conversion. Porell v. Cavanaugh, 41 Atl. 860, 861, 69 N. H. 304.

A conversion is an authorized act which deprives a man of his property permanently or for an indefinite time. A wrongful assumption of the ownership of property may be a conversion in itself, and a demand for the return of the property and a refusal is unnecessary as a condition precedent to an action for the conversion of the same. Union Stockyard & Transit Co. v. Mallory, Son & Zimmerman Co., 41 N. E. 888, 890, 157 Ill. 554, 48 Am. St. Rep. 341.

At common law a conversion is that tort which is committed by a person who deals with chattels not belonging to him in a manner which is inconsistent with the rights of the lawful owner. Velsian v. Lewis, 15 Or. 539, 16 Pac. 631, 3 Am. St. Rep. 184. Hence a demand is not necessary to constitute conversion. Kinkead v. Holmes & Bull Furniture Co., 64 Pac. 157, 158, 24 Wash. 216.

A demand and refusal are not a conversion, but simply evidence of it, and are necessary where the property has come lawfully into the defendant's possession. Smith v. Smalley, 46 N. Y. Supp. 277, 279, 19 App. Div. 519.

In a suit for the recovery of the possession of personal property alleged to be unlawfully detained, if a wrongful "conversion" of the property by the defendant is shown by the evidence, a demand for the property before suit brought, and proof of such demand, are not necessary. Cox v. Albert, 78 Ind. 241, 244.

Where money of the principal, with his knowledge and consent, or by his direction, is paid to another person as his agent, the former cannot, as a general rule, maintain an action against the latter for the recovery of such money, until demand therefor has been made; but if the evidence shows a wrongful conversion of the money by the agent, or by him and another, proof of such prior demand is unnecessary. Terrell v. Butterfield, 92 Ind. 1, 10.

Purchasing property from one who has no right to sell, and holding it to one's own use, is a direct act of conversion, without any demand and refusal, it being necessary to show demand and refusal only where a party obtains possession lawfully. Amherst v. Hollis, 9 N. H. 107, 110.

Disposal of whole by owner of interest.

Where defendant and another, who was the owner of an undivided one-third of an auger, used such auger in partnership in boring a well, and while in their possession the auger was seized and sold by a creditor of such partnership to pay a partnership debt without the consent or the procurement of defendant, neither such use of the auger nor such seizure and sale constituted a conversion by defendant. Bell v. Layman, 17 Ky. (1 T. B. Mon.) 39, 41, 15 Am. Dec. 83.

Conversion is a completed act by which property is disposed of without authority by another than the owner, contrary to the rights of the owner or one having a lease or mortgage thereon. Thus, where the lessor of land was entitled to a certain amount of wheat raised thereon, and notified the proprietor of an elevator, on its delivery, of his rights, and such elevator man agreed to hold the wheat for him, a delivery of the warehouse receipt to the lessee thereafter constituted a conversion. Willard v. Monarch Elevator Co., 87 N. W. 996, 998, 10 N. D. 400.

The term "conversion" includes the act of a co-tenant of a chattel in selling the whole of the chattel as his own. Leader v. Plante, 50 Atl. 53, 95 Me. 343, 85 Am. St. Rep. 418.

Failure to pay over money.

"Conversion" has reference to specific articles of property which are owned by the plaintiff, or to which he has a right of immediate possession, but it does not apply to money when the receipt of it creates only a debt to the plaintiff. An action for conversion cannot be maintained against a person who receives money in a fiduciary capacity unless he is bound to turn over the identical money. Rothchild v. Schwarz, 59 N. Y. Supp. 527, 528, 23 Misc. Rep. 521.

Where a party breached his contract by dismissing an appeal without the other party's consent, and failed to account to him for the money left by such party with the other for the purpose of prosecuting the appeal, there was in law a conversion of the amount so held, and the holder became immediately liable for the same, no demand therefor being necessary. Gregory v. Montgomery, 56 S. W. 231, 233, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 68.

The refusal of defendant, to which negotiable paper was sent by a bank for collection, to pay the proceeds thereof over on demand, was conversion. Hawkins v. State Loan & Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 50, 51.

Intent.

Conversion is the unlawful taking of the goods of another out of his possession with the intent to convert them to the use of the taker. Clark v. Whitaker, 19 Conn. 319, 326, 48 Am. Dec. 160.

Conversion is the act of assuming the general right of dominion and control of a thing belonging to another, which is usually exercised by the owner thereof. It "is defined to be an unauthorized act which deprives another of his property permanently or for an indefinite time. A wrongful intent is not an essential element of a conversion. It is enough that the rightful owner has been deprived of his property by some unauthorized act by another assuming dominion or control over it." Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477, 481; Industrial & General Trust v. Tod, 63 N. E. 285, 288, 170 N. Y. 233 (citing Boyce v. Brockway, 31 N. Y. 490); Mohr v. Langan, 63 S. W. 409, 416, 162 Mo. 474, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503.

A conversion is any interference "subversive of the right of the owner of personal property to enjoy and control it. The gist of the conversion is the usurpation of the owner's right of property, and not the actual damages inflicted. Honesty of purpose is not a defense." Ferrera v. Parke, 23 Pac. 883, 885, 19 Or. 141.

The taking possession of personal property under a contract of purchase is an act based on the presumption of ownership or a right of dominion over the thing converted where the vendor is without title, and, although without evil intent, is a conversion, for which trover lies without previous demand. The intent with which the wrongful act is done on the part of the defendant is not an essential element of the conversion. It is enough that the true owner has been deprived of his property by the unauthorized act of some person who assumes dominion or control over it. It is the effect of the act which constitutes the conversion. The conversion may consist simply of a purchase even by an innocent party of the goods or other personal chattels from one who has himself been guilty of conversion in disposing of them, where the buyer takes the goods or chattels into his possession or custody. Velsian v. Lewis, 16 Pac. 631, 632, 15 Or. 539, 3 Am. St. Rep. 184.

Where a banker took the bonds of a depositor from their place of deposit, and sent them out of the state to be used as collateral security for such banker's own debt, such act was a fraudulent conversion of the bonds. Intention to restore the bonds, and the agreement of the party who received them not to sell or dispose of them, do not do away with the criminal nature of the transaction. Commonwealth v. Tenney, 97 Mass. 50, 59.

Manual taking.

A conversion of property is the act of exercising dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the owner's right. It is not necessary that there be a taking of manual possession of the property. Reynolds v. Shuler (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 323, 325; Bristol v. Burt (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 254, 257, 5 Am. Dec. 264; Mahaney v. Walsh, 44 N. Y. Supp. 969, 971, 16 App. Div. 601; McIntire v. Blakeley (Pa.) 12 Atl. 325, 327; Budd v. Multnomah St. Ry. Co., 7 Pac. 99, 101, 12 Or. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 355; Donahue v. Shippee, 8 Atl. 541, 542, 15 R. I. 453; Brown v. Campbell Co., 24 Pac. 492, 495, 44 Kan. 237, 21 Am. St. Rep. 274; Tuttle v. Hardenberg, 38 Pac. 1070, 1071, 15 Mont. 219; Cernahan v. Chrisler, 83 N. W. 778, 779, 107 Wis. 645.

Conversion is an unauthorized assertion or exercise of acts of ownership over personal property belonging to another. "A manual taking is not necessary, but, where words are relied upon to show the conversion, they must be uttered under such circumstances, in proximity to the property, as to show a defiance of the owner's right—a determination to exercise dominion and control over the property and to exclude the owner from the exercise of his rights." Moore v. Prentiss Tool & Supply Co., 15 N. Y. Supp. 150, 154, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 516; Gillet v. Roberts, 57 N. Y. 28, 33. The language alone, not coupled with circumstances sufficient to show an intention or possibility of claiming or exercising control over the property, will not constitute a conversion. In this connection the court says: "Suppose one should meet me at a distance of 30 miles from my office, and declare that he owned my law library and that he would not give it up, he not having it in any way under his control or in his possession; could it be said that he had converted the same?" No cases have yet gone so far as to hold that mere words, under such circumstances, would constitute a conversion. Gillet v. Roberts, 57 N. Y. 28, 33.

In order to constitute a conversion it is not necessary to show a manual taking of the thing in question, nor that the defendant has applied it to his own use. A refusal to issue certificates of stock in a corporation to the owner of the stock is such conversion of the stock as will authorize an action thereon. Withers v. Lafayette County Bank, 67 Mo. App. 115, 119 (citing Abb. Law Dict.; Cooley, Torts; Bigelow, Lead. Cas.).

It is not essential to a conversion which will support the action of trover that the defendant should have the complete manucaption of the property. An intermeddling with or dominion over the property of another, whether by the defendant alone or in connection with others, which is subversive of the dominion of the true owner and in denial of his rights, is a conversion. Freeman v. Scurlock, 27 Ala. 407. Where a note is given in payment for a machine, to which title is to remain in the seller until the note is paid, and thereafter, the purchaser having left the state, the seller demands the machine from the purchaser's wife, and her father refuses to allow the seller to take it, he is guilty of a conversion thereof. Bolling v. Kirby, 90 Ala. 215, 222, 7 South. 914, 917, 24 Am. St. Rep. 789.

Misdelivery.

"Conversion," when applied to the action of trover, imports an unlawful act, not the mere nonfeasance; and hence the misdelivery of the goods by one intrusted with them constituted a conversion of them was sufficient to render him liable in trover, since it amounted to an unlawful act. Bowlin v. Nye, 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 416, 417.

If a person who is intrusted with the goods of another puts them into the hands of a third person contrary to orders it is a conversion. Murray v. Burling (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 172, 175.

To constitute a conversion of a boat leased, and returned to a place other than that called for by the contract, there must be such an intention of deviation from the contract as would be tantamount to an assertion of right or dominion over the property inconsistent with the bailor's rights of ownership. Direct Nav. Co. v. Davidson (Tex.) 74 S. W. 790, 791.

Mistake.

Assuming to one's self the property and right of disposition of another's goods is a conversion thereof. It is clear that in a case where a person gives a mortgage on property which does not belong to him, without the consent or knowledge of the owner, such mortgage is a nullity. Where a party mortgaging property is the owner of an undivided half interest thereof, and the mortgage includes the entire property through a mistake of the scrivener, it cannot be said that there is a conversion. Patterson v. Atkinson, 37 Atl. 532, 533, 20 R. I. 102.

Pledge or appropriation of trust property.

Where goods sent to an agent to sell for his principal for what they would command were pledged by the agent to secure his own debt, such act constituted a conversion, and the measure of damages therefor is the value of the property at the time of the conversion. Kennedy v. Strong (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 128, 132.

Where a banker took the bonds of a depositor from their place of deposit, and sent them out of the state to be used as collateral security for the banker's own debt, such act was a conversion of the bonds. Commonwealth v. Tenney, 97 Mass. 50, 59.

The term "conversion" may be used to designate the act of a guardian in failing to invest the funds of his ward in securities approved by order of court, and in mingling such funds with his own funds. In Noble's Estate, 35 Atl. 859, 860, 178 Pa. 460.

Positive act required.

Conversion "is wrongfully withholding property from the owner by a party who has possession thereof, actual or constructive, and who ought and has the power to put it in the owner's possession or within his control. Conversion sufficient to support an action of trover must be a positive, tortious act." Polley v. Lenot Ironworks, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 182, 184.

In Carraway v. Burbank, 12 N. C. 306, Henderson, J., says that conversion is any act of ownership exercised over the personal chattel of another inconsistent with an owner's rights. It must be an act—bare words will not do. University of North Carolina v. State Nat. Bank, 3 S. E. 359, 361, 96 N. C. 280.

A conversion is a positive, tortious act. Mere nonfeasance, or neglect of some legal duty, will not suffice to support trover, although it may constitute a sufficient ground to maintain an action on the case. Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451, 11 Am. Rep. 28. That which becomes, on contract, a nonperformance of what the party so undertakes to do, or a bare nondelivery of what he undertakes to deliver, is not to be considered as of itself amounting to a tortious conversion. Race v. Chandler, 15 Ill. App. 532, 538.

Refusal to deliver.

To constitute a conversion there must be some exercise of dominion over the property in repudiation of, or inconsistent with, the owner's rights. A refusal to deliver property to the owner upon his demand is not of itself a conversion. It is evidence tending to show a conversion, but, like other inconclusive acts, is open to explanation. It is a sufficient answer that it is not in the power of the defendant to comply with the demand, as that the property has been taken from him and is in the custody of the law. Hett v. Boston & M. R. R., 44 Atl. 910, 911, 69 N. H. 139.

A conversion seems to consist in any tortious act by which defendant deprives the plaintiff of his goods. A demand and refusal to deliver are, in general, evidence of a conversion; but it is said that, to make a refusal to deliver evidence of a conversion, it must be in the power of the defendant to make the delivery demanded. There must be an actual tort. In every action for trover and conversion the possession is supposed to have been lawfully in the defendant. It is the breach of the trust or the abuse of such lawful possession which constitutes the conversion. Spencer v. Blackman (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 167, 168.

In Magnin v. Dinsmore, 70 N. Y. 410, 417, 26 Am. Rep. 608, the court defines conversion, as applied to common carriers, as follows: "A conversion implies a wrongful act, a misdelivery, a wrongful disposition or withholding of property. A mere nondelivery will not constitute a conversion; nor will a refusal to deliver on demand, if the goods have been lost through negligence or stolen." Again, in Briggs v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 515, it was held that "a mere delay in the delivery of goods by a common carrier is not a conversion thereof." A mere expression of inability to deliver goods which have been mislaid by mistake or through negligence is not a conversion. Wamsley v. Atlas S. S. Co., 61 N. E. 896, 897, 168 N. Y. 533, 85 Am. St. Rep. 699; Rogers v. Hine, 2 Cal. 571, 572, 56 Am. Dec. 363.

The very denial of goods to him that has a right to demand them is an actual conversion, and not only evidence of it, as has been holden, for what is a conversion but an assuming upon one's self the property and right of disposing of another's goods? And he that takes upon himself to detain another man's goods from him without cause takes upon himself the right of disposing of them. Baker v. Beers, 6 Atl. 35, 37, 64 N. H. 102 (citing Baldwin v. Cole, 6 Mod. 212). "But the very denial to deliver is not always a conversion; as where a piece of timber was left on land by a lessee at the expiration of his term, and the defendants, when requested to deliver it, refused, but suffered the timber to lie without intermeddling. Bristol v. Burt (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 254, 257, 5 Am. Dec. 264.

Refusal to deliver, in order to constitute a conversion, must amount to a denial of the defendant's right. Phillips v. Shackford, 44 Atl. 306, 307, 21 R. I. 422.

There is a conversion by refusal to deliver pledged property on demand after a tender of performance of the obligation for which the property was pledged, for such refusal is the exercise of dominion over the property of another in defiance of another's right. Loughborough v. McNevin, 14 Pac. 369, 371, 74 Cal. 250, 5 Am. St. Rep. 435.

The exercise by one of dominion over the goods of another to the exclusion of the latter, in defiance of his rights, constitutes a conversion. Gordon v. Stockdale, 89 Ind. 240. Thus, an agent's refusal to deliver wheat purchased for his principal as his agent constitutes a conversion thereof. Nadling v. Howe, 55 N. E. 1032, 1033, 23 Ind. App. 690.

Mere delay in the delivery of goods, unless there has been a demand, does not amount to a conversion. Louisville & N. Ry. Co. v. Lawson, 11 S. W. 511, 513, 88 Ky. 496.

The mere failure of a warehouseman to deliver, on demand, goods which have been intrusted to him, does not support an action of conversion where the failure is solely because of the goods having unaccountably disappeared. Davis v. Hurt, 21 South. 468, 469, 114 Ala. 146.

Conversion means detaining goods so as to deprive the person entitled to the possession of them of his dominion over them, and the act of taking possession must be intended, and not merely accidental or negligent; and where defendant has come into the possession lawfully, but without fault, it is generally necessary to make a demand of possession before a suit for conversion will lie, unless it appeared that the defendant had appropriated the articles to his own use, or had disposed of the property contrary to the terms and stipulations under which he obtained possession. The refusal to surrender possession on demand is not of itself a conversion, but is only evidence of conversion, and, like other inclusive acts, is open to explanation. McIntire v. Blakeley (Pa.) 12 Atl. 325, 327.

Sale of another's property.

Conversion is a deprivation of property through a wrongful—that is, unauthorized—act. A sale of another's property evidences conversion, and any voluntary act which changes the character of the property and places it beyond the reach of the owner amounts to a conversion. Mohr v. Langan, 63 S. W. 409, 416, 162 Mo. 474, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503.

Where defendant sold to plaintiff's testator 75 shares of stock, being part of 216 shares, for which defendant had a certificate, but he retained possession of the certificate, and the shares were not transferred to the testator, but defendant afterwards transferred the 216 shares to a third person, to whom a new certificate was issued, there was a conversion by the defendant of the 75 shares sold to testator. Mahaney v. Walsh, 44 N. Y. Supp. 969, 971, 16 App. Div. 601.

The act of selling property belonging to another constitutes a conversion of the same, and even obviates the necessity of a demand, which, after sale and disposition of the property, would be futile. Ochs v. Pohly, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1, 3, 87 App. Div. 92.

Trespass and misfeasance distinguished.

The distinction between acts of trespass, acts of misfeasance, and acts of conversion is often a substantial one. In actions in the nature of trespass or case, for misfeasance, the plaintiff recovers only the damages which he has suffered by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant; but in actions in the nature of trover the general rule for damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion, diminished, when the property has been returned and received by the owner, by the value of the property at the time it was returned, so that after the conversion, and until the delivery to the owner, the property is absolutely at the risk of the person who has converted it; and he is liable to pay for any depreciation in value, whether that depreciation has been occasioned by his negligence or fault, or by the negligence or fault of any other person, or by inevitable accident or by act of God. Another distinction is that a judgment for a breach of contract or injury to property, though followed by payment, does not transfer title to the subject-matter involved, while a judgment in trover for conversion will, after payment, effect a complete change of ownership by operation of law. May v. Georger, 47 N. Y. Supp. 1057, 1060, 21 Misc. Rep. 622.

CONVERSION (Action of).

An action for conversion is within the provisions of the code prescribing the limitation of an action for taking, detaining, or injuring goods or chattels. Horton v. Jack (Cal.) 37 Pac. 652, 653.

Title in plaintiff.

It is a fundamental principle governing the action of conversion that the plaintiff must show a legal title. He must have the property, general or special, or the actual possession or right to immediate possession, at the time of conversion. In law "conversion" is defined to be the unauthorized assumption and the exercise of the rights of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of the owner's rights. Hence, as the right to possession of personal property vests exclusively in the administrator, an heir has no interest in it, which will support an action for conversion, until final distribution of the estate. Scruggs v. Scruggs (U. S.) 105 Fed. 28, 29.

Where plaintiff in an action for conversion neither owned nor was entitled to the property alleged to have been converted, a judgment in his favor will be set aside. Hunter v. Cronkhite, 36 N. E. 924, 925, 9 Ind. App. 470.

CONVERT.

By the use of the word "convert" in the statute providing that an assignee under a general assignment for the benefit of the creditors shall, before he shall have any power or authority to sell, dispose of, or convert to the purpose of the trust any of the assigned property, enter into a bond, was evidently intended to restrain the assignee from paying out any of the money or disposing of any of the property assigned to him for the purpose of the trust, until he should have filed his bond, and not that he could not take possession of the property to preserve it, or bring an action to enforce a chose in action. Easton v. Durland's Riding Academy Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 283, 285, 7 App. Div. 288.

"Convert," as used in Rev. St. 1889, § 3555, inflicting a penalty on any officer who shall convert to his own use or make way with or secrete any portion of the public moneys, "is generic, and includes within it the expressions 'make way with' and 'secrete' as modifiers." State v. Manley, 17 S. W. 800, 801, 107 Mo. 364.

Code, § 179, authorizing the arrest of defendant on execution in an action for wrongful taking, detaining, or converting property, is to be construed as wrongfully taking, detaining, or converting personal property. Merritt v. Carpenter (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 428, 432, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 462, 466, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 142, 146.

As embezzle.

"Converted," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant fraudulently embezzled and converted a certain sum of money, is synonymous with the word "embezzled" as there used. State v. Jamison, 38 N. W. 508, 509, 74 Iowa, 602.

Fraud implied.

In an action for an accounting between partners, a finding by referee was made that defendant converted a certain sum of money belonging to the partnership, and it was contended that this, ex vi termini, indicated fraud so as to relieve the defendant under a discharge in bankruptcy. It was held that the use of the term was shown by the remaining findings to have been in no such sense, but it described conduct not inconsistent with honesty and good faith. Gee v. Gee, 87 N. W. 1116, 1117, 84 Minn. 384.

Of bonds.

"Convert," as used in Greater New York Charter, § 172, Laws 1897, c. 379, providing that bonds of the annexed municipalities may be converted into registered bonds, will not be held to mean that they may be exchanged for registered bonds or surrendered and new bonds given, or that it is the duty of the comptroller to cancel them, but that an indorsement by the comptroller on the bonds that they are registered converts them from coupons to registered bonds. People v. Coler, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1072, 1075, 26 Misc. Rep. 327; In re Whann, 58 N. Y. Supp. 5, 7, 38 App. Div. 339.

CONVERTIBLE COUPON BONDS.

The term "convertible coupon bonds" is used to designate coupon bonds which may, at the option of the holder, be converted into registered bonds. This option is expressed in a clause contained in the bond itself, and, when inserted, produces a convertible coupon bond. The usual process of converting a coupon to a registered bond is to present the bond, cut off and surrender the coupons to the debtor, have the name of the creditor entered on a proper book kept by the debtor, and a proper indorsement made upon the bond itself showing its registration, thus reducing it as nearly as possible to the form and shape of an original registered bond. Benwell v. City of Newark, 36 Atl. 668, 669, 55 N. J. Eq. 260.

CONVEY.

See "Agreement to Sell or Convey"; "Lawfully Convey"; "Quitclaim and Convey."

The meaning of the word "convey," as used in an instrument, can only be determined by reference to the context. It may mean "to conduct water from place to place, or to transfer title from one person to another. Assuming that in the latter sense it is a term of art, which it is not, we are still bound to receive it in its other meaning if water was the subject-matter spoken of, since it would be absurd to speak of 'conveying' water in a technical sense from a spring to a paper mill." Edelman v. Yeakel, 27 Pa. (3 Casey) 26, 29.

A statute making it criminal to convey a slave away will be construed to mean "a carrying from the possession of the owner." State v. Hardin, 19 N. C. 407, 416.

The term "convey" can be properly used only when the transfer of some estate in land is spoken of. To speak of "conveying" a right from one person is to use inappropriate language. Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 697, 720.

The term "convey" is a technical term, long known and used in deeds conveying real estate, and never known or used in a will or devise, any more than the terms "bequeath" or "devise" are used in a deed. Jenckes v. Court of Probate of Smithfield, 2 R. I. 255, 256.

As any transfer of title, legal or equitable.

To "convey," ordinarily speaking, is to transfer property from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities. The word in its broadest significance might embrace any transmission of property. Kelly v. Fleming, 18 S. E. 81, 113 N. C. 133 (citing Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

In a strict legal sense, the word "conveyance" imports a transfer of the legal title to land, but it is also habitually used by lawyers to denote any transfer of title, legal or equitable, and the last is also the popular sense of the term, and such will be held to be its use in a deed "excepting and reserving from this conveyance all lands which have been heretofore 'conveyed' by said parties from the above described premises." Adams v. Hopkins (Cal.) 69 Pac. 228, 232.

The word "convey," when applied to the disposition of personal property, has the signification of "transfer," and means the passing of title and dominion from one person to another. Lippman v. State, 16 South. 130, 104 Ala. 61.

In a stipulation relating to the right to lands involved under deeds of a widow, which stated that if said quitclaim deed from the widow to the defendants conveyed to them all her dower interest, then the defendants should have judgment herein, but if said deed did not so convey her dower interest, etc., the word "conveyed" will not be used in its technical meaning, which would defeat the clear rights of the parties, but in the general popular sense of assignment or transfer. Dobberstein v. Murphy, 66 N. W. 204, 205, 64 Minn. 127.

As applicable to personalty.

"Convey" is properly applied to a transfer of real property, and should not be used in reference to personalty. Dickerman v. Abrahams (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 551, 561.

"Convey," as used in a will directing the conveyance of property, properly refers to real estate, and not personalty. Story v. Palmer, 18 Atl. 363, 365, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 1.

Manifestly the word "convey" is appropriate to the transfer of real property, and entirely inappropriate to the transfer of personal property; but when used in a will it may be construed to apply to personal property, when such construction is in accord with the language directing the distribution, and the whole scheme of the will. Thompson v. Hart, 69 N. Y. Supp. 223, 229, 58 App. Div. 439.

The term "convey," though usually applied to real estate, is very comprehensive in its meaning, and implies a transfer and assignment of personal property also. Leaycraft v. Hedden, 4 N. J. Eq. (3 H. W. Green) 512, 552.

As appoint.

A power contained in a trust deed granting premises in trust for a certain person for her life, and upon her death to the use of such person or persons as she shall by her deed, duly executed, "convey" the same, authorizing the use of the premises until the rents and profits thereof should pay a certain debt, comes within the meaning of the term "convey" as used in such deed of trust. The word "convey" means, in such place, "appoint." Manning v. Screven, 34 S. E. 22, 24, 56 S. C. 78.

Consideration imported.

In a contract stating that the obligor had "this day conveyed a note" for the payment of which he held himself accountable, the word "conveyed" did not import a consideration. Webster defines it as signifying "to carry, to bear, to pass, to transfer; to pass a title to anything from one person to another, as by deed, assignment, or otherwise." One may "convey" a farm without any consideration. The word as used in a contract is synonymous with "transfer," and a promissory note may be conveyed or transferred without consideration. Spicer v. Norton (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 542, 546.

Consignment for sale.

"An allegation that goods were 'sold and conveyed' is sustained by proof of the conveyance of the goods, which was a sale in form, although in fact it was a consignment of them, to be sold for or on account of the consignor, with authority for the consignee to apply the proceeds toward payment of a pre-existing debt which the consignor owed to the consignee." Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342, 344.

The word "convey," as employed in Cr. Code, § 3836, prohibiting the conveyance of property by a mortgagor, when applied to a disposition of personal property has the signification of "transfer," and means the passing of title and dominion from one person to another. It is intended to prohibit the mortgagor from disposing of the property so that the security would be endangered or embarrassed. The danger or embarrassment would result, not only from a sale, but from an exchange, a gift, or any other transfer by which a title not in subordination to the mortgage was created, or by which the possession was changed; and hence where defendant consigned to a third person property mortgaged by him, taking a receipt therefor from the carrier, which he retained, and he testified that he sent the property to such person "for him to do what he pleased with it," he was guilty of "conveying" the property within the statute. Lippman v. State, 16 South. 130, 104 Atl. 61.

As convey by deed.

"Conveyance," when used in reference to real estate, means transmission of the legal title thereto by an appropriate conveyance from the person owning the real estate to the person to whom it is to be conveyed, which conveyance must be duly executed by the grantor and accepted by the grantee. Abendroth v. Town of Greenwich, 29 Conn. 356, 365. Thus allegations that land was conveyed by the owner to third persons, who thereby acquired the title, fairly imports that the conveyance was by deed legally executed. Langmede v. Weaver, 60 N. E. 992, 997, 65 Ohio St. 17.

An allegation in a complaint that defendant "conveyed" certain real estate will be construed to mean that defendant conveyed the land by his deed thereto. Jones v. Davis, 22 Wis. 421, 424.

As convey by instrument in writing.

To "convey" means to carry, to transport, to take to or from; and hence, where it was stated in a deposition that a person sold and conveyed certain chattels, the word "convey" did not necessarily imply that the transfer was made by an instrument in writing. Brown v. Fitz, 13 N. H. 283, 285.

"Conveyed," as used relative to a transfer of land, means that there has been a conveyance by writing. McDonald v. Campbell (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 473, 474.

Conveyance of life estate.

A granting clause in a deed which "conveys and warrants" described land, without pretending to define the nature and character of the estate granted, is not repugnant to the habendum clause, which vests the grantee with a life estate; and hence the rule that the habendum cannot divest an estate in fee conveyed by the granting clause has no application. Welch v. Welch, 55 N. E. 694, 183 Ill. 237.

Conveyance of right of redemption.

"The words 'give, grant, sell, and convey' in a deed do not of themselves imply a warranty. Nor do they expressly and specifically convey the whole title, but are rather words of general description, susceptible of explanation or modification by other appropriate language. They are just as applicable to a conveyance of a right of redemption as to the grant of a fee." Thus their use in a deed, followed by a statement that the grantee intends to convey the same premises and title as conveyed to him by another only, operates to pass such title, though it is only a right of redemption. Bates v. Foster, 59 Me. 157, 160, 8 Am. Rep. 406.

Conveyance of title.

The agreement "to convey by deed of conveyance a certain tract of land" means not merely that the party is to execute a deed, but what is implied in conveying land is that the title shall be conveyed. Lawrence v. Dole, 11 Vt. 549, 553; Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185, 187.

The words "give, grant, and convey" are as comprehensive as any that can be used to convey legal title, and are as efficient in law to transfer the title. Young v. Ringo, 17 Ky. (1 T. B. Mon.) 30, 31.

The word "convey," in an instrument which purports, in consideration of a fixed annual rental, to lease and convey for a term of years all the coal on or under certain described land, does not operate to make the instrument a conveyance, but it is only a mining lease, entitling the grantee to take out all the coal he can mine during the term. Austin v. Huntsville Coal & Min. Co., 72 Mo. 535, 541, 37 Am. Rep. 446.

The use of the word "convey," in a contract whereby one of the parties agrees to convey premises to the other, implies that the conveyance shall give the vendee a sufficient title. Parker v. McAllister, 14 Ind. 12, 16.

To "convey" real estate is to transfer the legal title to it from the owner to another by an appropriate instrument. Citing Abendroth v. Town of Greenwich, 29 Conn. 356. Land is "conveyed" only when the title to it passes. Citing Fairfax's Adm'r v. Lewis (Va.) 11 Leigh, 233, 248. The Century Dictionary defines the word "convey" to mean in law "to pass title by deed." Langmede v. Weaver, 60 N. E. 992, 996, 997, 65 Ohio St. 17.

As conveyance to husband.

As used in Act 1849, giving to a married woman the right to convey and devise real and personal property as if she were unmarried, meant, by simulating the case of a wife to that of an unmarried woman, that she should have the same power as though she were not under the disability of coverture; that, taking away that disability, she should have power to make all such conveyances as were not forbidden by special provisions of law; but it did not mean to overreach particular prohibitions founded on special reasons of policy or convenience, and hence did not authorize the making of a deed to her husband. White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 328, 333.

Delivery of deed imported.

Where suit was brought to set aside a deed, and an allegation in the complaint was to the effect that the deed was executed, and that it "conveyed" to the defendant all the right of the grantor in the land, the word "conveyed" in such allegation should be construed to import that the deed referred to was delivered, since without a delivery there could be no conveyance. Keenan v. Keenan, 12 N. Y. Supp. 747, 749, 58 Hun. 605.

A testator, in his will, spoke of land as "conveyed" to his son, but as a matter of fact the deed to the son had not been delivered, and in the will it was further directed that the deed be delivered at testator's death. Held, that the use of the word "conveyed" was not conclusive that the deed had become effective by the delivery, and the deed would therefore be of a testamentary character, and subject to construction in that line. Mortgage Trust Co. v. Moore, 50 N. E. 72, 73, 150 Ind. 465.

Devise.

The terms "convey and warrant," when given their legal purport or acceptation, fully indicate an intention to convey a present estate to the grantee and defend the title thereto, and in no way is it apparent or to be inferred from these words that the grantors intended to devise the real estate in question. Wilson v. Carrico, 40 N. E. 50, 51, 140 Ind. 533, 49 Am. St. Rep. 213.

As executed.

In Gen. St. 1878, c. 39, § 14, providing that if any person, having conveyed by mortgage any article of personal property, shall dispose of said property with intent to defraud, he may be punished, the word "conveyed" meant "having executed," so that a person who executed a mortgage might be guilty of the offense though he had conveyed no title thereby. State v. Williams, 21 N. W. 746, 748, 32 Minn. 537.

Execution of note.

A statute giving to a married woman the right to "convey" and devise her property did not empower her to make a valid promissory note or other personal engagement. Stiles v. Lord, 11 Pac. 314, 317, 2 Ariz. 154.

Furnish distinguished.

"Furnish" and "convey" are words of widely different meaning. To 'furnish' a thing and to 'convey' it signify very different acts. To 'furnish' is to provide or supply anything wanted by another; to 'convey' is to bear, carry, or transport the thing to another person or place. A person at a distance may 'furnish' the article desired upon request by letter or otherwise, and another may 'convey' it to the person for whom it is intended. One may 'furnish,' 'provide,' or 'supply' a person confined in jail with food, which another may 'convey' into the jail to the person therein confined. Therefore to furnish a person who is confined in jail with anything may, and ordinarily does, mean quite a different act from what we understand by the words, 'shall convey in jail.' Thus an indictment charging the defendant with furnishing articles to a person confined in jail is not sufficient to describe the crime created by Pen. Code, art. 321, which makes it criminal to convey into jail any disguised instrument, etc." Francis v. State, 21 Tex. 280, 285.

As grant.

In a conveyance the word "convey" means to transfer the title or property. The word "convey" means to transfer the title from one person to another. It has the same legal effect as the word "grant," which has become a generic term applicable to the transfer of all classes of real property. In New York the operative word of conveyance is "grant," but Chancellor Kent says: "As other modes of conveyance operate equally as grants, any words showing the intention of the parties would be sufficient." The word, then, "convey," or "transfer," in a deed, is of equivalent signification and effect as "grant." And to construe a deed containing the words "have bargained, sold and conveyed, and by these presents do bargain, sell and convey," as a bargain and sale, is to ignore the word "convey," and give it no effect in the conveyance which is executed with the formalities required by the statute. Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185, 193.

The word "convey" means to transfer title from one person to another, and has the same legal effect as "grant," which has become a generic term applicable to the transfer of all classes of property. Edelman v. Yeakel, 27 Pa. (3 Casey) 27. The use of the word "convey" in a deed is equivalent to a grant at common law, and passes the title, and is in meaning and effect sufficient to answer the requisites of a grant at common law. Chapman v. Charter, 34 S. E. 768, 772, 46 W. Va. 769 (citing Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185).

"Convey," as used in an instrument granting real estate, is the equivalent of "grant." In this connection the court says: "We conceive that the word 'convey' is in meaning and effect sufficient to answer all the requisites of a grant at common law and under our statute concerning conveyances, and to carry with it the legal estate and vest it in the grantee." Patterson v. Carneal's Heirs, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 618, 621, 13 Am. Dec. 208.

The word "convey" is now held equivalent to the word "grant," even at common law. Uhl v. Over River R. Co., 41 S. E. 340, 344, 51 W. Va. 108.

Lease.

In Laws 1869, c. 56, § 4, enacting that no power of attorney from wife to her husband to "convey real estate or any interest therein" shall be of any force, the word "convey" is evidently used as comprehending the word "lease." Sanford v. Johnson, 24 Minn. 172, 173.

Rev. St. c. 61, § 1, declares that real estate conveyed to a married woman by her husband, or paid for by him, or given to her by his relations, "cannot be conveyed" by her without the joinder of the husband, means a sale of real estate. The word "convey" or "conveyances" must refer to an alienation of the estate, a transference of the title, and could not include a lease. We generally mean by the term "convey" that the title is deeded. Perkins v. Morse, 2 Atl. 130, 131, 78 Me. 17, 57 Am. Rep. 780.

"Neither the word 'convey' nor 'incumber,' according to its ordinary significance, is expressive of the act of creating a tenancy for years in lands. The former of the terms is appropriate to the transfer of a title to a freehold, the latter to putting the property in pledge for the payment of money. That the word 'conveyance' does not, when standing without assistance in a statute, signify its applicability to the passing of a chattel interest in realty, is clearly indicated in the cases of Kinney v. Watts (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 38, and Tone v. Brace, 8 Paige, 598." Sullivan v. Barry, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 1, 5.

Mortgage of leasehold.

The word "conveys," in Act 1898, p. 670, entitled "An act respecting conveyances, and relating to the recording of instruments," includes any instrument which transfers an interest in land, and it matters not how small in quantity and how short in time of duration that interest may be. A man who is in possession of land as a tenant from year to year has an interest therein which he may "convey." The term includes a mortgage of a 10-year leasehold. Lembeck & Betz Eagle Brewing Co. v. Kelly, 51 Atl. 794, 796, 63 N. J. Eq. 401.

The use of the word "convey" is equivalent to a grant at common law, and passes title. It means a transfer of title from one person to another. Thus where a lessee, who had erected on the leased lands elevator buildings which could not be removed without injury to them and to the freehold, and whose lease gave him no right to remove fixtures, gave a mortgage thereof which, though in form a chattel mortgage, purported to grant and convey the elevator, the mortgage was valid as a mortgage on the leasehold estate, although it was realty. Cross v. Weare Commission Co., 38 N. E. 1038, 1041, 153 Ill. 499, 46 Am. St. Rep. 902.

Payment and demand for conveyance implied.

Where one agrees to convey land on the payment of money, the word "convey" is to be construed as meaning the making and delivery of a deed after the vendee has not only tendered or paid the money, but demanded a conveyance. Fuller v. Hubbard (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 13, 17, 16 Am. Dec. 423.

Power to sell imported.

Where a testator gave his executors full power and authority to convey in fee simple absolute or otherwise, in their discretion, all or any portion of his real estate, and to execute and deliver all proper deeds and instruments in writing therefor, the phrase "full power and authority to convey in fee simple absolute or otherwise, in their discretion," meant that the executors might convey any of the testator's real estate as they might deem advantageous, the power to make all proper deeds implying the power to sell. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 98 Ill. 254, 258.

Present transfer imported.

The words "convey and warrant" in a deed operate to pass all the grantor's estate by virtue of legal implication only when there is nothing in the deed showing a contrary intent on the part of the grantor; and therefore the words in a deed reciting that, in consideration of a small cash payment and an agreement to furnish the grantor with support for life, she did convey and warrant to the grantee certain premises, "it being understood that possession of said property is to be given at my death," does not have such effect, but the deed must be construed as reserving a life estate to the grantor. Hart v. Gardner, 20 South. 877, 879, 74 Miss. 153.

Retention of legal title.

Land is "conveyed and sold," within the meaning of a statutory grant of land to a railroad company free from taxation till sold and conveyed, when the railroad company has parted with the entire equitable interest in the land and received full compensation therefor, although it still holds the bare legal title. State v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 21 Minn. 472, 477. Where a railroad company to whom lands are granted by the state to aid in the construction of its road, such lands to be exempt from taxation until sold and conveyed, has sold the lands and received the consideration, so that it retains no lien upon nor actual interest in them, though it retains the naked legal title only as trustee for the purchaser, it has "sold and conveyed" them within the meaning of the exempting clause. State v. Webber, 37 N. W. 949, 951, 38 Minn.

397 (following State v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 21 Minn. 472).

"Sold and conveyed," within the meaning of Illinois Central Railroad Charter, § 22, providing that certain lands owned by the company shall be exempt from all taxation under state laws until sold and conveyed by said corporation or trustees, includes lands sold and paid for, though it is not actually conveyed, as any other construction would enable the land to be held exempt from taxation for all time. Champaign County v. Reed, 100 Ill. 304, 307.

Sell distinguished.

In a "power to sell and convey" real estate, the power to sell and the power to convey are not one and indivisible. A person may give another authority to sell land without giving him authority to execute conveyances, or he may give him power to execute conveyances without the power to make sales, or he may give him the power to do both. Authority to convey can only be given by deed, while authority to sell may be given by parol. Dayton v. Nell, 45 N. W. 231, 43 Minn. 246.

Send distinguished.

See "Send."

As take.

The word "take" may be regarded as an equivalent of "convey." May's Heirs v. Slaughter, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 505, 509.

A warranty implied.

The words "give, grant, sell, and convey" in a deed do not of themselves imply a warranty. Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 227, 230, 17 Am. Dec. 221; Bates v. Foster, 59 Me. 157, 160, 8 Am. Rep. 406.

CONVEY AND WARRANT.

The words "convey and warrant" comprehend and express all the covenants of warranty as fully as if they were written out at full length. Jackson v. Green, 112 Ind. 341, 342, 14 N. E. 89.

Under the express provision of Rev. St. c. 30, § 13, the words "convey and warrant" in a deed amount to the conveyance in fee simple. Palmer v. Cook, 42 N. E. 796, 159 Ill. 300, 50 Am. St. Rep. 165.

As used in a deed providing that the grantor conveyed and warranted unto the grantee the property conveyed, the expression "convey and warrant" is to be construed as containing a covenant not only of title and seisin, and against incumbrances, but also for quiet enjoyment; and where the original grantor either had the title or was in possession under claim of title, such covenant is in futuro and runs with the land, and binds the grantor himself, and his heirs and personal representatives, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, that the grantor is lawfully seised of the premises, has good right to convey the same, and guarantees possession thereof, that the same are free from incumbrances, and that he will warrant and defend the title to the same against all lawful claims. Worley v. Hineman, 33 N. E. 260, 261, 6 Ind. App. 240.

Under the statute of Indiana, a deed containing the words "conveys and warrants" shall be deemed and held to be a conveyance in fee simple to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, with covenant from the grantor, for himself and his heirs and personal representatives, that he is lawfully seised of the premises, has good right to convey the same, and guarantees the quiet possession thereof, that the same are free from all incumbrances, and that he will warrant and defend the title to the same against all lawful claims. Rev. St. 1881, § 2927. Each one of these covenants is contained in the general warranty, the same as if they had been separately written in the deed. Kent v. Cantrall, 44 Ind. 452. In construing such a deed the court said: "It is thus seen that the deed in question contained, amongst other things, a covenant of general warranty, and this covenant, beyond all doubt, runs with the land." Dehority v. Wright, 101 Ind. 882, 883.

CONVEYANCE.

See "Fraudulent Conveyance"; "Private Conveyance"; "Public Conveyance"; "Voluntary Conveyance."

A "conveyance" is defined to be that by which anything is conveyed or transported, or which serves as means or way of carriage, as any vehicle. Von Bokkelen v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. Supp. 307, 309, 34 App. Div. 390.

The word "conveyance," in an insurance policy insuring against accident "while traveling by public or private conveyance," imports traveling by some vehicle or instrument or conveyance, other than the legs of a man walking and carrying his own body, as a car, vessel, stage, or by one's own or another's team. Ripley v. Railway Passengers' Assur. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 823, 824.

A locomotive or engine is not a "conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers," within the meaning of an insurance policy insuring against death caused by accident while traveling by public or private conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers. Brown v. Railway Passenger Assur. Co., 45 Mo. 221, 225.

A provision in an accident policy that the insurer shall not be liable for injuries in or on any conveyance, using steam, not provided for transportation of passengers, does not defeat recovery for death from an injury received while riding by invitation in a locomotive drawing a passenger train, the locomotive and train together constituting a "conveyance" for transportation of passengers. Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 458, 462, 53 Pac. 918, 41 L. R. A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49.

Agreement to convey.

A contract reciting that S. "hath agreed to sell and has sold to P.," and that P. "hath agreed to purchase and has purchased," the lease of certain property, and providing that the consideration for such lease was certain property for which P. was to give good and sufficient deeds "on or before the first day of May next," at which time or before conveyance was "to be made by both parties of the property hereby agreed to be conveyed," was an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance. Jackson v. Moncrief (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 26, 29.

There being a controversy concerning certain land, the plaintiff and P. entered into a written contract reciting that plaintiff had given P. a power of attorney to prosecute the action to judgment, and had agreed to grant, bargain, and sell, and did thereby grant, bargain, and sell, the land in controversy to P. and his heirs, but which provided that P. should prosecute the suit "by virtue of the power of attorney" from the plaintiff, and that if he should be successful he should pay the plaintiff a certain sum, and the plaintiff should convey the land to him in fee, otherwise P. was not to pay such sum, or any part thereof. Held, that the instrument constituted an agreement to convey rather than a conveyance. Maus' Lessee v. Montgomery (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 329, 331.

As any instrument of transfer.

As used in Civ. Code, § 1214, providing that every conveyance of real estate, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, shall be void as against subsequent purchasers in good faith and for a valuable consideration whose conveyances are first duly recorded, embraces every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered, or by which the title to any property may be affected, except wills. Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Banton, 46 Cal. 603, 604.

Code, § 1215, defines the meaning of the term "conveyance," as used in the two preceding sections, as embracing "every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged or incumbered, or by which the title to real property may be affected, except wills." Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564, 566.

The term "conveyance," as defined by the act concerning conveyances (1850, § 30), embraces "every instrument in writing by which any real estate or any interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, except wills, leases for a term not exceeding one year, executory contracts for the sale or purchase of lands, and powers of attorney." Brannan v. Mesick, 10 Cal. 95, 108.

The term "conveyance," as used in the chapter relating to frauds and perjuries, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing except a last will and testament, whatever may be its form and by whatever name it may be known in law, by which any estate or interest in land is created, aliened, assigned, or surrendered. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2036; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2326; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 2714; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 5972; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4226.

As the word is ordinarily used in statutes in relation to real estate, "conveyance" means the deed, the act or instrument, by which property in real estate is transferred. Dudley v. Sumner, 5 Mass. 438, 470.

The term "conveyance," as used in the chapter relating to deeds and mortgages, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, leases for a term not exceeding three years, and executory contracts for the sale or purchase of lands. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8994.

The term "conveyance," as used in the chapter relating to deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which an estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except leases for a term not exceeding three years, and executory contracts for the sale or purchase of lands. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4185; Chandler v. Kent, 8 Minn. 524, 526 (Gil. 467, 468); State v. Grant, 10 Minn. 39, 50 (Gil. 22); Ortman v. Chute, 59 N. W. 533, 534, 57 Minn. 452; White v. McGarry (U. S.) 47 Fed. 420, 421.

The term "conveyance," as used in the provisions relating to the recording of conveyances, embraces every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered, or by which the title to real property may be affected, except wills. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1642.

The term "conveyance" is defined by § 3 Rev. St. p. 2561, as embracing every instrument in writing by which any estate in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 41 N. Y. Supp. 1, 3, 18 Misc. Rep. 327.

The term "conveyance," as used in the title relating to real estate, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any real estate or interest in real estate, is created, aliened, mortgaged, incumbered, or assigned, except wills, and leases for a term not exceeding one year. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1969.

The term "conveyance," as used in the chapter relating to the alienation by deed, etc., of real property, etc., shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, and leases for a term not exceeding three years. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2242.

The term "conveyance" shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, alienated, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or in equity, except wills, leases for a term not exceeding three years, executory contracts for the sale or purchase of lands, and certificates which show that the purchaser has paid the consideration and is entitled to a deed for the lands, and contain a promise or agreement to furnish said deed at some future time. Rev. St. Wyo. 1890, § 2728.

The term "conveyance," as used in Act April 30, 1846, prescribing the mode of conveyances by married women, includes any writing necessary to convey land, and which operates to convey any estate or interest in land of a married woman. Dority v. Dority, 71 S. W. 950, 952, 96 Tex. 215, 60 L. R. A. 941.

The term "conveyance," as used in Rev. St. art. 635, providing that a husband and wife shall join in the conveyance of the wife's separate property, signifies the deed which transfers the title from the wife to the purchaser. Nolan v. Moore, 72 S. W. 583, 96 Tex. 341.

An instrument executed by the grantee in a deed, reciting that the deed was executed as security for a debt, and agreeing to quitclaim to the grantor on payment of the debt, is a "conveyance" within Rev. St. 1851, c. 46, § 30, requiring any conveyance to be acknowledged or proved before recorded. Cogan v. Cook, 22 Minn. 137, 143.

In construing Act 1891, c. 91, § 1, providing that whenever household or kitchen furniture is conveyed by chattel mortgage or otherwise, as allowed by law in North Carolina, the privy examination of married women shall be as prescribed in conveyances of land, the court said: "The word 'convey,' in its broadest significance, might embrace any transmission of possession; but we are restrained to its legal meaning, which, ordinarily speaking, is the transfer of property from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities. According to Webster, a 'conveyance' is an instrument in writing by which property, or the title to property, is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another. The meaning of this word being well understood at common law, it must be understood in the same sense when used in the statute." Kelly v. Fleming, 18 S. E. 81, 113 N. C. 133.

As any transfer of title legal or equitable.

"Conveyance" is defined to be the transfer of the title of land of one person or class of persons to another. Klein v. McNamara, 54 Miss. 90, 105 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. [12th Ed.] 361).

In a strict legal sense, the word "conveyance" imports a transfer of the legal title to land, but it is also habitually used by lawyers to denote any transfer of title, legal or equitable; and the last is also the popular sense of the term, and such will be held to be its use in a deed excepting and reserving from this conveyance all lands which have been heretofore conveyed by said parties from the above-described premises. Adams v. Hopkins (Cal.) 69 Pac. 228, 232.

Antenuptial contract.

An antenuptial contract whereby the intended husband agrees that there shall be conveyed on his death to his intended wife, by a proper deed, certain land therein described, but that if she does not survive him the agreement shall be void, is a "conveyance" within the meaning of How. St. § 5727, relating to recording of instruments. Aultman, Miller & Co. v. Pettys, 59 Mich. 482, 487, 26 N. W. 680, 682.

Assignment for benefit of creditors.

"A 'conveyance' is defined to be an instrument in writing by which property, or the title to property, is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another." An assignment for the benefit of creditors is required to be in writing, duly acknowledged in the same manner as conveyances of real estate, and recorded. The assignee has as full power to dispose of all the estate as the debtor had. An assignment for the benefit of creditors is therefore a conveyance. Prouty v. Clark, 34 N. W. 614, 615, 73 Iowa, 55.

A "conveyance," as used in the insolvent laws (Laws 1881, c. 184, § 2), prohibiting conveyances by insolvent debtors with preferences, includes an assignment by an insolvent debtor in which creditors are preferred or given rights not equally available to other creditors. Weston v. Loyhed, 14 N. W. 892, 894, 30 Minn. 221.

Assignment of chose in action.

The word "conveyance," as used in Act 1852, c. 365, § 10, authorizing a creditor to file a bill for attachment after a judgment at law in all cases where a conveyance is made by a debtor of property of any description, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors, embraces a fraudulent assignment by a debtor of a chose in action. Willson v. Beadle, 39 Tenn. (2 Head) 510, 518.

Assignment of mortgage.

The assignment of a mortgage is a "conveyance" within the recording acts. Larned v. Donovan, 32 N. Y. Supp. 731, 733, 84 Hun, 533; Merrill v. Luce, 61 N. W. 43, 45, 6 S. D. 354, 55 Am. St. Rep. 573; Burns v. Berry, 42 Mich. 176, 179, 3 N. W. 924. An assignment of a mortgage is a "conveyance," within Pub. St. c. 120, § 4, declaring a conveyance, unless recorded, invalid against persons other than the grantor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice. Swasey v. Emerson, 46 N. E. 426, 168 Mass. 118, 60 Am. St. Rep. 368. The term "conveyance," in Rev. St. Code, § 3594, which provides that every conveyance of real estate, except, etc., shall be void against any subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, etc., in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, includes an assignment of a real estate mortgage. Henniges v. Johnson, 84 N. W. 350, 353, 9 N. D. 489, 81 Am. St. Rep. 588; Hull v. Diehl, 52 Pac. 782, 783, 21 Mont. 71.

Under section 2242, Rev. St. 1878, providing that the term "conveyance" as used in such statute shall be construed to embrace every written instrument by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, an assignment of a mortgage is included within the term "conveyance." Butler v. Bank of Mazeppa, 68 N. W. 998, 999, 94 Wis. 351.

The term "conveyance," as used in the recording acts, is defined by it to include an instrument in writing by which real estate, or an interest therein, is mortgaged. A mortgage, therefore, is a "conveyance" within such acts, but such a mortgage does not create an estate in real property. An assignment of the mortgage is not a conveyance. Hull v. Diehl, 52 Pac. 782, 783, 21 Mont. 71.

Certificate of execution sale.

A properly recorded certificate of an execution sale of lands is within the meaning of the term "conveyance" in the recording laws. Drake v. McLean, 47 Mich. 102, 103, 10 N. W. 126, 127.

Certificate of sale of state lands.

A certificate of sale executed by the commissioner of the state land office on the sale of school land, pursuant to Gen. St. 1894, § 3967, is a "conveyance" within the meaning of the statute prohibiting resulting uses and trusts. Haaven v. Hoas, 62 N. W. 110, 111, 60 Minn. 313.

Charter party.

A charter party is not a "conveyance" within the meaning of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes." Hill v. The Golden Gate (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 168, 170 (citing 9 Stat. 440).

Consignment of goods.

The terms "assignment, transfer or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely or conditionally," in Gen. St. c. 118, § 89, forbidding any assignment, transfer, or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely, or conditionally, by an insolvent debtor with a view to prefer a creditor, includes a consignment of goods to be sold for or on account of the consignor, and therefore such a consignment is prohibited by the statute if the consignee is authorized by it to apply the avails of the sales to the payment of a pre-existing debt which the consignor owes him. Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342, 344.

Contract distinguished.

A conveyance is a contract under seal. There is often a difference between a power to contract and the power of making conveyances. But the power to contract given under the section providing that contracts may be made by the wife in the same manner and to the same extent as if she were unmarried will not be held to be limited to such contracts as are included in a section providing that a conveyance, transfer, or lien executed by either husband or wife to or in favor of the other shall be valid to the same extent as between other persons, and a section providing that a husband or wife may constitute the other his or her attorney in fact to control or dispose of his or her property for their mutual benefit, and under such first section the wife is authorized to enter into parol contracts with her husband. Grubbe v. Grubbe, 38 Pac. 182, 185, 26 Or. 363.

Contract for mortgage.

Real Property Law, § 240, states that the term "conveyance" includes every written instrument by which any estate or interest in real property is created, transferred, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real property may be affected, including an instrument in execution of a power, and although the power be one of revocation only, except a will, a lease for a term not exceeding three years, an executory contract for the sale or purchase of lands, and an instrument containing a power to convey real property as the agent or attorney for the owner of such property. A contract for an alteration of a building, by which, in lieu of final payment, the contractor is to take a second mortgage on the premises, is not within the statute. David- son v. Fox, 73 N. Y. Supp. 533, 534, 65 App. Div. 262.

Contract for sale of land.

By Rev. St. § 2242, the term "conveyance," as used in the previous section declaring every conveyance of real estate not recorded to be void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith, etc., is to be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, leases, and executory contracts for the sale or purchase of land, so that a mere executory contract for the sale or purchase of land is not a "conveyance" within section 2241. First Nat. Bank v. Chafee, 73 N. W. 318, 319, 98 Wis. 42.

The word "conveyance," in Gen. St. 1878, c. 69, § 2, providing that no conveyance or contract for the sale of real estate, or of any interest therein, by a married woman, other than mortgages on lands to secure the purchase money of such lands, and leases for terms not exceeding three years, shall be valid unless her husband join with her in such conveyance, refers back to what precedes, and includes contracts for the sale of real estate, or of any interest therein, the word "conveyance" being used in its more general sense. Gregg v. Owens, 33 N. W. 216, 217, 37 Minn. 61.

A bond for title by a married woman is not a "conveyance," required by Pub. St. Minn. c. 35, § 12, to be separately acknowledged by her; the word "conveyance" being expressly defined by section 30 as not embracing "executory contracts for the sale or purchase of land." Kingsley v. Gilman, 15 Minn. 59, 62 (Gil. 40, 42).

Conveyance of personalty.

"A conveyance is the act or instrument by which property in real estate is transferred. This word cannot be applied to an instrument in writing relating to personal property." Alexander v. State, 12 S. W. 595, 28 Tex. App. 186, 187.

A "conveyance," as used in a statute prohibiting fraudulent conveyances, or conveyances intended to defeat or defraud creditors, does not apply to chattels, but means a transfer of real estate by deed. Livermore v. Bagley, 3 Mass. 487, 505.

Within Const. 1885, art. 11, § 1, providing that the consent of a married woman, to be effective to render her separate statutory property liable for her husband's debts, must be in writing, and must be executed according to the laws respecting the conveyances by married women, the word "conveyance" is used in a broad sense, including conveyances of both real and personal property. Springfield Co. v. Ely (Fla.) 82 South. 892, 894.

Declaration of trust.

A "conveyance," within 2 Rev. St. 134, § 6, providing that no trust should be created or declared unless by a deed or conveyance in writing, is an instrument by which the title to such estate may be affected in law or equity, and comprehends a declaration of trust, although not under seal. Corse v. Leggett (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 389, 394.

A mere declaration in writing that the person making it holds land conveyed to him in trust for another is not such a conveyance or instrument as requires either a United States or state revenue stamp. Sime v. Howard, 4 Nev. 473, 481.

As deed.

15 Geo. II, c. 8, provided that a register should be appointed to record all conveyances, and that after a certain date no conveyance should be good to hold the same against any other persons but the grantors or their heirs until the deed thereof was recorded as provided in the statute. Held, that the "conveyances" meant by the statute were conveyances by deed. Foster v. Briggs, 3 Mass. 313, 316.

A conveyance is a deed which passes or conveys land from one person to another. Citing Brown v. Fitz, 13 N. H. 283, 285; Jacob, Law Dict. Thus allegations that land was "conveyed" by the owner to third persons, who thereby acquired the title fairly, imports that the conveyance was by deed legally executed. Langmede v. Weaver, 60 N. E. 992, 997, 65 Ohio St. 17.

Deed of trust.

"Conveyance" is the transfer of a title of land from one person or class of persons to another. So that, under Code 1891, c. 74, § 2, providing that every gift, sale, conveyance, etc., made by an insolvent debtor to a trustee giving or attempting to give a priority or preference shall be void as to such priority, a deed of trust is a conveyance prohibited by such act. Argand Refining Co. v. Quinn, 20 S. E. 576, 579, 39 W. Va. 535.

Homestead declaration.

A homestead is not a conveyance. It possesses none of the essential requisites of a conveyance. There is neither grantor nor grantee nor consideration in a declaration of homestead. There is no transfer of or change in the title. It is the act of the owner of the property whereby such owner secures a right or privilege given him by the statute. Burbank v. Kirby, 55 Pac. 295, 296, 6 Idaho, 210, 96 Am. St. Rep. 260.

As incumbrance.

Code 1857, p. 336, art. 23, providing that no "conveyance or incumbrance" for the separate debts of the husband shall be binding on the wife beyond the amount of her income, means that the wife shall not make her property security for her husband's debts by any form of instrument by which, under the law, a lien or hypothecation can be created. The words "conveyance or incumbrance," as so used, are not used to convey the same idea. "Conveyance" is a general word, comprehending the several modes of passing title to real estate. Strictly speaking, the words include mortgages and deeds of trust, and also the ordinary deed of bargain and sale. Klein v. McNamara, 54 Miss. 90, 105.

Judgment.

The term "conveyance," as used in a statute requiring all conveyances to be recorded, does not include judgments. Wilcoxson v. Miller, 49 Cal. 193, 195.

Lease.

A lease is a conveyance of real estate. Shlimer v. Inhabitants of Town of Phillipsburg, 33 Atl. 852, 58 N. J. Law (29 Vroom) 506; Carlton v. Williams, 19 Pac. 185, 186, 77 Cal. 89, 11 Am. St. Rep. 243; Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168; Craig v. Summers, 49 N. W. 742, 743, 47 Minn. 189, 15 L. R. A. 236; Stinson v. Hardy, 41 Pac. 116, 118, 27 Or. 584. Contra, see Perkins v. Morse, 2 Atl. 130, 131, 78 Me. 17, 57 Am. Rep. 780.

A lease of land for 99 years to an alien who has not declared his intention to become a citizen contravenes Const. art. 2, § 33, which declares that a conveyance of land to any alien, directly or in trust, shall be void. And the word "conveyance" will not be limited to an instrument which transfers the title to another. State v. Morrison, 52 Pac. 228, 18 Wash. 664.

The term "conveyance," within the meaning of Code, § 1810, providing that conveyances of unconditional estates of real property shall be void as to purchasers, etc., unless registered, etc., includes a written lease of all the timber on a tract of land for three years. Milliken v. Faulk, 20 South. 594, 595, 111 Ala. 658.

The term "conveyance," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1722, subd. 3, authorizing appeals from judgments or orders in probate proceedings against or in favor of directing the partition sale or conveyance of real property, is used in a restricted sense, and falls within the definition of that term as applied to the actual transfer of title to lands and interest therein, and does not include the hiring of real estate at a fixed rental for a term of years. In re Tuohy's Estate, 58 Pac. 722, 724, 23 Mont. 305.

Under Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6961, providing that a married woman cannot incumber or convey her lands except by deed in which her husband shall join, a lease of lands by a married woman for the purpose of giving the lessee the right to prospect and operate for gas and oil was not an "incumbrance or conveyance." Heal v. Niagara Oil Co., 50 N. E. 482, 150 Ind. 483.

Under Comp. Laws, c. 241, § 8994, providing that the term "conveyance" as used in that chapter shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, leases for a term not exceeding three years, and executory contracts for the sale or purchase of lands, a lease of real estate which has 8 or 10 years yet to run is within the meaning of such chapter, so that the real estate recording laws are applicable to it. Crouse v. Michell, 90 N. W. 32, 35, 130 Mich. 347.

Under 1 Rev. St. 738, § 140, providing that "no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, whether such conveyance contain special covenants or not," an instrument under seal, whereby the lessor demises and leases the right to collect wharfage for the term of one year, is not a conveyance of real estate. City of New York v. Mabie, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 151, 158, 64 Am. Dec. 538.

A lease of real estate for a time exceeding one year is a conveyance within the recording act, which declares that the word "conveyance" as used therein shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any real estate is created, alienated, mortgaged, or assigned, except wills, and leases for a time not exceeding one year. Jones v. Marks, 47 Cal. 242.

Mortgage.

"Conveyance" is a technical or quasi technical word of precise and definite import, and defined by Bouvier as a transfer of the title to land by one person to another. The instrument itself is called a "conveyance." Bouv. Law Dict. 346. It is a general term indicating the several modes of passing title. A mortgage in fee is a conveyance. Pickett v. Buckner, 45 Miss. 226, 245.

The term "conveyance," as used in the recording acts, requiring every conveyance of real property to be recorded, includes a real estate mortgage. Merrill v. Luce, 61 N. W. 43, 45, 6 S. D. 354, 55 Am. St. Rep. 844; Burns v. Berry, 3 N. W. 924, 925, 42 Mich. 176; Larned v. Donovan, 32 N. Y. Supp. 731, 733, 84 Hun. 533; Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Banton, 46 Cal. 603, 607; Allison v. Manzke, 94 N. W. 659, 661, 118 Wis. 11.

The term "conveyance," as used in the bankruptcy act, which provides that all property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors shall vest in his assignee, and which enacts that the creditor receiving a conveyance contrary to the act shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy, includes a mortgage. Bingham v. Frost, 6 N. B. R. 130, 131. But as used in a statute providing that conveyances made by debtor with a view to insolvency shall be void, it will not be construed to include mortgages. Bates v. Coe, 10 Conn. 280, 294.

The word "conveyance" in the bankrupt act is a generic term, including all proceedings to dispose of or incumber property in derogation of the equality of creditors, with intent by such disposition either to defeat or delay the operation of the act. Hence it includes mortgages on real estate which, if given prior to the provisions of the thirty-ninth section, are void, and deprives the mortgagee of all right to prove his claim in bankruptcy, even though he should be willing to surrender his rights under the mortgage. Bingham v. Frost (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 401.

"Conveyance," as used in Civ. Code, § 1187, relating to the conveyance of property by a married woman, should be construed to include a mortgage, which must be executed in the manner required for a conveyance. Tolman v. Smith, 16 Pac. 189, 191, 74 Cal. 345.

Within Rev. Code, § 2279, declaring that a conveyance by the owner is of no validity unless the husband and wife, if the owner be married, concur in and sign the conveyance, the term "conveyance" means not only a deed, but embraces a mortgage. Babcock v. Hoey, 11 Iowa, 375, 378.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2262, which provides that any grant or "conveyance" by the pre-emptor of government lands, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, shall be null and void, except, etc., a mortgage is not included. Norris v. Heald, 29 Pac. 1121, 12 Mont. 282, 33 Am. St. Rep. 581.

The term "conveyance," as used in a statute providing that a conveyance made by a grantor who is ousted shall be invalid unless made to the person in possession, does not include a mortgage. Harral v. Leverty, 50 Conn. 46, 55, 47 Am. Rep. 608.

"Conveyance," as used in a fire insurance policy providing that it should be void if any change take place in the title, interest, or possession, whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance, in whole or in part, should be construed to include a mortgage. East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Clarke, 15 S. W. 166, 79 Tex. 23, 11 L. R. A. 293.

"Conveyances," as used in Sess. Laws 1871-72, p. 700, declaring that the board of education in cities having a population exceeding 100,000 inhabitants shall have power to lease school property and loan moneys belonging to the school fund, but all conveyances of real estate shall be made to the city, should be construed to include a mortgage, for a mortgage is a conveyance of an estate or property to secure a debt or the performance of some particular act, subject to a defeasance usually written in the body of the same instrument. People v. Roche, 14 N. E. 701, 702, 124 Ill. 9.

How. Ann. St. § 5689, provides that the term "conveyance" shall embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, leases for a term not exceeding three years, and executory contracts for the purchase of land. Held, that the term "conveyance" as so defined included a mortgage, which instrument creates an equitable interest in real estate within such section. Edwards v. McKernan, 22 N. W. 20, 23, 55 Mich. 520; Reynolds v. McMullen, 22 N. W. 41, 45, 55 Mich. 568, 54 Am. Rep. 386.

A statute provided that "every conveyance or mortgage of lands * * * and every lease for more than three years" shall be recorded, "and every conveyance or lease not so recorded" shall be fraudulent and void as against any subsequent purchaser. And in Routh v. Spencer, 38 Ind. 393, Gilchrist v. Gough, 63 Ind. 576, 30 Am. Rep. 250, and authorities there cited, it was held that the word "conveyance" in the second clause referred to a mortgage as well as a deed. Another statute provided that a widow marrying a second time, and holding real estate in virtue of any previous marriage, with a child or children alive by such marriage, should not alienate such real estate, during such second or subsequent marriage, with or without the assent of her husband; and it was held that the inhibition upon alienation, which, as used in the section, meant the same as "conveyance," prohibited the widow from mortgaging the premises during the subsequent marriage. Vinnedge v. Shaffer, 35 Ind. 341; Bowers v. Van Winkle, 41 Ind. 432; McCullough v. Davis, 108 Ind. 292, 9 N. E. 276; Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Buck, 108 Ind. 174, 9 N. E. 153. Hence a statute forbidding an infant feme covert under certain conditions to disaffirm a sale of lands belonging to her, in which sale and conveyance her husband had joined, forbade a disaffirmance by an infant feme covert of a mortgage so executed. United States Sav. Fund & Investment Co. v. Harris, 40 N. E. 1072, 1075, 142 Ind. 226.

Code Civ. Proc. § 963, providing that an appeal may be taken from a judgment or order against or in favor of directing the partion, sale, or "conveyance" of real estate, is to be construed in a broad and comprehensive sense, embracing every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered, or by which the title to any real property may be affected, except wills. Hence a mortgage of real estate is a conveyance. In re McConnell's Estate, 15 Pac. 746, 74 Cal. 217 (citing Hassey v. Wilke, 55 Cal. 525, 528).

A "mortgage" may be described as a conveyance of land from a debtor to his creditor by way of security for a debt to become void on the payment of it. A deed of trust executed to secure the payment of a debt is a mortgage. A mortgage or deed of trust to secure the payment of a debt is therefore a "conveyance," within the meaning of Pasch. Dig. art. 1003, and hence a trustee in a deed of trust is not precluded from the power to sell on a default in the grantor's payment of the debt because of the want of title in himself sufficient to enable him to convey the fee in the land mortgaged to a purchaser. Jordan v. Peak, 38 Tex. 429, 442.

The act concerning conveyances, passed April 16, 1850, provides, in section 41, that "all conveyances of real estate heretofore made, acknowledged, or proved according to the laws in force at the time of such making, and acknowledgment or proof, shall have the same force as evidence, and be recorded in the same manner and with the like effect as conveyances executed and acknowledged in pursuance of this act," and in section 30 that the term "conveyances," as used in the act, shall embrace mortgages. Call v. Hastings, 3 Cal. 179, 184.

Mortgage of leasehold or personality.

Under the provisions of a statute providing that the term "conveyance" shall embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, the mortgage of a leasehold interest is a conveyance. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 492, 493, 19 App. Div. 344.

"Conveyances of property" as used in Code 1886, § 1798, authorizing the admission of conveyances of property in evidence without proof of execution when they have been acknowledged or proved and recorded as required by law, includes a mortgage of personal property. Patterson v. Jones, 8 South. 77, 78, 89 Ala. 388.

Note.

A note is not a conveyance, mortgage, or like formal instrument in writing, within Acts 1887, which provide that such instruments executed by a married woman shall be effectual to convey or charge her separate estate when the intention to do so is declared in them. Singluff v. Tindal, 19 S. E. 137, 138, 40 S. C. 504.

Payment of money.

The words "conveyance, transfer, assignment, or incumbrance," as used in the bankruptcy act, § 67, providing that all conveyances, transfers, assignments, or incumbrances of his property, or any part thereof, made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of a petition, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, shall be void, applies to a transfer or incumbrance of property, real or personal, rather than to the payment of money upon a pre-existing debt. Blakey v. Boonville Nat. Bank (U. S.) 95 Fed. 267, 268.

Quitclaim or bargain and sale.

See, also, "Bargain and Sale."

The term "conveyance" is defined in the recording act to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity. The elasticity of the term "conveyance" thus appears to be quite sufficient to comprehend a grant by way of quitclaim or of bargain and sale. Wilhelm v. Wilken, 44 N. E. 82, 83, 149 N. Y. 447, 32 L. R. A. 370, 52 Am. St. Rep. 743.

"As a quitclaim deed will transfer the title and right actually held by the grantor therein, it is a 'conveyance,' within Code Iowa, § 1940, providing that no vendor's lien shall be enforced after a 'conveyance' by the vendee, unless such lien is reserved by written instrument, acknowledged and recorded." Chrisman v. Hay (U. S.) 43 Fed. 552, 554.

Rev. St. § 2241, provides in effect that every conveyance of real estate which shall not be recorded as provided by law shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall first be recorded. Section 2242 declares in effect that the term "conveyance" as used in that section shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, alienated, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except wills, liens for a term not exceeding three years, and executory contracts for the sale or purchase of land. Under these sections a quitclaim deed executed subsequent to an unrecorded warranty deed, and reformed by a judgment subsequent to its recording, had the same effect, with such recorded judgment, as the original deed, with the description corrected, and re-executed, and re-recorded, would have had. Cutler v. James, 24 N. W. 874, 875, 64 Wis. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 603.

Receipt of receiver of land office.

Rev. St. Wis. 1878, § 4211, provides that when the occupant, or those under whom he claims, entered into the possession of any premises under claim of title, exclusive of another right, founding such claim on some written instrument as being a "conveyance" of the premises in question, and that there has been a continual occupation under such instrument for 10 years, the premises so included shall be deemed to have been held adversely. It is not essential that the written instrument should constitute in itself an actual title or conveyance, but only one on which may be founded a claim of adverse possession as being a conveyance. The receipt issued by the receiver of the land office on payment of the purchase price of land to the government, containing a description of the land, constitutes a "conveyance" within its meaning. Cawley v. Johnson (U. S.) 21 Fed. 492, 495.

Release or satisfaction of mortgage.

4 Rev. St. (8th Ed.) p. 2475, § 38, declares that the term "conveyance" shall embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity. Held, that under such statutory definition the word "conveyance" should be construed to include a release of a mortgage, which is required by section 1, p. 2469, to be recorded in order that the mortgage may be discharged as against a subsequent assignee thereof in good faith for value. Baker v. Thomas, 15 N. Y. Supp. 359, 363, 61 Hun, 17. So, also, a satisfaction of a mortgage. Bacon v. Van Schoonhoven, 87 N. Y. 446, 449.

Gen. St. c. 40, § 21, provides that unrecorded conveyances shall be void as against subsequent purchasers. Held, that the word "conveyance" as used in such act included every transfer of an interest in land, and therefore included a release by a mortgagee, whether done by entry in the margin of the record, by a certificate of discharge, or decree of the court. Merchant v. Woods, 7 N. W. 826, 27 Minn. 396.

A partial release of mortgaged premises is a "conveyance," as that term is used in Gen. St. c. 40, § 21, which chapter declares that every conveyance of real estate not recorded, etc., shall be void as against the purchaser in good faith, etc. Palmer v. Bates, 22 Minn. 582, 584.

Reservation of land.

As used in 1 Rev. St. p. 762, § 38, defining the term "conveyance" as embracing every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created or sold, or by which the title may be affected, the term would include an agreement among adjacent lot owners covenanting to reserve an open space in front of their lots and not to build thereon. Bradley v. Walker, 33 N. E. 1079, 1080, 138 N. Y. 291.

Voluntary conveyance by wife.

"Conveyances," as used in Rev. St. 1871, c. 61, providing that a married woman may manage, sell, and convey her estate, but that real estate directly or indirectly conveyed to her by her husband, or paid for by him, or given or devised to her by his relatives, cannot be conveyed by her without the joinder of her husband in such conveyance, meant such conveyances as were voluntary on the part of the wife, the result of a contract to which she should be a party, receiving their force and effect from her consent alone, and did not apply to voluntary conveyances. Virgie v. Stetson, 1 Atl. 481, 482, 77 Me. 520.

Will.

See, also, "Will."

A "conveyance" is an instrument in writing by which property or title to property is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another. Webster. In the narrower sense of the word, "conveyance" signifies the instrument employed to effectuate an ordinary purchase of freehold land, as opposed to settlements, wills, leases, and partitions. So that, as used in the Constitution of Washington, art. 2, § 33, providing that all conveyances of land hereafter made to any alien, in trust or directly, shall be void, it does not render a will void because it contains an item devising land to an alien. Brigham v. Kenyon (U. S.) 76 Fed. 30, 33.

While in a technical sense a will may be said to be a "conveyance," the ordinary rule is that it is not included when that term is used. Thus Pub. St. c. 176, § 8, authorizing a married woman living separate from a nonresident husband to manage, sell, and "convey" her property as if unmarried, does not defeat the interest of the husband in the estate of the wife on her death, so as to render her will disinheriting him valid. Foote v. Nickerson, 48 Atl. 1088, 1099, 70 N. H. 496, 54 L. R. A. 554 (citing Jenckes v. Probate Court of Smithfield, 2 R. I. 255, 256; May's Heirs v. Slaughter, 10 Ky. [3 A. K. Marsh.] 505, 509).

Laws 1875, c. 38, providing that aliens may inherit from a citizen who has purchased and taken a conveyance to real estate, is as applicable to the will in the case of a devise as it is to a deed in a case of a grant. Stamm v. Bostwick, 25 N. E. 233, 234, 122 N. Y. 48, 9 L. R. A. 597.

A will is never a "conveyance." A conveyance operates in the lifetime of the grantor, while a will does not operate until after the death of the maker. Of course, death transfers all property, and a will says where it shall go; but this does not render a will a "conveyance." It is the death that transfers the property. Comstock v. Adams, 23 Kan. 513, 524, 33 Am. Rep. 191.

While a will is a "conveyance" of real estate in a certain sense, we may say in legal language it is not so understood or referred to. The one who takes comes to his estate by purchase, and not by descent, but he is a devisee, and not a grantee; and we do not think, looking to the purpose of the Legislature, that the word "conveyances," as used in Laws 1885, c. 147, requiring conveyances, in order to be valid against bona fide purchasers, to be recorded, includes wills. Bell v. Couch, 43 S. E. 911, 912, 132 N. C. 346.

"Convey," as used in an act relative to transfers of interests in realty "regards the passing of titles by 'conveyances,' technically so called, and not wills, which are only quasi conveyances, and are not properly described by the term 'conveyance.'" May's Heirs v. Slaughter, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 505, 509.

Writing under seal.

The fourteenth section of the act concerning conveyances (Revision, p. 155) providing that every "deed or conveyance" of or for any lands, etc., shall be recorded, did not refer to writings not under seal. Bramhall v. Hutchinson (N. J.) 7 Atl. 873, 875.

CONVEYANCING.

When we speak of "conveyancing" we are understood to mean the practice of preparing deeds for execution. A "book on conveyancing" means a book containing precedents or forms of the various kinds of deeds or sealed instruments. Livermore v. Bagley, 3 Mass. 487, 505.

CONVICT.

See "County Convicts"; "Ex-Convict"; "State Convicts."

The word "convict," as ordinarily used, carries with it the idea that the person of whom it is spoken is guilty of crime of such infamous character as to be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and of such imprisonment; and therefore the word is to be taken prima facie as importing guilt of such crime, and imprisonment in consequence; and therefore to charge in writing that a man is an ex-convict is libelous per se. Morrissey Providence Telegram Pub. Co., 32 Atl. 19, 19 R. I. 124.

"Convicts," as used in the federal immigration laws declaring that convicts shall not be admitted, means any person who has been charged, found guilty, and suffered punishment for a crime. Thus an immigrant, who has been convicted in the country from which he came of assault with a deadly weapon, and has served a term of imprisonment imposed therefor, is a "convict" within the meaning of the term, and was not entitled to admission. In re Aliano (U. S.) 43 Fed. 517.

An accused person is termed a "convict" after final condemnation by the highest court of resort which, by law, has jurisdiction of his case, and to which he may have thought proper to appeal. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 27; Arcia v. State, 26 Tex. App. 193, 205, 9 S. W. 635; Brannan v. State, 72 S. W. 184, 185, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 399 (citing Woods v. State, 26 Tex. App. 490, 10 S. W. 108; Jones v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 135, 22 S. W. 404).

One against whom a judgment of conviction has been entered, but whose sentence has not been pronounced, who has an appeal pending, is not a "convict" within the meaning of the statute declaring that an accused person is termed a "convict" after final condemnation by the highest court of resort which has jurisdiction of his case. Jones v. State, 22 S. W. 404, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 135.

CONVICTED—CONVICTION.

See "Abiding Conviction"; "Absolute Conviction"; "Deliberate Conviction"; "Full Conviction."

See "Former Conviction"; "Summary Conviction"; "Prosecute to Conviction."

Before conviction, see "Before."

Crompton saith that conviction is either when a man is outlawed, or appeareth and confesseth, or is found guilty by the inquest; and when a statute excludes clergy to persons found guilty of felony, etc., it extends to those who are convicted by confession. Crompt. Just. 9. Bouvier says "conviction" means a condemnation. In its most extensive sense, this word signifies the giving judgment against a defendant, whether criminal or civil. In a more limited sense it means the judgment given against a criminal, and in its most restricted sense it is a record of the summary proceeding, upon any penal statute, before one or more justices of the peace or other person duly authorized, in a case where the offender has been convicted and sentenced, and this last has usually been termed a "summary conviction." Blair v. Commonwealth (Va.) 25 Grat. 850, 853 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict.).

"Conviction" is usually defined as the legal proceedings of record which ascertain the guilt of a party and on which the sentence of judgment is founded. Bouv. Law

Dict. The term is sometimes applied to finding a person guilty by verdict of a jury, and is sometimes used to denote final judgment. People v. Rodrigo, 11 Pac. 481, 484, 69 Cal. 601 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 223); White v. Commonwealth, 79 Va. 611, 615; Fanning v. State, 2 S. W. 70, 71, 47 Ark. 442.

The word "convicted" has a well-defined meaning. Webster defines the word as the past participle of the verb "to convict," which means "to prove or find guilty of an offense or crime charged," and Bouvier defines it to mean "the finding of a person guilty of an offense." Egan v. Jones, 32 Pac. 929, 930, 21 Nev. 433.

A "conviction" is an adjudication that the accused is guilty. It imports all that the statute requires before holding one to bail, and more. It involves not only the corpus delicti and the probable guilt of the accused, but the actual guilt. Nason v. Staples, 48 Me. 123, 127.

"Conviction," as its composition, "convincio, convictio," sufficiently indicates, signifies the act of convicting or overcoming one, and in criminal procedure the overthrow of the defendant by the establishment of his guilt by some known legal mode. These modes are, first, by the plea of guilty, and, second, by the verdict of a jury. United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 6 Fed. 152, 153.

A "conviction" is the finding of guilt. As is said by Gray, J., in Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 12 Am. Rep. 699, the ordinary meaning of "conviction," when used to designate a particular stage of a criminal prosecution triable by a jury, is the confession of the accused in open court, or the verdict returned against him by the jury. People v. Adams, 95 Mich. 543, 55 N. W. 461.

The phrase "on conviction of such refusal," in a statute authorizing grand jurors, on the refusal of witnesses to appear and testify, to require a justice to commit to jail such witnesses on conviction of such refusal, does not mean on conviction of an offense after trial, but simply meant on being convinced of such refusal in any satisfactory manner, and especially by the persistence of the witness in his refusal. In re Clark, 31 Atl. 522, 523, 65 Conn. 17, 28 L. R. A. 242.

Accusation and trial included.

As used in Pen. Code, § 497, declaring that a defendant doing the acts outlined by that section shall be "convicted and punished" in the same manner as if such larceny or receiving had been committed in this state, the word "punish" refers to the penalty to be affixed to the crime; but the word "convicted" is much broader in meaning, and includes the accusation and the trial, and hence gives jurisdiction to the courts in the states. People v. Black, 54 Pac. 385, 386, 122 Cal. 73.

Const. art. 4, § 10, declaring that any person who may be "convicted" of having given or offered a bribe to procure his election or appointment to office shall be disqualified to hold any office of trust or profit in the state, means when a person has been indicted by a grand jury, tried by a court and jury, and found guilty of the offense charged in the indictment. Egan v. Jones, 32 Pac. 929, 930, 21 Nev. 433.

As after judgment.

When the law speaks of "conviction," it means a judgment, and not merely a verdict, which in common parlance is called a "conviction." Smith v. Commonwealth, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 69, 70.

"Conviction" is used in different senses. In its most common use it signified the finding of the jury that the prisoner is guilty, but it is frequently used as implying a judgment and sentence of the court on a verdict or confession. As used in Gen. St. c. 131, § 13, providing that the "conviction" of any crime may be shown to affect the credibility of a witness, etc., it means a judgment of the court. Commonwealth v. Gorham, 99 Mass. 420, 422. See, also, Marion v. State, 20 N. W. 289, 295, 16 Neb. 349; Barker v. Almy, 39 Atl. 185, 20 R. I. 367; Hackett v. Freeman, 72 N. W. 528, 529, 103 Iowa, 296.

While in its ordinary sense the word "conviction" is used to indicate the ascertainment of the guilt of the prisoner by his plea of guilty or by the verdict of the jury, it is often used in a broader sense to include the sentence of judgment of the court. At common law persons who had been convicted of certain crimes were disqualified from testifying as witnesses, but the "conviction" contemplated by the common-law rule included the sentence or judgment of the court, and was satisfied with nothing less. State v. Barnes, 24 Fla. 153, 4 South. 560. Such is its use in Rev. St. § 1096, relating to the competency of witnesses. Bishop v. State, 26 South. 703, 41 Fla. 522. See, also, Keithler v. State, 18 Miss. (10 Smedes & M.) 192, 236. So, too, in Code Cr. Proc. art. 730, declaring that a "conviction" of a felony renders the convict incompetent to testify. Arcia v. State, 9 S. W. 685, 686, 26 Tex. App. 193. And in Code, § 832, declaring that persons "convicted" of a crime are, notwithstanding competent witnesses. Sacia v. Decker (N. Y.) 1 Civ. Proc. R. 47, 56.

"After conviction," in a clause of the Constitution giving the Governor power to grant pardons after conviction for all offenses, means after conviction by the verdict and the judgment of the court. The court says: "You have a conviction of the truth of the Christian religion; that is, that you are convinced of it. The jury has a conviction of the prisoner's guilt according to the evidence, and the prisoner is said to be 'convicted' by the verdict. The court has a conviction of the prisoner's guilt according to the verdict of the jury and according to the law of the case, and pronounces sentence; and the prisoner is then fully convicted according to the law and facts. By the corruptibility of the meaning of the words in our language, a verdict of guilty signifies the conviction of the prisoner, and the judgment of the court also signifies the conviction of the prisoner. In this sense we say of prisoners confined in the penitentiary that they are 'convicts'; that they are 'under conviction' by the sentence of the law." State v. Alexander, 76 N. O. 231, 235, 22 Am. Rep. 675. And such was held to be its meaning, as used in Const. art. 3, § 6, providing that the Governor can only pardon a criminal "after conviction," though it was said that perhaps it has not been generally held that, in order to constitute a conviction, the judgment should be actually entered before the pardon can be imposed. Smith v. State, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 637, 639.

Under a statute providing that every person who shall willfully and corruptly swear falsely shall upon conviction be adjudged guilty of perjury, and shall not thereafter be received as a witness, one who has been indicted and put on trial for perjury and found guilty by a jury, and is awaiting sentence upon the verdict, is not "convicted" so as to render him incompetent as a witness. There is no conviction merely upon the finding of a question of fact, but there must be also the judgment of the court. Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 109, 25 Am. Rep. 148.

It has generally been held that the word "convicted" includes the final judgment, and that one who has been found guilty by the jury but has not yet been sentenced is not a "convicted" person. In Gallagher v. State, 10 Tex. App. 469, it is said that the word "convicted" has a definite signification in law. It means that a judgment of final condemnation has been pronounced against the accused. To say that a party had been "convicted," and then to add that he stood to his trial and that final judgment was entered against him, would be tautology. One is not convicted when he pleads guilty, but when judgment is rendered, within Act March, 1897, § 5, declaring that any boy under the age of 18 years convicted of any other felony than those punishable by death or imprisonment for 10 years or more, either upon a plea of guilty or upon trial, shall be committed to the state reform school. State v. Townley, 48 S. W. 833, 147 Mo. 205.

"Conviction," as used in Cr. Code, § 235, providing that each and every person convicted of certain crimes shall be deemed infamous and incapable of holding office, etc., means the judgment on a verdict of guilty, and not the verdict alone. Faunce v. People, 51 Ill. 311, 312.

The term "conviction," as used in St. 1887, c. 392, providing that the conviction of a person licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, for violation of the provisions relating to such sale, shall make void his license, means a final judgment conclusively establishing such person's guilt, though such is not the meaning of the word in its most ordinary sense. Commonwealth v. Kiley, 23 N. E. 55, 150 Mass. 325.

In Acts 1883, c. 3459, § 2, fixing the conviction fees of state attorneys and of government solicitors, the term "conviction" is used in the sense of "judgment" or "sentence pronounced." State v. Barnes, 4 South. 560, 561, 24 Fla. 153.

"Convicted," as used in Code, c. 195, § 19, which declares that, except where it is otherwise expressly provided, a person convicted of a felony shall not be a witness unless he has been pardoned or punished, and a person convicted of perjury shall not be a witness though pardoned and punished, means "adjudged guilty." Blair v. Commonwealth (Va.) 25 Grat. 850, 858.

The word "conviction" is sometimes used as meaning the verdict of a jury, and at other times in its more strictly legal sense for the sentence of the court. Under a statute rendering overseers of the poor of a parish liable to informers on conviction of persons informed against, the overseers in office when the judgment was pronounced are liable. Burgess v. Boetefeur, 7 Man. & G. 481, 504.

In common parlance the word "convicted" "is taken to mean the verdict at the time of the trial, but in strict legal sense it is used to denote the judgment of the court." Francis v. Weaver, 25 Atl. 413, 415, 76 Md. 457.

Chief Justice Marshall defines "conviction" as a "technical term applicable to judgment in a criminal prosecution." Amidon v. Smith, 1 Wheat. 461, 4 L. Ed. 132. It may be true that "conviction" ordinarily signifies the finding of a verdict of guilty, but it also sometimes denotes the final judgment of the court; and, in support of personal liberty and a right of appeal, the latter meaning may be given it. Hill v. State, 41 Tex. 253, 255.

As after verdict of jury.

When it is said that one is "convicted," the meaning usually is not that sentence has been pronounced, but only that the verdict has been rendered; so a plea of guilty by the defendant constitutes a "conviction." Lord Coke distinguishes thus: "The difference between a man 'attainted' and 'convicted' is that a man is said to be 'convict' before he hath judgment, as if a man be convicted by confession, verdict, or recreancy; and when he hath his judgment on verdict, confession, or recreancy, or upon outlawry or adjuration, then he is said to be 'attainted.' Quintard v. Knoedler, 53 Conn. 487, 2 Atl. 752, 55 Am. Rep. 149.

The term "convicted," as used in the Constitution, declaring that the power of pardoning offenses, except such as persons may be "convicted" of before the Senate by an impeachment of the House, shall be in the Governor, meant a verdict, and did not necessarily include a judgment, the term being used in its ordinary meaning at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 325, 12 Am. Rep. 699. Such is its meaning in Const. art. 4, § 5, authorizing the Governor to grant reprieves and pardons "after conviction." Blair v. Commonwealth (Va.) 25 Grat. 850, 852. So, also, in a like provision in Const. art. 3, § 6. Parker v. State, 53 S. W. 1092, 1093, 103 Tenn. 547. And in Const. art. 5, § 8, authorizing the Governor "after conviction" to grant commutation for all offenses except certain defined ones. Ex parte Collins, 6 S. W. 345, 346, 94 Mo. 22.

Within the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness may be impeached by evidence that he has been convicted of a felony, a person may be said to be "convicted" where a jury has rendered a verdict of guilty, though he has not yet been sentenced. Thus Blackstone, after speaking of the verdict of acquittal, says: "But if the jury find him guilty, he is then to be convicted of the crime whereof he stands indicted, which conviction may accrue two ways—either by his confessing the offense and pleading guilty, or being found so by the verdict of his country;" and the words "convicted" and "conviction" are used in the Penal Code in such sense. Thus Pen. Code, § 1151, provides a general verdict upon the plea of not guilty is either guilty or not guilty, which imports an acquittal or conviction of the offense charged in the indictment. Section 1157 provides that, whenever the crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must, etc. People v. Ward, 66 Pac. 372, 374, 134 Cal. 301.

As used in a statute providing that all persons shall be bailable, unless after conviction for any crime or offense punishable with death or hard labor, the term "after conviction" signifies after the verdict of a jury finding the accused guilty. State ex rel. Butler v. Moise, 18 South. 943, 947, 48 La. Ann. 109, 35 L. R. A. 701.

In Const. Or. art. 2, § 3, which declares that the privilege of an elector shall be forfeited by a conviction of any crime which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, the word "conviction" is employed in its primary and ordinary sense, and signifies a proving or finding that the defendant is guilty, either by the verdict of a jury or his plea to that effect, and does not embrace the sentence which falls thereon. United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 6 Fed. 152, 159.

An offer of reward for the "conviction" of a person charged with crime means the return of a verdict of guilty against such person, which is the meaning of the word in its popular sense. Wilmoth v. Hensel, 25 Atl. 86, 91, 151 Pa. 200, 31 Am. St. Rep. 738; Williams v. United States, 12 Ct. Cl. 192, 200.

Appeal as affecting.

As often used, the word "conviction" includes both the ascertaining of the guilt of the accused and judgment thereon by the court, and such is its use in Code 1873, § 3648, which permits evidence of a conviction for a felony to be given as affecting the credibility of a witness, but the taking of an appeal from the judgment does not annul it so as to prevent evidence thereof from being given to affect the credibility of the convicted person. Hackett v. Freeman, 72 N. W. 528, 529, 103 Iowa, 296.

"After conviction," as used in Const. art. 1, § 13, authorizing the Governor to pardon a criminal after conviction, means after a verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty, and the Governor was authorized to pardon the criminal after a judgment of conviction has been entered against him, notwithstanding the defendant had taken an appeal from the judgment to the Supreme Court; and it is not necessary that the defendant should abandon his appeal in order to render the pardon valid, since the appeal did not vacate the sentence or judgment against the defendant, and therefore it cannot be contended that there was no conviction remaining to support the pardon after the defendant had taken his appeal. State v. Alexander, 76 N. C. 231, 233, 22 Am. Rep. 675.

Under Wag. St. p. 465, § 67, providing that every person who shall be "convicted" of arson, burglary, robbery, or larceny shall be incompetent to be sworn as a witness, a person is disqualified who had been sentenced to the penitentiary, though the sentence had been suspended by an appeal to the Supreme Court, since the order of supersedeas did not remove or suspend the disqualification. Ritter v. Democratic Press Co., 68 Mo. 458, 461.

"Conviction" means the verdict of the jury finding the party guilty, and does not refer to the termination of the legal proceedings. So a party is said to be "convicted" immediately after a verdict of guilty, though there may at the time be proceedings on appeal still pending. Quintard v. Knoedler, 2 Atl. 752, 754, 53 Conn. 485, 55 Am. Rep. 149.

Without deciding that a writ of error and supersedeas rendered the conviction less than the essential final judicial action to constitute a "conviction," a prosecution for a second offense, the penalty for which was greater on account of a former conviction, was continued until determination of the writ of error. White v. Commonwealth, 79 Va. 611, 615.

Attainted distinguished.

"The difference between a man 'attainted' and 'convicted' is that a man is said to be a 'convict' before he hath judgment, as if a man be convict by confession, verdict, or recusance; and, when he hath his judgment on the verdict, he is said to be 'attainted.'" It is further said: "By a conviction of a felon his goods and chattels are forfeited; but by attainder—that is, by judgment given—his lands and tenements are forfeited, and his blood corrupted, and not before." 1 Inst. 391. In Jacob's Law Dictionary it is said: "Attainder of a criminal is larger than conviction. A man is 'convicted' when he is found guilty or confesses the crime before judgment had, but not 'attainted' until judgment is passed on him." This is the technical common-law definition of the word "convict" or "convicted". A felon was "convicted" by the verdict of a jury; he was "attainted" by the judgment rendered on the verdict. Shepherd v. People (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 388, 401; Ex parte Brown, 8 Pac. 829, 830, 68 Cal. 176.

As conviction in state court.

The term "conviction," as used in a provision that "no reward shall be paid except after the conviction of the person engaged in the robbery of, or in the attempt to rob, any persons having charge of any conveyance engaged at the time in conveying passengers," etc., a conviction in the state court was referred to. There was no intention to aid the United States government in the arrest and conviction of its criminals. Sias v. Hallock, 14 Nev. 332, 335.

As conviction on direct proceeding.

1 Rev. St. (6th Ed.) p. 420, § 40, subd. 5, declaring that the office shall become vacant in case the incumbent shall be "convicted of an infamous crime," means a conviction by direct proceeding against the incumbent on criminal indictment. People v. Thornton (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 456, 465.

As conviction in penal action.

Act 1807, § 23, made the offense of altering or defacing the marks or brands of any hogs punishable by a fine of $20 and by whipping, and the twenty-fourth section provided that if any person should be "convicted" of branding a hog not his own he should be punished by a fine of $20 for every hog so branded. Held, that the word "convicted" meant convicted on the trial of a penal action for the recovery of the penalty, and did not mean a previous conviction on the indictment when no punishment was affixed to the offense except a forfeiture to the party aggrieved. Reagh v. Spann (Ala.) 3 Stew. 100, 107.

The word "conviction" and the word "offense" are legally pertinent to criminal rather than to civil proceedings. Although the words were used in a statute for a penalty or forfeiture, it was held that a qui tam action brought under such a statute was a civil action, and might be appealed as such. Canfield v. Mitchell, 43 Conn. 169, 172.

Criminal proceedings implied.

The use of the term "conviction," in a statute providing that any county treasurer failing to comply with the requirements of this section shall upon conviction thereof be punished, indicated that the proceedings against him should be on the criminal and not on the civil side of the court, the word "conviction" being used in law to designate certain stages and extent in a criminal prosecution. In re Howe, 37 Pac. 536, 537, 26 Or. 181.

The term "conviction," as used in the Rhode Island statute enacting that, if any prisoner for debt shall be convicted of having disposed of any part of his estate contrary to his oath or affirmation made for the purpose of securing his discharge, he shall not only be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury, but shall receive no benefit from such oath, is a technical term applicable to a judgment on a criminal prosecution, and not to a proceeding on a poor debtor's bond. Ammidon v. Smith, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 447, 461, 4 L. Ed. 132.

Decision of police commissioners.

In ordinary phrase, the meaning of the word "conviction" is the finding of the jury of a verdict that the accused is guilty, but in legal parlance it often denotes the final judgment of the court. To shut a person from the witness box because of conviction, guilt must be shown by the judgment. Until a person found guilty of forgery by an order of the jury has received judgment and sentence from the court, he is not incompetent to speak as a witness. Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 25 Am. Rep. 148. So, also, Schiffer v. Pruden, 64 N. Y. 47, 52; Sacia v. Decker (N. Y.) 1 Civ. Proc. R. 47, 56. The decision of police commissioners finding a policeman guilty of certain crimes is not a conviction within the meaning of the law authorizing evidence of a conviction to be introduced as affecting the credibility of a witness. People v. Sullivan, 54 N. Y. Supp. 538, 541, 34 App. Div. 544.

Escape before trial as affecting.

Rev. Code, p. 159, § 6, providing that the Supreme Court may strike from the rolls any attorney who shall have been convicted of any felony, means an actual "conviction" in its strict legal sense, and an attorney cannot be struck from the rolls under this section merely because it has been proved that he has passed counterfeit notes, knowing them to be such, been indicted therefor, confined in jail, and escaped before trial. State v. Foreman, 3 Mo. 602, 603.

Judgment and sentence distinguished.

The ordinary legal meaning of "conviction," when used to designate a particular stage of a criminal prosecution triable by a jury, is the confession of the accused in open court, or the verdict returned against him by the jury which ascertains and publishes the fact of his guilt; while "judgment" or "sentence" is the appropriate word to denote the action of the court, before which the trial is had, declaring the consequences to the convict of the fact thus ascertained. Blackstone uniformly speaks of the verdict of a jury on a plea of not guilty as constituting the "conviction," even while the case is still open to a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment. He says, if the jury find a prisoner guilty, he is then said to be "convicted" of the crime whereof he stands indicted, which conviction may accrue two ways, either by his confessing the offense of being guilty, or by his being found so by the verdict of his country. He also says there is a great difference between a man "convicted" and "attainted," though they are frequently, through inaccuracy, confounded together. After conviction only, a man is liable to none of these disabilities, for there is still in contemplation of law a possibility of his innocence. 4 Bl. Comm. 362 et seq. Mr. Dane, who was admitted to the bar before the adoption of the Constitution, and was peculiarly learned in the law of his time, says a man is "convict" by a verdict, but not "attainted" before judgment. Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 325, 12 Am. Rep. 699 (citing 6 Dane, Ab. 534); State v. Henson, 50 Atl. 468, 470, 66 N. J. Law. 601; State ex rel. Butler v. Moise, 18 South. 943, 948, 48 La. Ann. 109, 35 L. R. A. 701; Munkley v. Hoyt, 60 N. E. 413, 179 Mass. 108; People v. Adams, 55 N. W. 461, 95 Mich. 541; Bugbee v. Boyce, 35 Atl. 330, 331, 68 Vt. 311.

"The word 'conviction,' as used in Pen. Code, § 1272, providing that after conviction of an offense not punishable with death a defendant who has appealed may be admitted to bail, signifies a finding by the jury of a verdict that the accused is guilty. Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 348, says: 'A "conviction," in ordinary legal language, consists of a plea or verdict of guilty, and it is immaterial whether final judgment has been rendered thereon.' And while the word may be used as signifying the sentence pronounced upon the verdict or the record of conviction, including, inter alia, the verdict and sentence, still such meaning ought not to be attributed to it unless there is something in the context to indicate that it was used in this sense." In explanation of the foregoing, the court adds that there can be conviction by other modes than by the verdict of a jury, as by plea of guilty, etc. Ex parte Brown, 8 Pac. 829, 830, 68 Cal. 176.

The term "conviction" may refer to the judgment or sentence of a court declaring the punishment of the defendant in a criminal prosecution, but it ordinarily refers to the ascertainment of the defendant's guilt. Bugbee v. Boyce, 35 Atl. 330, 331, 68 Vt. 311.

To indicate the successful prosecution of a party charged with crime, we almost invariably use the phrase, "He has been convicted and sentenced," both ingredients being necessary to accomplish the final result. They are distinct acts or processes towards a result. The one is the act of the jury, the other of the court without the jury. They are expressed by appropriated and well-understood terms, and, while it is possible that the result of the co-operation of both may be expressed by the simple term "conviction," yet this is far from the ordinary use of that word. In summary convictions, where the act of conviction and sentence is one and the same, it is quite proper to hold that the conviction is complete without sentence. They are indivisible. It is the sentence that discloses the conviction. York County v. Dalhausen, 45 Pa. 372, 375.

Judgment for contempt.

A judgment imposing a fine for contempt is a conviction within Const. art. 3, § 6, providing that the Governor shall have power to grant, reprieve, and pardon after conviction, except in cases of impeachment. Sharp v. State, 49 S. W. 752, 753, 102 Tenn. 9, 43 L. R. A. 788, 73 Am. St. Rep. 851.

A "conviction" means the adjudging of a person guilty of an offense by a court or other authority of competent jurisdiction. Thus when the House of Commons adjudged a person in contempt, or an act to be a contempt or breach of privilege, their adjudication is a "conviction," and their commitment in consequence is an "execution." Ex parte Kearney, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.) 38, 44, 5 L. Ed. 391.

Judgment of divorce.

"Conviction," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 146, § 48, depriving a wife who has been convicted of adultery of her right of dower in her husband's real estate, does not mean only the establishing her adultery as a fact by proof, but is charged with the fuller meaning that, on the proof and finding or verdict of her adultery, the court has given judgment of divorce against her, and dissolved the marriage between her and the husband. Schiffer v. Pruden, 64 N. Y. 47, 50.

As judgment on each count.

"Conviction" is the finding of a person guilty of an offense. It is the final consummation of every step in the procedure from the indictment to the judgment. Where a defendant was found guilty on two counts in an indictment, and was sentenced for both offenses, the judgment sentencing defendant constituted two "convictions," within the meaning of the statute allowing a prosecuting attorney a fee for each conviction. Hempstead County v. McCollum, 24 S. W. 2, 58 Ark. 159.

Order of deportation of Chinese.

The term "convicted and adjudged," as used in Act Cong. May 5, 1892 (27 Stat. 25, c. 60 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1319]), declaring that any person of Chinese descent convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States shall be imprisoned and thereafter removed from the United States, means found or decided by a United States commissioner representing, not the criminal law, but the political department of the government. United States v. Hing Quong Chow (U. S.) 53 Fed. 233, 234.

Within the Chinese Exclusion Act, § 13 (Act Cong. Sept. 13, 1888, 25 Stat. 479 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1317]), "provided that any Chinese person convicted before a commissioner of any United States court may within ten days after such conviction appeal to the judge of the District Court for the district," the word "conviction" refers to an order that the Chinese person in question shall be removed from the United States to the country from whence he came, and does not refer to any "conviction," in the proper sense of the word, of a criminal offense. In re Crow Loy (U. S.) 110 Fed. 952, 953.

Plea of guilty or nolo contendere.

A "conviction," within the meaning of the statute which imposes a heavier penalty on a conviction for a second offense, is not to be construed as limited merely to convictions had after trial by jury, but includes as well a conviction of guilt on a plea of guilty, and authorizes an imposition of such heavier penalty where the defendant has once pleaded guilty and thereafter been convicted. People v. Adams, 55 N. W. 461, 95 Mich. 541.

A person who makes a plea of guilty is "convicted," within an act providing that the license of a pharmacist may be revoked for the illegal sale of liquor, but not until he has been convicted in a court. Munkley v. Hoyt, 30 N. E. 413, 179 Mass. 103.

The term "convicted" means that a man has been found guilty of a crime, or has confessed such crime before judgment. Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 403, 419.

A defendant who has been sentenced on a plea of nolo contendere is deemed "convicted," within Gen. Laws, c. 233, § 18, which provides that a person convicted of larceny shall be liable to the owner of the goods, etc., a plea of nolo contendere being an implied confession of guilt. Barker v. Almy, 39 Atl. 185, 20 R. I. 367.

In the strictest sense, a "conviction" is not complete until it has become a judgment of the court by a sentence, since before that time a verdict may be set aside or a new trial granted for various causes. The term is commonly used, however, to denote the finding of fact that the accused is guilty. A plea of nolo contendere does not amount to a conviction. Doughty v. De Amoreel, 46 Atl. 838, 22 R. I. 158.

Mill. & V. Code, § 5526, provides that any civil officer who shall arrest and prosecute to conviction any person guilty of carrying a bowie knife shall be entitled to $50. Certain policemen arrested defendant in the first instance for the specific offense charged, furnished the evidence by their own testimony upon which he was indicted, and by standing ready to testify against him on trial induced him to plead guilty. Held, that the defendant had been "arrested and prosecuted to conviction," within the meaning of the statute, in as full a sense as though the state had established its case by the fullest proof. Porterfield v. State, 21 S. W. 519, 520, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 289.

A conviction under an indictment to which a defendant has pleaded guilty operates in legal effect as a conviction for any offense provable against him under the indictment. Such a plea is a record admission of whatever is well alleged in the indictment. People v. Satchwell, 70 N. Y. Supp. 307, 309, 61 App. Div. 312.

Suspension of sentence as affecting.

"When it is said that there has been a 'conviction,' the meaning usually is, not that the sentence has been pronounced, but that the verdict has been returned." "Conviction may accrue in two ways, either by his confessing the offense and pleading guilty, or by his being found so by the verdict of the country." 4 Bl. Comm. 362. In People v. Goldstein, 32 Cal. 432, it was held that a plea of guilty on which no judgment was given was nevertheless a conviction. Mr. Justice Gray says, in Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 325, 12 Am. Rep. 699, that: "When the word 'conviction' is used to describe the effect of the guilt of the accused as judicially proved in one case when pleaded or given in evidence in another."

er, it is sometimes used in a more comprehensive sense, including the judgment of the court on the verdict or confession of guilt, but, when used to designate a particular stage of criminal prosecution triable by a jury, is the confession of the accused in open court or the verdict rendered against him by the jury which ascertains and publishes the fact of his guilt; while 'judgment' or 'sentence' is the appropriate word to denote the action of the court before which the trial is had, declaring the consequences to the convict of the facts thus ascertained." A plea of guilty, followed by a suspension of sentence, amounts to a "conviction," within section 23 of the liquor tax law, providing that no person convicted of felony shall be authorized to sell liquors under a liquor tax certificate. People v. Lyman, 68 N. Y. Supp. 331, 334, 33 Misc. Rep. 243; Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 325, 12 Am. Rep. 699.

"Conviction," as used in the offer of a reward for information which should lead to the conviction of a person engaged in operating an illicit distillery, was not used in a technical sense, requiring judgment to be rendered on a verdict of guilty, but it is sufficient if the party was found guilty of the offense charged by the verdict of a jury, though judgment was suspended on the verdict on motion of the district attorney. (Williams v. United States, 12 Ct. Cl. 192, 200); or though sentence is indefinitely postponed (Wilmoth v. Hensel, 25 Atl. 86, 91, 151 Pa. 200, 31 Am. St. Rep. 738).

CONVICTED A SECOND TIME.

Under a statute providing for an increased punishment where a person is convicted a second time of felony, it is held that the phrase "convicted a second time" refers only to felonies committed subsequent to the date of the conviction relied on to increase the penalty. Huyser v. Commonwealth, 76 S. W. 174, 177, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 608.

CONVINCE.

See "Reasonably Convinced."

To "convince" is primarily to "overcome" or "subdue," and, in logic, "to satisfy the mind by proof." When one is "convinced" he cannot be more convinced. If evidence is convincing, it is sufficient in any case, and to say it ought to be "more convincing" in one case than in another is giving the word degrees of comparison when the word itself is superlative. Evans v. Rugee, 16 N. W. 49, 50, 57 Wis. 623.

The statement that in a criminal case the jury must "be convinced beyond doubt" means that "the evidence must be such that the reason sees no doubt left of the defendant's guilt. The law does not deal with doubts that the imagination may conjure up. The mind may not run outside the evidence in search for doubts; the reason must detect and point them out in the evidence alone, and direct the mind to stop short of being convinced. When the mind so hesitates from conviction, there exists a reasonable doubt. If, on the other hand, the mind rests satisfied and convinced, all reasonable doubt is removed. It is that condition of mind which leads reasonable men in the common affairs of life to act with confidence, and not to pause and hesitate and say, 'I am not satisfied,' after a consideration of all the facts bearing on the proposition." Territory v. Barth, 15 Pac. 673, 676, 2 Ariz. 319.

CONVINCING PROOF.

"Convincing proof" may be said to be that degree of certainty required to sustain a given postulate. French v. Day, 36 Atl. 909, 89 Me. 441.

The statement that the party alleging fraud or mistake is bound to prove his allegation by "clear and convincing" evidence means that the evidence which tends to prove the alleged fraud or mistake, if standing alone and uncontradicted, would establish a prima facie case of fraud or mistake. Ward v. Waterman, 24 Pac. 930, 934, 85 Cal. 488.

A higher and more satisfactory character of proof is required to establish that an instrument or conveyance is not what it purports to be than is necessary in ordinary civil cases, some of the courts declaring that in some cases the proof must be "clear," some that it must be "convincing," some that it must be "satisfactory," and still some that it must be "clear of all reasonable doubt." These substantially convey the same idea, and require the same degree of proof. And a general rule that facts must be established by a "fair preponderance of the proof" means that the proof must be clear of all reasonable doubt. Winston v. Burnell, 24 Pac. 477, 478, 44 Kan. 367, 21 Am. St. Rep. 289.

CONVOY.

See "Sail with Convoy."

COOKING STOVE.

A cooking stove is an article of household furniture, calculated for no other use, and is not an article of ornament or luxury, but is a necessary. Though of modern invention, it is in the present state of the country as necessary as any other article of household furniture. A cooking stove is an article of household furniture necessary for upholding life, within the meaning of the statute exempting certain articles of personal property from attachment and execution. Crocker v. Spencer (Vt.) 2 D. Chip. 68, 15 Am. Dec. 652.

COOLER.

A "cooler," as used in connection with a packing house, consists of two or more rooms at least, one of which is refrigerated, the temperature being kept down from about 34 to 40 degrees Fahrenheit. Fresh meat is taken from the packing house and placed in this refrigerating room for sale to the butchers in a city where the cooler is located. At each cooler is a cooler manager in charge thereof, and one or more city solicitors. As a rule, the butcher goes to the cooler and inspects the meat, and if it suits he purchases it, and he pays therefor at the cooler. State ex Inf. Crow v. Armour Packing Co., 73 S. W. 645, 649, 173 Mo. 356, 96 Am. St. Rep. 515.

COOLING TIME.

"Cooling time," in the law of homicide, means such time as would give the blood reasonable time or opportunity to cool. In re McWhirt (Va.) 3 Grat. 504, 606, 46 Am. Dec. 196.

Cooling time "is time for the mind to become so calm and sedate as that it is supposed to contemplate, comprehend, and coolly act with reference to the consequences likely to ensue." Eanes v. State, 10 Tex. App. 421, 447.

"Cooling time," in the law of homicide, is that time lapsing after an assault upon or injury to another during which it is to be presumed that the latter has had ample opportunity to hear the voice of reason and humanity, so that, if he afterwards kill the one making the assault or inflicting the injury, it is reasonable to attribute such action to deliberate revenge. May v. People, 6 Pac. 816, 822, 8 Colo. 210.

"Cooling time" is a term used in criminal law to designate the time in which a man of ordinary prudence would so far recover from the effect of a provocation or assault that it could not be said that the act was the spontaneous result of the provocation or assault. Keiser v. Smith, 71 Ala. 481, 483, 46 Am. Rep. 312.

In holding under the facts, as a matter of law, that there had been a sufficient cooling time, which would preclude the defendant in homicide from the defense that the crime was committed in heat of passion, rendering the crime manslaughter, and not murder, Keiser v. Smith, 71 Ala. 481, 485, 46 Am. Rep. 312, held that the criterion is not how many days or hours had elapsed since provocation was given, although this is a consideration of vast significance in ascertaining the main inquiry. What constitutes a sufficiency of cooling time of any provocation is necessarily a question of law, and not of fact, the court being required to decide it preliminary to the admission or exclusion of evidence offered in mitigation. Ragland v. State, 27 South. 983, 987, 125 Ala. 12.

The statute fixes no time in which an excited mind is required to become cool and sedate. This question must depend upon the facts attendant upon the particular case. An instruction in a prosecution for murder, in which the question of "cooling time" is made a matter of law—that is, if a sufficient length of time, under the circumstances of the case, has elapsed for the mind to cool, as a matter of law it must be cool—was error, as the condition of the mind at the time of a homicide is a question of fact, and it is fundamental in this state that the jury should view the homicide as nearly as possible as did the accused at the time he committed the act.—Jones v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 492, 499, 26 S. W. 1082, 1086, 47 Am. St. Rep. 46.

COOPER.

A "cooper" is a seaman in contemplation of law, though he has peculiar duties on board ship. He is so treated in the shipping articles, and is, like common seamen, bound to do ordinary ship's duty, such as standing watch, assisting in navigation, handling sails, etc. He receives an extraordinary compensation for his duties as cooper, not as superseding, but as adding to, the common seaman's duty. United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 102.

CO-OPERATE—CO-OPERATION.

In the case of Hoffman v. Young, 2 Fed. 74, the court clearly defines the meaning of "co-operation," and says the courts do not mean merely acting together or simultaneously, but unitedly to a common end, a unitary result. Each and every part must have its subfunction to perform, and each must have a certain relation to or dependence upon the other. Paul Boynton Co. v. Morris Chute Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 440, 444.

Servants may be directly "co-operating" with each other in a particular business; in the same line of employment, and yet not be such that their duties bring them into habitual association, so that they may exercise a mutual influence over each other, promotive of proper caution. Swisher v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 182 Ill. 533, 547, 55 N. E. 555, 556.

The term "co-operation," in the patent law, does not mean acting together, but united to a common end. Holmes Burglar Alarm Telegraph Co. v. Domestic Telegraph & Telephone Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 220, 227 (citing Birdsall v. McDonald, 1 Ban. & A. 165).

A general rule of patent law requires that separate inventions should be separately patented, but an exception to the rule is happily expressed in the statement that distinct inventions may be joined in the same patent where they "co-operate" in the use of the same article. Thus separate machines may be included in the same patent, though distinct and independent, where each is the same as the other in the accomplishment of the same general end, or which co-operate to accomplish a single result. Wilkins Shoe-Button Fastener Co. v. Webb (U. S.) 89 Fed. 982, 987.

CO-OPERATIVE.

"Co-operative," within the title of an act requiring cheese factories on the co-operative plan to give bond, sufficiently describes the business referred to in the act, though it is carried on by the dividend plan, as the term "co-operative" means promoting the same end, helping, acting together to accomplish the same end; whereby it seems to describe the business transacted both by those who manufacture the cheese and those who furnish the milk to be manufactured. They all promote the same end, and hence are co-operative; the farmers by furnishing the milk, and the others by manufacturing the product. Hawthorne v. People, 109 Ill. 302, 313, 50 Am. Rep. 610.

CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION.

"In a broad sense all associations, whether corporations or partnerships, are 'co-operative,' if all the members, either by their labor or capital or both, co-operate to a common purpose. There is, undoubtedly, in the popular use of the terms, a more limited sense, though the precise limits are not well defined. There is no legal, as distinguishable from their popular, signification. In the Century Dictionary the term 'co-operative society' is defined as a union of individuals, commonly laborers, or small capitalists, framed for the prosecution in common of a productive enterprise, the profits being shared in accordance with the amount of capital or labor contributed by each member." Finnegan v. Noerenberg, 53 N. W. 1150, 1151, 52 Minn. 239, 18 L. R. A. 773, 38 Am. St. Rep. 552.

CO-OPERATIVE INSURANCE COMPANY.

As charity, see "Charity."

COPARTNERS.

All partners are copartners, but all copartners are not partners. Whether they are partners or not depends on the nature of the act performed, and the kind and scope of the business in which the act was done; and, in determining whether there is a joint interest in the contract, the benefit accruing from the contract has an important bearing. Dumanoise v. Townsend, 45 N. W. 179, 180, 80 Mich. 302.

COPARTNERSHIP.

See, also, "Partnership."

A copartnership is a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, with the understanding that there shall be a communion of profits thereof between them. Lott v. Young (U. S.) 109 Fed. 798, 802.

A copartnership is, in its essence, a contract of agency. Each partner is the general agent of the firm, and the firm is the agent of each partner, with power to bind him to a personal liability in favor of partnership creditors. This agency continues only so long as the partnership continues, and on the dissolution of the partnership, as by the withdrawal of a member or otherwise, the agency terminates. Lapenta v. Lettieri, 44 Atl. 730, 732, 72 Conn. 377, 77 Am. St. Rep. 315.

CO-PARTY.

The word "co-parties," as used in Code, § 551, requiring that coparties to the judgment appealed from shall join or be notified, means parties to the judgment appealed from, not coplaintiffs or codefendants to the action. Logan v. Logan, 77 Ind. 558, 560.

Under a statute of Indiana, providing that a part of several co-parties may appeal, etc., the word "co-parties" means co-parties to the judgment, and not co-parties plaintiff or defendant, either on the complaint or cross-complaint. Gregory v. Smith, 38 N. E. 395, 396, 139 Ind. 48 (citing Hadley v. Hill, 73 Ind. 442); Hildebrand v. Sattley Mfg. Co., 57 N. E. 594, 595, 25 Ind. App. 218; Inman v. Vogel, 40 N. E. 665, 666, 141 Ind. 133.

COPPER.

The word "copper," as used by a witness in a prosecution for burglary, while reciting the words of one of the burglars in a conversation with the nightwatchman who detected him, in which the burglar was alleged to have said "Don't tell the 'coppers,'" signifies "policeman." People v. Connor, 22 N. Y. Supp. 669, 670, 68 Hun, 78.

COPPER CASH.

A "cash" is a Chinese coin composed of copper and lead, and copper and nickel, used in China as money by count, and as such is not entitled to importation duty free under Tariff Act July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 49), as "coins, gold, silver, and copper," unless it can be imported to be used as part of the currency of the United States. Crocker v. Redfield (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 835.

COPPER-FASTENED.

"Copper-fastened," in reference to a ship copper-fastened, means that all the bolts under the water which go through the keel, keelson, stern box, stern post, and stern should be copper. Freeman v. Baker, 5 Car. & P. 475, 476.

COPPERED SHIP.

A "coppered" ship is one which has the bottom of the keel and the sides of the keel, as well as the sides of the vessel, covered with copper. Hazard v. New England Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 934, 935.

Where insurance was effected in Boston on a ship from New York to the Pacific, and the letter ordering the insurance was written in New York by the owner of the ship, who resided there, and the letter represented that the ship was a coppered one, the word "coppered" meant such a ship as was known as a "coppered" one according to the usage and custom of the port of New York. Hazard's Adm'rs v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 557, 582, 8 L. Ed. 1043.

COPY.

See "Certified Copy"; "Complete Copy or Statement"; "Correct Copy"; "Exemplified Copy"; "Full Copy"; "Letterpress Copy"; "Office Copy"; "True Copy."

Attested copy, see "Attest—Attestation."
Every copy, see "Every."

The word "copy" is defined in Webster's Dictionary as a writing like another writing, a transcript from an original. In Bouvier's Law Dictionary a copy is a true transcript of an original writing. In the common and in the legal acceptation of the word, a "copy" is not an original. Kaalaea Plantation v. Balabola, 3 Haw. 818, 822; State v. Champion, 116 N. C. 987, 989, 21 S. E. 700; McCaig v. City Sav. Bank, 111 Mich. 356, 358, 69 N. W. 500.

A copy is a transcript of an original writing. The proof of records may be made by copy, and the copy may be of three kinds, and only three: (1) Exemplification; (2) copies made by an authorized officer; (3) sworn copies. Stamper v. Gay, 23 Pac. 69, 70, 3 Wyo. 322 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 501).

"A copy is a transcript from an original, whereas a certificate is a declaration in writing which, when under the hand and seal of the notary, becomes a protest." The word is used in such sense in St. 1841, c. 44, § 6, providing that all copies of certificates rendered by a notary public shall be under his hand and notarial seal, and shall be received as evidence of such transaction. Ticonic Bank v. Stackpole, 41 Me. 302, 305.

Abstract.

As a copy, see "Abstract."

Change of language or appearance as affecting.

A "copy of any print," as used in 17 Geo. III, c. 57, prohibiting the sale of a copy of any print, applies to a copy of a print in which there exists small variations from the original, a copy being deemed that which comes so near to the original as to give every person seeing it the idea created by the original. West v. Francis, 5 Barn. & Ald. 737.

A "copy" of a book, to be an infringement thereof, must be a transcript of the language in which the conceptions of the author are clothed; of something printed, and embodied in a tangible shape. The mere conceptions clothed in another language cannot constitute the same composition, and cannot be called a "copy." Stowe v. Thomas (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 201, 207.

Code, c. 130, § 5, providing that a "copy of any record or paper in the clerk's office of any court attested by the officer in whose office the same is may be admitted in evidence in lieu of the original," means that a "copy is a true transcript of an original writing," and hence a writing which is not a true transcript of a judgment is not a copy thereof. Dickinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390, 412.

Copy of law.

The language, "copies of * * * papers in his office," in a statute giving the Secretary of State a certain fee for every copy of a paper on file in his office, is broad enough to include copies of laws which are in the Secretary of State's office, unless its generality is otherwise restrained. This language is by other legislation so restrained and limited as to be incapable of a construction including "laws" among the "papers," copies of which the Secretary of State may make and charge for. State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 1, 40.

As copy of whole.

A certificate that a copy of a docket entry is a true "copy" is insufficient to show that it is a copy of the whole record, but rather the contrary. In most cases the language would be understood to mean something less than the whole. Undergraft v. Perry, 4 Pa. (4 Barr) 291, 294.

In ordinary parlance the word "copy" means, not a reproduction of only a portion of the thing copied, but of the whole of it. The Century Dictionary defines the word as follows: "A completed reproduction, or one of a set or number of reproductions, containing the same matter, or having the same form or appearance." Webster's Dictionary gives the following definition: "A writing like another writing, a transcript from an original; hence (2) any single book or set of books containing a composition resembling the original work, as the 'copy' of a deed, or of a bond, a 'copy' of Addison's works, etc." The Standard Dictionary defines "copy" as a "single book or set of books, or a sheet reproducing any literary composition; as a fully illustrated copy of Dante's Inferno, etc." Thus the word "copy," in a contract providing that a party thereto should turn over the plates and stock for binding of certain books, consisting of sets of two volumes, each, on the consideration of the payment of 20 cents "per copy," did not mean a single volume of the work, but a reproduction of the entire work. Johnson v. Weed-Parsons Printing Co., 74 N. Y. Supp. 373, 374, 36 Misc. Rep. 628.

A copy of an application for insurance, which does not contain a copy of the applicant's name appended thereto, is not a "copy" within the meaning of Rev. St. § 1945a, precluding an insurance company from proving the contents of such application, unless a copy is attached and made a part of the policy. The signature is a very material part of the instrument. The signature is the thing which gives force to the application, and, when signed with the knowledge of its contents, is conclusive upon the insured. Dunbar v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 72 Wis. 492, 497, 40 N. W. 386.

As duplicate original.

Duplicate distinguished, see "Duplicate."

In Bankr. Form (18 Sup. Ct. xx), directing that the "copy" of the petition in involuntary bankruptcy, together with a writ of subpoena, shall be served as therein provided, the term "copy" means duplicate original. In re Stevenson (U. S.) 94 Fed. 110, 116.

As an individual book.

"Copy" is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "an individual book, as a copy of the Bible"; and it is in this sense that the word "copies" is used in Rev. St. § 4962, requiring a notice of copyright to be inserted in the several copies of the edition of a copyrighted book. Pierce & Bushnell Mfg. Co. v. Werckmeister (U. S.) 72 Fed. 54, 57, 18 C. C. A. 431.

2 Wds. & P.—38

Original.

"Copy," as used in Code, § 550, requiring a "copy of appellant's case on appeal" to be left with appellee, is sufficiently complied with by a service of the original statement of the case, and it does not require that the same be a copy of it. McDaniel v. Scurlock, 20 S. E. 451, 115 N. O. 296.

Within the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1906, providing that a copy of judicial record of a foreign country may be admitted in evidence without the certificate of the clerk, if it be accompanied by the oral testimony of the witness that he had compared the copy with the original, etc., the stress is not laid upon the word "copy" so as to distinguish it from the original, and thus tending to show that the original must be introduced under the preceding section providing that a judicial record of the foreign country may be admitted in evidence when proved by the attestation of the clerk of the court. Wickersham v. Johnston, 38 Pac. 89, 90, 104 Cal. 407, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118.

Under a statute allowing the supervisor of elections a certain price for a "copy" of any paper on file, the words mean a copy certified and issued by the supervisor as a copy, not a duplicate printed copy of the original paper issued as an original document. Muirhead v. United States, 13 Ct. Cl. 251, 256.

Photograph.

"Copy," as used in Act Feb. 3, 1831 (4 Stat. 436), providing that any person who shall invent, design, etch, engrave, or work any print or engraving shall have the sole right and liberty of printing it, and that any person who shall engrave, etch, or work, sell, or copy the main design shall forfeit the plate on which it has been copied, should be construed to cover the photographic method. "Copy" is a general term, added to the more specific terms before used for the very purpose of covering methods of reproduction not included in the words "engrave, etch or work," and if it covers anything should cover the photographic method, which, more nearly than any other, produces a perfect "copy." Rossiter v. Hall (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1253; Rossiter v. Hall (N. Y.) 32 How. Prac. 226, 228.

Translation distinguished.

"Copy" is defined as a reproduction or imitation, as of a writing, printing, drawing, painting, or other work of art, so as to have another or others similar to the original. It is a document which is taken or written from another, as opposed to an original; and hence a translation in another language or dialect does not constitute a "copy." Rasmussen v. Baker, 50 Pac. 819, 825, 7 Wyo.

117, 38 L. R. A. 773 (citing Stowe v. Thomas [U. S.] 23 Fed. Cas. 201).

COPY OF ACCOUNT.

The "copy of account," as used in the statute requiring the copy of an account to be filed in certain cases in justice courts, "is a substitute for the bill of particulars directed in the practice act, and ought to be equally minute and particular, the same reasons subsisting in both cases;" and, in order to comply with the statute, must give the items of the account, and not a mere statement that the debt was due for merchandise per bill. Clark v. Hillyer, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 102.

The word "copy," as used in an act authorizing the defendant to file a copy of his account or state of his demand, means a copy of the items as entered in the book, so that the opposite party, seeing the particulars, may be prepared to answer and defend. There must be a copy, and not merely a recital of the substance, amount, or balance thereof. McCormick v. Brookfield, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 69-71.

COPYHOLD.

As freehold, see "Freehold."

The tenancy of copyhold is a peculiar one, and the incidents of it are seemingly contradictory, for it is said of copyholders that though they are tenants at will, yet their estate shall descend to their heirs, and such descent shall be governed by the rules of the common law. They had their estates granted them in fee, but still at the will of the lord. But in fact they do not hold by the precarious tenure of the lord's will; for, the good nature of many lords of manors having time out of mind permitted their vassals and their children to enjoy their possession without interruption in their regular course of descent, the common law gave them title to prescribe against their lords, and, on performance of the customary service, to hold their lands in spite of any determination of the lord's will. Choate v. Tighe, 57 Tenn. (10 Heisk.) 621.

COPYRIGHT.

A copyright is the grant of an exclusive privilege by the government for the purpose of protecting and encouraging, like a patent, the product of a mental effort, which secures to the author the fruit of his toil, or enables him to dispose of it with his incidental rights. A copyright gives to the owner the sole right to print, publish, and vend copies of a written composition. In re Rider, 15 Atl. 72, 16 R. I. 271; Davis v. Vories, 42 S. W. 707, 708, 141 Mo. 234; Per- ris v. Hexamer, 99 U. S. 674, 675, 25 L. Ed. 308; Kennedy v. McTammany (U. S.) 33 Fed. 584; Stowe v. Thomas (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 201, 207.

The word "copyright," which was provided by an act of Parliament, was construed to mean the "sole and exclusive right of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said work is herein applied." J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Clow (U. S.) 82 Fed. 316, 320, 27 C. C. A. 250.

The word "copyright" signifies an exclusive right of an author and his assigns to print his literary composition, and publish and republish it in print. Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 185.

The right of "copyright" is the right of an author or proprietor of a literary work to multiply copies of it, to the exclusion of others. Palmer v. De Witt, 47 N. Y. 532, 536, 7 Am. Rep. 480.

"Copyright before publication," or the common-law right of first publication, is the exclusive privilege of first publishing any original material product of intellectual labor. Palmer v. De Witt, 47 N. Y. 532, 537, 7 Am. Rep. 480.

"Copyright after publication" is the right secured by statute to multiply copies of a literary work, to the exclusion of others. Palmer v. De Witt, 47 N. Y. 532, 537, 7 Am. Rep. 480.

A "copyright," under the statute, is the exclusive right to publish a literary or artistic work. Such work may be a transcript or reproduction from some original manuscript, plate, or negative, as a book, engraving, or photograph; or may itself be an original, as a painting, model, or design; and such work may or may not be published in multiple form. Pierce & Bushnell Mfg. Co. v. Werckmeister (U. S.) 72 Fed. 54, 56, 18 C. C. A. 431.

The law undertakes to encourage the publication of works of authors by providing that upon certain conditions no one but the author, or one deriving the right from him, shall have the liberty of publishing or copying his works for a certain time. The copyright thus secured to an author by state is an incorporeal right, not a corporeal thing. Werckmeister v. Springer Lithographing Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 808, 810; Stephens v. Cady, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 528, 530, 14 L. Ed. 528. At the same time it is property capable of being assigned by the author at his pleasure. It cannot, like tangible property, be made the subject of seizure and sale on execution. Werckmeister v. Springer Lithographing Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 808, 810.

"Copyright" signifies an exclusive right of an author and his assigns to print his literary composition, and republish it in print."

The term is narrower than the word "literary property." Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 185.

An owner of a copyright has an exclusive right to sell his book in any manner anywhere in the United States. This right he can transfer to another as to the whole or any particular part of the country. Davis v. Vorles, 42 S. W. 707, 708, 141 Mo. 234.

A "copyright of a book," within the meaning of the copyright laws, includes the copyright of a newspaper. The copyright of a book is not always infringed by reproducing a part of the work. The copyright of the book is not infringed by making a plate from which a copy of a picture in an illustrated paper that is copyrighted can be produced. Harper v. Shoppell (U. S.) 26 Fed. 519.

When an author has sold his book, the only property which he reserves to himself, or which the law gives to him, is the exclusive right to multiply the copies of that particular combination of characters which exhibits to the eyes of another the ideas intended to be conveyed. This is what the law terms "copy" or "copyright." Stowe v. Thomas, 2 Am. Law Reg. (O. S.) 210, 228.

"Copyright" has been extended, so that it now includes what the old guild of authors would have disdained—catalogues, mathematical tables, statistics, designs, guidebooks, directories, and other works of similar character. Nothing, it would seem, evincing in its make-up that there has been underneath it in some substantial way the mind of a creator or originator, is now excluded. National Tel. News Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. (U. S.) 119 Fed. 294, 297, 56 C. C. A. 198, 60 L. R. A. 805.

A "copyright" of a map, secured to the author under the act of Congress, is an exclusive right to the multiplication of the copies for the benefit of the author or his assigns, disconnected from the engraved plate of the map or any physical existence. It is an incorporeal right to print and publish the map, or, as said by Lord Mansfield in Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burrows, 2303, 2306, "a property in notion, and has no corporeal, tangible substance." It is not the subject of seizure and sale by execution, but can be reached by a creditors' bill in chancery. Stephens v. Cady, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 528, 530, 14 L. Ed. 528.

Letters patent distinguished.

There is no doubt that a work on the subject of bookkeeping, though only explanatory of well-known systems, may be the subject of a copyright; but then it is claimed only as a book. But there is a clear distinction between the book, as such, and the art which it is intended to illustrate. The novelty of the art or thing described or explained has nothing to do with the validity of the copyright. To give the author of the book an exclusive property in the art described therein, when no examination of its novelty has ever been officially made, would be a surprise and a fraud upon the public. That is the province of letters patent, not of copyright. The claim to an invention or discovery of an art or manufacture must be subjected to the examination of the Patent Office before an exclusive right therein can be obtained, and it can only be secured by a patent from the government. The difference between letters patent and copyright may be illustrated by reference to the case of medicines. Certain mixtures are found to be of great value in the healing art. If the discoverer writes and publishes a book on the subject, as regular physicians generally do, he gains no exclusive right to the manufacture and sale of the medicine; he gives that to the public. If he desires to acquire such exclusive right, he must obtain a patent for the mixture as a new art, manufacture, or composition of matter. He may copyright his book if he pleases, but that only secures to him the exclusive right of printing and publishing his book. So of all other inventions or discoveries. And the court held that the publication of a work on bookkeeping, and the copyright of such work, did not give an exclusive right to the methods of bookkeeping therein explained and described. Baker v. Selden, 101 U. S. 99, 102, 103, 25 L. Ed. 841.

Renewal included.

The word "copyright," in a contract by an author for the sale of his copyright, was construed to only pass the first term, and not his right to renew the copyright. Pierpont v. Fowle (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 652, 658.

COPYRIGHTED.

The word "copyrighted," when printed on a trade label, is a word having a well-defined meaning, to wit, that the protection of the statute of copyrights had been secured, and that the label was protected from infringement by the statute regulating copyrights. Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 26 Pac. 556, 558, 16 Colo. 383, 25 Am. St. Rep. 279.

CORAL

"Coral, cut or manufactured," as used in Tariff Act July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 44), as amended by Act March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 192), would include coral cut in the form of a cameo, and not set and known as coral cameo in commerce, and the same was therefore not taxable under the provisions for "cameos not set." The specific designation must prevail over the commercial designation. Bailey v. Schell (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 382, 383.

CORAM JUDICE.

It is "coram judice" whenever a case is presented which brings the power to hear and determine a cause into action. Belles v. Miller, 38 Pac. 1050, 1052, 10 Wash. 259 (citing United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. [6 Pet.] 691, 8 L. Ed. 547); Fitzpatrick v. Simonson Bros. Mfg. Co., 90 N. W. 378, 380, 86 Minn. 140.

CORAM NOBIS.

See "Writ of Error Coram Nobis."

CORAM NON JUDICE.

Acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction, either over the person, the cause, or the process, are said to be "coram non judice." St. Lawrence Boom & Mfg. Co. v. Holt, 41 S. E. 351, 355, 51 W. Va. 352 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

CORD.Of stone.

"Cord," as used in a contract for the purchase of stone for so much a cord, measured in the wall, where both parties knew that 128 cubic feet of rough stone makes only 99 cubic feet of masonry, will be held to mean 99 cubic feet. Robinson v. Grannis, 33 N. Y. Supp. 291.

Of wood.

"Cord," as used in a contract for the sale of a given number of cords of wood, means 128 cubic feet for each cord. Kennedy v. Oswego & S. R. Co., 67 Barb. 169, 177.

A statute imposed a penalty on the sale of cord wood without having the same measured by a sworn surveyor at a certain amount per cord. Held, that in order to come within the terms of the statute the sale must be of at least a cord, and hence, where less than a cord was sold without being measured as prescribed, there was no violation of the statute. Pray v. Burbank, 12 N. H. 267.

The word "cords," as used in a written contract for the purchase of a stated number of cords of wood, without explanation, relates to the quantity of wood to be delivered, and does not necessarily fix either the lengths or shapes of the sticks of wood. Maynard v. Render, 23 S. E. 194, 195, 95 Ga. 652.

The words "25 cords of wood" are sufficient, when used in an indictment to designate the property stolen, to show that the wood stolen was personal property. State v. Parker, 34 Ark. 158, 159, 36 Am. Rep. 5.

The word "cord," as used in a declaration for the sale and delivery of wood, must be interpreted as meaning "cord" as defined by Rev. St. 28, § 200. Colton v. King, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 317, 319.

CORD WOOD.

The word "cords," as used in a written contract for the purchase of a stated number of cords of wood, without explanation, relates to the quantity of wood to be delivered, and does not necessarily fix either the lengths or shapes of the sticks of wood. The contrary would have been true if the contract had been for the delivery of so much "cord wood." The employment of the latter term would have signified an undertaking to deliver wood cut in cordwood lengths, and parol evidence was admissible to show what was the real agreement of the parties in this respect. Maynard v. Render, 23 S. E. 194, 195, 95 Ga. 652.

CORDIAL.

See "Sweet Cordial."

"Cordial," as used in the customs act of 1883, providing that cordials containing spirits should pay certain tariff duties, includes the liquor known as "benedictine," prepared in France after a secret formula, derived from the Benedictine monks at the abbey of Fécamp, in that country, and put up in bottles with labels signed and trademarked by the proprietors, and accompanied in the case of each bottle by a circular, claiming for the liquor certain therapeutic and prophylactic qualities. In re Gourd (U. S.) 49 Fed. 728, 729.

"Common store cordial is sweetened whisky sold as spirituous liquor. Godfrey's Cordial is a very different thing, known for and sold as medicine. The sale of the former is in violation of a statute prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, but the sale of the latter is not within the prohibition of the statute." State v. Bennet (Del.) 3 Har. 565, 567.

CORDUROY.

The phrase, "corduroy composed of cotton and other vegetable fiber," within Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule I, par. 315, 30 Stat. 178 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1659], imposing a duty thereon, does not include a pile fabric, commercially known as "velvet cord," "ribbed velvet," or "corded velvet," which is made of cotton with a fine rib. These goods are never bought or sold as "corduroys," though that circumstance would be immaterial if they were in fact corduroys. They are not within the definition of "corduroy" given in the Century Dictionary, which describes a thick stuff especially used for the outer garments of men engaged in rough labor, field sports, and the like. It seems to have been assumed below that the word "cords" is an abbreviation of "corduroy," the latter word being a generic term covering a group of several species. Reference to these words in the new English Dictionary of the Philological Society, however, shows that cords came first into use, and corduroy, or "corde du roy," was a term of subsequent invention. Evidently the broader word of the two is "cords." Corduroys, in fact, are not made by the manufacturers who make velvet cords, nor velvet cords by the manufacturers who make corduroys. Stewart, Howe & May Co. v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 928, 51 C. C. A. 558.

CO-RESPONDENT.

Neither in our law nor in the dictionary has the word "co-respondent" any such meaning as "paramour." In England, in an action for divorce, the "plaintiff" and the "defendant," as we call them, are the "petitioner" and the "respondent." In such an action there, the defendant makes the paramour a party respondent, and in that way he is and is called "co-respondent." With us, if the paramour can be so joined, he would be a "codefendant," and not a "co-respondent." Lowe v. Bennett, 58 N. Y. Supp. 88, 90, 27 Misc. Rep 356.

CORN.

Authorities in great abundance have been produced to show that in England, by the term "corn," all kinds of grain used for bread stuff is understood; but as maize is an article not cultivated there, except as a curiosity, it may well be questioned whether English authorities are entitled to equal weight with those of our own country, where the article is extensively grown and used. Webster says expressly that the term "corn" is appropriated in the United States to maize. This is undoubtedly in conformity to the universal usage and understanding in the United States with regard to corn. "Corn" in this country is not understood to be a generic term, including all kinds of grain, but is known to be confined in its meaning to the single article of Indian corn, and therefore an indictment for stealing "corn in the ear" is sustained by evidence of the larceny of Indian corn. Commonwealth v. Pine, 3 Pa. Law J. 411, 412.

An indictment for setting fire to a "stack of barley" was equivalent to the words "stack of corn or grain" in the statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV, § 30, c. 17, describing the punishment for such offense. Rex v. Swatkins, 4 Car. & P. 548.

"Corn and grain," within the meaning of a statute exempting a debtor's corn and grain necessary and sufficient for the subsistence of himself and family, not exceeding 30 bushels, from execution, does not extend to those species of corn and grain which may, by sales or exchanges, indirectly contribute to the same end, where they are, by their nature and the general custom of the community, not suitable to be used in the making of bread, and are not so designed by the owner. Blake v. Baker, 41 Me. 78, 80.

As maize or Indian corn.

In this country the word "corn" is now generally and popularly restricted in its meaning to maize or Indian corn. Webst. Dict. That is the ordinary import of the word, unless the meaning is enlarged by the circumstances of its employment. Kerrick v. G. W. Van Dusen & Co., 20 N. W. 228, 32 Minn. 317; Wood v. State, 18 Fla. 967, 969.

"'Corn' here, whatever it may elsewhere signify, or whatever it may have signified elsewhere, does not mean a cereal, or wheat or barley or oats, or mere grain; it means that which is termed 'Indian maize,' and is and has been the principal bread stuff here." It is used in such sense in Act Feb. 20, 1875, making it criminal to steal an outstanding crop of corn. Sullins v. State, 53 Ala. 474, 476.

As shelled corn.

"Corn" applies mainly to maize or Indian corn, and does not necessarily imply shelled corn. In a general sense, one in common use, it implies corn, either shelled or in the ear. Thus it is said of a farmer that he produced on his farm a thousand bushels of corn, without reference to whether it is shelled or not, and so it is said there is stored in a house a thousand bushels of corn. This implies that quantity, shelled or unshelled; and, under an indictment that defendant stole three bushels of corn, the evidence is sufficient if it shows that he stole three bushels of corn in the ear. State v. Nipper, 95 N. C. 653, 654.

As standing or harvested corn.

A charge that another "has stolen corn out of the field" is susceptible of two meanings, either that he has stolen harvested corn from the field, or that he has stolen corn which has not been harvested; and, as the latter corn is not the subject of larceny, it is erroneous, in an action for slander, to refuse to instruct that, if the jury find that the persons to whom the language was spoken understood it as referring to standing corn, there can be no recovery. Stitzell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 54, 56, 5 Am. Rep. 396.

Rice.

"Corn," as used in a memorandum of an insurance policy describing the property insured, does not include rice. Scott v. Bourdillion, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 213.

CORNCRIB.

The character of a building as a "corner" arises apparently from the style in which and the purpose for which the building was originally constructed, and not the use to which a building may temporarily be put; so that a building erected for and usually occupied as a dwelling house cannot be considered a "corner," though temporarily used for the storage of corn. Where an indictment charged conspiracy to burn a "corner" containing corn, and the proof showed that the building was a cabin which had been inhabited up to within a month or two before the attempt to burn it, when the owner had deposited corn in it, there was a fatal variance. Thomas v. State, 22 South. 666, 116 Ala. 461.

Sess. Acts 1885, p. 105, defining the burning of a "corn bin" containing corn to be arson in the second degree, includes also the burning of a "corner" containing corn. Cook v. State, 3 South. 849, 850, 83 Ala. 62, 3 Am. St. Rep. 688.

As a building or house.

See, also, "Building (In Criminal Law)."

A corner used solely for storing corn and feed is a "house" within a statute relating to burglary or larceny. Barber v. State (Tex.) 69 S. W. 515, 516; Brown v. State, 52 Ala. 345, 347.

A corner used for storing corn is a "storehouse" within the meaning of the Criminal Code. Metz v. State, 65 N. W. 190, 191, 46 Neb. 547.

CORN-FED HOGS.

The term "corn-fed hogs" is used to designate hogs which have been fed on corn. Bartlett v. Hoppeck, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

CORN MILL.

A conveyance of a cornmill, with all the privileges and appurtenances, passes title to the land on which the mill is situated. Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 31 Am. Dec. 200 (cited in Indianapolis, D. & W. R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 33 N. E. 679, 134 Ind. 127).

CORNER.

A "corner" is the intersection of two converging lines or surfaces; an angle, whether internal or external; as the "corner" of a building, the four "corners" of a square, the "corner" of two streets. A mere variation in line does not constitute a "corner." Christian v. Gernt (Tenn.) 64 S. W. 399, 401.

A description of a tract of land as "lying in the southwest corner of a section" is sufficiently definite, according to rules of decision that a "corner" is a base point from which two sides of the land conveyed shall extend an equal distance so as to include by parallel lines the quantity conveyed. Walsh's Lessee v. Ringer, 2 Ohio, 327, 333, 15 Am. Dec. 555.

In stock speculations.

"Corner," is a term used in speculations in stocks, grains, etc., to mean manipulations of the market in such a manner as to make the stocks, grains, etc., which is the subject of the corner, scarce or plenty in the market, at the will of the manipulators, in such a manner that the latter may fix the price thereon. Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 155, 158.

A "corner," according to stock-exchange parlance, is procured where somebody succeeds in buying for further delivery more property of a given kind than is possible for the seller to deliver before the day of the maturity of the contract. Wright v. Cudahy, 48 N. E. 39, 41, 168 Ill. 86.

The term "corner" is a term used in boards of trade, etc., to designate the condition arising when a much greater quantity of any given commodity is sold for future delivery within a given period than can be purchased in the market. The buyers, who are called in the slang of the exchanges "longs," then insist on delivery, and by these means succeed in running up prices to a fictitious point, by which deals are run out between the dealers, or by exchanges, or, where the person insists upon it, by actual delivery. A very large majority of these transactions are no doubt merely speculative, but many of them are actual purchases for manufacturers and exporters. Kent v. Miltenberger, 13 Mo. App. 503, 506.

CORNER TOOTH.

The question whether a "corner tooth" shown to have been knocked out in an assault is a front tooth, and therefore constitutes a maiming, is for the jury. High v. State, 10 S. W. 238, 241, 26 Tex. App. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 488.

CORONER.

"A coroner is a public officer charged with the duty of holding inquests, and is clothed with general powers for that purpose; among which is the power to summon officers to make scientific examination of the body when the jury shall deem such examination requisite." Pueblo County Com'rs v. Marshall, 16 Pac. 837, 839, 11 Colo. 84.

Anciently, the office of coroner was of great dignity, and exercised by persons of high authority, as well as by those in lesser degree and station. Blackstone says: "There are also particular coroners for every county of England, usually four, but sometimes six, and sometimes fewer. This office is of equal antiquity with the sheriff, and was ordained together with him to keep the peace when the earls gave up the wardship of the county. He is still chosen by all the freeholders in the county court." As ascertained in great measure from the statute (4 Edw. I, "De Officio Coronatoris"), the powers and duties of the coroner are both judicial and ministerial, his judicial authority extending to inquiries touching the manner of death of any person slain or dying suddenly, or in prison, which must be super visum corporis; and also to inquiries respecting treasure-trove and shipwreck. His ministerial office is only as the sheriff's substitute. Cox v. Royal Tribe, 71 Pac. 73, 74, 42 Or. 365, 60 L. R. A. 620, 95 Am. St. Rep. 752 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 347, 349; 2 Bac. Abr. 428).

A coroner is an officer of great antiquity at the common law, whose powers and duties, like those of the sheriff, were both judicial and ministerial. By virtue of his office, like the sheriff, he was a conservator of the peace, and he has always had other duties attached to his office which do not pertain to that of sheriff; but his ministerial office is, and always has been, both in England and the United States, to act as the sheriff's substitute in the execution of process, when the latter cannot act. Powell v. Wilson, 16 Tex. 59, 60, 61 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 346, 350).

The office of a coroner is a very ancient one, and came with the common law to this country from England. The powers and duties of a coroner here are what they were at common law, except in so far as they have been modified by our statutes or institutions. Lancaster County v. Holyoke, 37 Neb. 328, 331, 55 N. W. 950, 951, 21 L. R. A. 394.

The words "coroner," "justice," and "constable" mean officers of the county in which the action is brought or is pending, or in which the proceeding is had, or to whom the process is directed. Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7212.

The term "coroner" includes any person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 66; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8.

CORONER'S COURT.

A coroner's court in England is a court of record, and upon a finding of felo de se the executor or administrator may remove the inquest of office into the Court of the King's Bench and traverse it, for it has been said that it would be hard that he should be concluded by an inquisition which is nothing more than an inquest of office, taken behind his back. In the United States they are generally denominated courts of inferior jurisdiction, and not of record, but in Oregon the organic act does not so much as dignify the office with any judicial functions whatever. Cox v. Royal Tribe, 71 Pac. 73, 74, 42 Or. 365, 60 L. R. A. 620, 95 Am. St. Rep. 752.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

The object of a coroner's inquest is to ascertain the cause of death, whether it was the result of violence or criminal agency; and in order to attain this object the coroner is necessarily clothed with a discretion in the performance of his duties, being the sole judge as to the propriety or necessity of holding an inquest. The coroner, however, in that respect is not subject to revision by the county commissioners, and he is entitled to fees prescribed by the statute, notwithstanding the verdict of his jury disclosing that the deceased died a natural death, and not by casualty or violence. Boisliniere v. Board of County Com'rs, 32 Mo. 375, 378.

CORPORAL.

"Corporal" means relating to the body; bodily. Should be distinguished from "corporeal." Black, Law. Dict. 278.

CORPORAL IMBECILITY.

"Corporal imbecility" may arise after the marriage, which will not then vacate the marriage, because there was no fraud in the original contract. 1 Bl. Comm. 440, note 12. In commenting upon this statement of Blackstone, the Supreme Court of Connecticut has said: "Here he . . . plainly rejects the idea that the term 'corporal imbecility' has a precise, technical meaning, and absolutely imports a natural, permanent, and incurable imbecility." Griffeth v. Griffeth, 162 Ill. 368, 376, 44 N. E. 820, 822.

"Corporal imbecility" does not, ex vi termini, import a permanent and incurable impotency to consummate marriage, and the term has no such technical meaning. Ferris v. Ferris, 8 Conn. 166, 168.

CORPORAL OATH.

A "corporal oath" is a solemn oath, and so called from the ancient usage of touching the corporale or cloth which is used in covering the consecrated elements in the eucharist. Jackson v. State, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 184, 185.

The phrase "solemn oath" is synonymous with the phrase "corporal oath," and an oath taken with the uplifted hand may be properly described by either phrase in an indictment for perjury. Jackson v. State, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 184, 185.

The term "corporal oath" must be construed as applying to any bodily assent to the oath of the witness. In the English authorities it is said that the oath usually administered is called a "corporal oath" because the person who takes it lays his hand on some part of the Scriptures, or other book esteemed sacred by the witness, or kisses the book. State v. Norris, 9 N. H. 96, 102.

"What is termed a 'corporal oath' was anciently administered by touching the cloth that covered the consecrated elements, or, as some supposed, from the fact that the party taking it was required to lay his hand upon the Bible; but a 'corporal oath,' as latterly understood, means merely a solemn oath, although the name is derived from the ancient usage just mentioned. In Jackson v. State, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 184, it was held that the terms 'corporal oath' and 'solemn oath' are now to be used as synonymous. Wharton says the oath must be solemnly administered. It is immaterial in what form it is given, if the party at the time professes such form to be binding on his conscience. A 'corporal oath' and 'solemn oath' are equivalent. Either is sustained by proof of swearing with uplifted hands." Commonwealth v. Jarboe, 12 S. W. 138, 89 Ky. 143 (quoting 2 Whart. Cr. Law [9th Ed.] § 1251, and note).

What is universally understood by an "oath" is that the person who takes it imprecates the vengeance of God upon him if the oath he takes is false (1 Atk. 20), and the words "corporal oath" may stand for lifting up an arm or bodily member. Therefore, where an indictment for perjury charged that the defendant did then and there in due form of law take his "corporal oath," the indictment was not faulty for its failing to state that he took the oath on the holy Gospel of God, or in the presence of Almighty God by uplifted hands. Respublica v. Newell (Pa.) 3 Yeates, 407, 412, 2 Am. Dec. 381.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

"Corporal punishment," within the meaning of the rule that the master of a vessel may inflict corporal punishment on seamen, is to be construed to mean a reasonable and moderate corporal punishment. Brown v. Howard (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 119, 123.

"Corporal punishment," in its enlarged meaning, expresses all kinds of punishment or of inflicted upon the body, including imprisonment. But under the statute providing that, where corporal punishment is inflicted, the person shall in no case be bailed, the words do not include imprisonment, but are used in the restricted sense denoting punishment on the body, such as whipping, the statute having been copied from an older state, and the proviso being probably of ancient origin. Corporal punishment of this nature has always been deemed so humiliating that no bail would be sufficient to induce accused's surrender upon the affirmance of a judgment requiring its infliction. Ritchey v. People, 43 Pac. 1026, 1027, 22 Colo. 251.

"Corporal punishment" seems to mean any kind of corporal deprivation or suffering which is inflicted by the sentence, directly by way of penalty for the offense, and in this sense, of course, includes imprisonment, as well as of the pillory. It is set in contradistinction to a fine. People v. Winchell (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 525, note.

COPORALE.

"Coporale" is a fine linen cloth used to cover the sacred elements in the eucharist, or in which the sacrament is put. Jackson v. State, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 184, 185.

CORPORATE.

The term "corporate," as used in Code, § 5182, exempting from taxation property used for purposes of private or corporate profit, is employed in contradistinction to "public." Trustees of Academy of Richmond County v. Augusta City Council, 17 S. E. 61, 65, 90 Ga. 634, 20 L. R. A. 151.

CORPORATE AUTHORITIES.

Const. 1848, art. 9, § 5, providing that the "corporate authorities" of cities, towns, or other municipal corporations may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, means those municipal officers who are either directly elected by the population to be taxed, or appointed in some mode to which they have given their assent. Hessler v. Drainage Com'rs, 53 Ill. 105, 113; People v. City of Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, 30, 2 Am. Rep. 278; Gage v. Graham, 57 Ill. 144, 146; Cornell v. People, 107 Ill. 372, 383; Wilson v. Trustees of Sanitary Dist., 27 N. E. 203, 205, 133 Ill. 443; People v. Knopf, 49 N. E. 424, 426, 171 Ill. 191. The phrase does not include commissioners appointed by the Legislature to carry on some special improvement within the corporate limits. People v. City of Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, 30, 2 Am. Rep. 278.

City council.

Const. Ill. 1848, art. 9, § 5, provides that the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns, and villages may be invested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes. Held, that the "corporate authorities" of a city, within such Constitution, was the city council of such city, and not the voters thereof. City of Quincy v. Cooke, 2 Sup. Ct. 614, 619, 107 U. S. 549, 27 L. Ed. 549.

Act Feb. 28, 1881, giving the "corporate authorities" of villages power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, means those officers of cities and villages to whom is given the ordinance-making power. State v. Andrews, 10 N. W. 410, 11 Neb. 523.

Park commissioners.

Const. art. 9, § 5, providing that the corporate authorities of cities may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, will be construed to include park commissioners authorized to complete, improve, and manage public parks. West Chicago Park Com'rs v. Western Union Tel. Co., 103 Ill. 33, 40.

Supervisors and town clerk.

Under Act April 15, 1834, § 4, declaring that the corporate powers of the several counties and townships shall be exercised by the commissioners or supervisors thereof, respectively, the supervisors of a town are the "corporate authorities" referred to in Act April 20, 1874, and its supplement of June 9, 1891, authorizing the corporate authorities of the township to increase indebtedness and issue bonds for the purpose of putting the roads and highways of the town in better condition. Such supervisors have no control over the auditors of the township, and cannot require that such auditors sign the bonds so to be issued. Commonwealth v. Upper Darby Auditors, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 89, 90.

The supervisor and assessor of a town are its "corporate authorities," within the meaning of Const. art. 9, § 9, authorizing special assessments to be made by such authorities. Jones v. Town of Lake View, 38 N. E. 688, 691, 151 Ill. 663 (following Hundley v. Lincoln Park Com'rs, 67 Ill. 559).

Under a law which authorizes the "proper corporate authorities" of a township to issue the bonds of the town when so authorized at an election called for that purpose, the supervisor and town clerk are the proper corporate authorities for the issuing and delivery of the bonds, though they are not such for the purpose of creating an indebtedness. Town of Windsor v. Hallet, 97 Ill. 204, 209; Town of Prairie v. Lloyd, 97 Ill. 179, 197; Town of Douglas v. Niantic Sav. Bank, 97 Ill. 228, 232.

The supervisor and town clerk of the township are but a part of the corporate authority. The Legislature cannot clothe them, without the consent of the people, with the discretionary power of taxation or creating a debt, because they are not of themselves the "corporate authority," in the sense of the Constitution. Marshall v. Silliman, 61 Ill. 218. A certain county which had previously adopted township organization became organized under a special system, dividing the county into four supervisors' districts. In one of these districts two supervisors were elected, neither of whom resided in a certain township, which prior to the organization had voted a donation to a certain railroad. In this state of affairs the Legislature assumed to authorize such township and others to issue bonds for the amount of its donation without any vote of the people on that subject, the bonds to be signed by the supervisors of the district in which the township was situated, and countersigned by the town clerk. Held, that the two supervisors were not the corporate authorities of the township, so as to be capable of being invested with authority to create a debt in behalf of the town without the approval of the voters. Schaeffer v. Bonham, 95 Ill. 368, 382.

CORPORATE BODY.

Any body corporate, see "Any."
School district as, see "School District."

A corporate body is merely a legal or artificial person substituted for a natural person. Freeholders of Sussex County v. Strader, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 108, 117 (citing Ang. & A. Corp. p. 58).

The term "bodies corporate" does not include municipal corporations. Cedar County v. Johnson, 50 Mo. 225, 227.

The term "corporate body," in the clause of a charter of a railroad company making it lawful for all persons of lawful age, or for the agent of any corporate body, to subscribe to the capital stock of the company, manifestly refers to private corporations only, and does not include municipal corporations. It does not refer to counties, cities, towns, or townships, and cannot be held to embrace them. Campbell v. Paris & D. R. Co., 71 Ill. 611, 612; East Oakland Tp. v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255, 256, 24 L. Ed. 125. It means private and money-making, trading, or business corporations, and does not intend to give authority to any township, however remote from the road, authority to become one of its stockholders, for the provision manifestly refers to private corporations when it authorizes agents thereof to subscribe. East Oakland Tp. v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255, 256, 24 L. Ed. 125.

"The loan officers of a county and the supervisors of a county are corporate bodies," for they have corporate power sub modo and for certain purposes only. Denton v. Jackson (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 403, 405.

A school district is not a body corporate within the meaning of Cr. Code, 1860, § 118, making it a misdemeanor for a director, etc., to falsify papers, etc., of a body corporate. Commonwealth v. Beamish, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 389, 391.

CORPORATE BONDS.

Corporate bonds are representations of money loaned to the corporation. They are issued in the form of bonds in order that they may be sold in negotiable form, but differ from certificates of stock, which are not securities for money nor negotiable security in the strict commercial sense. Bonds issued by a corporation are generally issued for money borrowed, which is necessary, in addition to the capital stock, to support the operations of the company. Bailey v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 604, 636, 22 L. Ed. 840.

CORPORATE BUILDINGS.

5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 76, § 92, authorizing the corporation to incur indebtedness for repairs upon "corporate buildings," means buildings in the possession of the corporation, whether held under a strict legal title or not. Regina v. Borough of Warwick; 8 Q. B. 926, 929.

CORPORATE CONDUCT.

There may be actual corporate conduct which is not formal corporate action; and where that conduct is directed or produced by the whole body, both of officers and stockholders—by every living instrumentality which can possess and wield the corporate franchise—that conduct is of a corporate character, and, if illegal and injurious, may deserve and receive the penalty of dissolution. There always is and there always must be corporate conduct without formal corporate action, where the thing challenged is an omission to act at all. A corporation organized in the public interest, for the benefit of the public, and in the expectation of benefit to the community, which is the motive of the state's grant, may accept the franchise and hold it in sullen silence, doing nothing, resolving nothing, furnishing no formal corporate action on which the state can put its finger, and say, "This the corporation has done by the agency through which it is authorized to act." That is corporate conduct which the state may question and punish without searching for a formal corporate act. People v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 24 N. E. 834, 838, 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 33, 18 Am. St. Rep. 843.

CORPORATE EXISTENCE.

The expression "corporate existence," as used in Gen. St. 1865, c. 62, § 2, declaring that whenever any corporation shall be organized under the laws of the state it shall be the duty of the officers of the corporation to file with the Secretary of State a copy of the articles of the association or corporation, and the corporate existence of the corporation should date from the time of the filing said copy of such articles, means when the corporation is fully authorized to transact all business for which it was created. Hurt v. Salisbury, 55 Mo. 310, 314.

Under Rev. St. § 2664, providing that if any railroad corporation shall not within two years begin the construction of its road, and within one year thereafter expend thereon not less than 10 per cent. of its capital stock, "its corporate existence and powers shall cease," the charter of a corporation failing to comply with such requirements is absolutely forfeited, and the corporation ipso facto ceases to be a corporation without any action whatever on the part of the state. Ford v. Kansas City & I. Short Line Ry. Co., 52 Mo. App. 439, 455, 458.

CORPORATE FRANCHISE.

As a commodity. see "Commodity."

Powers distinguished, see "Corporate Powers and Privileges."

"Corporate franchises are, properly speaking, legal estates vested in the corporation itself as soon as it is in esse." Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 700, 4 L. Ed. 629; Society for Savings v. Coite, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 594, 606, 18 L. Ed. 897; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 127. They are not mere naked powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest, which vest in the corporation upon the possession of its franchises; and, whatever may be thought of the corporation, it cannot be denied that the corporation itself has a legal interest in such franchises. Society for Savings v. Coite, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 594, 606, 18 L. Ed. 897; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 632, 638, 18 L. Ed. 904; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 700, 4 L. Ed. 629; They are privileges or immunities of a public nature, which cannot be legally exercised without legislative authority. It is private property affected with a public use. Acts granting such franchises are declared to be contracts by many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and all the highest American state courts. State v. Real Estate Bank, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 595, 599, 41 Am. Dec. 109. They are the rights or privileges which, when the Legislature grants a charter of incorporation, it confers upon the grantees of the charter—the right or privilege of forming a corporate association, and of acting, within certain limits, in a corporate capacity; and this right or privilege is called the "corporate franchise." Jersey City Gaslight Co. v. United Gas Imp. Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 264–266 (citing 2 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 922). They are franchises essential to corporate existence, and granted as part of the organic act of incorporation, and that can be forfeited only by quo warranto proceedings, or the statutory substitute thereof, to vacate the charter of the corporation; but the term is often used as applicable to all the franchises which a corporation may lawfully acquire. State v. Portage City Water Co., 83 N. W. 697, 699, 107 Wis. 441.

A corporate franchise is a franchise acquired by act of incorporation. Brady v. Moulton, 61 Minn. 185, 186, 63 N. W. 489.

By the term "corporate franchise or business" is meant the right or privilege given by the state to two or more persons of being a corporation—that is, of doing business in a corporate capacity—and not the privilege or franchise which, when incorporated, the company may exercise. It is a right or privilege by which several individuals may unite themselves under a common name, and act as a single person with a succession of members, without dissolution or suspension of business and with a limited individual liability. The granting of such right or privilege rests entirely in the discretion of the state, and may be accompanied with such conditions as the legislature may judge most fitting to its interests and policy. Cobb v. Durham County Com'rs, 30 S. E. 338, 122 N. C. 307 (citing Home Ins. Co. v. State of New York, 134 U. S. 595, 10 Sup. Ct. 593, 33 L. Ed. 1025).

The term "corporate franchise or business," as used in the statute providing for a tax on such property, means the right or privilege given by the state to two or more persons of being a corporation; that is, of doing business in a corporate capacity. The granting of such right or privilege rests in the discretion of the state, and may be accompanied by such conditions as its Legislature may deem best. From the nature of the tax, being laid on a franchise given by the state and revocable at pleasure, it cannot be affected in any way by the character of the property in which the capital stock is invested. The power of the state over the corporate franchises and conditions on which it shall be exercised is as ample and plenary in the one case as the other. People v. Knight, 67 N. E. 65, 67, 174 N. Y. 475, 63 L. R. A. 87 (citing Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 10 Sup. Ct. 593, 33 L. Ed. 1025).

The phrase "corporate franchise," in Const. 1890, § 180, providing that grants of corporate franchises under which organizations have not taken place shall be subject to constitutional provisions, one of which prohibits exemptions from taxation, means the right to exist as a corporation. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. (Miss.) 24 South. 200, 209, 60 L. R. A. 33.

Laws 1901, p. 316, c. 132, § 187a, enacts that every trust company shall pay, for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise, a certain annual tax. Held, that the phrase "corporate franchise" means the right or privilege of being a corporation—of doing business in a corporate capacity. People v. Miller, 83 N. Y. Supp. 185, 187, 85 App. Div. 211.

CORPORATE NAME.

A corporate name is an artificial name, and is selected with an object, and may be changed, and a new one taken. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Royal (U. S.) 122 Fed. 337, 345, 58 C. C. A. 499.

The choice of the name of a corporation is voluntary. Such name is an artificial thing, which can be selected by its incorporators from the entire vocabulary of names. A body of associates who organize a corporation, selling a particular product, are not lawfully entitled to employ, as their corporate name, the name of one of their number, when such name has been intentionally selected to compete with an established concern of the same name, engaged in a similar business, and divert the latter's trade to themselves by confusing the identity of the product of both, and leading purchasers to buy those of one for those of the other. Rogers v. Wm. Rogers Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 17 C. C. A. 575, 576, 70 Fed. 1019. Other courts have laid down substantially the same doctrine. Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict v. Howe Scale Co. (U. S.) 122 Fed. 348, 352, 58 C. C. A. 510.

A corporate name is regarded as of the nature of a trade-mark, even though composed of individual names, and its simulation may be restrained. After adoption it follows the corporation. Fite v. Dorman (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 129, 147.

CORPORATE OFFICE.

By the act incorporating the university at Lewisburg, approved Feb. 5, 1846 (P. L. 32), it was provided that the trustees named therein, and their successors, should constitute a body politic; that they should have power to transact all the business of the university, to elect a chairman, secretary, and other officers to manage its affairs, to enact proper ordinances for its government, to appoint the necessary professors and other instructors, and to remove them, or any of them, on sufficient cause being shown. The powers and duties of the professors thus appointed were, by the terms of the said act, defined, and they were empowered, inter alia, to grant diplomas upon certain specified terms. Held, that a professorship in said university was not a "corporate office in a private corporation," within the meaning of Act June 14, 1836, § 2 (P. L. 621), and that therefore a writ of quo warranto could not be issued under the provisions of the said act to any person to show cause why he acted in the capacity of professor in said university. Phillips v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 394, 401, 402.

The term "office of a corporation" means its principal office within the state, or principal place of business within the state if it has no principal office therein. Revere Rubber Co. v. Genesee Valley Blue Stone Co., 20 App. Div. 166, 167, 46 N. Y. Supp. 989.

CORPORATE OFFICER.

See "Officer (of corporation)."

CORPORATE PAPER.

"Corporate paper," as used in a contract that the parties to it, being stockholders of a certain company, would indemnify those who are or become indorsers of the corporate paper of such company, is synonymous with "company's paper," and includes any and all obligations for the payment of money made by the corporation or for its use and benefit. Taylor v. Coon, 48 N. W. 123, 125, 79 Wis. 76.

CORPORATE POWERS AND PRIVILEGES.

The expression "corporate powers and privileges," as used in Const. Ga. 1868, art. 3, § 6, giving the General Assembly power to grant "corporate powers and privileges" to private companies, excepting banking institutions, etc., signified the corporate franchises—the aggregate powers and privileges which constitute a corporation; not every separate power and privilege which may be conferred on a corporate body. Jones v. Habersham, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 348, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. Ed. 401; Id. (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 964, 967.

Though it might be difficult to give a conceptual definition of "corporate powers" which would be found complete and accurate in all cases, an accurate descriptive definition readily occurs: They are such powers as are usually conferred upon corporations. State v. Jones, 64 N. E. 424, 427, 66 Ohio St. 453 (quoting Dill. Mun. Corp.).

Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, declaring that the Legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers, means that no special act shall be passed conferring corporate powers on private corporations, and it does not apply to municipal corporations. Pell v. City of Newark, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 71, 76, 29 Am. Rep. 266.

An act which authorizes councils of certain villages to nominate to the county commissioners two freeholders as trustees in the making of contemplated improvements is an attempt to confer on such municipalities corporate powers, within a provision of the Constitution that the Assembly shall pass no special act conferring such powers. Hamilton County Com'rs v. State, 35 N. E. 887, 889, 50 Ohio St. 653.

By the "powers" of a corporation is meant the privileges and franchises which are created in the charter, and which control and circumscribe the legal acts of the corporate body. Whenever it goes beyond the privileges and franchises therein mentioned, its act becomes illegal and void. Dalles Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Wasco Woolen Mfg. Co., 8 Or. 527, 530.

Franchises distinguished.

There is a distinction between the "powers" and the "franchises" of a corporation. The kinds of business which corporations organized either under title 2, c. 34, Gen. St., or under Act 1873, are authorized to do, are powers, but not franchises. The only franchise which such corporations possess is a general franchise to be or exist as a corporate entity. State v. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co., 41 N. W. 1020, 1025, 40 Minn. 213, 3 L. R. A. 510.

CORPORATE PROPERTY.

Within the meaning of an act providing for the division of a town, and appointing commissioners to apportion between the towns the corporate debts and corporate property, an ancient public common or training field, the title to which became vested in the town, not for its own use, but for the use of those who were or might become inhabitants, and who might have occasion to use it, was not corporate property. But the school funds of the town, the income of which is applied to the relief of the town from a burden imposed by general laws, and for which it is obliged to raise money by taxation, is corporate property and should be apportioned. Inhabitants of Wrentham v. Inhabitants of Norfolk, 114 Mass. 555, 561, 562.

CORPORATE PURPOSE.

A tax for a corporate purpose is one which is to be expended in a manner which shall promote the general prosperity and the welfare of the municipality which levies it. Wetherell v. Devine, 6 N. E. 24, 26, 116 Ill. 631.

Const. art. 5, § 9, provided that corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns, and villages may be vested with authority to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes. Held, that a "corporate purpose," within the meaning of the Constitution, is that purpose necessary or proper to carry into effect the object of the creation of the corporate body. People v. Trustees of Schools, 78 Ill. 136, 140.

A corporate purpose is a purpose which is germane to the general scope of the object for which the corporation was created, or such as has a legitimate connection with that object and a manifest relation thereto.

Weightman v. Clark, 103 U. S. 256, 28 L. Ed. 392; Wetherell v. Devine, 6 N. E. 24, 26, 116 Ill. 681; People v. Dupuyt, 71 Ill. 651, 655; Livingston County Sup'rs v. Weider, 64 Ill. 427, 432.

Within Const. art. 9, § 5, the phrase "corporate purposes" may be defined to mean a tax to be expended in a manner which will promote the general prosperity and welfare of the municipality which levies it. That every individual taxpayer shall have a direct interest in the object for which the tax is levied, or be directly benefited by its expenditure, is unattainable. General results are all that can be expected; and if it appear that a tax has been voted and levied with an honest purpose to promote the general well-being of the municipality, and was not designed merely for the benefit of individuals, its collection will not be stayed by the courts on the ground that it is not for a corporate purpose. Taylor v. Thompson, 42 Ill. 8, 13; Burr v. City of Carbondale, 76 Ill. 455, 461; Hackett v. Ottawa, 99 U. S. 86, 93, 25 L. Ed. 363.

It is impracticable to lay down an exact rule by which to determine what is a "corporate purpose," within Const. art. 2, § 9, providing that a city shall not become indebted for any other than a corporation purpose. The question must necessarily be decided in view of the facts of each particular case. It is not necessary that the object for which a tax is imposed by the corporate authorities should be within the corporate limits to make it a corporate purpose. It is sufficient if it be of vital importance to the permanent interests of the corporation, although situated beyond the limits thereof. McCallie v. Town of Chattanooga, 40 Tenn. (3 Head) 817, 821.

To understand what is meant by a "corporate purpose," a distinction must be drawn between the powers of a corporation, and the end and purpose intended to be accomplished by it. The two must not be confused. To illustrate: The counties of a state are corporations with well-defined and distinct purposes, to wit, supervision of roads, bridges, and ferries, and other internal and county matters; and to carry out these ends certain powers are granted which are distinct and separate from the ends. So, too, municipal governments are provided for cities, towns, and villages for the purpose of enabling them to preserve peace and order, to construct and repair streets, and for various other corporate objects; and, to enable these governments to meet the ends designed, certain powers are granted, but these powers and the corporate purpose are widely different. True, the one follows the other and is necessary thereto, but the corporate purpose must exist before the power can be granted to carry it out. Act Dec. 23, 1882, declaring, as amended, townships along the line of a railroad bodies corporate, with power to subscribe stock and assess and collect taxes to pay the subscription, but not declaring for what purpose the power is given, is in violation of Const. art. 9, § 8, providing that counties, townships, etc., may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes. Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 1, 27, 8 S. E. 14-17, 2 L. R. A. 242.

The words "corporate purposes," as used in a statute authorizing a corporation to take land for corporate purposes, does not include private purposes, even though in some sense it might be necessary to the corporation; hence the act is not unconstitutional as authorizing a taking for other than public purposes. In re Rhode Island Suburban Ry. Co., 48 Atl. 590, 591, 22 R. I. 455.

Providing a site for a state institution is not a corporate purpose, within the meaning of the Constitution. Livingston County Sup'rs v. Weider, 64 Ill. 427, 432.

The expression "corporate purposes," as used in Const. 1848, art. 9, § 5, means a purpose necessary or proper to carry into effect the object of the creation of the corporate bodies; and a tax by a school township or district to aid in the construction of a railroad, or to pay interest on bonds issued in aid of such road, is not for a corporate purpose. People v. Trustees of Schools, 78 Ill. 136, 139; People v. Dupuyt, 71 Ill. 651, 655.

A "corporate purpose," within Const. art. 9, § 586, includes the levy of a tax to pay bounties to persons who should thereafter enlist or be drafted into the United States army. Taylor v. Thompson, 42 Ill. 8, 13.

CORPORATE RIGHTS.

Privilege distinguished, see "Privilege."

"Corporate rights are well defined by Chancellor Kent and others to be franchises or peculiar privileged grants of the nature of incorporeal property." Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 154.

"Corporate rights," as used in Act Feb. 18, 1855, § 22, providing that every railway company formed under the act should pay a certain sum on the whole amount of capital stock paid in, in lieu of all other taxes, and section 31, providing that any alteration, amendment, or repeal of the act should not operate as an alteration or amendment of the corporate rights of companies formed under it unless specially named in the act so altering or amending, mean the essential and important rights of corporations formed for the particular purposes which the act had in view, as distinguished from the privileges and immunities which are not so fundamental, but which may nevertheless have value. The standard of taxation provided by section 22 was a privilege which had value, no doubt, while it remained the law; but in so far as it operated to the advantage of those corporations it was a disadvantage to all other corporations and persons, and therefore lacked the elements of equality which we expect to find in whatever we dignify as a "right" in contradistinction to a "privilege" or "immunity," either of which suggests advantage, discrimination, or favor. Detroit St. Ry. Co. v. Guthard, 16 N. W. 328, 51 Mich. 180.

CORPORATE SEAL.

An imprint in red ink of what purports to be a corporate seal, bearing the title of the corporation with the year of its charter, as prescribed by a vote of directors, placed on a bond executed in the name of the corporation, opposite the words, "In testimony of which, pursuant to authority vested in us for this purpose by the directors of said company, the seal of said company and the signatures of the president and treasurer thereof are hereunto affixed." is sufficient as an impression of the corporate seal. Here there is a substance affixed to the instrument more tenacious than wax or wafer, adopted and declared by the company to be their seal, and we know of no decision in this enlightened age which declares it to be otherwise. Woodman v. York & C. R. Co., 50 Me. 549, 550.

Corporations, like individuals, may use a seal with a peculiar device, if they have adopted such, or they may adopt for the occasion a seal of any device, or a paper and wafer without any mark. Tenney v. East Warren Lumber Co., 43 N. H. 343, 354.

Statutory definitions: A creature of the law, having certain powers and duties of a natural person. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 930; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 283; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2850; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 396; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 390; San Luis Water Co. v. Estrada, 117 Cal. 168, 177, 48 Pac. 1075. An artificial person created by law for specific purposes, the limit of whose existence, powers, and liabilities are fixed by the act of incorporation, usually called its "charter." Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 1831; Central R. & Banking Co. v. State, 54 Ga. 401, 406. An intellectual body created by law, composed of individuals united under a common name, the members of which succeed each other so that the body continues always the same, notwithstanding the change of the individuals which compose it, and which for certain purposes is considered a natural person. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 427; State ex rel. Saunders v. Kohnke, 33 South. 793, 795, 109 La. 838.

The word "corporation," as used in the Constitution, providing that corporations may be formed under general laws, is here used to denote such ideal bodies as had formerly been created under that name by charter or by special legislative act, and that meaning must be given to the word "corporation" in construing the general law that provides the mode of forming corporations. Oregon Cascade R. Co. v. Bailly, 3 Or. 164, 173.

"A body corporate or corporation is an artificial person created by the supreme power of the state, with the like powers and liabilities of a natural person in so far as they are given or constituted by the creator. It is called a 'body corporate,' says Lord Coke, because the persons composing it are made into one body. It is only in abstracto, and rests only in contemplation of law. 10 R. 50. So, again, he says (1 Inst. 202, 250) persons capable of purchasing are of two sorts—persons naturally created by God, and persons created by the policy of man, as persons incorporated into a body politic. If, leaving the quaint scholastic teaching of the father of the English law, we come to the clearer and directer sense of our own Marshall, we find the same prevailing idea. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 636, 4 L. Ed. 629. In corporations, says Prof. Woodeson, individuals are invested by the law with a politic character and a personality wholly distinct from their natural capacity. * * * Thus, then, the essential legal definition that covers the whole ground and expresses the very essence of the being of a body corporate is this: It is an artificial, legal person, a succession of individuals, or an aggregate body, considered by the law as a single continuous person limited to one peculiar mode of action, and having power only of the kind and degree described by the law which confers them. Such is the established notion of our common law. Such, too, as far as I can trace, is the doctrine of the modern civil law, modified by the jurisprudence of the European continent." Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 129, 142.

"There are many definitions of a corporation more or less expressive, but the essence of all is that it is a legal or artificial person with prescribed powers, having a capacity of succession or of duration without regard to the changes in its membership." Askew v. Hale County, 54 Ala. 639, 642, 25 Am. Rep. 730.

A corporation of necessity is composed of one or more persons, and the object of the persons composing it is to obtain some privilege or franchise which was not theretofore allowed to them as individuals. Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 48 S. W. 420, 421.

As was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 514, 562, 7 L. Ed. 939, the grant of corporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collective and changing body of men. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 208, 209, 112 U. S. 414, 28 L. Ed. 794; Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 385, 402.

All corporations, whether public or private, are in contemplation of the law founded on the principle that they will promote the interest or convenience of the public. Directors for Leveeing Wabash River v. Houston, 71 Ill. 318, 322.

Corporations are but aggregated individuals acting through the agency of man. They may consist of a single individual, or more, and they are no more ideal beings when thus acting than the individual thus acting. Goddard v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 57 Me. 202, 241.

As association.

See "Association."

Characteristics and kinds.

Corporations are of two kinds—public and private. Coyle v. McIntire (Del.) 30 Atl. 728, 730, 7 Houst. 44, 40 Am. St. Rep. 109.

The general term "corporation" is divided into those which are private only, formed by voluntary agreement for private purposes, and those which are created by the state for the purposes of government and management of public affairs, which are public or quasi public corporations. Murphy v. Chosen Freeholders of Mercer County, 81 Atl. 229, 232, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 245.

"Corporations," using that term to designate organizations merely claiming or alleged to be corporations as well as those in all respects legally constituted, have been divided into three classes—corporations de jure, corporations de facto, and corporations by estoppel. Brown v. Atlanta Ry. & Power Co., 39 S. E. 71, 73, 113 Ga. 462.

Corporations are in a certain sense legislative bodies. They have a legislative power when the directors or shareholders are duly convened—that is, fully adequate to settle all questions affecting their business interests or policy. Republican Mountain Silver Mines v. Brown (U. S.) 58 Fed. 644, 647, 7 C. C. A. 412, 24 L. R. A. 776.

A corporation is an intelligent, though artificial, person, its board of directors is its controlling mind, and it may be bound like a natural person by the consent implied by law from a course of conduct permitted and recognized by its governing body. Salem Iron Co. v. Lake Superior Consol. Iron Mines (U. S.) 112 Fed. 239, 241, 50 C. C. A. 213.

A corporation is defined by an eminent jurist as the personification of certain legal rights under a description imposed on it by the power which created it. "Residence, habitancy, and individuality are among the qualities of a corporation." Bank of United States v. State, 20 Miss (12 Smedes & M.) 456, 460.

A corporation, it was said in Ohio Ins. Co. v. Nunnemacher, 15 Ind. 294, is a creature existing, not by contract, but by statute. There may be a contract among individuals to enter into a corporation said the court in that case, but, when they have become a corporation, the charter, not contract, determines their rights. Huter v. Union Trust Co. (Ind.) 51 N. E. 1071, 1072.

A corporation, as to its property, is a mere trustee for its stockholders. Lenawee County Sav. Bank v. City of Adrian, 33 N. W. 304, 305, 66 Mich. 273.

The term "corporations," as used in the article relating to corporations, shall include all associations and joint-stock companies having powers and privileges not possessed by individuals or partnerships. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 215; V. S. 1894, 3675; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 943.

In the construction of statutes the words "corporation" and "company" may be construed as including any corporation, company, person, persons, partnership, joint-stock company, or association. Ky. St. 1903, § 457.

"Corporations," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall mean all bodies which have any of the powers and privileges of private corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships, and shall include limited or other partnership associations organized under laws making the capital subscribed alone responsible for the debts of the association. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

As citizen.

See "Citizen."

Company distinguished.

While the word "company" is frequently used to denote an incorporated association, it does not necessarily involve that idea, either in common speech or at law. The Imperial Dictionary says the word "company" is applicable to private partnerships or to incorporated bodies, but, when there are only a few individuals associated, the concern is generally called a "copartnership," the term "company" being usually reserved for large associations; while it defines a "corporation" as a body politic or corporate formed and authorized by law to act as a single person. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines "company" as an association of a number of individuals for the purpose of carrying on their legitimate business, and says that this term is not synonymous with "partnership," though every such incorporated company is a partnership. When these companies are authorized by the government, they are known by the name of "corporations." Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 678, 4 Misc. Rep. 172.

Company synonymous.

"Company" and "corporation" are commonly used as interchangeable terms, and are so used in Act March 7, 1899, relating to the incorporation of street railroads. Goddard v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 66 N. E. 1068, 1068, 202 Ill. 362.

Creation

A corporation aggregate is composed of natural persons. It is often stated in the books that such a corporation is created by its charter, but this is not precisely correct. The charter only confers the power of life or the right to come into existence, and provides the instruments by which it may become an artificial being. Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509, 518.

A corporation is a creature of, and created by, the law. People v. Golden Gate Lodge No. 6, 60 Pac. 865, 866, 128 Cal. 257. A corporation is a creation of the statute. People v. Dederick, 55 N. E. 927, 929, 161 N. Y. 195. A corporation is an artificial person, and in this country is solely the creature of the lawmaking power. Ex parte Selma & G. R. Co., 45 Ala. 696, 725, 6 Am. Rep. 722.

A corporation, in Colorado, is undoubtedly a creature of the statute. To create it the statutory requirements must be followed, and all the prescribed formalities which relate to the essentials of corporate existence must unquestionably be observed. Thus, a corporation which has issued no stock, and has received no stock subscription, has no power to contract. Aspen Water & Light Co. v. City of Aspen, 37 Pac. 728, 730, 5 Colo. App. 12.

The power of creating corporations is one appertaining to sovereignty, and is exercised by that branch of the government in which it is constitutionally vested. Formerly the right to corporate existence was always by a special charter or act of incorporation, but the power of special legislation of this kind is now restricted or abolished in nearly all of the states, and corporations are usually formed by persons complying with the general laws of the state on the subject. A corporation must have a full and complete organization and existence as an entity, and in accordance with the law to which it owes its origin, before it can assume its franchises, or enter into any kind of contract, or transact any business. When, however, it has fully complied with the law under which it is organized, it is a corporation de jure; but where the persons desiring to form such a corporation have made the attempt to comply with the law, and have failed in some essential matter, and afterwards have done business under such defective organization, then it is known as a corporation de facto. Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 676, 4 Misc. Rep. 172.

The creating or chartering of corporations involves an exercise of legislative power. They may be created by a particular statute granting the charter, or organized by virtue of general statutes prescribing the mode, specifying the powers and privileges to be enjoyed. In either mode the corporation is in a legal sense created by statute, and a law providing that no devise to a corporation shall be valid unless such corporation be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise clearly refers to such charters only as were granted by a statute of this state or organized under a general statute of the state. Any other construction would work a complete revolution of the policy of the state. Such law does not include or authorize a corporation created under the laws of another state to take a devise in this state, although it might take a devise in the state in which it was organized. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144, 165.

As distinct from stockholders.

While a corporation may, from one point of view, be considered as an entity, without regard to the corporators who compose it, the fact remains self-evident that a corporation is not in reality a person or thing distinct from its constituent parts. The word "corporation" is but a collective name for the corporators or members who compose an incorporated association. Home Fire Ins. Co. v. Barber (Neb.) 93 N. W. 1024, 1032; City of Nashville v. Ward, 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 27, 30.

A corporation is an artificial being, the creature of positive law, wholly distinct from the natural persons composing it, its identity being unaffected by changes, however extensive and frequent, of these. State v. Hood (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 177, 188.

Const. § 211, declares that no railroad corporation, organized under the laws of another state, doing business in Kentucky, shall have the right of eminent domain or the power to acquire real estate until it shall have become a body corporate in accordance with the laws of Kentucky. Ky. St. 1899, § 841, provides that no company or corporation organized under the laws of any other state shall maintain any railway in Kentucky until it shall have become a citizen, resident, and corporation of the state. Held, in a suit against a foreign railroad corporation which attempted to remove the case to the federal court, that the word "corporation" in Const. § 211, and the words, "company," etc., in Ky. St. 1899, § 841, referred to the corporation as a legal entity, and not to its stockholders, and the court would presume, for purposes of jurisdiction, that the stockholders were citizens of the foreign state. Lewis v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co., 76 S. W. 526, 527, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 948.

A corporation, in law, constitutes an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders doing business by its officers and agents. Ross v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. 544. It is legally defined to be an artificial person separate and distinct from its stockholders. Gaskell v. Beard, 11 N. Y. Supp. 399, 401, 58 Hun, 101; Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504, 507. Its officers are its agents, not the agents of the stockholders. Central R. & Banking Co. v. Smith, 76 Ala. 572, 585, 52 Am. Rep. 353.

"A corporation is a something—a legal entity, an artificial being or person—entirely distinct from both the stockholders, president, and directors." McCabe v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 827, 828.

"A corporation, says Mr. Cook in his work on Corporations, is an entity, an existence, irrespective of the persons who own all its stock. The fact that one person owns all of the stock does not make him and the corporation one and the same person." Rhawn v. Edge Hill Furnace Co., 51 Atl. 360, 362, 201 Pa. 637; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co., 46 Atl. 99, 101, 196 Pa. 25.

A corporation is a collection of many individuals united into one body, under a special denomination, having perpetual succession under an artificial form, and vested by the policy of the law with the capacity of acting in several respects as an individual. 1 Kyd, Corp. 13. A corporation is in reality an association of persons, or the entire body of stockholders. It is but a collective name for the corporators or members. 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 1, 227, 474. The shareholders vested with the corporate powers are the corporation or company. Tayl. Corp. § 50. While a corporation may, from one point of view, be considered as an entity without regard to the corporators who compose it, the fact remains self-evident that a corporation is not in reality a person or a thing distinct from its constituent parts. People v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 401, 408, 16 Civ. Proc. R. 1, 2 L. R. A. 33.

While it is true, as a general proposition, that a corporation may be created and constituted a legal entity, existing separate and apart from the natural persons composing it, yet it cannot act independently, or against the will, or abstain from complying with the direction, of the natural persons who constitute the corporate body. A corporation is in fact an association of persons united in one body, having perpetual succession, vested with political rights conferred upon it by the body creating it. Ford v. Chicago Milk Shippers' Ass'n, 39 N. E. 651, 655, 155 Ill. 166, 27 L. R. A. 298.

In contemplation of law, a corporation is a legal entity, an ideal person, separate from the real persons who compose it. This fiction, however, is limited to the uses and purposes for which it was adopted—convenience in the transaction of business and in suing and being sued in its corporate name, and the continuance of its rights and liabilities, unaffected by changes in its corporate members. A corporation cannot be formed for the purpose of accomplishing a fraud or other illegal act under the disguise of the fiction; and, when this is made to appear, the fiction will be disregarded by the courts, and the acts of the real parties dealt with as though no such corporation had been formed, on the ground that fraud vitiates everything into which it enters, including the most solemn acts of men. First Nat. Bank v. Trebein Co., 52 N. E. 834, 50 Ohio St. 316.

A statement that a corporation is an artificial person or entity, apart from its members, is merely a description in figurative language of a corporation viewed as a collective body. A corporation is generally an association of persons, and no judicial dictum or legislative enactment can alter this fact. Mor. Priv. Corp. § 227. So that the idea that a corporation may be a separate entity, in the sense that it can act independently of the natural persons composing it, or abstain from acting where it is their will that it shall, has no foundation in reason or authority, and is contrary to the fact. Buffalo Loan, Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Medina Gas & Electric Light Co., 42 N. Y. Supp. 781, 788, 12 App. Div. 199.

A corporation is to be considered as a person sui juris having an independent existence distinct from the individual stockholders. It becomes subject to legal responsibilities, just as a natural person endowed with judgment and volition. The stockholders are beneficially the owners of its property, and they may control its action; but it is beyond their power to exempt it from any legal responsibility which it may incur. Folsom v. Detrick Fertilizer & Chemical Co., 36 Atl. 446, 448, 85 Md. 52.

A corporation is composed of a number of individuals, authorized to act as if they were one person. The individual stockholders are the constituents or component parts, through whose intelligence, judgment, and discretion the corporation acts. Jones v. Williams, 39 S. W. 486, 490, 139 Mo. 1, 37 L. R. A. 682, 61 Am. St. Rep. 436.

A corporation is known and acts only in its corporate name. Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504, 507.

The word "corporation" is but the collective name for the corporators or members. People v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 401, 407, 22 Abb. N. C. 164, 16 Civ. Proc. R. 1, 2 L. R. A. 33.

Extraterritorial rights.

A corporation has no legal existence beyond the locality of its creation. Diamond Glue Co. v. United States Glue Co. (U. S.) 103 Fed. 838, 839; Runyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 122, 129, 10 L. Ed. 382; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 168, 181, 19 L. Ed. 357; Van Steuben v. Central R. Co., 35 Atl. 992, 993, 178 Pa. 367, 34 L. R. A. 577; Alleghany Co. v. Allen, 52 Atl. 298, 299, 68 N. J. Law, 68; Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co., 62 N. E. 587, 589, 169 N. Y. 506, 88 Am. St. Rep. 608; Sullivan v. La Crosse & M. Steam Packet Co., 10 Minn. 386, 389 (Gil. 308, 311). What rights it may exercise in other jurisdictions are permitted upon the principle of comity. Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co., 62 N. E. 587, 589, 169 N. Y. 506; St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 423, 20 L. Ed. 192. The recognition of its existence, even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of these states—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Van Steuben v. Central R. Co., 35 Atl. 992, 993, 178 Pa. 367, 39 Wkly. Notes Cas. 217, 219, 34 L. R. A. 577; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 168, 181, 19 L. Ed. 357; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 38 N. W. 474.

483, 70 Mich. 485; Home Ins. Co. v. Davis, 29 Mich. 238.

The tenure of its life and the limits of its powers are fixed by the laws of the state which permits its creation. A state cannot impose one of its artificial creatures on another sovereignty, or confer upon its corporations powers which they can lawfully exercise beyond its jurisdiction. By the comity existing between states, a corporation created in one state may, through its agents, carry on its ordinary business in another state, upon such conditions as may be prescribed by the alien state. But, strictly, corporate acts must be done in the home state, and all attempts to perform such acts outside the state of the corporation's domicile is a usurpation of power and wholly void. The migratory corporation is under the ban of the law, into whatever land it comes. Its pretensions to extraterritorial powers are in conflict with the sovereignty of the states it invades, and are everywhere denied. Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World v. Fraley (Tex.) 59 S. W. 905, 906.

"Corporations are artificial persons, existing only in contemplation of law. They must dwell in the place of their creation, and cannot migrate to another state." Rush v. Foos Mfg. Co., 51 N. E. 143, 147, 20 Ind. App. 515; Land Grant Ry. & Trust Co. v. Coffey County Com'rs, 6 Kan. 245, 253; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 132; Foster-Cherry Commission Co. v. Caskey, 72 Pac. 268, 269, 66 Kan. 600. But they may be sued, like natural persons, in transitory actions arising ex contractu or ex delicto, in any state where legal service of process may be had. Rush v. Foos Mfg. Co., 51 N. E. 143, 147, 20 Ind. App. 515.

A corporation exists only in contemplation of law and by force of the law, and when the law ceases to operate, and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty. But although it must live and have its being in that state only, yet it does not follow that its existence there will not be recognized in other places; and its residence in one state creates no insuperable objection to its power of contracting in another. The corporation must show that the law of its creation gave it authority to make such contracts; yet, as in the case of a natural person, it is not necessary that it should actually exist in the sovereignty in which the contract is made. It is sufficient that its existence as an artificial person in the state of its creation is acknowledged and recognized by the state or nation where the dealing takes place, and that it is permitted by the laws of that place to exercise there the powers with which it is endowed. Every power, however, which a corporation exercises in another state, depends for its validity upon the laws of the sovereignty in which it is exercised, and a corporation can make no valid contract without the sanction, express or implied, of such sovereignty. Runyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 122-129, 10 L. Ed. 382. See, also, North British & Mercantile Co. v. Craig, 62 S. W. 155, 157, 106 Tenn. 621.

Foreign corporations included.

As used in the Code of Tennessee, providing that when a corporation, company, or individual has an office or agency in the county other than that in which the principal resides, the service of process may be made on any agent or clerk employed therein in all actions growing out of or connected with the business of the office or agency, the word "corporation" means either a foreign or domestic corporation. Brooks v. Dun (U. S.) 51 Fed. 138, 142.

In Pub. St. c. 66, § 5, providing that actions may be commenced against corporations in the same manner as other civil actions, the word "corporations" includes foreign as well as domestic corporations. Sullivan v. La Crosse & M. Steam Packet Co., 10 Minn. 386, 392 (Gil. 308, 313).

New York City Charter (Laws 1897, c. 378, § 936), providing that any tax for personal property on any "corporation or person in the city of New York," which is in default, may be recovered by an action in any court of record in the state, includes only such persons or corporations as are residents of the city, and therefore does not include a nonresident. City of New York v. McLean, 63 N. E. 380, 381, 170 N. Y. 374.

Act March 24, 1870, providing that a railroad corporation in this state leasing its road to a "corporation of another state" shall remain liable as if it operated the road itself, includes any corporation outside of the state, whether chartered by Congress or by another state. Smith v. Pacific R. R., 61 Mo. 17, 18.

Incorporation distinguished.

A corporation is a civil institution. It is established by a law of the state from considerations of public policy. Its existence, its capacities, and its powers are all conferred by law from some real or supposed public benefit to result from it. It is a political institution of the state. "The words 'corporation' and 'incorporation' are frequently confounded, particularly in the old books. The distinction between them is, however, obvious; the one is a political institution; the other only the act by which that institution is created. When a corporation is said to be a person, it is understood to be so only in certain respects and for certain purposes, for it is strictly a political institution." Toledo Bank v. Bond, 1 Ohio St. 622, 642 (citing Ang. & A. Corp. pp. 3, 4).

Natural personal distinguished.

A corporation may be differentiated from a natural person thus: The natural person may make any contract or do any business not inhibited by law or public policy. The corporation cannot make any contract or do any business except as authorized by legislative grant. Parsons v. Tacoma Smelting & Refining Co., 65 Pac. 765, 770, 25 Wash. 492 (citing City of Spokane v. Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoer, 22 Wash. 172, 179, 60 Pac. 140).

A corporation is an artificial person which must act within certain limits. It differs from a natural person thus: If an individual gives his note, it is not necessary to prove anything in the way of authority, but a corporation must act by way of agents, and the authority of the agents who act for it is not to be presumed, but must be shown. Foster v. Ohio-Colorado Reduction & Mining Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 130.

The term "natural persons," in Act May 3, 1852, excepting executors, administrators, and other natural persons, suing or sued in a representative character, from the payment of certain costs, does not include moneyed institutions or corporations. Wagenhurst v. Delaware Tp., 4 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 533 534.

Powers.

A corporation is a mere creature of the law. It cannot exercise any power or authority, other than those expressly given by its charter or necessarily incident to the power and authority thus granted. Commonwealth v. Bringhurst, 103 Pa. 134, 137, 49 Am. Rep. 119; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 636, 4 L. Ed. 629; Seattle Gas & Electric Co. v. Citizens' Light & Power Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 588, 592; Werner v. City of Washington (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 705, 706; City of Columbus v. Beach (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 739, 743; Runyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 122, 129, 10 L. Ed. 382; Deringer's Adm'r v. Deringer's Adm'r (Del.) 5 Houst. 416, 429, 1 Am. St. Rep. 150; Codd v. Rathbone, 19 N. Y. 37, 40; Coyle v. Gray (Del.) 30 Atl. 728, 730, 7 Houst. 44, 40 Am. St. Rep. 109; Utley v. Clark-Gardener Lode Min. Co., 4 Colo. 369, 372. These are such as are best calculated to effect the objects for which it was created. Swan v. Williams, 2 Mich. 427, 434. It has such powers as are reasonably necessary to effect all the general purposes of the corporate creation, though not particularly specified in its charter, unless prohibited thereby or by some law of the state. Interior Woodwork Co. v. Prasser, 84 N. W. 833, 834, 108 Wis. 557 (citing Farwell Co. v. Wolf, 70 N. W. 289, 290, 71 N. W. 109, 96 Wis. 10). If a power is claimed for it, the words giving the power, or from which it is necessarily implied, must be found in the charter. The enumeration of the powers of a corporation in its charter implies the exclusion of all others not fairly incidental. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace-Car Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 484, 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. Ed. 55; National Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Home Sav. Bank, 54 N. E. 619, 620, 181 Ill. 35, 64 L. R. A. 399, 72 Am. St. Rep. 245. "It can have no other capacities than such as are necessary to carry into effect the purposes for which it was established. It is a creature of the Legislature, and can have no powers but such as are given to it by its creator, either at the time of its creation or subsequently, or such powers as are incidental to those granted." New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely (N. Y.) 2 Cow. 678, 709. Its power to do business and make contracts is limited by its charter. Powers not conferred by its charter or by necessary implication cannot be exercised. It can bind itself, and others can become bound to it, only in the mode prescribed by the law of its creation, and such by-laws as it may lawfully enact. State Ins. Co. of Missouri v. Redmond (U. S.) 3 Fed. 764, 766. None of its powers are original. They are precisely what the incorporating act has made them, and can only be exercised in the manner which that act authorizes; in other words, the state prescribes the purposes of a corporation and the means of executing those purposes. Purposes and means are within the state's control. This is true as to domestic corporations. It has even a broader application to foreign corporations, as to which the right to do business within the state depends entirely on the will of the state, and may be refused at any time, especially if the foreign corporation fails to comply with the laws of the state. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 20 Sup. Ct. 518, 524, 177 U. S. 28, 44 L. Ed. 637. It has no such general powers or rights of property as those which belong to a private citizen. Its powers are limited to the ends for which it was instituted. Robins v. Embry (Miss.) Smedes & M. Ch. 207, 264. Its power is derived only from the act, grant, charter, or patent which creates things. Davis v. Old Colony R. Co., 131 Mass. 258, 271, 41 Am. Rep. 221. It possesses only those powers which are imparted to it by the law of its creation, either expressly or impliedly, as necessary to its existence. The implied powers, however, are as much granted as express powers. If a banking or other corporation could do no act except in terms prescribed in its charter, its movements for all practical purposes would not last for a day. By the grant of a bank charter all the incidental and necessary facts required to carry the expressly granted powers into effect are implied. Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 180, 235.

A corporation is a creature of positive law, its rights, powers, and duties are prescribed by the law, and, beyond the legitimate purposes which it was created to serve, and the lines of limitation the law has drawn around it, it is without power to act or capacity to take. Thus, a banking corporation, while fully competent to do what is usual and necessary in its own business, may not own and operate a railroad or engage permanently in another business than that for which it was created. In re Gibbs' Estate, 27 Atl. 383, 157 Pa. 59, 33 Wkly. Notes Cas. 120, 122, 22 L. R. A. 276.

Among the most important of the powers incident to a corporation are immortality, and if the expression may be allowed, individuality, properties by which a perpetual succession of many persons are considered as the same and may act as a single individual. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 636, 4 L. Ed. 629 (cited in Codd v. Rathbone, 19 N. Y. 37, 40). And see Coyle v. McIntire (Del.) 30 Atl. 728, 730, 7 Houst. 44, 40 Am. St. Rep. 109.

To corporations, however created, there are said to be certain incidents attached, without any express words or authority for this purpose, such as the power to plead and to be impleaded, to purchase and sell, to make a common seal, and to pass by-laws. United States Bank v. Dandridge, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 64, 67, 6 L. Ed. 552.

It has inherent powers incident to its corporate character, such as perpetual succession, a capacity to sue and be sued by its corporate name, to take by devise, to purchase lands where not limited or restrained by statute, and the right to have a common seal. Primarily all these powers are essential and necessary to the very existence of a corporation, although they may be modified, limited, and controlled by any special provision which the legislative power may choose to adopt. Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504, 507.

"Professor Erskine, the learned Scotch civilian, says: 'A corporation is composed of any number of persons united or erected by a proper authority into a body politic, to endure in continual succession with certain rights and capacities of purchasing, suing, etc., as appear most suitable to the nature of that special community, and most necessary for answering the purpose intended by it.'" Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 124 (quoting 1 Ersk. Inst. by Macallan, 190).

Kyd defines a corporation thus: "Though many things be incident to a corporation, yet, to form a complete idea of a corporation aggregate, it is sufficient to suppose it vested with the three following capacities: (1) To have perpetual succession under a special denomination and under an artificial form; (2) to take and grant property, to contract obligations, and to sue and be sued by its corporate name in the same manner as an individual; (3) to receive grants of privileges and immunities, and to enjoy them in common. These alone are sufficient to the essence of a corporation." The same definition is given by Justice Nelson in Thomas v. Dakin, 22 Wend. 9, 70. Judge Dillon defines it thus: "A corporation is a legal institution devised to confer, upon the individuals of which it is composed, powers, privileges, and immunities which they would not otherwise possess, the most important of which are continuous legal identity, and perpetual succession under the corporate name, notwithstanding successive changes by death or otherwise in the corporators or members of the corporation." Angell & Ames define a corporation as a body created by law, composed of individuals united under a common name, the members of which succeed each other, so that the body continues the same notwithstanding the changes of individuals which compose it, and is for certain purposes considered as a natural person. It is not essential to the idea of a corporation that it shall have perpetual existence, for limited corporations are a matter of most common occurrence. Neither is it essential that it shall have capacity to sue or be sued under its corporate name, for it may be authorized to sue only in the name of one of its officers. That it shall have capacity to sue or be sued under some name standing for its collective body is all that is necessary. In the last analysis the only absolutely essential attribute of the corporation is the capacity to exist and act within the powers granted as a legal identity, apart from the individuals who constitute its members. Andrews Bros. Co. v. Youngstown Coke Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 585, 588, 30 C. C. A. 293.

Corporations have power in general to make contracts and incur debts in the prosecution of their legitimate business, and to give their promissory note for such indebtedness. Chaska Co. v. Carver County Sup'rs, 6 Minn. 204, 215 (Gil. 130, 137).

Corporations cannot consolidate their funds or form partnerships unless authorized by express grant or necessary implication, nor can they enter into any agreement amounting to a practical consolidation or partnership. People v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 401, 407, 22 Abb. N. C. 164, 16 Civ. Proc. R. 1, 2 L. R. A. 83.

Stockholders included.

The word "corporation," in a charter subjecting the corporation to certain liabilities, includes stockholders. Starkweather & Shepley v. Brown (R. I.) 55 Atl. 201, 204.

Within the provisions requiring every corporation doing business in this state to pay its employes at least once a month, the word "corporation" refers to the members who constitute the corporation, and the rights of the corporation are to be measured by the same laws as the rights of a person. Johnson v. Goodyear Min. Co., 59 Pac. 304, 305, 127 Cal. 4, 47 L. R. A. 338, 78 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The term "corporation" does not include stockholders, and the statute imposing a liability upon a corporation does not thereby impose the same upon the stockholders. National Park Bank v. Remsen, 15 Sup. Ct. 891, 893, 158 U. S. 337, 39 L. Ed. 1008.

As trustee.

See "Trustee."

Agricultural society.

See "Agricultural Society."

Association of brokers.

The open board of brokers in the city of New York is not a corporation, the obligations and rights of its members not being determined or fixed by any statutory enactment. White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 818.

Bank.

"Corporations most akin to this [those incorporated for purposes of trade] at common law were the creatures or favorites of the crown, created for some great public good, and as inducements to its subjects to engage in trade and commerce, so that the greatness and power of the government might be extended and enriched; hence large grants of privileges were made, and every facility and protection given to induce capital and individual enterprise to engage in pursuits that would bring back to the source of power so many corresponding benefits. Here they are regarded as monopolies, obnoxious to individual and private enterprise, and are to be restricted and governed by different rules. Such a corporation as this would not be one at common law. It lacks perpetuity, an essential element in a corporation at common law. The members are individually liable for the debts, an element utterly opposed to their very being." Said in a case construing a bank charter. Hargroves v. Chambers, 30 Ga. 580, 605.

County court.

A corporation is a legal person merely, but as used in Acts 1883, c. 168, providing that the Union Bank & Trust Company shall have the right and power to accept and execute all trusts of every name and kind which may be imposed on it, with its consent, by any person or corporation, whether the trust be that of a guardian, executor, trustee, the committee of an estate of a non compos mentis, or any other trust, it has a broader meaning, and gives such corporation the power to act as the administrator of a decedent under an appointment of the county court. If the word "corporation" be limited to its exact meaning, it would follow that the trusts referred to could only be such as were imposed by some corporation, but when these words are tried by the connection in which they are used, and the illustration given of them in the statute, it is seen that this could not have been the meaning, for while a great variety of trusts may be created by private individuals and also by corporations, yet neither of them can appoint a guardian or committee or the estate of a lunatic. This must be done by the chancery court or the county court. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Wright (Tenn.) 58 S. W. 755, 757, 52 L. R. A. 469.

Joint-stock company.

That which distinguishes a corporation from an unchartered joint-stock company is the difference in the extent of liability of the shareholders for the debts of the concern; in the latter the liability being that of a partner in an ordinary partnership. Cameron v. First Nat. Bank, 23 S. W. 334, 335, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 309.

"A corporation is an artificial person created by law, in whom the title of the property vests; and the owner of stock in a corporation has no title to the corporation property, the title vesting in the artificial person created by law, known as the 'corporation.' When we speak of a joint-stock company or copartnership, however, there is no such artificial person created, in whom the title to the property can vest." It was said by Finch, J., in People v. Coleman, 31 N. E. 96, 133 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 183: "We may thus see upon what the legislative intent to preserve them as separate and distinct is founded, and what distinguishing characteristics remain. The formation of the one involves the merging and destruction of the common-law liability of the members for the debts, and requires the substitution of a new or retention of the old liability by an affirmative enactment which avoids the inherent effect of the corporate creation. In the other the common law remains unchanged and unimpaired, and needing no statutory intervention to preserve or restore it. The debt of the corporation is its debt, and not that of its members. The debt of the joint-stock company is the debt of the associates, however enforced. The creation of the corporation merges and drowns the liability of its corporators. The creation of the stock company leaves unharmed and unchanged the liability of the associates. The one derives its existence from the contract of individuals; the other from the sovereignty of the state." It was held that the value of the real estate of a joint-stock association should not be taken into consideration in appraising the value of the shares of stock of such corporation held by a decedent for the purpose of levying a transfer tax. In re Jones' Estate, 74 N. Y. Supp. 702, 704, 69 App. Div. 237.

Rev. St. pt. 1, tit. 4, c. 13, § 1, providing that all moneyed or stock corporations deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise shall be liable to taxation, does not include joint-stock companies formed solely by private agreement and not formed under any statute, such companies not being "corporations" even within a liberal use of the term. People v. Coleman, 5 N. Y. Supp. 394.

"Corporations" and "associations" are convertible, and often used as synonymous, terms, so that as used in rule of court authorizing circuit courts to issue mandamus in proceedings involving the action of any officer or board of any county, city, etc., and an action of any private corporation or officer or board thereof, the word "corporation" will be held to include joint-stock associations, there being no reason for any distinction or discrimination between the two; and section 1255, 1 How. Ann. St., in relation to taxation, provides that the term "corporation," as used in the act, shall be construed to include all associations and joint-stock companies having any of the powers and privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnership. Attorney General v. American Exp. Co., 77 N. W. 317, 320, 118 Mich. 682.

The term "corporation," as used in Act 1849, § 5, providing that nothing in the act should be construed to confer on associations any of the rights and privileges of corporations, except as specially provided, was used in a liberal and enlarged sense, and might embrace what is usually known as a "joint-stock association." Thus, in Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, at page 70, it was said that a corporate body was known to the law by the powers and faculties bestowed on it. The use of the term "corporation" in its creation is of itself unimportant, except as it will apply to possession of its powers and faculties; hence every body which possesses the powers and faculties of a corporation is a corporation. People v. Wemple, 5 N. Y. Supp. 581, 582, 52 Hun. 434.

In the last analysis the only absolutely essential attribute of the corporation is the capacity to exist and act, within the powers granted, as a legal identity apart from the individuals who constitute its members. Under such definition a partnership association, limited, organized under the act of June 2, 1874, which is governed by a board of managers, with liability of members limited to the amount of their unpaid capital stock, power to sue and be sued, and to hold and convey real estate, in its associated name, is a corporation and a citizen, within the law relating to citizenship as giving jurisdiction to federal courts. Andrews Bros. Co. v. Youngstown Coke Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 585, 588, 30 C. C. A. 293.

Joint-stock companies are endowed with perpetual succession, dissolution not resulting from changes in membership, produced by death or otherwise. They may sue or be sued in the name of the president and treasurer, and a suit by or against the president or treasurer is not abated by death, resignation, or removal of such officers; and a judgment against the president or treasurer is not a lien upon their individual property, but execution is levied upon the property of the company only. These privileges not being enjoyed by natural persons and partnerships, but being attributes of a corporation, a joint-stock company will be held to be a corporation, as affecting its right to maintain an action in another state from that in which it was organized. Fargo v. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 787, 790.

Municipal or quasi public corporations.

Municipal corporations or institutions designed for the local government of towns or cities, or, more accurately, towns and cities, with their inhabitants, are, for the purpose of subordinate local administration, invested with a corporate character. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 9. Chief Justice Marshall's description of a corporation is in these words: "A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law." Mather v. City of Ottawa, 114 Ill. 659, 664, 3 N. E. 216, 218.

The people of a county are not a corporation, nor are they recognized in law as capable of suing or being sued. The county, however, is a corporation, and is the proper party plaintiff to object to a contract made by the board of supervisors for building a jail. Smith v. Meyers, 15 Cal. 33, 34.

Pen. Code, § 165, inflicting a penalty for offering bribes to any member of a common council, board of supervisors, or board of trustees of any "corporation," means only public or quasi public corporations. People v. Turnbull, 29 Pac. 224, 225, 93 Cal. 630.

Code, § 1025, providing a punishment for obtaining money by false pretenses from any "person or corporation," includes a board of county commissioners. The words cannot be construed so that the county is to be regarded as a corporation rather than the board, and so exempt a person indicted under the act from punishment. State v. Wilkerson, 3 S. E. 683, 686, 98 N. C. 696.

The term, as used in Const. art. 8, § 1, providing that no "corporation" shall be created by special laws, means corporations created for private or quasi public uses, and does not include corporations which are organized as a branch of the state government, such as a state board of examiners organized to examine applicants to practice medicine and surgery within the state. Iowa Electric Medical College Ass'n v. Schrader, 55 N. W. 24, 27, 87 Iowa, 659, 20 L. R. A. 355.

The term "corporations," in Act March 3, 1848, entitled "An act to provide for the recovery of damages in cases where the death of a person is caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default," and which authorizes a recovery against corporations, embraces both public and private corporations, and includes boards of chosen freeholders of the respective counties of the state. Murphy v. Chosen Freeholders of Mercer County, 31 Atl. 229, 231, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 245.

The word "corporation," as used in the constitutional provision that the General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity, means private, and not public or municipal, corporations. Its connection with the words "association or individual" shows this. State v. Caffery, 22 South. 756, 757, 49 La. Ann. 1748.

"2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 231, authorizing proceedings supplementary to execution against any person or corporation, is not to be construed as including municipal corporations, but is restricted to mean private, ordinary, business corporations." Wallace v. Lawyer, 54 Ind. 501, 507, 23 Am. Rep. 661.

The Code gives remedy by garnishment to all persons, and defines persons to include corporations; but the term "corporations," as here used, implies private, and not public, corporations. Brown v. Gates, 15 W. Va. 131, 160 (citing City of Memphis v. Leski, 56 Tenn. [9 Helsk.] 511, 24 Am. Rep. 331).

Gen. St. c. 129, § 50, authorizing the interrogation of officers of a corporation which is a party to a suit, applies to private corporations only. Linehan v. City of Cambridge, 109 Mass. 212, 213.

Within Comp. Laws 1879, c. 81, § 54a, providing that, in all personal actions arising upon contract before justices of the peace, any corporation or person within the county where the action is brought, in possession of property, money, goods, chattels, credits, and effects of the defendant, may be summoned as garnishee, the term "corporation" means private corporations organized for private purposes, and does not include municipal corporations. Switzer v. City of Wellington, 19 Pac. 620, 621, 40 Kan. 250, 10 Am. St. Rep. 196.

Under Const. art. 4, § 17, providing that when any bill shall be presented to create a corporation it shall be continued till another election of members of the General Assembly, municipal or other public corporations are not included. Constitutional provisions are to be construed, not so much as they were understood by the framers of the Constitution, but as they were understood by the people adopting it, and, in the popular sense of the term, "corporations" is applied almost exclusively to private corporations. State v. District of Narragansett, 16 Atl. 901, 905, 16 R. I. 424, 3 L. R. A. 295.

The provisions of Const. Miss. art. 12, §§ 13, 20, providing that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as the property of individuals, and that taxation shall be equal and uniform, apply to corporations wholly private, and do not prevent the grant of an exemption to a corporation of a quasi public character. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Levee Com'rs (U. S.) 37 Fed. 24.

The term "corporations," as used in Const. art. 9, entitled "Corporations," means private corporations, and not municipal ones. Land Owners v. People, 113 Ill. 296, 314.

Gen. St. 650, § 108, declaring that allegations of the existence of a corporation shall be taken as true unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney, applies to municipal corporations as well as private ones. Hixon v. George, 18 Kan. 253, 259.

The term "corporation," as used in Const. Neb. art. 3, § 15, declaring that the Legislature shall not pass any local or special laws granting to any corporation any exclusive privileges, is employed in its ordinary sense, and will not include a county, as a county, if a corporation at all, is a municipal corporation. Sherman County v. Simmonds, 3 Sup. Ct. 502, 506, 109 U. S. 735, 27 L. Ed. 1093.

Const. art. 16, § 8, providing that municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, entered on, or destroyed by the construction of their works, highways, or improvements, includes counties. County of Chester v. Brower, 12 Atl. 577, 117 Pa. 647, 2 Am. St. Rep. 713.

The phrase "the societies, corporations, or institutions now exempted by law from taxation," as used in the legacy tax law of New York (Laws 1887, c. 713), declaring that bequests to the societies, corporations, or institutions now exempted by law from taxation shall not be subject thereto, has reference obviously to such associations, corporations, or institutions as would have been included within the general terms of the statute but for the exemption itself. A bequest to a city is not exempt from the legacy tax under the exemptions to societies, etc. In re Hamilton, 42 N. E. 717, 718, 148 N. Y. 310.

The term "corporation" in Rev. Code 1852, as amended in 1893, p. 818, c. 145, relative to mechanics' liens, and applying to all building, and to corporations as well as individuals, does not extend to municipal corporations. George W. Emory & Co. v. Commissioners of Town of Laurel (Del.) 55 Atl. 1118, 1119.

School district.

Within the provisions of article 12, § 1, Const. Kan., providing that corporations must be created under general laws, and under section 5, providing that provision shall be made by general law for the organization of cities, towns, and villages, the word "corporation" relates to corporations proper—that is, to private corporations and cities, towns, and villages—and it in no way relates to counties, townships, or school districts. Traveler's Ins. Co. v. Oswego Tp. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 58, 63, 7 C. C. A. 669; Beach v. Leahy, 11 Kan. 23, 28.

State.

"The word 'corporations,' in its largest sense, has a more extensive meaning than people generally are aware of. Any body politic (sole or aggregate), whether its power be restricted or transcendent, is in this sense a corporation. The King, accordingly, in England, is called a 'corporation.' 10 Co. 29b. So, also, by a very respectable author (Sheppard, in his Abridgment, volume 1, § 431) is the Parliament itself. In this extensive sense, not only each state singly, but even the United States, may, without impropriety, be termed 'corporations.' I have, therefore, in contradistinction to this large and indefinite term, used the term 'subordinate corporations,' meaning to refer to such only (as alone capable of the slightest application, for the purpose of the objection) whose creation and whose powers are limited by law. The differences between such corporations and the several states in the Union, as relative to the general government, are very obvious in the following particulars: (1) A corporation is a mere creature of the King or of Parliament; very rarely of the latter; most usually of the former only. It owes its existence, its name, and its laws (except such laws as are necessarily incident to all corporations, merely as such) to the authority which creates it. A state does not owe its origin to the government of the United States, in the highest or in any of its branches. It was in existence before it. It derives its authority from the same pure and sacred source as itself—the voluntary and deliberate choice of the people. (2) A corporation can do no act but what is subject to the revision either of a court of justice or of some other authority within the government. A state is altogether exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States or from any other exterior authority, unless in the special instances where the general government has power derived from the Constitution itself. (3) A corporation is altogether dependent on that government to which it owes its existence. Its charter may be forfeited by abuse; its authority may be annihilated, without abuse, by an act of the legislative body. A state, though subject in certain specified particulars to the authority of the government of the United States, is in every other respect totally independent of it. The people of the state created, the people of the state can only change, its Constitution. Upon this power there is no other limitation but that imposed by the Constitution of the United States—that it must be of the republican form." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 447, 1 L. Ed. 440, 452.

A corporation is the creature of a sovereign power, deriving its life from its creator. The state is a sovereign having no derivative powers, exercising its sovereignty by divine right. A state gets none of its powers from the general government, and hence a state is not a corporation. Lowenstein v. Evans (U. S.) 69 Fed. 908, 911.

The term "corporation" includes the state, as it is a legal being capable of transacting some kinds of business like a natural person; and therefore the state is a "person," within the meaning of 1 Rev. St. p. 768, §§ 1-3, providing that all notes in writing, made and signed by any person, whereby he shall promise to pay to any other person, or his order, shall be negotiable, etc., and that the word "person" in the last two preceding sections shall be construed to extend to every corporation capable by law of making contracts. Indiana v. Woram (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 33-38, 40 Am. Dec. 378.

Under a constitutional provision that "the Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, borough, or township, or unincorporated district, by virtue of a vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company, association, or corporation, or to obtain money for, or loan its credit to, any corporation, association, institution, or party," it matters not whether the bounties to be paid by money borrowed by a county, township, etc., are in aid of the United States or state, of individuals liable to be drafted, or those who have advanced money to encourage volunteers or to comply with contracts made with volunteers. All these are either corporations, associations, or parties. A government is a corporation aggregate. It never dies, and it is this that gives it immortality. Speer v. School Directors, etc., of Borough of Blairsville, 50 Pa. (14 Wright) 150, 176.

The term "corporation," "as used in the act of Congress touching internal revenue, does not include the state, and consequently the income of the state of Georgia from the Western & Atlantic Railroad property, owned, controlled, and managed by the state, has not been made by law a subject of taxation." United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 322, 328; Georgia v. Atkins (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 241, 242, 35 Ga. 315, 318. "When the term 'corporation' is applied to a nation or state, it is employed in its most extensive signification, and, thus used, the United States or the commonwealths composing the United States, may be termed 'corporations'; but when the term 'corporation' is directed or refers to those artificial persons, bodies corporate or politic, interested for the promotion or advancement of religion, learning, or commerce, and for various other objects, public or private, where charity, industry, skill, and speculation can be freely and advantageously employed, and which owe their existence, name, powers and duration to a government, it is used in its ordinary, and, to the common understanding, explicit, sense." Georgia v. Atkins (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 241, 242, 35 Ga. 315, 318.

The words "corporation, company, or person," as used in the provisions of the Code defining and punishing forgery, include the United States, and the several states and territories, and all the several branches of government of either of them, all public and private bodies, politic and corporate, all partnerships as well as individuals. And the word "another," as used in such provisions, is as comprehensive as the words defined above. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, §§ 6612, 6613.

The term "corporation," as used in the acts of Congress touching internal revenue, does not include a state. United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 322, 329, 21 L. Ed. 597.

State university.

The State University of Iowa is not a "corporation," but a creature of the Legislature, whose property belongs to the state like that of its charitable institutions. It cannot, therefore, be sued in an action at law, and the proper method of seeking relief for grievances resulting from official acts of the officers of the University is by application to the Legislature. Weary v. State University, 42 Iowa, 335.

While in England, and possibly in a few instances in this country, corporations exist by prescription, the presumption being that there was a grant of corporate powers, but that all evidence of the same has been lost by lapse of time, the State University of Iowa cannot be considered a corporation where it was established by an act of the Legislature, by which act ten acres of land on which buildings were situated were granted for its use, and also two townships of land which had been granted by Congress were donated to the University, and certain persons were named in the act as trustees. The State University had no existence in any form prior to the act in question. No grant was made to an association of men acting under a collective name or otherwise, and the trustees designated were simply agents of the state whose successors were appointed by the state. These provisions were insufficient to incorporate the University. Weary v. State University, 42 Iowa, 335, 336.

United States.

In construing the statute of New York providing that a devise of lands may be made to any person capable by law to hold real estate, but no devise to a corporation shall be valid unless such corporation be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise, the court, in an action in which it was considering the question of validity of a devise of lands to the United States, said: "The term 'corporation,' in the statute, applies only to such corporations as are created under the laws of the state." United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315-321, 24 L. Ed. 192.

CORPORATION AGGREGATE.

"A corporation aggregate is a collection of individuals united in one body under such a grant of privileges as secures a succession of members without changing the identity of the body, and constitutes the members, for the time being, one artificial person or legal being capable of transacting some kind of business like a natural person." People v. Assessors of Village of Watertown (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 616, 620; Sanford v. New York Sup'rs (N. Y.) 15 How. Prac. 172, 175; Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504, 513; Sibley v. Penobscot Lumbering Ass'n, 45 Atl. 293, 294, 93 Me. 399.

A corporation aggregate is a collection of many individuals united into one body under a special name, having perpetual succession under an artificial form, invested by the policy of the law with the capacity of acting in several respects as an individual, and having collectively certain faculties which the individuals have not. Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 111, 115.

Corporations aggregate are artificial beings created for specific and limited objects, public or private, in order to conduct and continue in succession the interests pertaining to those objects, by the exercise collectively of appropriate legitimate means, such as natural persons may employ individually. The difference between the powers of corporations and individuals is to be found mainly in the limited objects of the former, and the necessity of their acting in a concrete character. Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawson (Va.) 3 Grat. 19, 20, 46 Am. Dec. 183.

An aggregate corporation consists of many persons united together into one society, which is operated by a continual succession of members. Overseers of Poor of City of Boston v. Sears, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 122, 125.

"A corporation aggregate is an artificial body of men composed of divers individuals, the ligaments of which body are the franchises and liberties bestowed upon it, which bind and unite all into one, and in which consists the whole frame and essence of the corporation." Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 70; Louisville, C. & C. R. Co. v. Letson, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 497, 552, 11 L. Ed. 353. "It must of necessity have a name, for the name is, as it were, the very being of the constitution, the heart of their combination." Louisville, C. & C. R. Co. v. Letson, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 497, 552, 11 L. Ed. 353. The powers and faculties which are usually specified as creating corporate existence are: (1) The capacity of perpetual succession; (2) the power to sue and be sued and to grant and receive in its corporate name; (3) to purchase and hold real and personal estate; (4) to have a common seal; and (5) to make by-laws. Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 70; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 667, 4 L. Ed. 629.

A corporation aggregate is an artificial person existing in contemplation of law, and endowed with certain powers and franchises, which, though they must be exercised through the medium of its natural members, are yet considered as subsisting in the corporation itself, as distinctly as if it were a real person. Hope v. Valley City Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789, 797 (citing Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. [4 Wheat.] 518, 667, 4 L. Ed. 629).

As distinct from members.

An aggregate corporation is a being created by law, entirely distinct from the individuals that compose it; and the essence of a corporation consists in the right to have perpetual succession under a special name, and in an artificial form to take and grant property, contract obligations, and to sue and be sued by its corporate name as an individual, and to receive and enjoy in common the grant of privileges and immunities. Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504, 513.

A corporation aggregate is an artificial being, a mere creature of the law, composed generally of natural persons in their natural capacity, but may also be composed of persons in their political capacity of members of other corporations; and the individuals, or any of them, who in their natural capacity compose one corporation, may in the same capacity compose another distinct and separate corporation—as, the president and directors of one bank, or any number of them, may be the president and members of another bank, or the incorporated managers of any other institution. And hence the corporation of the regents of the college of medicine and the corporation of the regents of the university are two ideal rational beings, existing only in contemplation of law, although composed of natural persons, and acting through and by the natural agents or persons composing them, respectively. Regents of University of Maryland v. Williams (Md.) 9 Gill & J. 365, 393, 31 Am. Dec. 72.

A corporation aggregate is but one person, having the same unity in its corporate character and existence as a natural person. However numerous they may be, the will and individuality of the corporators are lost or merged in the will and individuality of the whole. A corporation can have but one will, and one will can only be manifested by the potential and uncontrollable voice of the majority. It has, and can have, from the nature of things, no other mode of action. Charleston Ins. & Trust Co. v. Sebring (S. C.) 5 Rich. Eq. 342, 347.

CORPORATION AT LARGE.

By a "corporation at large" is meant the different ranks and orders which compose it, including the definite and indefinite bodies. Corporations in this country, however, have no ranks, orders, or integral parts corresponding to the constitution of old English corporations. Richards v. Clarksburg, 4 S. E. 774, 781, 30 W. Va. 491.

CORPORATION BY ESTOPPEL.

One who has contracted with a corporation as such is estopped to deny its existence as a corporation at the date of the contract in any suit arising thereunder, and such corporation has been, it seems to us, with great propriety designated a "corporation by estoppel." Whether or not the rule that there must be a charter or law authorizing the creation of a corporation, and a colorable compliance with the terms of such charter or law, applies to corporations by estoppel, is one upon which there is conflict of authority. The better doctrine seems to be that the estoppel prevails, notwithstanding the law under which the corporation claims to exist may be unconstitutional or otherwise invalid. Brown v. Atlanta Ry. & Power Co., 39 S. E. 71, 73, 113 Ga. 462.

CORPORATION FOR MUNICIPAL PURPOSES.

Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that "corporations for municipal purposes" shall not be created by special laws, cannot be construed to include counties. People v. Mo Fadden, 22 Pac. 851, 853, 81 Cal. 489, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66.

Const. art. 8, §§ 4, 5, declare that corporations may be created for municipal purposes by special act, but that no municipal corporations, except cities of over 5,000, shall be created by special act. Held, that a corporation for municipal purposes is either a municipality, such as a city or town, created expressly for local self-government with delegated legislative powers, or it may be a subdivision of the city for governmental purposes, such as a county, a school or a road district, but it must express some of the functions of government, either local or general. State ex rel. Chouteau v. Leffingwell, 54 Mo. 458, 465.

CORPORATION OF THIS STATE.

A corporation organized under the laws of another state, though permitted to do business in Michigan, cannot maintain a proceeding to prevent a corporation organized in Michigan from taking a similar name, under How. Ann. St. § 3960d3, providing that corporations organized in this state shall not take any name in use by any other organization of this state, etc.: the foreign corporation not being a "corporation of this state," within the meaning of the law. People v. Home Life Assur. Co., 69 N. W. 653, 654, 111 Mich. 405.

CORPORATIONS ORGANIZED UNDER ACTS OF CONGRESS.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that, where corporations are consolidated under and by virtue of an act of Congress, they are to be treated as corporations formed and organized under the act of Congress. United States v. Stanford (U. S.) 70 Fed. 346, 361, 17 C. C. A. 143 (citing United States v. Central Pac. R. Co., 99 U. S. 449, 450, 25 L. Ed. 287; Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449, 4 Sup. Ct. 437, 447, 28 L. Ed. 482; Pacific R. Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1, 14, 5 Sup. Ct. 1113, 29 L. Ed. 319).

CORPORATION SOLE.

"A corporation sole embraces but a single individual with corporate powers." Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 172.

"A 'corporation sole,' as defined by Kent (2 Comm. 273), consists of a single person, who is made a body corporate and politic in order to give him some legal capacities and advantages, and especially that of perpetuity, which, as a natural person, he cannot have." Codd v. Rathbone, 19 N. Y. 37, 39; Bank of Havanna v. Wickman (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 97, 98; Bank of Havanna v. Wickham (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. 134, 138.

"A 'sole corporation,' as its name implies, consists only of one person, to whom and his successors belong that legal perpetuity the enjoyment of which is denied to all natural persons." Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 101 (quoting Ang. & A. Corp. 18, 19); Brooks v. Dinsmore, 8 N. Y. Supp. 103, 15 Daly, 428, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 98. Such corporations, however, cannot take personal property in succession. Brooks v. Dinsmore, 8 N. Y. Supp. 103, 15 Daly, 428, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 98 (citing Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U. S. [9 Cranch] 43, 3 L. Ed. 650).

When a minister of a town or parish is seised of any lands in the right of the town or parish, which is the case of all parsonage lands or lands granted for the use of a minister, or of the minister for the time being, the minister, for this purpose, is a sole corporation, and holds the same to himself and his successors. Inhabitants of First Parish in Brunswick v. Dunning, 7 Mass. 445, 447.

Under Act Feb. 22, 1786, ministers hold parsonage lands in succession as sole corporations, and their rights and remedies as such are clearly defined under the common law. They stand on the same foundation as to their parsonages with all other sole corporations holding lands in succession at common law. A minister holds parsonage lands in right of his parish or church, and on his resignation, deprivation, or death the fee is in abeyance until there be a successor. Weston v. Hunt, 2 Mass. 500, 501.

CORPORATORS.

A corporator is one who is a member of a corporation; one of the stockholders or constituents of the body corporate. In re Atlantic Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 16 Alb. Law J. 453, 454, 2 Fed. Cas. 168, 169.

Under an act providing that the trustees and corporators of any company shall be severally liable for all debts or responsibilities of such company to the amount by him or them subscribed, until the whole amount of the capital of such company shall have been paid in, etc., it is held that stockholders are included in the terms "trustees and corporators." Shufeldt v. Carver, 8 Ill. App. (8 Bradw.) 545, 548. Not merely commissioners or promoters of corporations so organized. Gulliver v. Roelle, 100 Ill. 141, 147.

The term "corporators," as used in Bankr. Act March 2, 1867, c. 176, § 37 (14 Stat. 535), providing that the filing of a petition in bankruptcy on behalf of a corporation can only be duly authorized by a vote of the majority of the corporators at any meeting called for the purpose, means those who are members of the corporation; that is to say, the constituents or stockholders of the corporation. In re Lady Bryan Min. Co. (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 926, 927.

Corporators are the associates who are the getters up of a corporation, and whose functions cease with its organization. And so, where a charter of a corporation provided that "the trustees and corporators of any company organized under this act and those entitled to a participation in the profits" were to be held liable "until the whole amount of the capital raised by the company shall have been paid in and a certificate thereof recorded," it was presumable that the capital and certificate referred to were those required prior to the complete organization of the company. Chase v. Lord, 77 N. Y. 1, 11.

CORPOREAL

"Corporeal things" are such as are made manifest to the senses, which we may touch or take, which have a body, whether animate or inanimate. Of this kind are fruits, corn, gold, silver, clothes, furniture, lands, meadows, woods, and houses. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 460.

Corporeal things, in the Spanish civil law, are those things which may be seen and touched, and are either moveable or immoveable; the moveables being those which can move naturally by themselves or be moved by man, and immoveables being those which can neither move naturally nor be moved by man. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

Corporeal hereditaments are the substance, which may be always seen, always handled. 2 Bl. Comm. 19. Kent says corporeal hereditaments are confined to land. Whitlock v. Greacen, 21 Atl. 944, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 359 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 402).

Leases of coal stone and other like material are corporeal hereditaments, and constitute the essential part of the land itself, and are capable of absolute grant. Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 373, 375.

The right which a party has to the use of water flowing over his own land is identified with the realty, and is a real or corporeal hereditament, and not an easement. But the right of a party to have the water of a stream or water course flow to or from his lands or mill over the land of another is an "incorporeal hereditament" and an easement. Cary v. Daniels, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 236, 238.

A railroad's franchise is an incorporeal hereditament, as distinguished from land, which is a corporeal hereditament. Gibbs v. Drew, 16 Fla. 147, 149, 26 Am. Rep. 700.

CORPOREAL OATH.

The terms "corporeal oath" and "solemn oath" are used synonymously, and an oath taken with unlifted hands may be properly described by either term. "Corporeal oath" is defined by Webster as a solemn oath, so called from the ancient usage of touching the corpore, or cloth, that covered the consecrated emblems. Jackson v. State (Ind.) Smith, 124, 125.

CORPS.

See "Marine Corps."

CORPSE.

In Rev. St. § 3764, prescribing the penalty against persons, etc., having the unlawful possession of the corpse of a deceased person, the word "corpse" does not apply to the remains of persons long buried and decomposed. Carter v. City of Zanesville, 52 N. E. 126, 127, 59 Ohio St. 170.

CORPUS.

Corpus delicti distinguished, see "Corpus Delicti."

A body or substance, as used with reference to property, means the res or thing itself. Thus, the roadway, embankment, superstructure, and equipment constitute the corpus of a railroad property. Jackson v. Ludeling, 99 U. S. 513, 521, 25 L. Ed. 460.

With reference to the funds of an estate, the corpus is the principal of a devise or bequest as distinguished from the income derived therefrom. In other words, it is the body of the estate, devise, or bequest from which the income is derived. Appeal of Earp, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 119, 123; Keyser v. Mitchell, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 473, 476.

CORPUS DELICTI.

"Corpus delicti" means literally the body of the crime or offense. Webster defines it to be the substantial and fundamental fact of the crime having been committed; the proof essential to establish a crime; the subject of the crime itself as the body of the person murdered. White v. State, 49 Ala. 344, 347.

The corpus delicti is the fact that the crime charged has been actually perpetrated. Goldman v. Commonwealth, 42 S. E. 923, 924, 100 Va. 865.

"In a criminal case there must always be shown the fact that some crime has been committed. In other words, there must be a corpus delicti. That is, if a man openly confesses that he has killed another at a certain time, unless there is proof that the man was actually killed, even though the missing man may not come back, the confession amounts to nothing." State v. Hand 41 Atl. 192, 1 Marv. 545.

The corpus delicti is made up of two things: First, certain facts forming its basis; and, secondly, the existence of criminal agency as to the cause of them. People v. Jones, 55 Pac. 698, 699, 123 Cal. 65; McBride v. People, 37 Pac. 953, 955, 5 Colo. App. 91; Pitts v. State, 43 Miss. 472, 480.

The expression "corpus delicti" means primarily the body of the offense. This term means, when applied to any particular offense, that the particular crime charged has actually been committed by some one. It is made up of two elements: (1) That a certain result has been produced, as that a man has died or a building has been burnt or a piece of property is not in the owner's possession; (2) that some one is criminally responsible for the result. State v. Millmeier, 72 N. W. 275, 277, 102 Iowa, 692.

The "corpus delicti" is the body of a crime. The body upon which a crime has been committed, e. g., the corpse of a murdered man—the charred remains of a house burned down. In a derivative sense, the substance or foundation of a crime; the substantial fact that a crime has been committed, "or that the death of the person indicated in the indictment has been caused or accomplished by the acts of personal violence, or the direct criminal agency of some other human being or beings." People v. Dick, 37 Cal. 277, 281.

Agency or identity of defendant.

Proof of corpus delicti involves two things: First, a criminal act; second, the defendant's agency in the production of the act. State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441.

The corpus delicti—that is, the body of the offense—includes the production of a dead body, and proof that death was caused, not by natural causes, but by violence, and excludes accident or suicide. It has generally been held by the authorities to also include the identity of the victim and the identity of the party causing the death. In Lovelady v. State, 14 Tex. App. 545, 560, the court said: "The corpus delicti consists of two things: First, the criminal act; and, second, the defendant's agency in the commission of such act. Generally speaking, the criminal agency of defendant in producing the death is so involved as that testimony on both issues is admitted at the same time. But, undoubtedly, there may be cases where the court should insist that the evidence of corpus delicti should first be established before any proof of criminal agency is admitted. While, as a general proposition, the corpus delicti may be proved by circumstances, yet under Pen. Code, § 654, the proof of identity must be established by evidence outside the death of the party, and the remains of deceased or portions of them must be sufficiently identified to establish the death of the party." Gay v. State, 60 S. W. 771, 772, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 450.

The corpus delicti is the body or substance of the offense. This means and has always meant the existence of the criminal fact. In prosecutions for murder proof of the corpus delicti involves the establishment of fact that a murder has been committed, but includes neither the identity of the person alleged to have been killed nor the killing by the person accused. Evidence that a murder has been done, whether by the defendant or another, is proof of the offense. State v. Calder, 59 Pac. 903, 906, 23 Mont. 504.

"Corpus delicti" is defined in Whart. Cr. Ev. § 325, as follows: A corpus delicti, a proof of which is essential to sustain a conviction, consists of a criminal act, and to sustain a conviction there must be proof of the defendant's guilty agency in the production of such act. Flower v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 241, 53 C. C. A. 271.

The corpus delicti in all cases of homicide must be proved as an essential condition of conviction. To the corpus delicti, in this sense, it is requisite (1) that the deceased should have been shown to have died from the effect of the wound; (2) that it should appear that this wound was unlawfully inflicted, and that the defendant was implicated in the crime. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 311. Proof of drunken quarrels ending in no serious injury, which are shown by the autopsy not to be the cause of the death, are not proof of corpus delicti. McBride v. People, 37 Pac. 953, 955, 5 Colo. App. 91.

Corpus distinguished.

The term "corpus delicti" involves the element of crime on a charge of homicide. Producing the dead body does not establish a corpus delicti; it would simply establish the corpus. On a charge of arson mere proof that a building was destroyed by fire does not establish the corpus delicti. People v. Simonsen, 40 Pac. 440, 107 Cal. 345.

In homicide.

This expression "corpus delicti" figured largely in criminal trials from an early day, and yet its precise scope, force, and application have not been and cannot be embodied in a proposition or rule applicable to all cases. The idea indicated by it is not obscure. Thus, on a charge of murder, the corpus delicti is the killing of a human being, and is proved by evidence of the finding of a dead body under such circumstances as would indicate that the killing was felonious. State v. Potter, 52 Vt. 33, 38.

"Corpus delicti" is a term used in criminal law, which means the commission of the offense as charged, and in the case of homicide must not only include a death by vio lence, but must "to a reasonable extent exclude the hypothesis of suicide or death by the act of another person." Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 319, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

The term "corpus delicti" involves the element of crime, and in murder it is that the death was caused by criminal means used by another person, and not by his own act or by accident, where the death had been proved by identification of the body of the deceased. People v. Tapia, 63 Pac. 1001, 1003, 131 Cal. 647.

The first branch of a case of murder, the "corpus delicti," as it is termed in the law, by which is meant the body of the crime, the fact that the murder has been committed, must be clearly and conclusively proved by the government. The corpus delicti is made up of two things: (1) Of certain facts forming the basis of the corpus delicti, by which is meant the fact that a human being has been killed; the second, the existence of criminal and human agency as the cause of the death. Ruloff v. People, 18 N. Y. 179, 182. "Corpus delicti" which must be proved in a prosecution for homicide means the fact that deceased is dead, and that his death was criminally caused. State v. Miller, 32 Atl. 137, 139, 9 Houst. 564; United States v. Williams, 28 Fed. Cas. 636, 644; Pitts v. State, 43 Miss. 472, 480.

CORRAL.

To "corral" means to surround or inclose; to coop up; to put into a close place. This need not necessarily be done by means of an artificial structure, but may also be done by means of, or through the agency of, men and dogs, either alone or in conjunction with natural or artificial barriers of an inanimate nature, and is so used in Pen. Code, § 374, as amended March 3, 1893. People v. Borda, 38 Pac. 1110, 1112, 105 Cal. 636.

CORRECT.

In an agreement submitting mutual accounts between the parties to arbitration, a stipulation that the party shall accept the annexed statement of disbursements and collections as correct to date, the word "correct" could not have meant complete, so as to exclude all omitted items of disbursements or collections, but the meaning and intent of the phrase was that the schedule should be taken to be correct as far as they went and as to the items therein specified. Adams v. MacFarlane, 85 Me. 143, 151.

In Tax Law, art. 11, §§ 250-256, providing that a petition for writ of certiorari to review an action of the commissioners must contain a statement that application has been made in due time to the proper officers to correct such assessment, the word

"correct" was employed in its ordinary sense, and in accordance with its proper meaning, in connection with the particular subject-matter to which it referred. Where the assessment is illegal, it is appropriately required to be stricken from the assessment roll; but where there was authority to make it, but error only in the manner of making it, the direction, with equal aptness, is that it should be corrected. People v. Feitner, 64 N. Y. Supp. 321, 324, 30 Misc. Rep. 641

As revise.

Militia Act 1834 directs that the roll of the company shall be annually revised on the first Tuesday of May, and corrected from time to time, as the company may require. Held, that the words "corrected" and "revised" as there used were synonymous, and the word "corrected" implied and contained the term "revised." Cox v. Stevens, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 205, 207.

The words "revision" and "correction," as used in the statute providing that a property owner may by petition to the city council object to its acts and proceedings, and show wherein he may have been or may be wronged or injured thereby, and ask for a revision or correction of the same, mean that the council may be called upon to review that which had been done, and make the proceeding conform to the law. Hutcheson v. Storie, 51 S. W. 848, 852, 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 71 Am. St. Rep. 884.

Validity of debt implied.

The word "correct" in a statute providing that the final settlement of an executor's account in the statutory method shall be evidence that the charges for moneys paid to creditors, legatees, and next of kin are correct, cannot mean less than that the validity of a debt and the right of a legatee are as much pronounced correct as is the fact of his reception of the money. Wright v. Trustees of Methodist Episcopal Church, 1 Hoff. Ch. 202, 214.

CORRECT COPY.

See "Complete Transcript."

St. 1890, c. 421, § 21, relating to insurance, and providing that a correct copy of the application shall be attached to every policy which refers to it as part of the policy or as having any bearing on the contract, etc., includes one which does not differ in substance from the original, mere clerical errors not affecting the meaning of the application and misspelling being immaterial. Nugent v. Greenfield Life Ass'n, 52 N. E. 440, 441, 172 Mass. 278.

A transcript of a justice of the peace exhibiting a complete proceeding and judgment against the defendant therein named, and certified as a "true and correct copy," is admissible as evidence in support of a deed on a sale of real estate on execution thereunder, under Rev. St. 1894, § 624, Rev. St. 1881, § 612, which requires such justice to make out and certify a "true and complete transcript" of the proceedings and judgment; the phrases "true and correct copy" and "true and complete transcript" being equivalent terms. Collier v. Collier, 49 N. E. 1063, 1064, 150 Ind. 276.

The clerk in his certificate stated that the transcript of the judgment is a true and correct copy. A point was made that the certificate was insufficient for the reason that the word "correct" is used instead of the word "complete"; that the certificate should have stated that the transcript of the judgment is a true and complete copy. There is nothing in this objection. Bailey v. Martin, 21 N. E. 346, 347, 119 Ind. 103; Yeager v. Wright, 13 N. E. 707, 709, 112 Ind. 230.

CORRECT DESCRIPTION.

The mechanic's lien statute, requiring notice of lien to contain a "correct description" of the property on which the lien is intended to be enforced, means a description "which identifies the individual object intended to be designated." It does not mean a technical description. Gordon v. South Fork Canal Co. (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 817, 819; Springer v. Kroeschell, 43 N. E. 1084, 1088, 161 Ill. 358.

CORRECT ENTRY.

An indorsement of an examiner in the appraiser's department on an entry that it was correct merely meant that the entry was sufficient to cover the market value of the goods. Robertson v. Bradbury, 10 Sup. Ct. 158, 159, 132 U. S. 491, 33 L. Ed. 405.

CORRECT PLAT.

The statement in a surveyor's affidavit that the "plat is a correct plat" meant that the land is correctly platted and laid out. Timothy v. Chambers, 11 S. E. 598, 85 Ga. 267, 21 Am. St. Rep. 163.

CORRECTION.

The words "revision" and "correction," as contained in a city charter (Sp. Laws 1893, p. 25, § 27), relating to special assessments, and providing that any person might present a petition to the city council showing wherein he had been or may be injured by a proposed improvement, and asking for a "revision or correction of the same," means that the council may be called upon to review that which had been done, and to make the proceedings conform to the law, but it does not empower the council to do anything that it or its officers could not have done in the first instance. Hutcheson v. Storrie, 51 S. W. 848, 2 Wds. & P.—40

852, 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 71 Am. St. Rep. 884.

CORROBORATE.

As defined in Black's Law Dictionary, the word "corroborate" means "to strengthen; to add weight or credibility to a thing"; and an instruction by the court that the term means to strengthen, to make more certain, to give additional strength, is correct. Still v. State (Tex.) 50 S. W. 355, 358.

To corroborate means to strengthen. Therefore Comp. Laws, § 7384, providing that a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless he be "corroborated" by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, does not require that the corroborative evidence be such as will of itself support a conviction, but only that it shall support or strengthen that of the accomplice in the respect that it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. State v. Hicks, 60 N. W. 66, 67, 6 S. D. 325.

"The usual sense of the word 'corroborate' is strengthen, and in a legal sense, especially as used in the Criminal Code, evidence is said to be corroborated when it is fortified by other evidence of consistent facts, or facts which increase the probability of the truth of the testimony in question. But in another, but still a proper, sense, a witness may be said, and often is said, to be corroborated by his manner, his character, the circumstances surrounding the transaction; in short, as serve to strengthen his testimony, to render it more probable to impress a jury with a belief in its truth." Scheffer v. Hatch, 25 N. Y. Supp. 240, 241, 70 Hun. 597.

CORROBORATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

See "Strong Corroborating Circumstances"; "Strongly Corroborated."

The expression "corroborating circumstances," as employed in Hill's Code, § 1778, requiring two witnesses, or one witness and "corroborating circumstances," to convict a prisoner of the crime of perjury, means evidence aliunde which tends to prove the prisoner's guilt independent of his declaration. State v. Buckley, 22 Pac. 838, 840, 18 Or. 228.

CORROBORATING EVIDENCE.

"The term 'corroborating evidence,' as found in the books, is used in two distinct senses—the one general, the other special or technical. In the general sense it is used when we say that in any case, and as to any evidence, it was or was not corroborated. In this sense the evidence has no other function than to aid other evidence of a like or different character in giving it additional weight. Such other evidence, so aided, may or may not be sufficient of itself; that is a question solely for the jury. General corroborating evidence may corroborate any material evidence already in, whether that evidence goes directly to the issue or necessary legal elements in the case, or to giving solidity to a link merely in the chain of proof. In the special or technical sense of corroborating evidence, on the other hand, we are dealing with a substantive quantum of evidence without which the case of the party who is compelled to produce it must inevitably fail. Its materiality goes to the very core of the case. We find special or technical corroborating evidence necessarily present in at least three distinct classes of cases: First, in criminal cases, where it is sought to convict an accused upon the testimony of an accomplice alone; second, in civil cases, where the testimony is given by a witness as to some transaction of the party, dead at the time the evidence is required; third, classes of cases in which technical corroborating evidence is required in proving wills, and in some jurisdictions in proving the signature to deeds." As used in Comp. Laws, § 2082, providing that, in a suit by or against heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of a deceased party, an opposite or interested party to the suit shall not obtain a verdict, judgment, or decision on his own evidence in respect to any matter occurring before the death of the deceased person, unless such evidence is corroborative of some other material evidence, means "such evidence as tends in some degree, of its own strength and independently, to support some essential allegation of issue raised by the pleadings testified to by the deceased as evidence sought to be corroborative, which allegation or issue, if unsupported, would be fatal to the case; and such corroborating evidence must of itself, without the aid of other evidence, exhibit its corroborative character by pointing with reasonable certainty to the allegation or issue which it supports. And such evidence will not be material unless the evidence sought to be corroborated itself supports the allegation or point in issue." Gildersleeve v. Atkinson, 27 Pac. 477, 478, 6 N. M. 250.

The word "corroborating" is a word apt and fitting, and generally adopted by judges and law writers to indicate evidence confirmatory of that already given, and, under the rule that proof of seduction must be made by some corroborating evidence which does not emanate from the mouth of the seduced female, it must not rest wholly upon her credibility, but must be such evidence as adds to, strengthens, confirms, and corroborates her testimony. The change in the statement of the rule in an instruction that there must be independent evidence of such facts to that of corroborating evidence was proper. Mills v. Commonwealth, 22 S. E. 863, 93 Va. 815.

Corroborating evidence must be such as tends to connect the accused with the offense committed, and is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the crime, and the corroborating evidence may be either direct or circumstantial. Hozier v. State, 6 Tex. App. 501, 503.

"Corroborative evidence" is additional evidence of a different character to the same point. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1839; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 692.

Act March 12, 1870, § 2 (Stat. 1869-70, p. 291), provides that no divorce shall be granted on the testimony of either husband or wife, "unless corroborated by other evidence." The statute does not define to what extent the corroboration must go. In the very nature of the case, it would be impossible to lay down any general rule as to the degree of corroboration which will be requisite. Hence the statute only requires that there shall be some corroborating evidence. Evans v. Evans, 41 Cal. 103, 108.

The corroborating evidence required by Gen. St. 1878, providing that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless he is corroborated by such other evidence as tends to convict the defendant of the offense, the circumstances thereof must, independently of the testimony of the accomplice, tend in some degree to establish the guilt of the accused, but need not be sufficiently weighty or full, as standing alone, to justify a conviction. State v. Lawlor, 28 Minn. 216, 223, 9 N. W. 698, 702.

The expression "corroborated strongly," as used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 746, providing that in trials for perjury no persons shall be convicted except upon the testimony of two credible witnesses, or of one credible witness strongly corroborated by other evidence as to the falsity of the defendant's statement under oath, means that the corroborating evidence must relate to a material matter—that is, must tend to show the falsity of defendant's oath—and, taken altogether, it must be, in the opinion of both the court and the jury, strong—that is, cogent, powerful—and calculated to make a deep or effectual impression upon the mind. This character of corroborating evidence may be produced by the proof of independent facts or circumstances which, when considered separately, would not be sufficient, but when considered in the concrete would be strong. In other words, the corroboration may be by circumstantial evidence, consisting of proof of independent facts which together tend to establish the main fact—that is, the falsity of the oath—and which together strongly corroborate the truth of the testimony of a single witness who has testified to such falsity. Hernandez v. State, 18 Tex. App. 134, 149, 51 Am. Rep. 295.

CORRUGATED.

The word "corrugated" is an English word well known, meaning "wrinkled," and, as used in the term "shirred or corrugated goods" means "wrinkled." The word "corrugated" is used to explain, what otherwise might be unintelligible to the uninitiated, the word "shirred." Day v. Stellman (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 262, 265.

"Corrugated" or "shirred" India-rubber goods is a name given to India-rubber goods, manufactured under a Goodyear patent, "by the stretching of strips or threads of India-rubber to such an extent as may be desired, and covering the strips or threads on opposite sides with laminae of cloth, leather, or other suitable material, which laminae are united to each other and to the strips or threads by means of India-rubber cement, which will by the contraction of the strips or thread of India-rubber become corrugated so as to form distinct plaits between them, and present a corded appearance." Goodyear v. Cary (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 649, 652.

CORRUPT.

The term "corrupt" imports a wrongful desire to acquire or cause some pecuniary or other advantage to or by the person guilty of the act or admission referred to, or some other person. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6842, subd. 2; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

The word "corrupt," as used in the definition of a crime, such as conspiracy, means doing of an unlawful or prohibited act. United States v. Johnson (U. S.) 28 Fed. 682, 683; United States v. Frisbie (U. S.) 28 Fed. 808, 809.

A statute defining "usury" as the taking of more than legal interest with a "corrupt" intent means merely the intent to get more for the use of the money than the law allows. The word "corrupt" indicates, as there used, merely the commission of an unlawful act; and hence proof that the lender charged usury, or is responsible for it, sufficiently shows the corrupt intent. New England Mortg. Sec. Co. v. Gay (U. S.) 83 Fed. 636.

"Corrupt" is variously defined. Anderson, in his Dictionary, defines it as meaning to do an act for unlawful gain; and the same author defines the word "corruption" to be an act done with intent to gain advantages not consistent with official duty and the rights of others. "Corrupt" is also defined to be dishonest, without integrity, guilty of dishonesty, involving bribery, or a disposition to bribe or to be bribed. Where the chief of police ordered two unoffending citizens to be arrested, and while under arrest used towards them the most profane and insulting language, his acts, though willful and malicious, would not be corrupt unless prompted by some dishonest or knavish motives, as, for example, bribery, or unlawful gain, or some dishonest benefit to the officer or to some one in favor with him. State v. Ragsdale, 59 Mo. App. 590, 603.

"Corrupt," as used in St. 2 Geo. II, c. 24, § 7, punishing any person who shall "corrupt or procure any person or persons to give his or their vote or votes," is the agreement for the corrupt act to be done, and it is not essential that the vote should actually be given. It is the act of the party giving the bribe. Henslow v. Fawcett, 3 Adol. & E. 51.

CORRUPT FORBEARANCE.

A corrupt forbearance of money then due is as much within the statute against usury as an original loan, and within the meaning of the statute it is a loan. Gibson v. Fristoe (Va.) 1 Call, 62, 73, 1 Am. Dec. 502.

CORRUPT OLD TORY.

The words "corrupt old Tory," used in reference to a member of the Legislature mean no more than that such person was a Tory of an obnoxious description. The words do not impute that kind of Toryism which distinguish one of the political parties in England, or that which was applicable to one portion of the American community during our revolutionary struggle and for some time afterwards. The words of themselves do not mean that the person referred to was a traitor of some kind, or an enemy to his country. They merely impute to him the advocacy of a particular candidate for the presidency. If anything more than general scurrility was meant, the words impute some political creed or heresy which the person spoken of considered obnoxious. The qualities imputed by the adjective "corrupt" merely represented the person as one possessing a heart of general depravity. The joint application of the epithets "corrupt" and "Tory" has a tendency rather to qualify and limit, than to extend, the former, by confining it to political feelings or sentiments. Hogg v. Dorrah (Ala.) 2 Port. 212, 217.

CORRUPTION.

"Corruption," as applied to public officers, is a hard word, not always accurately understood, covering a multitude of delinquencies, great and little. But it is strictly accurate to apply it to any color of influence, of mere relation of any kind, on the administration of justice. Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 344, 351.

Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines "corruption" as being "something against law," and illustrates its application by the case of a contract for usurious interest, wherein it was "corruptly agreed," etc. Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Olla, 94 Ill. App. 323, 324.

CORRUPTION OF BLOOD.

"Corruption of blood" was an incident on an attainder for treason or felony. The doctrine of corruption of blood was of feudal origin, introduced after the Norman Conquest. The blood of the attainted person was deemed to be corrupt, so that neither could he transmit his estate to his heirs, nor could they take by descent from the ancestor. The crime of the attainted felon was deemed a breach of the implied condition in the donation of the feud "dum bene segeserit," and, the descent to his heirs being interrupted by the corruption of blood, his lands escheated to the lord. But this escheat was subordinate to the prior and superior law of forfeiture. Avery v. Everett, 18 N. E. 148, 150, 110 N. Y. 317, 1 L. R. A. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 368.

The expression "corruption of blood," as used in the Constitution, declaring that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted, when applied to a specific piece of property, is but another form of the expression "or forfeiture during the life of the offender." Heirs of Szymanski v. Zuntz (U. S.) 20 Fed. 361, 362.

CORRUPTLY.

The word "corruptly" imports a wrongful design to acquire or cause some pecuniary or other advantage to the person guilty of the act or omission referred to, or to some other person. Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, par. 7, subd. 3; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6842, subd. 2; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7, subd. 4; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4063; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2688; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 2178; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7715; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 810; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4544, subd. 3; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 3.

The terms "willfully and corruptly," in Code, § 1090, providing that it shall be criminal for any officer who is required to take an oath of office to willfully and corruptly do anything contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof, import that there must be a corrupt motive; and therefore the act of county commissioners in accounting for and receiving a greater amount of mileage than is due them is not a violation of the statute, where the money is not taken with any fraudulent motive. State v. Norris, 16 S. E. 2, 111 N. C. 652.

The court, instructing the jury in a perjury case, used the following words, "has intentionally, corruptly, willfully," etc. In such connection "corruptly" refers to the motive of the witness rather than the means by which his testimony is obtained, and the word could not be construed so as to imply that the witness had been bribed. In Overtoom v. Chicago & E. L. R. Co., 54 N. E. 898, 181 Ill. 323, it is said: "It is the corrupt motive, or the giving of false testimony knowing it to be false, that authorizes a jury to disregard the testimony of a witness." And in 1 Bouv. Law Dict. it is said: "An act may be corruptly done, though the advantage to be derived from it be not offered by another." "It would seem that a witness who should testify 'willfully, and for the purpose of concealing the truth,' would bring himself within the meaning of 'corruptly testifying.'" Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Ols, 61 N. E. 459, 192 Ill. 514; Id., 94 Ill. App. 323, 324.

In law, "corruptly" means more than mere illegal conduct, and implies moral turpitude and intentional fraud. It is synonymous with "actual and intentional wrongdoing" or "willful and corrupt dealing." Worsham v. Murchison, 66 Ga. 715, 719.

As knowingly.

The word "corruptly" is not as broad in its meaning as "willfully," but signifies the doing of an act for unlawful gain; viciously; crookedly. An allegation, in an indictment for perjury, that the defendant's testimony was "willfully and corruptly" false, was equivalent to alleging that it was "knowingly" false. State v. Stein, 51 N. W. 474, 475, 48 Minn. 466.

The description of an oath sworn to by defendant in a prosecution for perjury, whereby it is charged that the person has sworn "falsely, knowingly, and maliciously," necessarily involves "corruptly," which is the language used by the statute, as an oath could not have been taken willfully, knowingly, maliciously, and falsely without being corruptly done. State v. Bixler, 62 Md. 354, 356.

An indictment charging that defendant "willfully and corruptly" testified to what was averred to be untrue implies that the testimony was false to his knowledge. State v. Smith, 22 Atl. 604, 607, 63 Vt. 201.

As willfully.

"Corruptly" means viciously or wickedly, and, as used in an indictment that defendant corruptly and falsely testified, is not equivalent to "willfully" in the statute making perjury the act of willfully, corruptly, and falsely testifying. Williams v. People, 57 Pac. 701, 26 Colo. 272.

The word "corruptly," as used in an indictment for perjury, is not synonymous with "willfully," since "corruptly" means viciously, wickedly, while "willfully" means with design or with some degree of deliberation. Thus, to say that testimony was "corrupt" is to say that it is wicked or vicious, whereas to say that it was "willful" is to aver that it was given with some degree of deliberation; that it was not due to surprise, inadvertence, or mistake, but to design. United States v. Edwards (U. S.) 43 Fed. 67.

CORVEE.

"Corvée" is a French word, meaning the duty imposed upon labor alone of working the highways, which was a grievance contributing to the Revolution, since which time the roads have been worked by taxation. State v. Covington, 34 S. E. 272, 125 N. C. 641.

COSAS COMUNES.

In Febrero, Novísimo, "cosas comunes" are defined as those "qui sirven a los hombres y demas vivientes, como el aire, el agua llovediza, el mar y sus riberas." Title 1, lib. 2, tit. 1. Both writers cite chapter 3, tit. 28, pt. 3. In Hall's version of the law referred to, there are included in the things belonging as to property to none, and as to use to all living creatures, "air, rain, water, the sea, and its shores." Hall, Mex. Law, 447. This is probably a mistake of the printer. The words of the law are, "el ayre, e el mar, las aguas de la lluvia." Lord Denman remarks that Fleta, enumerating "res communes," omits "aqua profluens." Mason v. Hill, 5 Barn. & Adol. 1, 23. By the Mexican law the property in rivers pertained to the nation; the use, to the inhabitants. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 316, 10 Pac. 674, 707.

CO-SERVANT.

See "Fellow Servant."

COST.

See "Actual Cost"; "Estimated Cost"; "First Cost"; "Invoice Cost"; "Original Cost"; "Prime Cost"; "Real Cost"; "Whole Cost."

The term "cost" is certainly of an equivocal meaning. Thus the actual "cost" of a bale of goods purchased at Liverpool is composed of the price paid for it, or, in other words, the prime cost and charges, including commissions on the purchase; the packages, if any; and, if the goods were purchased at the manufactory, then it includes not only the prime cost and all charges attending them to the place of exportation, but also the charges before mentioned, and perhaps many others. Goodwin v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 625, 627. So, where it was claimed that a contract for the sale of boilers was to be made "at cost," and the agent of the seller computed what he said the cost was, and inserted it in the contract, the parties will be bound by the figures thus given, it being impossible to determine all the elements which would enter into the cost of it. Thus it is said that we are all familiar with the seemingly insuperable difficulty of ascertaining the cost, for example, of producing a pound of cotton or of making a yard of cloth; and perhaps no two persons engaged on the problem would agree on the prime elements of the calculation. Even in the simpler application to mere bargain and sale of a thing already in existence and not to be manufactured, the term is ambiguous, and so much so that it is not impossible that often it will be found to avoid the contract for incurable uncertainty. Hazelton Tripod Boiler Co. v. Citizens' St. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 317, 321.

"The word 'cost' is of limited significance, much narrower than 'damages,' for instance, which, in the case of laying out one railroad over and across another, has been held not to include compensation for the interruption and inconvenience to the business of the latter occasioned thereby. Massachusetts Cent. R. Co. v. Boston, C. & F. R. Co., 125 Mass. 124. In Lexington & W. C. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 226, the actual 'cost' of running trains was held not to include interest on cars, and to mean money actually paid out. And in Alphonso v. United States, 1 Fed. Cas. 395, under the revenue act of 1790, c. 128, § 66, it has been held that the words 'actual cost' mean the actual price paid by the bona fide purchasers, and not the market value, thus excluding any idea of profit or return. 'Actual cost' means real cost, as distinguished, among other things, from estimated costs, or other market price, which may include matters which do not enter into the real cost." Thus the term as used in St. 1890, c. 428, providing for the abolition of grade crossings, and providing for the payment of the "total costs" of the alterations, does not include the cost of the new station, but only the cost of altering the old one and making it conform to the new tracks and new approaches, and does not authorize the allowance of a reasonable advance on the actual cost of doing the work, so as to give a proper return on the portion of the road used outside of the limits of the improvement in carrying material excavated, and his compensation for interference with other traffic. In re City of Newton, 51 N. E. 183, 185, 172 Mass. 5.

A city charter provided that the cost of construction of sidewalks should be defrayed by the owners of the land fronting thereon, and that the cost might be collected by sale of the lot, etc. Held, that where the sidewalks were paid for by bonds, and the city's credit was such as to cause her a loss in so doing, the loss did not constitute a part of the legitimate cost of the work chargeable on the lot, but that the cash value of the bonds when paid out represented the actual cost of the work. City of Galveston v. Heard, 54 Tex. 420, 449.

"Cost," within the provision of the act of May 5, 1892, permitting a Chinese laborer arrested without a certificate of residence to show that he was entitled to such certificate, but was prevented by accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause from procuring it, and declaring that upon proper proof a certificate shall be granted to him upon his paying the "costs," does not mean the cost of his arrest and trial, but merely the cost of the certificate. United States v. Tye (U. S.) 70 Fed. 318, 319.

Of books.

A contract between publishers, by which one agrees to take any volumes of a certain book which the other may ship within a certain time "at the cost thereof," will mean all the cost thereof, including an allowance to the author, in the absence of evidence showing that the parties adopted a different construction of such language. Gray v. Harper (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1010, 1014.

Of commitment.

In Act July 20, 1790, relating to the arrest of a seaman absenting himself from his vessel, and providing that the master shall pay the cost of the commitment, to be deducted out of the seaman's wages, the word "cost" has the large and full sense of charge, expense, loss, and detriment, so as to cover the expense of a person necessarily employed in the place of a seaman who has voluntarily absented himself. Brower v. The Maiden (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 321, 322.

Of distribution of ballots.

Act June 19, 1891, § 13, imposing on a borough auditor the duty of printing and distributing ballots for the election of borough officers, and certifying the "cost of distribution" to the county commissioners for payment as part of the county election expenses, necessarily implies payment for the time expended by the auditor. Giving the words such meaning is not an enlargement of their scope; to say they meant less would be a restriction on their obvious intent. Corr v. Lackawanna County, 29 Atl. 745, 746, 163 Pa. 57.

Of erection.

A contract for the sale of a lot obligating the vendor to erect a house on the premises, to be completed by a specified day, and making it the purchaser's duty to pay any "increased costs in the erection of the house" caused by alterations made at her direction, cannot be construed to include taxes and interest on a mortgage which the vendor was compelled to pay, after the date fixed for completion of the house and the delivery of a deed, owing to a delay caused by alterations directed by the purchaser, since the mortgage existed as an incumbrance against the land for the erection of the house, and the taxes would have become a lien against the land before the date originally fixed for the delivery of the deed if the public officials had not accidentally delayed the performance of their statutory duties. Woolley v. Friedlander, 22 N. Y. Supp. 213, 67 Hun, 321.

Of insurance.

An agreement between the United States and another whereby such other party agreed to furnish all the labor, tools, and materials necessary to cut, dress, and box all the granite necessary for a government building, and the United States agreed to pay the full cost of labor, etc., and "cost of insurance" on the same, was not an agreement to obtain insurance or to become insurers, but the term meant merely that they would pay the "reasonable premiums of insurance" paid by the other party. Tillson v. United States, 9 Sup. Ct. 255, 256, 129 U. S. 101, 32 L. Ed. 636.

The "cost of insurance" for one year is the actual sum which will reimburse the insurer for its outlay, including death claims and operating expenses. Nielsen v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 73 Pac. 168, 170, 139 Cal. 332, 96 Am. St. Rep. 148.

Of seizure.

Under Act July 13, 1866, providing that the cost of seizure made before process issues shall be taxable by the court, it is held that the phrase "cost of seizure" may be properly construed to cover any necessary expenses of watching the property seized by the collector for such time as shall necessarily elapse between the seizure by the collector and the seizure by the marshal under process; but where a collector of internal revenue seized property as forfeited, and did not turn it over to the district attorney to have proceedings commenced for 37 days, and, the property being forfeited, the collector presented the bill for watching the property while in his custody, at $5 per day, as being cost of seizure, it was held that such a charge could not be regarded, under the circumstances, as cost of seizure. Fifteen Empty Barrels (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 42.

Of tuition.

Act 1886, c. 24, § 45, authorizing the admission to the schools of certain districts of pupils residing outside the district on the payment of the "actual pro rata cost of tuition" for all such children, means the tuition in the separate school districts, and not in the county at large. State v. Hamilton, 10 South. 57, 69 Miss. 116.

COST PRICE.

Value synonymous, see "Value."

"Cost" is a relative term, and differs in its meaning according to the circumstances.

under which it is used. Thus the "cost price" to an importer is one thing, to a jobber or middleman another, to a retailer another, and to a purchaser from the retailer still another. In determining what the contracting parties mean by such a term, reference must be had to the situation and the circumstances. Ordinarily it would refer to the sum which the seller had himself paid for the article, but it may refer to the sum paid to its original producer, or to some one of the numerous holders through whose hands it has passed between the original producer and the immediate seller. Herst v. De Comeau, 31 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sweeny) 590, 605.

A storekeeper agreed to pay a debt in merchandise out of his store, said merchandise to be sold and delivered at not over 25 per cent. of the cost price. Held, that the phrase "cost price" obviously meant the price paid for the goods by the defendant, and could not be construed to mean what they should have cost at fair market rates. Buck v. Burk, 18 N. Y. 337, 340.

"Cost price" means the amount paid for goods, or engaged to be paid; and where a discount is offered for payment within certain dates, but the payment is not made, the discount should not be deducted in determining the cost price. McCoy v. Hastings & Bradley Co., 61 N. W. 205, 92 Iowa, 585.

Sums allowed to the prevailing party by way of indemnity for his expenses in the action are termed "costs." Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 5497.

"Costs" are an allowance to a party for the expenses incurred in prosecuting or defending a suit, and are an incident to the judgment. Tillman v. Wood, 58 Ala. 578; Stewart v. Corbus, 13 Pac. 647, 648, 15 Or. 68; Stanton Co. v. Madison Co., 4 N. W. 1055, 1058, 10 Neb. 304; City Bank of Leadville v. Tucker, 3 Pac. 217, 218, 7 Colo. 220; Cary v. Ducker, 12 S. W. 204, 205, 52 Ark. 103 (citing Town of Norwich v. Hyde, 7 Conn. 529, 533); Musser v. Good (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 247; Howard Building & Loan Ass'n v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 102 Pa. 220, 222; Johnson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 13 N. W. 673, 674, 29 Minn. 425; State v. Dyches, 28 Tex. 535, 542.

"Costs" are but an incident to the judgment, and do not add to its force or effect. Hoover v. King, 72 Pac. 890, 882, 43 Or. 281.

"Costs" are a pecuniary allowance made by law to the successful party in a suit, or a distinct proceeding within a suit in consideration of and to reimburse his probable expenses. The word "costs" is a word of well-known legal signification. It signifies, when used in relation to the expense of legal proceedings, the sums prescribed by law as charged for the services enumerated in the fee bill. Apperson v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 388, 390; Neher v. Crawford, 65 Pac. 156, 157, 10 N. M. 725; City of St. Louis v. Menitz, 18 S. W. 30, 31, 107 Mo. 611; Alexander v. Harrison, 28 N. E. 119, 2 Ind. App. 47; Price v. Garland, 4 N. M. 365, 367, 20 Pac. 182 (citing Apperson v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law [9 Vroom] 272).

"Costs" are certain allowances authorized by statute to reimburse the successful party for expenses occurred in prosecuting or defending an action or special proceeding. They are in the nature of incidental damages allowed to indemnify a party against the expense of successfully asserting his rights in court. The party to blame pays the costs to the party without fault, and they are never allowed to both parties for the same services in the same court. Stevens v. Central Nat. Bank, 61 N. E. 904, 906, 168 N. Y. 560.

Costs which are incurred in prosecuting an action are usually adjudged against the losing party, in addition to the principal sum which may be adjudged against him. State v. Dyches, 28 Tex. 535, 542.

At common law no costs were allowed eo nomine, but in actions where the plaintiff recovered damages the jury were allowed to include his expenses, though the defendant, in case he prevailed, had no indemnity for his. Johnson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 13 N. W. 673, 674, 29 Minn. 425.

"Costs" are the statutory allowance to a party to an action for his expenses in conducting such action. They have reference only to the parties, and the amounts paid or presumed to have been paid by the parties seeking to recover such expenses. Costs are unknown at common law, and are only given by statutory direction." Bennett v. Korth, 15 Pac. 221, 222, 37 Kan. 235, 1 Am. St. Rep. 248.

"Costs are only recoverable by force of a statute, and the allowance of them in any case will depend on the terms of the statute." In taxing costs, the only charges which can be allowed are those specifically provided for in the fee bill, and are not to be increased or diminished at the discretion of the court. Apperson v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 388, 390.

Any charge for services not enumerated in the statute is not, nor is there any pretense for calling it, "costs." Neither a justice of the peace, nor the circuit court, ever taxes and allows the items of costs on the trial of the case. He only renders judgment in that regard that the party recovers costs, and they are known by the entire profession to be the expenses of a suit which may be recovered by law from the losing party. Chase v. De Wolf, 69 Ill. 47, 49.

Code, §§ 303, 304, abolishing all laws giving fees to attorneys, solicitors, and counselors, and giving to the prevailing party instead thereof a certain sum by way of indemnity, or his expenses in the action, and declaring that this allowance shall be termed "costs," intended only to alter or abolish one portion of the law regulating costs, and give the prevailing party the same thing in a different form. The term "costs," as used in section 304, prescribing in what actions costs shall be allowed of course to the plaintiff, comprehended all the costs of a suit, as previously. Wheeler v. Westgate (N. Y.) 4 How. Prac. 269, 270.

"Costs" are expenses necessarily incurred in a suit in a court of justice. At common law costs were unknown. Costs are altogether the creature of statute. Speaking of the statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1) Sir Edward Coke says: "Before this statute at the common law, no man recovered any costs of suit, either in plea real, personal, or mixt. By this time it may be collected that justice was good and cheap of ancient times, for in King Alfred's time there were no writs of grace, but all writs remedialls granted freely." 2 Inst. 288. In the United States, therefore, costs are all regulated exclusively by statute. As a rule costs are given to the prevailing party in civil actions, and the statutes giving them might include the state, when it sues or permits itself to be sued in civil actions. But there is a broad distinction between the status of a state instituting a prosecution in its sovereign capacity, to assert its sovereign rights, to enforce its public laws, or to protect its citizens, and the status of a state suing to enforce mere rights of property, as a person might do in a like case. There is no known statute giving costs against the Crown, nor is the state liable for costs in criminal prosecutions. Noyes v. State, 1 N. W. 1, 2, 46 Wis. 250, 32 Am. Rep. 710.

"Costs" are expenses which are incurred either in the prosecution or defense of an action, or of any process at law or equity, consisting of the fees of attorneys, solicitors, or other officers of court; and such disbursements are allowed by law. Appeal of Jane, 87 Pa. 428, 430.

Within the provisions of 1 Mills' Ann. St. 1891, § 677, providing that a successful plaintiff may recover against the defendant his costs to be taxed, the language "his costs to be taxed" cannot mean less than all his costs in the action to be taxed. For, the moment an attempt is made to limit these words to a part of his costs, we are met by the unanswerable question, what part? That which was before clear and certain becomes a matter of doubt and conjecture. Shreve v. Cheesman (U. S.) 69 Fed. 785, 789, 16 C. C. A. 413.

As all the costs.

Acts 1886-87, pp. 186, 187, amendatory of a former statute, which provides that, whenever a person is convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary, a certified copy of the bill of "costs" in the case shall be delivered to the contractor to whom said convict is assigned, and said contractor shall pay over to the clerk of the court in which the conviction is had the full amount of the "costs of the case," is to be construed as including all the costs in a case in which the convict was jointly tried with certain other defendants. Dawson v. Sayre, 80 Ala. 444, 445, 2 South. 479.

The "costs of suit" to which a plaintiff is entitled when he succeeds in a civil action includes all the costs belonging to the action, whether prior or subsequent to the rendition of judgment, and, if new costs accrue, the judgment opens to receive them. Kitchen v. Woodfin (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 693, 694.

An award for slander of $1 damages, and that defendant pay the "costs," entitles the plaintiff to judgment for full costs. The bare finding of costs, without saying more, must be intended to mean such costs as the act, operating on the subject-matter, will allow. Moon v. Long, 12 Pa. (2 Jones) 207, 208.

Attorney's fees.

The term "costs," when used in the statute, means legal or taxable costs, and does not include attorney's fees. Brown v. Corey, 134 Mass. 249, 250; Guild v. Guild, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 229, 233; City of St. Louis v. Meintz, 18 S. W. 30, 31, 107 Mo. 611.

"Costs" include certain sums allowed by Code to a party for the purpose of reimbursing him for amounts paid to his attorney, and also disbursements specified in section 3256 of the Code; and a judgment to the effect that trustees shall not have any "costs" on an appeal is also to the effect that they are not entitled to be reimbursed for the sums paid to their attorneys on the appeal. In re McCechron, 67 N. Y. Supp. 18, 20, 55 App. Div. 147.

In its legal sense, the term "costs" denotes not only the expenses incurred by reason of being a party to legal proceedings, but also the charges which an attorney is entitled to recover for his professional services. Rap. & L. Law Dict. A stipulation in a note to pay "all costs for collecting the above, not less than ten per cent.," includes an attorney's fee for bringing suit. Williams v. Flowers, 90 Ala. 136, 137, 7 South. 439, 24 Am. St. Rep. 772.

Under Comp. Laws, § 6065, permitting a justice on such terms as he may see fit, and on payment of costs, to set aside the default judgment, the term "costs" includes an attorney's fee specified in section 6143. Erepenbach v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 8 S. D. 575, 579, 67 N. W. 606.

The word "costs," when applied to legal proceedings, does not include counsel fees. A contract settling a suit, and requiring defendant to pay the plaintiff's claim and "costs," was construed not to require defendant to pay the fees of plaintiff's attorney. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Kroehle, 61 N. Y. Supp. 944, 945, 29 Misc. Rep. 481. See, also, McDonald v. Page (Ohio) Wright, 121.

"Costs and expenses," as used in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, § 126, relating to contests as to the compensation to be made by a waterworks company for land taken by it, and enacting that in addition to the purchase money, and before the promoters of the undertaking shall become absolutely entitled to the estate, or to have the same merged or extinguished for their benefit, they shall, when the right of any such estate shall have been disputed by the company and determined in favor of the party claiming the same, pay the full costs and expenses of any proceedings for the determination or recovery of the same to the parties with whom any such litigation shall have taken place, meant costs as between attorney and client, and not as between party and party. Hyde v. Borough of Manchester, 12 C. B. 474, 478.

The term "costs," as used in Code, tit. 1, § 7, providing that when full costs are allowed the sum fixed as an indemnity for the expense of employing legal aid should be as follows, is not used in its ordinary comprehensive sense, defined by Webster to be the sum fixed by law or allowed by the court for charges of a suit awarded against a party losing, in favor of the party prevailing, but is limited generally to the allowance for attorney's, solicitor's, and counsel fees. Belding v. Conklin (N. Y.) 2 Code Rep. 112, 113.

"Costs," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 640, providing that the undertaking given in an attachment proceeding shall obligate the sureties, in case the defendant recovers judgment or the warrant is vacated, to pay all costs which may be awarded to the defendant, cannot be construed as meaning counsel fees incurred and expended by defendant in the litigation, but only means the numerous items designated in the suit as "costs," together with fees of officers and witnesses, which may be recovered under its settled and well-defined provisions as a part of the judgment in favor of the successful party. "Counsel fees are separate and distinguishable items from those entering into the signification of the word 'costs.'" Northampton Nat. Bank v. Wylle, 4 N. Y. Supp. 907, 908, 52 Hun. 146.

Rev. St. 1881, § 1208, declares that in partition suits all costs and necessary expenses shall be awarded and enforced in favor of those entitled thereto against the partitioners. Held, that the words "costs and necessary expenses," as there used, did not include attorney's fees. Hutts v. Martin, 33 N. E. 676, 678, 134 Ind. 587.

An order that costs and expenses of a certain suit brought to enjoin creditors' proceedings against an estate shall be paid out of a fund in court does not include fees of counsel for the trustee who brought the suit. Ball v. Vason, 56 Ga. 264.

Pub. St. c. 230, § 22, providing for "costs of partition," means counsel fees, ordinary costs of suit, and other expenses of making the partition. Redecker v. Bowen, 23 Atl. 62, 63, 15 R. I. 52.

The term "costs," as used in Comp. St. c. 82, § 16, allowing an attorney a lien upon a judgment to the extent of the costs, etc., refers to the sums allowed the party to indemnify him from employing an attorney, and does not include disbursements or charges, such charges being provided for by another statute. Forbush v. Leonard, 8 Minn. 303, 308 (Gil. 267, 270).

"Costs," as used in Civ. Code Or. § 144, providing that the plaintiff in an action, before procuring a writ of attachment to issue, shall give an undertaking with one or more sureties, to the effect that he will pay all costs if the attachment be wrongful and without sufficient cause, not exceeding the sum specified in the undertaking, only includes an allowance for attorney's fees. Bing Gee v. Ah Jim (U. S.) 7 Fed. 811, 813.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 3047, requiring appellant, when he serves his notice of appeal from a justice's judgment, to pay the costs of the action included in the judgment, the attorney's fee, being included in the judgment by the act relating to actions in the city court of Albany, is a part of the costs. Schwemmer v. Stratton, 22 N. Y. Supp. 523, 66 Hun. 629.

Under Rev. St. § 2918, providing that in all equitable actions costs may be allowed any party, in the discretion of the court, the term "costs" includes attorneys' fees stipulated for in the mortgage sought to be foreclosed. Spengler v. Hahn, 70 N. W. 466, 467, 95 Wis. 472.

As costs accruing at trial.

Wag. St. p. 349, § 4, providing that "costs shall be paid by the state" in cases of acquittal in a criminal prosecution, means only costs that have accrued at the trial, and does not include costs which have previously been adjudged against the party. State v. Brigham, 63 Mo. 258.

Costs of appeal and new trial.

As used in Code, c. 13, § 2182, which provides that an undertaking for stay of proceedings on appeal to the circuit court from a justice's court must be in such an amount as may be deemed sufficient to compensate plaintiff for the use or profits of the claim during the pendency of the appeal, and for costs and disbursements of the action, the words "costs and disbursements of the action" must be construed to mean that the undertaking includes all costs and disbursements that may be awarded against the appellant on the appeal, and is not limited to include only the costs and disbursements of the trial in the justice's court. "Costs and disbursements of the action" must certainly mean the costs and disbursements which will accrue in the trial of the action, as well as those which have already accrued. Bilyeu v. Smith, 22 Pac. 1073, 1074, 18 Or. 335.

The words "with costs," in an order of reversal or affirmance in the Court of Appeals in a case where the allowance of costs is discretionary, means costs in the Court of Appeals only, and the Supreme Court has no power to allow costs after such a disposition of the case. In re Hood's Estate, 1 N. Y. Supp. 833, 49 Hun, 608 (citing In re Commissioners, 10 N. E. 545, 104 N. Y. 677).

Where a judgment in the Supreme Court provides that "appellants recover of appellee all costs in this behalf expended," such phrase means the recovery of costs of appeals in both the supreme and district courts. Bonner v. Wiggins, 54 Tex. 149, 150.

As costs on behalf of the state.

The word "cost," for which a person may be sentenced to hard labor, has been judicially declared. It includes all costs, including officer's fees incurred in behalf of the state. It does not include fees due witnesses summoned on behalf of defendant, or costs incurred by him in making his defense. Bowen v. State, 12 South. 808, 98 Ala. 83; Bradley v. State, 69 Ala. 318, 321. Such is its meaning in the statute authorizing the clerk of the criminal court to be paid the costs out of the fine and forfeiture fund when the defendant is acquitted (Burgin v. Hawkins, 14 South. 771, 772, 101 Ala. 326), and as used in Code, §§ 4502, 4504, which permits one accused of a misdemeanor to confess judgment with good and sufficient sureties for the fine and costs (Bowen v. State, 12 South. 808, 809, 98 Ala. 83).

As costs of prosecution.

The term "costs," in Mills' Ann. St. § 699, providing that costs in criminal cases shall be paid by the county when the defendant is convicted and is unable to pay them, and when defendant is acquitted, unless the prosecuting witness be adjudged to pay them, refers only to the costs of the prosecution, and not to those of defendant. Board of Com'rs v. Wilson, 34 Pac. 265, 268, 3 Colo. App. 492. See, also, Williams v. Northumberland County, 20 Atl. 405, 110 Pa. 48; Hutt v. Winnebago County Sup'rs, 19 Wis. 116, 128.

Damages.

An indemnity bond, after reciting that an obligee had levied on certain property by virtue of an execution as belonging to the judgment creditor, and that the property had been replevied by D., contained the condition that if the sheriff should defend the replevin suit the obligor would indemnify and save him from all costs, charges, and expenses that he should incur in defending the suit. Held, that the term "all costs, charges, and expenses in defending the suit" meant expenses of the defense strictly, and hence did not include the damages and costs recovered by D. by reason of the wrongful levy. Scott v. Tyler (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 202, 205.

Costs are in the nature of damages, and, as damages and interest, are considered in some sense as the same. Douglass v. McCoy, 24 W. Va. 722, 727 (citing McRea v. Brown [Va.] 2 Munf. 46, 48).

Although costs were never given at the common law by the name of "costs," yet in reality they were also included in the quantum of damages in actions where damages were given, and in such cases were assessed by the jury. Aller v. Shurts, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 188.

A statute providing that on the trial of the traverse of an indictment for a forcible entry and detainer, if the traverse be taken and tried against the person indicted, the person convicted shall pay such "costs and damages" to the party complaining as shall be assessed by the justices or justice before whom the same is tried, does not permit of the construction that the justice who awards the restitution may impose on the party the payment of a gross sum in "damages" as contradistinguished from "costs." The word "damages" is considered in law in two several significations, the one properly and generally, the other relatively; properly, when damages are founded on the statutes where costs are included within the word "damages," and taken as damages; relatively, when the injury declared on existed before the writ brought, and is the foundation of the suit—in such case damages do not mean "costs." Fitch v. People (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 141, 142.

The statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I, c. 1 (A. D. 1279), has usually been considered as creating the right to recover costs, and hence the maxim that "costs are recoverable only by statute." That the right to costs is a creature of the statute is generally, but not exclusively, correct. Even before the statute of Gloucester, in cases where damages were recovered, a compensation equivalent to costs was assessed by the jury and included in the quantum of damages. Eft v. Reeve, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 139, 140.

As debt.

As debt contracted, see "Debt."

As debt founded on contract, see "Debt Founded on Contract."

In judgment for as debt, see "Debt."

Disbursements distinguished.

"There seems to be no little confusion, even in the books, in the use of the terms 'costs' and 'disbursements,' one sometimes being used for the other; and we must look to the sense in which those terms are intended to be used, more than to their strict, technical signification. The theory seems to have been that the fees of the several officers of court, as well as the witnesses, would be paid by the party at the time he called their services into requisition, and, when that is done, the amounts thus paid would properly constitute disbursements; but, unless this is done, we do not see how such fees would be properly classed as disbursements, when nothing has been disbursed; and, in such case, which very frequently occurs, we do not see why such fees may not properly be taxed as costs due to the several officers of court. Indeed, we suppose that a good deal of the confusion in the use of the terms 'costs' and 'disbursements' has arisen from the conflict between the theory and the practice; the theory being that the fees of the several officers of court and the witnesses are paid by the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, at the time the services are rendered, in which case they would very properly be termed 'disbursements,' and taxed as such, in order to reimburse the party for the outlay he has been required to make, while the practice in many cases is that such fees are not paid at the time, but, remaining due to the several officers at the termination of the action, are taxed as costs due to such officers." Dauntless Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 24 S. C. 536, 541.

In general use, the term "costs," when employed with reference to litigation, embraces both disbursements and specific sums allowed by statute as indemnity to the prevailing party for his expenses. In a narrower sense, the term "costs" excludes disbursements. Giving the term its most liberal signification, it could embrace only the taxable costs and disbursements in an action. Hegar v. De Groat, 3 N. D. 354, 358, 56 N. W. 150.

Expenses.

Acts 1889, p. 120, § 1, provides that, within 30 days after the termination of any cause in any circuit court that was tried on change of venue from another county, the clerk of such court shall make out an itemized list of all the expenses incurred by his county in the trial of the cause, and present it to the county court of the county where the cause originated. Section 2 provides that the county court to whom any such bill of costs is presented, properly authenticated, shall allow the same, as though the cause had terminated in his own county. Held, that the word "costs," in section 2, should be construed to mean "expenses," and that the county in which the action was begun was liable on change of venue for all "expenses" incurred by the trial court by reason of the change, including current expenses of the court, as well as those for which it was already liable—the costs of the cause. Hempstead County v. Royston, 23 S. W. 650, 651, 58 Ark. 113.

Rev. St. § 1852, which entitles the plaintiff to the costs and expenses of prosecuting condemnation proceedings when the company, by its neglect or omission, has compelled the plaintiff to institute the same, includes all necessary expenditures in that behalf, and is not limited to what would be taxable costs in an action. Taylor v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry., 53 N. W. 853, 855, 83 Wis. 645.

The word "costs" imports the expenses of the suit, which may be recovered by law from the losing party. Schlesinger v. Arline, 31 Fed. 648, 651 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

The word "costs," as used in Civ. Code, § 2778, subds. 3, 4, relating to costs of the litigation, is used in an extended sense, and includes all things which are necessary in order to make the litigation effectual. Showers v. Wadsworth, 22 Pac. 663, 665, 81 Cal. 270.

Gen. St. § 969, provides that sureties on the recognizance of a person charged with a criminal offense may, at any time before judgment is rendered against them, seize and surrender such person to the sheriff of the county in which the recognizance was taken, and that the sheriff shall take such person into custody, and acknowledge in writing his surrender, and that the sureties shall thereupon be discharged on payment of all costs. Held, that the word "costs" includes not only the costs taxable by the clerk, and the fees which the sheriff is entitled to receive for the service and return of the papers, but also all expenses the law officers might legitimately pay out, or have a right to charge in connection with the capture and return of the criminal for trial. Ayres v. People, 32 Pac. 77, 78, 3 Colo. App. 117.

Pub. St. c. 227, § 7, relating to the release of poor tort debtors upon petition to any justice of the Supreme Court, the last provision of which is as follows, "provided, however, that any person who shall have been imprisoned as aforesaid upon a writ issued out of the justice court or upon execution wherein the debt of damages and costs shall not exceed one hundred dollars," etc., means the costs specified in the execution itself, and does not include the prisoner's board in jail. In re Millard, 13 R. I. 178, 179.

The term "costs," as used in the provisions of the Code requiring the state and county to pay, in certain criminal proceedings, all costs accruing under existing laws on behalf of the state or county, as the case may be, for the faithful prosecution and safekeeping of the defendant, includes the cost of boarding juries and that of the jailer. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 7622.

The word "costs," used in sections 5, 7, St. 1834, relating to the impounding of beasts running at large, is not used in reference to any claim that may be made by the impounder, but refers to those undefined expenses which may arise during the after-proceedings required by the statute. Palmer v. Spaulding, 17 Me. (5 Shep.) 239, 243.

The word "costs," as used in an assignment of a policy to secure notes, which provided that if the policy matured before payment, and the assignee would pay to the beneficiary the balance of the policy, less "costs of collecting the same," does not refer to the court costs, but to the expenses which the assignee might incur in collecting the policy. Ballinger v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 91 N. W. 767, 768, 118 Iowa, 23.

Expense of reference.

The term "costs," as applied to a reference to hear, try, and determine, made on a stipulation in an action in the Supreme Court, with a provision that costs of the reference shall be taxed, has no defined legal meaning. We think the import of these words is the ordinary expenses incident to reference, namely, disbursements, referee's fees, witness' fees, and other proper charges, as upon the trial of a case. Nichols v. Moloughney, 82 N. Y. Supp. 949, 950, 85 App. Div. 1.

The word "costs" as used in an award of arbitrators, allowing a certain sum in full of all damages and costs, means legal costs to be recovered in a suit, and not the expenses of a reference. Buckley v. Ellmaker (Pa.) 13 Serg. & R. 71, 79.

Extra allowance.

The term "costs" does not include an extra allowance, and therefore a direction by an appellate court, on the remand of a cause, to allow costs to a party, does not authorize an extra allowance by the trial court. Haskell v. King, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1112, 1114, 54 App. Div. 441.

Fees distinguished.

"Costs and fees" are altogether different in their nature generally. The one is an allowance to a party of expenses incurred in the successful transaction or defense of a suit. The other is compensation to an officer for services rendered in the progress of the cause. Bradley v. State, 69 Ala. 318, 321; Howard Building & Loan Ass'n v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 102 Pa. 220, 222; Musser v. Good (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 247; Crawford v. Bradford, 2 South. 782, 783, 23 Fla. 404.

Costs are an allowance to a party for the expenses incurred in prosecuting or defending a suit, and incident to the judgment. There is a manifest difference between costs and fees. Fees are compensation to public officers for services rendered individuals, not in the course of litigation. Tillman v. Wood, 58 Ala. 578, 579.

The word "costs" is a word of known legal signification. It signifies, when used in relation to the existence of legal proceedings, the sums prescribed by law as charges for the services enumerated in the fee bill. The terms "fees and costs" are often used interchangeably, as having the same application; but, accurately speaking, the term "fees" is applicable to the items chargeable by law as between the officers or witnesses, and the party whom he serves, while the term "costs" has reference to the expenses of litigation as between litigants. Alexander v. Harrison, 28 N. E. 119, 120, 2 Ind. App. 47.

As part of fine or judgment.

See "Fine"; "Judgment."

Master's costs.

The term "costs," as used in Rev. St. 1893, § 2548, as amended by the act of 1897 providing that, when the property sought to be partitioned does not exceed $1,000 in value, the costs shall be one-half of the costs allowed when the value exceeds that sum, and declaring that this provision shall apply to all costs in the cause, includes fees allowed the officers, including the commission allowed to the master for making the sale, for, as the act stood before the amendment in 1897, there was an exception of clerk's and sheriff's costs, and the term manifestly was intended to include clerk's and sheriff's fees, and thus indicates an intention to include all officers' fees. Bryan v. Ream, 37 S. E. 921, 59 S. C. 340.

The compensation of a master, as respects the party who has it to pay, is costs, and not a fee. As an item of expense in an equity case, the master's fee is included in the general costs of the suit. Bradley v. West Chester St. Ry. Co., 28 Atl. 500, 160 Pa. 72.

Payment of judgment.

An employer's liability insurance policy providing that, if any legal proceedings are taken against the assured to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident, the insurer will defend the same, "at its own cost," in the name and on behalf of the assured, cannot be interpreted to mean not only that the insurer should assume all the expense of defending the suit, but would also pay any judgment that might be recovered. Rumford Falls Paper Co. v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 43 Atl. 503, 505, 92 Me. 574.

Receiver's and trustee's costs.

The costs of a receiver in an action where goods are attached are to be included in the term "costs" taxable against the person against whom judgment is rendered, though not as technical costs taxed by law under statutory fee bills. Hetterman v. Young (Tenn.) 61 S. W. 1085, 1087.

Upon the final determination of the case, in which a receiver has been appointed, the amount of the receiver's compensation is generally held to be a part of the costs in the cause and fall within the meaning of the term "cost," which are awarded to the prevailing party. McAnrow v. Martin, 56 N. E. 168, 170, 183 Ill. 467 (citing City of St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 11 Mo. App. 241, Id. 87 Mo. 223).

An order that costs and expenses of a certain suit, brought to enjoin creditors' proceedings against an estate, shall be paid out of the fund in court, includes the necessary funds for carrying on a planting interest on the estate intrusted to the receiver, the hire of laborers, the commissions of the receiver, and the disbursements incident to the discharge of his duties. Ball v. Vason, 56 Ga. 264.

Within the provisions of a decree foreclosing a mortgage on railroad property, and directing an application of the funds, first, to the payment of expenses attendant on the sale; second, to the payment of the costs of this suit, etc.; third, to the payment of all interventions or other claims allowed by this court—the expense of managing the road by the receiver are not strictly costs of suit; yet they are expenses incurred in the litigation, and by order of the court, and may properly be included within the meaning of the words "costs of suit," if, when property is attached or seized by the officers under process of law, the expenses of preserving the property and the litigation are charged as costs of the suit, so that certificates issued for such expenses come within class 2. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Stuttgart & A. R. R. Co. (U. S.) 106 Fed. 565, 570.

As taxable costs.

Under a statute providing that the defendant may tender the debt and costs before the return day of the writ, and that such tender shall be a bar to any further proceedings in the case (Gen. St. c. 272, § 5; Id. c. 208, § 1), the costs the defendant must tender in order to avail himself of the advantages of the statute are such costs as the law has prescribed—the costs taxable in court. These are the only involuntary costs known to the law, which is to be interpreted as having provided that, if the party will settle the suit against him before entry in court, he shall be required to pay to the plaintiff's attorney just as much, and no more, for all the costs that are chargeable, before or after the action, as if he paid the same costs after entry. Woodward v. Roberts, 51 N. H. 552, 555.

The term "costs," as used in Rev. St. c. 45, § 35, giving the defeated party in an action the right to a new trial on payment of all costs, means the costs as taxed by the clerk and entered in the feebook. Cook County v. Calumet & C. Canal & Dock Co. (Ill.) 19 N. E. 46, 47.

"Costs," as used in Code, tit. 10, § 310, directing the clerk to add the interest on a verdict for money to the costs of the party entitled thereto, refer to the bill of costs, and not to the gross allowance. Belding v. Conklin (N. Y.) 2 Code Rep. 112, 113.

The term "costs," as used in Act July 20, 1892, c. 209, 27 Stat. 252 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 706], allowing any citizen to prosecute any suit or action in the federal courts without prepaying fees or costs, means taxable costs to be recovered by the adverse party. Columb v. Webster Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 76 Fed. 198, 200.

Taxes.

The tax imposed by Acts 1889, c. 130, entitled "An act to provide revenue for the state," on the unsuccessful party in civil suits, and on each indictment or presentment, is not costs, within the meaning of the law permitting imprisonment for costs, though by the statute such taxes are required to be taxed in the bill of costs, and are thereby declared part of the costs in the case. By such declaration the Legislature has not changed its nature. It is still a tax, and as such may be put in the bill of costs and collected with the costs, so far as judgment and execution may be efficacious for that purpose; but, so long as it remains in the revenue bill, as a specific tax, it cannot, by a mere declaration in such bill that it is costs, become costs in fact, so as to justify imprisonment for its payment. Costs and fees, though unknown to the common law, have in modern times a fixed and well-defined signification. Costs are the expenses incident to the conduct of a suit, either in the prosecution or defense, and such disbursements as are allowed by law as fees to witnesses and officers of court.

Ex parte Griffin, 13 S. W. 75, 76, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 547 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 376).

Witnesses' and officers' fees.

The term "costs," as applied to proceedings in a court of justice, has, in the acceptance of the profession, and by the practice of all courts in Georgia, a well-understood meaning. In includes all charges fixed by statute as compensation for services rendered by officers of the court in the progress of the cause. Davis v. State, 33 Ga. 531, 533; Markham v. Ross, 73 Ga. 105.

"Costs," as used in Pub. St. c. 256, § 5, providing that, on conviction and sentence in any prosecution for a crime or offense, costs shall be taxed as in civil cases, unless otherwise provided, means the expenses and fees which the law authorizes the winning party to recover of his adversary in an action, and includes the expense of procuring the attendance of witnesses. State v. A. B. C., 40 Atl. 1065, 68 N. H. 441.

"Costs of the proceedings," as used in St. Louis City Charter, art. 6, § 8, with respect to proceedings for the condemnation of land for city purposes, which provides that the costs of the proceedings shall be paid by the city, means the costs so authorized to be taxed, and does not include the allowance of charges for expert witnesses, and other similar expenses incurred by a landowner in developing the character and extent of deposits of clay claimed to exist on the lands appropriated by the city. City of St. Louis v. Meintz, 18 S. W. 30, 31, 107 Mo. 611.

"Costs in civil actions," as defined by Gen. St. 1894, c. 67, § 5497, is a fixed amount to be recovered by the prevailing party. As used in section 7314, "provided that, on change of venue, the costs accruing from the change shall be paid by the county in which the offense was committed," the word "costs" includes both costs and disbursements as defined by section 5500, as expenses necessarily paid or incurred by the prevailing party, but does not include the expenses incident to the running of the court during the trial, such as jurors' and court officers' fees. Board of Com'rs of Hennepin County v. Wright County Com'rs, 87 N. W. 846, 847, 84 Minn. 267.

The term "costs," as used in Code, tit. 10, § 303, providing that there might be allowed to the prevailing party on the judgment certain sums by way of indemnity, which allowances are in this act termed "costs," was meant to indemnify the party for his expenses, which consist quite as much of the fees of witnesses and officers as of lawyers, and does not give a new definition of the word "costs." Webster defines the word "costs" to be the sum fixed by law or allowed by the court for charges of a suit, awarded against the party in favor of the party prevailing. Belding v. Conklin (N. Y.)

4 How. Prac. 196, 197; Belding v. Conklin (N. Y.) 2 Code Rep. 112, 113.

An order setting aside a default, conditioned that the defendants pay the plaintiff's "costs for the term," included only the travel and attendance of the party, the clerk's fees, and the witnesses' fees. Thurston v. Roger Williams Min. Co., 1 R. I. 288.

A sheriff's expenditures, such as rent bills, keeper's fees, and such other disbursements as are often necessarily made in levying attachment writs, are the officer's legal costs, which need not be included in the party's verified memorandum, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 507, 508, requiring the party in whose favor judgment is rendered to deliver to the clerk of the court within two days a verified memorandum of costs and necessary disbursements, and providing that such memorandum need not include the legal fees or costs of any officer of the court, etc., necessarily incurred in levying attachment writs. First Nat. Bank v. Boyce, 15 Mont. 162, 168, 38 Pac. 829, 832.

COSTS AND EXPENSES OF REDEMPTION.

The phrase "costs and expenses of redemption," as used in Pol. Code, § 3817, as amended, providing for redemption from tax sale to the state by paying the taxes due, with interest and penalty, and costs and expenses of redemption, means the amount due, as computed according to the statute. San Diego Inv. Co. v. Shaffer, 70 Pac. 179, 180, 137 Cal. 323.

COSTS DE INCREMENTO.

The distinction between costs taxable between party and party, and those taxable or allowable between attorney and client, is referred to in every text-book on English practice. The former are called "de incremento," or costs of increase, and had their origin in the statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I), while the office of attorney did not come into legal existence until a later date, under the statute of Westminster II (13 Edw. I). Strong v. Mundy, 31 Atl. 611, 612, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 833.

COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION.

The administration of an estate of a bankrupt includes the proceedings from the petition until the estate is reduced to money, and the dividends paid and the estate closed, so that under the bankrupt act, providing for the allowance of such attorney's fees only as are a part of the costs of administration, no allowances can be made from the estate to an attorney for services rendered in the matter of the bankrupt's application for discharge. In re Brundin (U. S.) 112 Fed. 306, 307.

COSTS OF COLLECTION.

The expression or clause in notes, "and costs of collection," is surplusage, and not destructive of the negotiability of the notes, for the reason that no costs of collection can accrue if the notes are paid when due. The great weight of authority is that notes that waive benefit of valuation, appraisal, and exemption laws, and provide for the payment of attorney's fees, do not destroy the negotiability by rendering the amount to be paid uncertain. Nicely v. Winnebago Nat. Bank, 47 N. E. 476, 477, 18 Ind. App. 30 (citing Nicely v. Bank, 15 Ind. App. 563, 44 N. E. 572, 57 Am. St. Rep. 245).

COSTS OF MOTION.

A direction of a court not contained in a judgment is an order. An application for an order is a motion. An order of the General Term upon appeal from an order comes within these definitions, and therefore falls within section 779, Code, which stays all proceedings when "costs of a motion" are given, until payment thereof. The rule as to costs upon a motion is applied by the Code to interlocutory costs upon an issue of law, the same as if they were costs on a motion. Phipps v. Carman (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 518, 519.

The phrase "costs of a motion," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 779, providing that where costs of a motion, or any other sum of money, directed by an order to be paid, are not paid within the time fixed for the purpose, all proceedings on the part of the party required to pay them, except to review or vacate the order, are stayed, cannot be construed to include the costs of an appeal from an order granting a new trial on the merits. Eisenlord v. Clum, 5 N. Y. Supp. 512, 52 Hun, 461.

COSTS OF PROSECUTION.

Rev. Laws, § 713, authorizing the chancery court to require of either party sufficient security for the costs of the prosecution of an action, will be construed to apply to the defendant as well as the plaintiff, when the former is prosecuting an affirmative counterclaim. Badger v. Taft, 3 Atl. 535, 537, 58 Vt. 585.

The expression "costs of prosecution," as used in a statute providing that one tried and convicted might be adjudged to pay the costs of prosecution, meant such only as were incurred in the conduct of the prosecution, and making it effectual in a verdict, and not those which the defendant incurred in resisting the prosecution and defending himself from the criminal charge. State v. Wallin, 89 N. C. 578, 580.

COSTS OF SUIT.

The terms "costs of suit" and "costs of prosecution" have a well-known technical meaning, as well understood by lawyers as the term "suit" or "prosecution." The expression does not mean all the expenses incurred, but it means the expenses pending the suit, as allowed or taxed by the court. Lord Coke says "costs are expensæ litis, and shall be allowed for expenses pending the suit. Even the officer's fees on execution or warrant are not included in the costs, properly so called." Town of Norwich v. Hyde, 7 Conn. 529, 534.

COSTS TO ABIDE EVENT.

As to what constitutes "event," see "Event."

A remittitur on reversal of a judgment by the Court of Appeals, with "costs to abide the event," should be construed to include the costs and disbursements of the first trial, and of the party's appeal to both the General Term and the Court of Appeals on the rendition of a judgment in his favor on a second trial. Powers v. Manhattan R. Co., 14 N. Y. Supp. 130, 131, 20 Civ. Proc. R. 78.

Where an order is made by an appellate court reversing a judgment, with "costs to abide the event," the costs intended by the order include those of the appeal, so that, if the appellee is finally successful, he is entitled to tax the costs of the appeal. First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 469, 470.

A decision of an appellate court reversing a judgment, and ordering a new trial with "costs to abide the event," means only that the party finally prevailing is entitled to his costs in that court, and not that he must recover for all proceedings in the cause. Thomas v. Evans, 3 N. Y. Supp. 297, 298, 50 Hun, 441.

"Costs to abide the event" means all costs of the action, up to and including the decision in the Court of Appeals. Smith v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 82 N. Y. Supp. 674, 675 (citing Franey v. Smith, 126 N. Y. 658, 27 N. E. 559).

COTTAGE.

A cottage is a small dwelling house. Any number of cottages may, therefore, satisfy the allegation of a number of dwelling houses; and there is not any repugnance in common speech between calling a dwelling house a "messuage" in one instrument, and a "cottage" in another. Young v. Sotheron, 2 Barn. & Adol. 628, 634.

In Johnson's and other English dictionaries, a cottage is said to be a small house, and a house is said to be a dwelling place, so that any small dwelling place may, without impropriety of language, be described as a cottage. A large dwelling house or cottage may be divided into two or more distinct dwelling houses or cottages, and each part may be so described. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 15 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 227, 240.

Curtilage included.

"A cottage is a little house without land. Co. Litt. 216. The grant of a cottage will pass a little dwelling house which has no land belonging to it." Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 470, 31 Am. Dec. 200.

There is no difference between a cottage and a messuage. As to the matter of taking cattle damage feasant, it will be supposed that a cottage has at least a court to it. A cottage contains a curtilage, and so there may be a levancy and couchancy on a cottage. Emerton v. Selby, 2 Ld. Raym. 1015; Scholes v. Hargreaves, 5 Term R. 46, 48.

COTTOLEO.

The use of the word "cottoleo" on tubs containing a compound of cottonseed oil and the product of beef fat is an infringement of the trade-mark "cottonlene," previously registered for the sale of the same substance, and used in marking tubs containing it. N. K. Fairbank Co. v. Central Lard Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 133, 135.

COTTON.

"Cotton in the seed" is not the marketable condition of cotton. The laws of trade and commerce require that it should be manipulated and converted into what is commonly known as "lint cotton." Mangan v. State, 76 Ala. 60, 66.

COTTON BRAID.

Braids composed of 95 per cent. of cotton and 5 per cent. of other materials, commercially known as belonging to the class of "cotton braids," though bought and sold under the specific names of "cotton hat braids," "cotton fancy braids," "cotton straw braids," etc., and used in the manufacture of hats, are dutiable under paragraph 354, Act Oct. 1, 1890, and not under section 4, as a nonenumerated manufactured article, nor under paragraph 355 as a manufacture of cotton not specially provided for; nor under paragraph 354, as "cotton gimps, galoons, webbing, goreing and braces." Zimmerman v. United States (U. S.) 61 Fed. 938, 939.

The distinction between cotton braids and other manufactures of cotton not otherwise provided for, and hat braids, has been established and recognized by Congress by Acts March 2, 1861, 12 Stat. 178, and July 14, 1862, 12 Stat. 543, and Rev. St. § 2504. Arthur v. Zimmerman, 96 U. S. 124, 125, 24 L. Ed. 770.

COTTON CLOTH.

Act Aug. 28, 1894, par. 257, reads: "The term cotton cloth, or cloth, wherever used in the foregoing paragraph of this schedule, shall be held to include all woven fabrics of cotton in the piece, whether figured, fancy, or plain, not specially provided for in this act, the warp and filling threads of which can be counted by unravelling or other practicable means." This section does not apply to embroidered cotton cloth, which is not embroidered in the loom. United States v. Einstein (U. S.) 78 Fed. 797, 798, 24 C. C. A. 346.

COTTON GIN.

A "cotton gin" is not a fixture, but in all cases is a personal chattel, which does not ordinarily pass by a conveyance of the ground on which it stands. Hancock v. Jordan, 7 Ala. 448, 450, 42 Am. Dec. 600.

COTTON HOUSE.

The term "cotton house," in a statute making the burning of a cotton house arson, includes a gin, as a ginhouse is a house in which cotton is usually stored. Waters v. Jones (Ala.) 3 Port. 442, 447, 29 Am. Dec. 261.

COTTON LACES.

Act of 1846, providing a duty on cotton laces and insertings, means laces and insertings composed wholly of cotton, and does not include those composed of linen and cotton combined. Steegman v. Maxwell (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1198.

By Revenue Act July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 46) Schedule D, a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem was imposed on "cotton laces, cotton insertings and manufactures wholly composed of cotton, not otherwise provided for." By section 1 of the act of March 3, 1857, the duties of the articles enumerated in Schedules C and D of the act of 1846 were fixed at 25 and 19 per cent., respectively, with such exceptions as were thereafter made. By section 2 of the act of 1857, all manufactures composed wholly of cotton, which were bleached, printed, painted, or dyed, and delaines, were transferred to Schedule C. Held, that the designations which were qualified by the word "cotton" in the act of 1846 were designations of articles by special description, as contradistinguished from designations of a commercial name or a name of trade, and were therefore designations of quality and material, and hence laces and insertings composed wholly of cotton, and bleached or dyed, were dutiable at 24 per cent., under the act of 1857. Cochran v. Schell, 2 Sup. Ct. 301, 107 U. S. 617, 27 L. Ed. 490.

COTTON NOTES.

Cotton notes are receipts given for each cotton bale received on storage by a public warehouse. Fourth Nat. Bank v. St. Louis Cotton Compress Co., 11 Mo. App. 333, 337.

COTTON PILE FABRICS

Trimnings cut out of cotton velvet in various open and scroll work designs and colors are dutiable as cotton pile fabrics, under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule I, par. 315, 30 Stat. 178 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1659]. Horstmann, Von Hein & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 147.

COTTON WASTE.

An application for insurance, representing that there was no cotton or woolen waste or rags kept in or near the property to be insured, means only such waste or rags as are, from their nature or condition, easily inflammable; and clean, white rags, though in the most literal sense included in the term, are not within its spirit or meaning, and should not be regarded as a breach of the representation. Elliott v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co., 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 139, 145.

COTTON WEARING APPAREL.

"Cotton wearing apparel," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 349, does not include so-called fascinators made of cotton chenille. Oppenheimer v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 740.

COTTON WEBBING.

Cotton elastic webbing is made of rubber and cotton, as distinguished from wool elastic webbing, made of rubber, wool, and cotton, and from union elastic webbing, made of rubber, silk, and cotton. Beard v. Nichols, 7 Sup. Ct. 548, 120 U. S. 260, 30 L. Ed. 652.

Webbing made of cotton, silk, and India rubber, the cotton predominating in quantity, and the rubber in value, cannot, in the absence of any finding as to its commercial or common designation, be classified as "cotton webbing," under Tariff Act 1890, par. 354, Schedule I, but should be placed under paragraph 460, as a manufacture of which India rubber is the component material of chief value. United States v. Shattuck (U. S.) 59 Fed. 454, 455, 8 C. C. A. 176.

COULD.

In a charter party for a voyage from Sundswall to Southampton, stipulating that the owner should receive the highest freight "which he could prove" to have been paid for ships on the same voyage when the vessel passed Elsinore, the words "could prove" were satisfied by the capacity to prove, coupled with knowledge on the part of the defendant of the capacity to prove, and of existence of the facts, and did not mean strictly legal proof. Gether v. Capper, 15 C. B. 696.

COUNCIL.

See "City Council"; "Common Council"; "Town Council."
Other council, see "Other."

The word "council," in cities which have a board of aldermen, includes common council. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 1536-907.

The word "council," as used in an act relating to reformatory institutions established by counties and cities, shall be taken and held to mean the corporate authorities of any city or town, by whatever name or style the same may be designated. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 4416.

The word "councilman" may include trustees of towns. Rev. St. Utah 1896, § 2498.

The word "council" shall include any body or bodies authorized to make ordinances for the government of a city or town. Code Va. 1887, § 5.

The word "council" shall include any body or board, whether composed of one or more branches, who are authorized to make ordinances for the government of a city, town, or village. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17.

The word "council," as used in Rev. St. § 1380, relating to the change of boundaries of a municipal corporation, includes the board of trustees of a hamlet. In re Town of Newburgh, 8 O. C. D. 24, 25, 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 78.

COUNCILMEN.

Commonly and colloquially, when we speak of a councilman or alderman, we do not refer to a mayor. Hence, under a statute providing that the councilmen and aldermen of towns and cities shall be ineligible during their term of office to any other municipal office in said towns and cities, a mayor is not therefore rendered ineligible. Akerman v. Ford, 42 S. E. 777, 116 Ga. 473.

In an ordinance regulating municipal elections, and providing for the election of a certain number of councilmen, under a statute authorizing the city to elect a certain number of aldermen, to be known as the "city council," the term "councilmen" has the same meaning as the term "aldermen," as used in the statute. State v. Anderson, 8 South. 1, 4, 26 Fla. 240.

COUNSEL.

See "Of Counsel"; "State's Counsel."

The words "counsel," "advise," or "assist" may be, and frequently are, used to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributed to, or procured it done. True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 685, 90 Ky. 651; Omer v. Commonwealth (Tex.) 25 S. W. 994, 996.

As an attorney.

The term "counsel," as used in Rev. Laws, 437, requiring that the interrogatories annexed to a commission for depositions be signed by the party or his counsel in the cause, was not intended to be employed in that peculiar and restricted sense in which it is used at Westminster Hall, in distinction from "attorney." In our courts a man's attorney is usually his counsel, even though he is not a counselor of this court. Ludlam v. Broderick, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 269, 271.

Within Sanb. & B. Ann. St. § 752a, providing that circuit judges are authorized to appoint counsel to assist the district attorney in the prosecution of persons charged with crime, the term "counsel" means one who has been admitted as an attorney at law in this state, and who is associated in the management of a particular cause, or who acts as legal adviser in reference to any matter requiring legal knowledge and judgment. State v. Russell, 53 N. W. 441, 442, 83 Wis. 330.

Rev. St. 70, § 10, providing that no justice shall take cognizance of any cause or do any judicial act where he shall have been a counsel in the case, means concerned in the case or having charge of it as attorney, and there is no distinction between being "of counsel" and "attorney" in the case. Ingraham v. Leland, 19 Vt. 304, 307.

An attorney is a person authorized to appear for and represent a party in the written proceedings in any action, suit, or proceeding, in any stage thereof. An attorney, other than the one who represents the party in the written proceedings, may also appear for and represent a party in court, before a judicial officer; and then he is known in the particular action, suit, or proceeding, as counsel only, and his authority is limited to the matters that transpire in the court or before such officer at the time. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1049; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4758.

COUNSEL IN THE CAUSE.

The term "counsel in the cause," as used in the statute excepting counsel in the cause from the right to witness fees, does not include attorneys in attendance on the court on business other than that of the action in which they were witnesses. Abbott v. Johnson, 2 N. W. 332, 335, 47 Wis. 239.

COUNSELOR.

Attorney at law distinguished, see "Attorney at Law."

COUNT.

See "Common Counts"; "Counting upon a Statute"; "General Count"; "Omnibus Count"; "Special Count."

"A count is sometimes considered as synonymous with a declaration, and this was its original signification in the law French, but it is now most generally considered as a part of a declaration wherein the plaintiff sets forth a distinct cause of action. Cheetham v. Tillotson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 430, 434.

The term "counts" is used to designate the several different forms in which plaintiff states his cause of action in his declaration. Buckingham v. Murray's Ex'r, 30 Atl. 779, 780, 7 Houst. 176.

The word "count," in Gen. St. § 229, prohibiting any candidate being put in charge of any box in which votes are cast for the office, or to take part in the count thereof, must be given not its narrowest and most technical meaning, but that wider meaning, reasonably applied, which embraces all those acts of the counter which are within the natural and proper scope of his duties, and which bring to him any opportunity to perpetrate a fraud. Under this section, the action of a candidate for office in merely cutting off the sides of a few envelopes containing ballots, with a machine used for that purpose, to illustrate the operation of the machine, at the request of the election counters, is not taking part in the count. Grelle v. Pinney, 62 Conn. 478, 483, 26 Atl. 1106, 1108.

In indictment.

"The word 'count' is used when in one finding by the grand jury the essential parts of two or more separate indictments for crimes apparently distinct are combined, the allegations for each being termed a 'count,' and the whole an 'indictment'; and an indictment in several counts, therefore, is a collection of several bills against the same defendant for offenses which on their face appear distinct, under one caption, and found and indorsed collectively as true by the grand jury. The object is what it appears to be, namely, in fact, to charge the defendant with the distinct offenses, under the idea that the court may, as often as it will, allow them to be tried together, thus averting from both parties the burden of two or more trials, or, in another class of cases, to vary what is meant to be the one accusation so as at the trial to avoid an acquittance by any unforeseen lack of harmony between allegations and proofs, or a legal doubt as to what form of charge the court will approve. On the face of the indictment, every separate count should charge the defendant as if he had committed a distinct offense, because it is on the principle of joinder of offenses that the joinder of counts is admitted." Boren v. State, 4 S. W. 463, 464, 23 Tex. App. 28.

As paragraph.

A "count," as used in common-law pleading, and the term "paragraph," as used in code pleading, are equivalent, and mean an entire or integral statement of a cause of action. Bailey v. Mosher (U. S.) 63 Fed. 488, 490, 11 C. C. A. 304.

In an answer alleging that defendant admits that she is the owner, by purchase contract, of the premises described in the complaint, and admits the sixth, seventh, and eighth counts in the complaint, the term "counts" evidently means paragraphs, as the complaint contains but one cause of action, divided into paragraphs. Southard v. Smith, 66 N. W. 316, 317, 8 S. D. 230.

COUNTENANCE.

"To countenance" an act means something more than to witness it. Webster defines the word: "To encourage by a favoring aspect; to sanction; to favor; to approve; to aid; to support; to abet." Mere approval of a trespass after it is committed, by one for whose benefit it was committed, will not make him liable. One may rejoice over a murder after its commission, without for that being criminally liable; and so may one approve and applaud an assault and battery committed by one upon another, without subjecting himself to liability to the injured party. "To countenance an assault," means to aid or abet it, and, as jurors are presumed to understand the meaning of ordinary English words, an instruction authorizing a conviction for an assault of one not the assaulting party, if he countenanced it, or if it was committed in his presence and countenanced by him, is not erroneous. Cooper v. Johnson, 81 Mo. 483, 487.

COUNTER.

The word "counter" is defined to be "contrary to; contra-way; in opposition to"; and such is its meaning when used as a part of the compound "counter-claim." Silliman v. Eddy (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 122, 123.

COUNTERCLAIM.

The term "counterclaim" means an opposition claim or demand of something due; a demand of something which of right belongs to the defendant, in opposition to the right of the plaintiff. Silliman v. Eddy (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 122, 123; Venable v. Dutch, 15 Pac. 520, 521, 37 Kan. 515, 1 Am. St. Rep. 260. It is the claim of a defendant to recover from a plaintiff by setting up and establishing any cross-demand that may exist in his favor as against plaintiff. Venable v. Dutch, 15 Pac. 520, 521, 37 Kan. 515, 1 Am. St. Rep. 260.

"Counterclaim" is the opposite of "claim." The plaintiff makes a claim against the defendant. The defendant, besides his defense, makes a counterclaim against the plaintiff. Wolf v. H—, (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 84, 85.

A counterclaim proper presents matter upon which an original action might be brought in defendant's favor. Bardes v. Hutchinson, 85 N. W. 797, 798, 113 Iowa, 610; Belleau v. Thompson, 33 Cal. 495, 497. It is in effect an action in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. Albany Brass & Iron Co. v. Hoffman, 33 N. Y. Supp. 600, 601, 12 Misc. Rep. 167; Davidson v. Remington (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 310, 311.

A counterclaim is a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim or defendant's defense, or connected with the subject of the action. Davis v. Frederick, 12 Pac. 664, 6 Mont. 300; Hudson v. Snipes, 40 Ark. 75, 78; Slone v. Slone, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 339, 340; Keifer v. Summers, 35 N. E. 1103, 1105, 137 Ind. 106; Cohn v. Hussen (N. Y.) 66 How. Prac. 150, 151. It is allowed in order that the whole controversy between the parties may be determined in one action, and it may be relied on wherever an action could be brought by the defendant for that same cause. Slone v. Slone, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 339, 340.

"A counterclaim in an action on contract is that which might have arisen out of, or could have had some connection with, the original transaction, in the view of the parties, and which, at the time the contract was made, they could have intended might in some event give only one party a claim against the other for compliance or noncompliance with its provisions." Conner v. Wenton, 7 Ind. 523; White v. Regan, 32 Ark. 281, 289; Standley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 95 Ind. 254, 261; Blue v. Capital Nat. Bank, 43 N. E. 655, 658, 145 Ind. 518.

The counterclaim must have such a relation to and connection with the subject of the action that it will be just and equitable that the controversy between the parties as to the matters alleged in the complaint and in the counterclaim should be settled in one action by one litigation, and that the claim of one should be offset against or applied upon the claim of the other. Romaine v. Brewster, 27 N. Y. Supp. 138, 139, 6 Misc. Rep. 531 (citing Carpenter v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 93 N. Y. 552, 556, 557); Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Darnall, 83 N. W. 266, 267, 13 S. D. 279.

A counterclaim, to be available to a party, must afford to him protection in some way against the plaintiff's demand for judgment, either in whole or in part. It must therefore consist of a set-off or claim by way of recoupment, or be in some way connected with the subject of the action stated in the complaint. It must present an answer to the plaintiff's demand for relief; must show that he is not entitled, according to law, or under the application of just principles of equity, to judgment in his favor as or to the extent claimed in the complaint. It must therefore contain not only the substance of what is necessary to sustain an action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff, but it must also operate in some way to defeat, in whole or in part, the plaintiff's right of recovery in the action. An answer which does not meet this requirement is insufficient, whether regarded as a defense or counterclaim. Mattoon v. Baker (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 329, 332; Dietrich v. Koch, 35 Wis. 618, 626.

A counterclaim is a claim on behalf of the defendant, which, if established, will defeat or in some way qualify the judgment to which the plaintiff is otherwise entitled. Scott v. Town of Menasha, 54 N. W. 263, 264, 84 Wis. 73; Dietrich v. Koch, 35 Wis. 618, 626; Venable v. Dutch, 15 Pac. 520, 521, 87 Kan. 515, 1 Am. St. Rep. 260.

A counterclaim must be a cause of action on which defendant can sue plaintiff. A defendant cannot avail himself of a counterclaim which the court before which the action is pending has no jurisdiction to try and determine. Cragin v. Lovell, 88 N. Y. 258, 259 (quoted in Howard Ironworks v. Buffalo Elevating Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 452, 459, 81 App. Div. 386).

The counterclaim must exist in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, and a defendant cannot set up a counterclaim existing in favor of any person; the test being whether defendant could have maintained an independent action on the judgment. Roberts v. Donovan, 9 Pac. 180, 181, 70 Cal. 108.

A counterclaim is a cause of action arising against the plaintiff, or against him and another, which arises out of the contract or transaction stated in the petition. The defendant who pleads a counterclaim admits the contract or transaction, and seeks to recover on his counterclaim growing out of it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Whitlow's Adm'r (Ky.) 43 S. W. 711, 712, 41 L. R. A. 614.

A counterclaim is where the demand is against the plaintiff, and for which a judgment might be recovered against the defendant. Tyler v. Willis (N. Y.) 33 Barb. 327, 333.

A counterclaim setting up a cause of action against the plaintiff must state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff. Campbell v. Routt, 42 Ind. 410. It must also show that the facts stated as constituting a cause of action arise out of, or were connected with, the cause of action stated in the complaint. Lane v. Whitehouse, 46 Ind. 389, 390.

Where the facts stated in an answer constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant for the recovery of damages against the plaintiff, and are connected with the subject of the action, it is sufficient to warrant their being pleaded as a counterclaim. Cincinnati Daily Tribune Co. v. Bruck, 56 N. E. 198, 199, 61 Ohio St. 489, 76 Am. St. Rep. 433.

In an action to recover possession of certain chattels claimed under a mortgage executed to plaintiff by defendant, where the answer demanded judgment for the value or return of certain goods not covered by the mortgage, and alleged to have been wrongfully taken by plaintiff and converted to her use, such claim is a counterclaim, under Code, § 3226, providing that, in actions for the recovery of specific personal property, no counterclaim shall be allowed. Chapin v. Garretson, 52 N. W. 104, 85 Iowa, 377.

A breach of warranty may be the subject of counterclaim in an action for the purchase price of property sold with warranty. Aultman & Co. v. Torrey, 57 N. W. 211, 55 Minn. 492.

The Code declares that, in order to obtain an attachment, plaintiff must show that he is entitled to recover the sum stated to be due him, over and above all counterclaim. Held, that the word "counterclaim" is broader and includes more than "discounts and set-offs," and hence an affidavit stating that plaintiff is entitled to the sum due, over and above all discounts and set-offs, is insufficient. Lampkin v. Douglass (N. Y.) 10 Abb. N. C. 342, 343; Valentine v. Central Nat. Bank, Id. 188, 191.

Statutory definitions.

A counterclaim may consist of (1) a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as a foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action also arising upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 438. Wigmore v. Buell, 47 Pac. 927, 928, 116 Cal. 94; Ainsworth v. Bank of California, 51 Pac. 952, 119 Cal. 470, 39 L. R. A. 686, 63 Am. St. Rep. 135; Lyon v. Petty, 4 Pac. 103, 104, 65 Cal. 322; Roberts v. Donovan, 9 Pac. 180, 181, 70 Cal. 108; St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 286, 289, 35 Pac. 876, 877; Freeman v. Seitz, 58 Pac. 690, 126 Cal. 291. A like definition is given in the New Mexico Code. Agua Pura Co. v. City of Las Vegas, 60 Pac. 208, 212, 10 N. M. 6.

Practice Act, § 47, defines the counterclaim which, in section 46, defendant is authorized to set up as constituting a defense, as follows: "The counterclaim mentioned in the last section shall be one existing in favor of defendant or plaintiff, and against a plaintiff or defendant between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint or answer as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or defendant's defense, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) when an action arises upon contract, any other causes of action arising also upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action." In an action for damages for an assault and battery, a libel published by the plaintiff of and concerning the defendant does not constitute a counterclaim, within the meaning of Practice Act, § 47. Macdougall v. Maguire, 35 Cal. 274, 280, 95 Am. Dec. 98.

By section 57, Mills' Ann. Code, a "counterclaim" is defined as being a claim in favor of a party plaintiff or defendant against the adverse party, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the transaction set forth as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim or the defendant's defense, or, in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action also upon contract. Long v. McGowan (Colo.) 66 Pac. 1076, 1077; Hyman v. Jockey Club Wine, Liquor & Cigar Co., 48 Pac. 671, 672, 9 Colo. App. 299.

A "counterclaim" is defined by Code, § 2659, as follows: "(1) When the action is founded on contract, a cause of action also arising on contract, or ascertained by the decision of a court; or (2) a cause of action in favor of the defendants, or some of them, against the plaintiffs, or some of them, arising out of the contracts or transactions set forth in the petition, or connected with the subject of the action; or (3) any new matter constituting a cause of action in favor of the defendant, or all of the defendants if more than one, against the plaintiff, or all of the plaintiffs if more than one, and which the defendant or defendants might have brought when the suit was commenced, or which was then held, either matured or not, when so pleaded." Palmer v. Palmer, 57 N. W. 645, 647, 90 Iowa, 17. The three subdivisions of this section are the same as sections 2886, 2889, and 2891 of the revision of 1860. The only difference is that the first subdivision above set out is called a "set-off," the second a "counterclaim," and the third a "cross-demand." Sherman v. Hale, 41 N. W. 48, 76 Iowa, 383.

The statutory definition is that a "counterclaim is any matter arising out of or connected with the cause of action," etc. Rev. St. 1894, § 353 (Rev. St. 1881, § 350). Again, it is referred to in the statute as "a counterclaim arising out of a contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the ground of plaintiff's claims" (Rev. St. 1894, § 354; Rev. St. 1881, § 351). Blue v. Capital Nat. Bank, 43 N. E. 655, 658, 145 Ind. 518.

A counterclaim, under the Code, is any matter arising out of or connected with the cause of action which might be the subject of an action in favor of the defendant, or tend to reduce the plaintiff's claim for damages. Rev. St. 1894, § 353 (Rev. St. 1881, § 350). Shipman Coal Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Pfeiffer, 39 N. E. 291, 292, 11 Ind. App. 445; Wright v. Anderson, 117 Ind. 349, 353, 354, 20 N. E. 247; Lane v. Whitehouse, 46 Ind. 389, 390 (quoting definition in 2 Gavin & H. St. 91, § 59); Douthitt v. Smith, 69 Ind. 463, 465; Standley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 95 Ind. 254, 261-263.

The counterclaim which a defendant may file must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claims, or connected with the subject of the action (Gen. St. par. 4178). Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Phelps, 46 Pac. 183, 184, 4 Kan. App. 139; Richardson v. Penny, 61 Pac. 584, 586, 10 Okl. 32; Deford v. Hutchison, 25 Pac. 641, 643, 45 Kan. 318, 11 L. R. A. 257.

A counterclaim must tend in some way to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery, and must be one of the following causes of action against the plaintiff, or, in a proper case, against the person whom he represents, and in favor of the defendant, or of one or more defendants, between whom and the plaintiff a separate judgment may be had in the action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) in an action on contract, any other cause of action on contract existing at the commencement of the action. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 501. See, also, Putnam v. De Forest (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 146, 147; Williams v. Upton (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 205; Drake v. Cockroft (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 34, 39; Hall v. Werney, 46 N. Y. Supp. 33, 34, 18 App. Div. 565; Howard Ironworks v. Buffalo Elevating Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 452, 459, 81 App. Div. 386.

The counterclaim mentioned in a provision requiring the answer of a defendant to contain a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of a contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) in an action arising on contract, any other cause of action arising also on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 244; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4913; Jacobson v. Aberdeen Packing Co., 66 Pac. 419, 421, 26 Wash. 175; Hurst v. Everett, 91 N. C. 399, 402; Code S. C. § 173; Ex parte Carolina Nat. Bank, 18 S. C. 289, 297.

A counterclaim is a cause of action existing in favor of a defendant, and against a plaintiff or another defendant, or both, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5069.

By Rev. St. § 2656, a defendant is allowed to plead as a counterclaim a cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action. Gilbert v. Loberg, 57 N. W. 982, 983, 86 Wis. 661; Racine County Bank v. Keep, 13 Wis. 209, 214; Computing Scale Co. v. Churchill, 85 N. W. 337, 338, 109 Wis. 303. A like definition is given in Code, § 96, Renaker v. Smith, 60 S. W. 407, 109 Ky. 643; Whitlock v. Ledford, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 387, 388, 82 Ky. 390; Forbes v. Cooper, 11 S. W. 24, 88 Ky. 285; Grimes v. Grimes, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 658, 659, 88 Ky. 20, 23, 9 S. W. 840; Rennebaum v. Atkinson, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 254, 256, 45 S. W. 874, 876, 103 Ky. 555; and in Civ. Code, § 126, Wells v. Boyd, 62 Ky. (Duv.) 366, 367; Nolle v. Thompson, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 121, 123; and in Comp. Laws S. D. § 3915, Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Darnall, 83 N. W. 266, 267, 13 S. D. 279. Under the Kentucky statutory definition it has been held that a cause of action for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of real property cannot be pleaded as a counterclaim to a suit for the recovery of the possession of specific personal property, though the real property and the personal property were sold by defendant to plaintiff by the same contract, Rennebaum v. Atkinson, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 254, 256, 45 S. W. 874, 876, 103 Ky. 555; that a defendant cannot recover, by way of counterclaim, against a person not a plaintiff, on a claim which does not affect the plaintiff, nor the subject-matter of his action, Wells v. Boyd, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 366, 367; that, in an action to recover damages for trespass to land, defendant may bring in, as a counterclaim, his sworn title, and have judgment for the land, Whitlock v. Ledford, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 387, 388, 82 Ky. 390.

As cross-action.

A counterclaim is substantially a cross-action by the defendant against the plaintiff, growing out of or connected with the subject-matter of the action. Renaker v. Smith, 60 S. W. 407, 109 Ky. 643.

A counterclaim is allowed in order that the whole controversy between the parties may be determined in one action, and it may be relied upon wherever an action could be brought by the defendant for the same cause. In an action for assault and battery, the defendant may be the party most aggrieved, and the one who is actually entitled to relief. If so, he could maintain an action against the plaintiff, and, having been sued by him, has the right to seek redress against him by his cross-action in the form of a counterclaim. Slone v. Slone, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 339, 340.

A "counterclaim" is a cross-action, and it must contain all the elements of a cause of action, and must be governed and judged by the same rules which apply to the complaint, and the claim must be due. Union Bank v. Heyward, 15 S. C. 296, 303.

A counterclaim is, in effect, a cross-action, and, when well pleaded, the defendant becomes an actor, and there are two simultaneous actions depending in the same proceeding between the same parties, and each has the right to have all matters put in issue by the pleadings adjudicated, and neither has the right to go out of court before a complete determination of all the matters in controversy, without the consent of the other. Whedbee v. Leggett, 92 N. C. 469, 470.

As cross-complaint.

See "Cross-Complaint."

Cross-complaint distinguished.

In a counterclaim the defendant's cause of action is against the plaintiff, while in a cross-complaint it is against a codefendant, or one not a party to the action. White v. Regan, 32 Ark. 281, 290.

Cross-bill in equity included.

A counterclaim is declared to be any matter arising out of or connected with the cause of action which might be the subject of an action in favor of the defendant, or which would tend to reduce the plaintiff's claim or demand for damages. This definition of "counterclaim" comprehends the recoupment of the common law and the cross-bill of the chancery practice. Kirkpatrick Const. Co. v. Jewett Car Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 625; Shipman Coal Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Pfeiffer, 39 N. E. 291, 292, 11 Ind. App. 445.

A counterclaim, as the term is now used, is comprehensive of both recoupment and set-off at common law, and is also broader. In actions at law, or in suits in equity, it imports a claim opposed, or which qualifies, or at least in some degree affects, the plaintiff's cause of action or suit. As applicable to suits in equity, a counterclaim need only be a claim on which a suit might be maintained against the plaintiff by the defendant. Civ. Code, § 389. The Code, in thus authorizing counterclaims in equity, seems to have adopted substantially the rule in regard to filing cross-bills. Burrage v. Bonanza G. & Q. M. Co., 6 Pac. 766, 768, 12 Or. 169.

As cross-demand.

See "Cross-Demand."

As cross-petition.

See "Cross-Petition."

Defense distinguished.

A counterclaim is not a defense, as the word is used in reference to pleadings. Thus in section 500, Code Civ. Proc., it is provided that an answer may contain a statement of new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim, thus making a clear distinction between the two, and the definition of "counterclaim" as given in section 501 shows that it is not included in the term "defense." Hence a counterclaim cannot be stricken off as sham under a provision allowing a sham answer or a sham defense to be stricken off on motion. Baum's Castorine Co. v. Thomas, 37 N. Y. Supp. 913, 92 Hun, 1.

A clear distinction between a defense and a counterclaim was that, when a defense is intended as a counterclaim, it should be explicitly so stated in the answer, and, when the defendant defines his answer as a defense, and it is uncertain whether a counterclaim is intended, the answer should be construed and considered as his defense. Lafond v. Lassere, 56 N. Y. Supp. 459, 26 Misc. Rep. 77.

A counterclaim cannot be stricken out as an irrelevant defense. It is not a defense. It is an affirmation of a cause of action against the plaintiff in the nature of a cross-action, upon which the defendant may have an affirmative judgment against the plaintiff. Fettretch v. McKay, 47 N. Y. 426, 427.

The purpose of the answer is to defeat the action and bar the recovery, and a counterclaim or set-off, on the contrary, is a pleading by which the defendant states a cause of action in his own behalf and against the plaintiff. Accordingly, where the commencement of a paragraph of the pleading filed by the defendants was in the words, "For the third and further defense, said defendants say," etc., and it concluded thus, "Wherefore the defendants say that * * * neither of said defendants are indebted to the plaintiffs, and they ask judgment," the paragraph cannot be made the foundation of a judgment for damages or other affirmative relief in favor of the defendants against the plaintiffs. Bird v. St. John's Episcopal Church, 56 N. E. 129, 133, 154 Ind. 138.

A counterclaim cannot be regarded as a defense, and hence is not subject to be stricken out. An irrelevant defense and counterclaim is an affirmation of a cause of action against the plaintiff in the nature of a cross-action upon which the defendants may have an affirmative defense against the plaintiff, and it cannot be stricken out on motion. Fettretch v. McKay (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 453, 454.

A counterclaim does not deny the cause of action, or plaintiff's right to recover thereon. A counterclaim will not prevent plaintiff from obtaining full credit for the amount due him, yet, if established, it affects his right of judgment. A defense denies the right to recover, and shows that plaintiff never had a cause of action, or that it had been discharged as by payment. Yarger v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 43 N. W. 469, 78 Iowa, 650.

Denial.

A counterclaim is defined by Code, § 500, as a cause of action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff, whether independent of the plaintiff's claim or connected with it. Denials are no part of a counterclaim. Foley v. Mercantile National Bank, 33 N. Y. Supp. 414, 24 Civ. Proc. R. 249.

Recoupment and set-off.

"Counterclaim" is a term introduced into codes of civil proceedings, and includes any defense which at common law would have been set up by the way of recoupment or set-off. Hay v. Short, 49 Mo. 139, 142.

A counterclaim, under the Code, is like a recoupment at common law. Hudson v. Snipes, 40 Ark. 75, 78.

The counterclaim of the Code is a new invention. Its precise force and meaning is to be fixed by judicial decision, and obviously includes recoupment and set-off, as between the parties to the record. It is the set-off of the Revised Statutes, together with the set-off of the courts of equity, and yet something more. It embraces all sorts of claims which a defendant may have against a plaintiff in the nature of cross-action or demand, or for which a cross or separate action would lie, within the limitations or restrictions contained in Code, § 150. Wolf v. H—(N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 84, 85.

"Counterclaim," as used in the Code, includes both recoupment and set-off, and is, strictly speaking, a pleading by which the matters arising out of the recoupment or set-off are averred. Freeman v. Seitz, 58 Pac. 690, 126 Cal. 291; St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 286, 289, 35 Pac. 876, 877.

Counterclaim embraces both set-off and recoupment, Windecker v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 43 N. Y. Supp. 358, 362, 12 App. Div. 73; Wilder v. Boynton (N. Y.) 63 Barb. 547, 549; and is more comprehensive than either, O'Connor v. Roark, 41 Pac. 465, 467, 108 Cal. 173.

A counterclaim is more comprehensive than a defense, set-off, or recoupment, and secures to a defendant sued the full relief which a separate action at law would have secured to him on the same facts. Cohn v. Hussen (N. Y.) 66 How. Prac. 150, 151.

The term "counterclaim" embraces both recoupment at common law and the cross-bill in equity. Shipman Coal Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Pfeiffer, 39 N. E. 291, 292, 11 Ind. App. 445; Kirkpatrick Const. Co. v. Jewett Car Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 625.

The term "counterclaim," as used in the statutes, embraces all matters which might have been set off, and all claims which, under the adjudications of the court, might have been imposed as a defense by way of recoupment, as well as other claims and demands which theretofore could not have been enforced by separate action. The design was to enable the parties to settle all disputes, as far as practicable, in one action. Gage v. Angell (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 335, 336.

COUNTERFEIT.

"In common parlance, a counterfeit is a likeness or resemblance intended to deceive, and to be taken for that which is original and genuine. and, when applied to persons, is seldom used in an innocent sense." Thirman v. Matthews (Ala.) 1 Stew. 384, 386.

The word "counterfeit" means to make in imitation of something else, with a view to defraud by passing the false copy for genuine or original. State v. McKenzie, 42 Me. 392, 394 (citing Webst. Dict.).

A counterfeit is an instrument falsely made in similitude of a genuine instrument. United States v. Barrett (U. S.) 111 Fed. 369, 372.

"Counterfeit," in a statute making it criminal to falsely make, forge, or counterfeit the coin of the United States, means to make something in the resemblance or similitude of such coin. United States v. Otey (U. S.) 31 Fed. 68, 69.

Pen. Code, div. 6, § 49, prescribes the punishment to be inflicted on a person who shall feloniously and fraudulently make, sign, or print any counterfeit note or bill of a bank; and section 52 declares that any person who shall feloniously and fraudulently pass up, etc., any false, forged, counterfeit, or altered note as aforesaid, shall be punished, etc. It was held that the term "counterfeit" was sufficient, without the addition of the words "in imitation of or purporting to be," and therefore an indictment following the identical language of the statute was sufficient. As defined by orthodox and classical expounders of our language, and in common acceptance, the word "counterfeit" imported an imitation, likeness, resemblance. In this acceptance it was understood and taken by all mankind. In reference to standard compilers of the words forming our language, the word "counterfeit" imports nothing more. The word "counterfeit" conveyed every idea without the addition of the explanatory expression, "imitation of or purporting to be." State v. Calvin (Ga.) R. M. Charit. 151, 159.

An indictment under the forty-third section of the act concerning crimes and misdemeanors, which punishes counterfeiting coin current in the state, must charge the offense to have been committed with an intent to defraud, as the word "counterfeit" is not a technical term legally meaning that the act is done to defraud. Mattison v. State, 3 Mo. 421.

COUNTERFEIT BILL.

A counterfeit bill is one printed from a false plate, and not a bill printed legitimately or illegitimately from a genuine plate. Kirby v. State, 1 Ohio St. 185, 187.

V. S. p. 264, c. 31, § 34, directed against counterfeiting, and making it punishable for any one to have in his possession, with intent to utter, any counterfeited bill, must be construed as meaning counterfeit, and referring to bills made in imitation of money, and not as referring to a valid bill which had been copied or imitated. State v. Randall (Vt.) 2 Aik. 89, 103.

COUNTERFEIT COIN.

A counterfeit coin is one made in imitation of some genuine coin. It is not necessary that the resemblance should be exact in all respects. The resemblance is sufficient if the coins are so far alike that the counterfeit coin is calculated to deceive a person exercising ordinary caution and observation in the usual transactions of business, though it would not deceive a person who was an expert or who has had particular experience in such matters. United States v. Hopkins (U. S.) 26 Fed. 443.

Both the coin made and that in imitation of which it is made are said to be counterfeited, the one in an active and the other in a passive sense. In the one case the action is effective, and in the other not. In the one case the protectiveness of the action centers in the object; in the other, it is reflected from it. And an allegation in an indictment that respondent ten pieces of forged and counterfeit coin unlawfully and feloniously did forge, make, and counterfeit, is sufficient. State v. Griffin. 18 Vt. 198, 202.

A counterfeit coin, within Act June 8, 1864, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin in the United States," is a piece of metal stamped and made legally current as money issued from the mints of the United States and those of foreign countries current here. It is a coin in imitation of some genuine coin. The resemblance of the counterfeit to the genuine must be such that it might deceive a person using ordinary caution, and a conviction for counterfeiting cannot be had for the uttering of pieces of metal which are not in the likeness or similitude of some genuine coin; and hence a person who passes pieces of metal apparently gold, octagon in form, on one side of which is the device of an Indian, and on the other the inscription " $\frac{1}{4}$ dollar," is not guilty under Rev. St. § 5461 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3685], punishing the counterfeiting of coin. United States v. Bogart (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1185.

COUNTERFEIT TRADE-MARK.

The phrases "forged trade-mark" and "counterfeited trade-mark," or their equivalents, as used in provisions in the Penal Code punishing the forging and counterfeiting of trade-marks, include every alteration or imitation of any trade-mark so resembling the original as to be likely to deceive. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4484.

COUNTERFEITER.

In legal parlance, a counterfeiter is one who unlawfully makes base coin in imitation of the true metal, or forges false currency, or any instrument of writing bearing likeness and similitude to that which is lawful and genuine, with an intention of deceiving and imposing on mankind. Thirman v. Matthews (Ala.) 1 Stew. 384, 386.

COUNTERFEITING.

As an infamous crime, see "Infamous Crime."

As felony, see "Felony."

COUNTERPART.

Where each part of a statement is executed by one party only, as often occurs in cases of leases, the two instruments are called "counterparts." Roosevelt v. Smith, 40 N. Y. Supp. 381, 382, 17 Misc. Rep. 323.

COUNTERPART WRIT.

A counterpart writ is a copy of the original writ, and is authorized to be issued to another county when the court or justice has jurisdiction of the cause by reason of the fact that some of the defendants are residents of his county, or found therein. White v. Lea, 77 Tenn. (9 Lea) 449, 450.

COUNTERSIGN.

To countersign an instrument is to sign what has already been signed by a superior—to authenticate by an additional signature—and usually has reference to the signature of a subordinate in addition to that of his superior, by way of authentication of the writing to which it is affixed, and it denotes the complete execution of the paper. Fifth Avenue Bank v. Forty-Second St. & G. St. Ferry R. Co., 33 N. E. 378, 380, 137 N. Y. 231, 19 L. R. A. 331 33 Am. St. Rep. 712.

"Countersign" means to sign what has already been signed by a superior; to authenticate by an additional signature; and hence, where the signature of a person appeared on the instrument, it was not open to the objection that it was not signed though the signature was preceded by the word "Countersigned." Gurnee v. City of Chicago, 40 Ill. 165, 167.

"Countersigned," as used in a statute directing the issuance of a certificate of state indebtedness signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the Acting Paymaster General, means the signing of what has already been signed by a superior to authenticate a writing. In the making of the paper itself, the part taken by the Acting Paymaster General was subordinate to the previous signature of the Governor and the Quartermaster General. People v. Brie (N. Y.) 43 Hun, 317, 327.

COUNTERVAIL LIVERY.

A release was a form of transfer used at common law only where some right to real estate existed in one person, the actual possession of which was in another. The possession in such case was said to "countervail livery." Dyer, 269, pl. 20, in marg. That is, it supplied the place of and rendered unnecessary that open and notorious delivery of the possession which the common law required in cases of transfer of lands. Miller v. Emans, 19 N. Y. 384, 387.

COUNTING HOUSE.

Within an act authorizing a punishment for breaking or entering a counting house, a building called a "machine house," on the premises of a person who had large chemical works, in which goods sent out were weighed, and in which the men's time was taken, and wages paid, is included.—Regina v. Potter, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 575.

COUNTING UPON A STATUTE.

In Gould, Pl. c. 111, § 16, note 3, it is said that "counting upon a statute consists in making express reference to it as by the word 'against the form of a statute' (or 'by the force of statute') in such case made and provided."—Richardson v. Fletcher, 52 Atl. 1064, 1066, 74 Vt. 417.

COUNTRY.

See "Foreign Country"; "Indian Country."

"Countries," as used in 12 Stat. 577, providing that goods which are grown or produced in countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope shall, when imported from a place this side of it, pay a duty of 10 per cent. in addition to the duties imposed on such articles when imported directly from the place of their growth or production, is used in a local and geographical sense, without regard to the subdivision of the territory under different sovereigns or government; and hence Calcutta, in the British East Indies, is to be regarded as a country beyond the Cape of Good Hope. Campbell v. Barney (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1157, 1158.

Under revenue laws providing that no goods, wares, or merchandise should be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which they can only be, and most usually are, shipped for transportation, it was held that "country" should be construed as embracing all the possessions of a foreign state, however widely separated, which are subjected to the same executive and legislative authority. The productions and manufactures of a foreign state and of its colonies may be imported into the United States in vessels owned by the citizens or subjects of such state, without regard to their place of residence within its possessions. This, when applied to Great Britain, includes its East India possessions. United States v. The Recorder (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 718; Stairs v. Peaslee, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 521, 526, 15 L. Ed. 474.

The concluding part of the old system of pleading, by which the answer stated that the pleader, "and of this he puts himself upon the country," meant that the truth of the fact so stated he desired to have tried by the jury. Bell v. Yates (N. Y.) 33 Barb. 627, 629.

As state in United States.

In an article in the convention for extradition between the United States and Switzerland, which provides that the fact of the commission of the crime shall be established according to such proceedings as would be required if the crime had been committed in the country where the person shall be found, the word "country" necessarily means, in carrying out the provisions of the convention under our form of government, the special political jurisdiction that has cognizance of the crime; and, where the proceeding is brought in the state of New York, it must follow the observances which prevail in such state. In re Farez (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 1007.

In the statute of limitations providing that limitations shall not run against a person without the country, the word "country" should not be construed to mean the United States, and not the state. The state may certainly with propriety be called a country, and, when the Legislature used the expression "country," it is natural to suppose that they meant the country for which they were legislating. Mansell's Adm'r v. Israel, 6 Ky. (3 Bibb) 510, 514.

In mining as rock surrounding vein.

As the term "country" is used in the mining law, it designates the mass of rock which surrounds a vein or lode. It is used to designate all such surrounding rock, without regard to its character. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

The term "country," in the mining law, is used to designate the rock surrounding or adjoining a lode. King v. Amy & Silver-smith Con. Min. Co., 24 Pac. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

COUNTRY DAMAGE.

"Country damage," as used with reference to bales of cotton, is damage which results often from the bad condition of the cotton when it is baled, or from its exposure to bad weather, or from ill usage in its interior transportation, and is not discoverable from an inspection of the bales at the time of shipment. Bradstreet v. Heran (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1183.

The term "country damaged," as applied to a cargo of wheat purchased afloat, means damaged by being wet or from some other cause before shipment. Alexander v. McNear (U. S.) 23 Fed. 403.

COUNTRY ROCK.

As the term "country rock" is used in the mining law, it designates the mass of rock which surrounds the vein or lode. It is used to designate all such surrounding rock, without regard to its character. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

"Country rock" is the term applied in mining parlance to the rock which forms the boundaries of and incloses a vein, lode, or ledge. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 6 Sup. Ct. 481, 483, 116 U. S. 529, 29 L. Ed. 712.

COUNTRY WHENCE HE CAME.

Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1318], prohibiting any Chinese laborer, etc., from returning to the United States, and providing that, if such person return, he shall be removed to the "country from whence he came," means the country of his last domicile, and is not simply a paraphrase of the words "country of which he is a subject by birth or allegiance." United States v. Chong Sam, 47 Fed. 878, 883.

Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1318], prohibiting any Chinese laborer, etc., from returning to the United States, and providing that, if such person return, he shall be removed to the "country from whence he came," includes the country from which he came by a direct journey, though he may have come through another country. In re Mah Wong Gee (U. S.) 47 Fed. 433, 434.

As country of residence.

Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1318], prohibiting any Chinese laborer, etc., from returning to the United States, and providing that, if such person return, he shall be removed to the "country from whence he came," means a country in which he has established relations of a permanent character, and acquired a right under the law of that country to freely return thereto. United States v. Ah Toy (U. S.) 47 Fed. 305, 306.

Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1318], prohibiting any Chinese laborer, etc., from returning to the United States, and providing that, if such person return, he shall be removed to the "country from whence he came," means any country of which such person was a resident at the time he entered the United States. In re Leo Hem Bow (U. S.) 47 Fed. 302, 303.

COUNTY.

See "Another County"; "Established County"; "New County"; "Organized County"; "Proper County"; "Unorganized County"; "Body of County"; "Co."

Any county, see "Any."

The term "county," as defined by Blackstone (1 Bl. Comm. 113, 116), is a civil division of a state or kingdom for political and judicial purposes, formerly governed in England by an earl or count, from whom it derived its name. Kent defines a county (2 Kent, Comm. 275) as a public corporation created by the government for political purposes, and invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good; and such powers are, in general, subject to the control of the Legislature of the state. Patterson v. Temple, 27 Ark. 202, 207.

The word "county" signifies the same as "shire"; "county," being derived from the French, and "shire" from the Saxon. Both of these words signify a circuit or portion of the realm into which the whole land is divided for the better government thereof, and the more easy administration of justice. State v. Dickenson (Fla.) 33 South. 514, 515, 60 L. R. A. 539 (citing Stockton v. Powell, 29 Fla. 1, 10 South. 688, 15 L. R. A. 42).

Counties "are corporations of a purely political character, constituting the machinery and essential agencies by which the free governments derived from and modeled upon the representative and popular features of the English Constitution are upheld, and through which, for the most part, their powers are exercised. The idea of a government by means of counties comes down from the remotest period of Anglo-Saxon history. It was imported to the American colonies with the common law, and entered naturally and of course into the frame of all their colonial governments, from whence it passed, by easy transition and necessary consequence, into the governments of the states. Our Constitutions do not expressly provide for the organization of the territory into counties. This division is taken for granted. The idea of counties underlies all American Constitutions. They presuppose both the existence and necessity of counties, and, starting from that foundation, proceed to base thereon frames of government in which the counties act all efficient parts. The political power is composed of representatives from counties. Through them justice is administered, the revenue collected, and the local police rendered effective. Having this character, so intimately connected with the public interests, so foreign to any considerations of private convenience in opposition to the common good, it logically follows that the power of the Legislature to mold and direct these political subdivisions to effect their objects, and cause them to subserve their highest purposes, must be very great. They are the vitals of the state; their inefficiency, her paralysis. The health of the body politic requires that the Legislature should have a power over them analogous to that of the individual over his own limbs." Eagle v. Beard, 33 Ark. 497, 501.

Counties are but agencies of the state for governmental purposes. Consolidated Ice Co. v. City of New York, 59 N. E. 713, 716, 166 N. Y. 92.

Counties are involuntary political or civil divisions of the state, created by general laws to aid in the administration of the state government. City of New Albany v. Conger, 47 N. E. 852, 854, 18 Ind. App. 230; Jasper County Com'rs v. Allman, 42 N. E. 206, 207, 142 Ind. 573, 39 L. R. A. 58; Cones v. Benton County Com'rs, 37 N. E. 272, 273, 137 Ind. 404; State v. King, 57 N. E. 535, 537, 154 Ind. 621; Jay County Com'rs v. Fertich, 46 N. E. 699, 700, 18 Ind. App. 1; Cole v. White County, 32 Ark. 45, 52; State v. Blackburn, 33 S. W. 529, 530, 61 Ark. 407. The people residing therein are virtually the incorporators. State v. King, 57 N. E. 535, 537, 154 Ind. 621.

"A county is a public corporation which exists only for public purposes connected with the administration of the state government, and it and its revenues are alike, where no express restriction is found to the contrary, subject to legislative control." Raymond v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 63 N. E. 745, 749, 196 Ill. 329; Swartz v. Lake County Com'rs, 63 N. E. 31, 35, 158 Ind. 141; Sangamon County Sup'rs v. City of Springfield, 63 Ill. 66, 71; Marion County v. Lear, 108 Ill. 343; Harris v. Whiteside County Sup'rs, 105 Ill. 445, 451, 44 Am. Rep. 808; City of Chicago v. Manhattan Cement Co., 53 N. E. 68, 70, 178 Ill. 372, 45 L. R. A. 848, 69 Am. St. Rep. 321; Armstrong v. Dearborn County Com'rs (Ind.) 4 Blackf. 208, 213.

Counties are, at most, but local organizations which for the purpose of civil administration are invested with a few functions characteristic of corporate existence. They are local subdivisions of the state, created by the sovereign power of the state of its own sovereign will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit them. Frederick v. Douglas County, 71 N. W. 798, 799, 96 Wis. 411 (citing 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 23, 25); Grant County v. Lake County, 21 Pac. 447, 448, 17 Or. 453; Hamilton County Com'rs v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109, 115; Fischer Land & Improvement Co. v. Bordelon, 27 South. 59, 62, 52 La. Ann. 429; Kahn v. Sutro, 46 Pac. 87, 88, 114 Cal. 316, 33 L. R. A. 620.

Counties are subdivisions of the state in which some of the powers of state government are exercised by legal functionaries for legal purposes. They are nothing more than certain portions of territory in which the state is divided for the more convenient exercise of the powers of government. They form together one political body, in which the sovereignty resides. Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 208.

A county is a corporation, with commissioners, treasurer, coroner, sheriff, constables, justices of the peace, judges of the courts, etc. It is struck off from the state at large, and becomes a distinct and independent body, though in some cases it may be within the bounds of an old county. Respublica v. McClean (Pa.) 4 Yeates, 399, 409.

A county is a political subdivision of the state, acting as a corporation with certain specified powers, and acting through its officers in a certain prescribed way, pointed out by law. Shawnee County Com'rs v. Carter, 2 Kan. 115, 128.

Counties are subdivisions of the state for governmental purposes, and the General Assembly has power to create, alter, abolish, and regulate them as expediency may demand, so that no vested rights are interfered with. State v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 27 S. W. 367, 368, 123 Mo. 72.

Counties of a state are involuntary subdivisions of the state, and corporations for governmental purposes. The board of county commissioners is the legal representative of the county, but the inhabitants, not the board, constitute the county. Zuely v. Casper, 67 N. E. 103, 104, 160 Ind. 455, 63 L. R. A. 133.

Counties are separate organizations established for public, political purposes, for the administration of government—chiefly for purposes strictly local in character and interest. Shriver v. Hering, 54 Atl. 651, 653, 97 Md. 19.

A county is a subdivision of the state created by the sovereign power of the state for governmental purposes. Such subdivisions are instrumentalities of government, and exercise the powers delegated by the state. Miami County Com'rs v. Mowbray, 66 N. E. 46, 47, 160 Ind. 10 (citing Fulton County Com'rs v. Rickel, 106 Ind. 501, 7 N. E. 220; Vigo County Com'rs v. Dally, 132 Ind. 73, 31 N. E. 531).

A county is a political division endowed with specific powers, and provided with appropriate officers to manage its affairs. Floyd v. Perrin, 8 S. E. 14, 21, 30 S. C. 1, 20, 2 L. R. A. 242.

Counties, cities, etc., are political subdivisions of the state, and are included in the term "state," which is the concrete whole. State v. Levy Court (Del.) 43 Atl. 522, 524, 1 Pennewill, 597.

A county is a body politic whose powers are exercised by a board of supervisors. Sierra County v. Butler, 69 Pac. 418, 419, 136 Cal. 547.

A county is a political subdivision of the state. People v. Scannell, 75 N. Y. Supp. 500, 508, 37 Misc. Rep. 345.

A county is a legal subdivision of the state. State ex rel. Beach v. Flinn, 4 Mo. App. 347, 350.

A county is the largest political division of the state having corporate powers. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3901; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4100.

The word "county" includes a parish, or any other equivalent subdivision of a state or territory of the United States. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 4.

The word "county" may mean the county in which the subject-matter referred to is situate, belongs, or is cognizable. V. S. 1894, 25; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 27.

Whenever the term "county," "subdivision," or "judicial subdivision" is employed in the Code of Criminal Procedure, in defining or describing the territorial or local jurisdiction of any magistrate or court, or in restraining, enlarging, or otherwise conferring authority upon any court, officer, or person of this state, the words are deemed to be employed in the same sense and interchangeably, except when a different sense plainly appears; as, for example: (1) The term "county," when so employed, includes an organized county, or an organized county and such unorganized counties or other territory or parts of this state as now are, or as may be hereafter, by law, attached to such organized county for judicial purposes; (2) the term "subdivision," when so employed, includes an organized county, or an organized county and such unorganized county or counties or other territory or parts of this state as now are, or as may be hereafter, by law, attached to such organized county for judicial purposes. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8511.

City as.

The word "county" includes city and county. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 14.

The word "county" shall be construed to include the city of Baltimore, unless such construction would be unreasonable. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 3, art. 1, § 11.

Under a statute prohibiting counties from subscribing for stock in any incorporated company unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription, it is held that cities, though an integral part of the county, are not intended to be included in the prohibition. Thompson v. City of Peru, 23 Ind. 305, 307; City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, 77.

The words "counties and townships," in Const. art. 13, § 12, providing that the Legislature shall provide for the establishment of a library in each township, and that all the fines collected in the several counties and townships for any breach of the penal laws shall be exclusively applied to the support of such libraries, include all the municipal divisions of the state, and hence fines collected in the city of Detroit must be shared with the country towns of the county. Wayne County v. City of Detroit, 17 Mich. 390, 401.

Contiguous territory implied.

Within Gen. St. 1894, § 621, providing that new counties may be created out of territory to be detached from one or more of the counties already organized, but no existing county shall by the creation of any new counties be reduced in area to less than 400 square miles, or contain a population of less than 2,000 inhabitants, the word "county" is used in its usual and accepted meaning, and with reference to declared public policy of the state from its beginning—that all counties shall be composed of contiguous territory, unless separated by navigable rivers; so that a statute does not authorize the founding of a new county, where by so doing the old county is left in two or more completely separated parts. Duckstad v. Polk County Com'rs, 71 N. W. 933, 934, 69 Minn. 202.

As district.

Rev. St. 1898, § 8, declares that counties on the shores of Green Bay shall have jurisdiction in common of all offenses committed on that part of the bay lying within the limits of the state. Const. art. 1, § 7, provided that, in all prosecutions by indictment or information, the case shall have a speedy trial by a jury of the county or district where in the offense shall have been committed, which county or district shall have previously been ascertained by law. It was held that where one was informed against for taking fish with nets in the waters bordering on Door county, and the offense was committed 40 miles from Brown county, and 5 miles, at least, from the nearest point of any other county than Door, the circuit court of Brown county had jurisdiction; the word "district," in the Constitution, not being used synonymously with "county." State v. McDonald, 85 N. W. 502, 505, 109 Wis. 506.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. Or. § 54, amended in Sess. Laws 1876, p. 37, providing that, in case of an action against a private corporation, the summons shall be served on certain officers, or, in case none of them reside or have an office in the county where the cause of action arose, then on any clerk within such county, the word "county" must, in the federal court, be understood to mean the district or territorial limit of the court's jurisdiction. Lung Chung v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. 254, 257.

As a municipal corporation.

A county is a municipal corporation comprising the inhabitants within its boundaries, and formed for the purpose of exercising the powers and discharging the duties of local government, and the administration of public affairs conferred upon it by law. Laws 1892, c. 686; Markey v. Queens County, 49 N. E. 71, 72, 154 N. Y. 675, 39 L. R. A. 46; Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 279, 47 App. Div. 250.

A county is a municipal corporation created by law for public and political purposes, and constitutes a part of the government of the state. Its powers are expressly defined by law, and, where they are not fixed by the Constitution, they may be acknowledged or modified by the Legislature. Gooch v. Gregory, 65 N. C. 142, 143.

Municipal corporations proper are called into existence either at the direct solicitation or by the free consent of the people who compose them. Counties are local subdivisions of the state, created by the sovereign power of the state, of its own sovereign will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit them. The former organization is asked for, or at least assented to, by the people it embraces. A municipal corporation proper is created mainly for the interest and convenience of the locality and its people. A county organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large. Overholser v. National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, 67 N. E. 487, 489, 68 Ohio St. 236.

A municipal corporation is a government possessing powers of legislation, and is charged with a general care for the welfare of the people, while a county organization is merely the involuntary agent of the state, charged with the interests of the state in the particular county, and clothed with certain administrative functions, limited in extent, and clearly defined by law. City of Williamsport v. Commonwealth, 84 Pa. 487, 499, 24 Am. Rep. 208.

A county is a municipality, within the meaning of an act authorizing municipal corporations to fund indebtedness; a county being defined by St. 1893, c. 22, art. 1, § 1, as follows: "That each organized county within this territory shall be a body corporate and politic." Territory v. Hopkins, 59 Pac. 976, 980, 9 Okl. 133.

A county is not, in a strict sense, a municipal corporation. In the sense, however, that its board of commissioners has no power other than is derivable expressly or by necessary implication from the provisions of the statute defining their powers, it comes within the rules and principles of law applicable to such corporations. State v. Coad, 57 Pac. 1092, 1095, 23 Mont. 131.

A county is not a municipal corporation, in the full sense of the term. It is only a quasi corporation, and possesses such powers and is subjected to such liabilities only as are specially provided for by law. Schweiss v. First Judicial District Court, 45 Pac. 289, 23 Nev. 226, 34 L. R. A. 602.

Counties are not municipal corporations proper, and, even when invested with corporate capacity and the power of taxation, are but quasi corporations, with limited powers and liabilities. They exist only for the purpose of the general political government of the state. They are the agents and instrumentalities the state uses to perform its functions. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and the duties imposed upon them are the duties of the state. Madden v. Lancaster County (U. S.) 65 Fed. 188, 191, 12 C. C. A. 566.

The city and county of San Francisco is recognized as having the attributes of both a city and county. Geographically it is one of the legal subdivisions of the state, and, in that respect, is recognized by the Constitution as one of the counties of the state. Politically it is regarded in that instrument as a municipal corporation. A county is not a corporation for municipal purposes, within the meaning of the Constitution. Kahn v. Sutro, 46 Pac. 87, 88, 114 Cal. 316, 33 L. R. A. 620.

A county is one of the public territorial divisions of the state, created and organized for public, political purposes connected with the administration of the state government, and especially charged with the superintendence and administration of local affairs of the community; being in its nature and objects a municipal corporation. The Legislature, unless restrained by the Constitution, may exercise control over the county agencies, and require such public duties and functions to be performed by them as fall within the general scope and object of the municipal organization. Talbot County Com'rs v. Queen Anne's County Com'rs, 50 Md. 245.

As person.

See "Person."

Powers and liabilities.

Counties are quasi municipal corporations, and it is elementary that they can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted them by the Legislature, or such as are fairly implied as necessary to the exercise of the powers granted. Grannis v. Blue Earth County Com'rs, 83 N. W. 495, 496, 81 Minn. 55; Scates v. King, 110 Ill. 456, 466.

Counties exist only for the purpose of a general politic government of the state. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and all the duties with which they are charged are duties of the state. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Township of Oswego (U. S.) 59 Fed. 58, 64, 7 C. C. A. 669.

A county is one of the political divisions of the state, signifying a community clothed with such extensive authority and political power as may be deemed necessary by the superior controlling power of the state for the proper government of its people residing within its borders, and for a proper administration of its local affairs. Emery County v. Burresen, 47 Pac. 91, 14 Utah, 328, 37 L. R. A. 732, 60 Am. St. Rep. 898.

A county organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large, for purposes of political organization and civil administration in matters of finance, of education, of provision for the poor, of military organization, and especially in the general administration of justice. State v. Downs, 57 Pac. 962, 963, 60 Kan. 788; People v. Van Gaskin, 6 Pac. 30, 40, 5 Mont. 352.

Counties are involuntary political or civil divisions of the state, created by general laws to aid in the administration of the government. Their powers are not uniform in all the states, but these generally relate to the administration of justice, the support of the poor, and the establishment and repair of highways, all of which are matters of state, as distinguished from municipal, concern. They are purely auxiliaries of the state, and to the general statutes of the state they owe their creation, and the statutes confer on them all the powers they possess, prescribe all the duties they owe, and impose all the liabilities to which they are subject. Cummings v. Kendall County, 26 S. W. 439, 440, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 164; Shipley v. Hacheney, 55 Pac. 971, 972, 34 Or. 303; Harris v. Whiteside County Sup'rs, 105 Ill. 445, 451, 44 Am. Rep. 808. A county is thus merely a part of the state government. Hoexter v. Judson, 59 Pac. 498, 499, 21 Wash. 646.

A county has been defined as an involuntary political or civil division of a state, created by statute to aid in the administration of the government. It is in its very nature and purpose a governing agency, rather than a corporation. Whatever of power it possesses, or whatever of duty it is required to perform, originates in the statutes creating it, or in the statutes declaring its power and duty. Southern Ry. Co. v. St. Clair County, 27 South. 23-25, 124 Ala. 491; Askew v. Hale County, 54 Ala. 639, 641, 25 Am. Rep. 730. It is created mainly for the interest, advantage, and convenience of the people residing within its territorial boundaries, and the better to enable the government to extend to them the protection to which they are entitled, and the more ben-eficially to exercise over them its powers. All the powers with which the county is intrusted are the powers of the state, and all the duties with which they are charged are the duties of the state. If these were not committed to the county, they must be conferred on some other governmental agency. Askew v. Hale County, 54 Ala. 641; People v. Martin, 53 N. E. 309, 312, 178 Ill. 611.

Counties are mere subdivisions of the state for governmental purposes—capable, however, of holding title in fee to such land as may be donated to them for their own use. Abernathy v. Dennis, 49 Mo. 468. Hence a county can take land under a will. Fulbright v. Perry County, 46 S. W. 955, 958, 145 Mo. 432.

A county is not a municipal corporation. It has no police powers. It is not a corporation in the strict sense of the term, but is what is denominated a "quasi corporation"—an organization in the nature of a corporation exercising special and limited powers. Those powers pertain strictly to local concerns—the performance of local public duties in which no other part of the state is directly concerned. The apprehension and trial of persons accused of crime is a matter not of local, but of general, concern—one in which the whole state, in theory, is equally interested. Hence the services of the sheriff in the arrest of offenders against the criminal laws of the state are performed for the state, and not for the county of which he is sheriff. Northern Trust Co. v. Snyder, 89 N. W. 460, 466, 113 Wis. 516.

A county is not a corporation, but it is a mere political organization of certain of the territory within the state, particularly defined by geographical limits, for the more convenient administration of the laws and police power of the state, and for the convenience of the inhabitants. Such organization is vested with certain powers delegated to it by the state for the purpose of civil administration, and for the same purpose it is clothed with many characteristics of a body corporate. Hunter v. Mercer County Com'rs, 10 Ohio St. 515, 520.

A county is a corporation, so far as to be capable of suing and being sued; but its inhabitants cannot, like the inhabitants of towns and parishes, assemble, and by vote declare their will on any subject. The inhabitants of counties, as such, are not represented in either branch of the Legislature, and so cannot, like towns, which may be represented in both branches, or plantations, which may be represented in the Senate, be presumed to have assented to taxes imposed by the Legislature. The only representative body in the county whose acts and admissions are binding on its inhabitants is the court of sessions, which has been immemorially considered as the agent and representative of the county, touching its finances and general prudential concerns. Inhabitants of Hampshire County v. Inhabitants of Franklin County, 16 Mass. 76, 87.

Counties are but subdivisions of the territory created for governmental purposes, and their inhabitants derive their authority to hold elections and elect officers from the Legislature; and where the law makes no provision for an election, or gives no authority to elect an officer, such right or authority cannot be legally exercised. Stone v. Reynolds, 54 Pac. 555, 558, 7 Okl. 397.

A county is often said to be a mere agency of state government—a function through which the state administers its affairs—and it frequently has but little, if any, option in the creation of debts and liabilities against it. Robertson v. Blaine County (U. S.) 90 Fed. 63, 69, 32 C. C. A. 512, 47 L. R. A. 459.

A county is an organized political subdivision of a state. It has such powers—and such only—to contract loans and incur other indebtedness as are expedient, or by fair implication granted to it by the Legislature of the state. Dudley v. Lake County Com'rs, 80 Fed. 672, 675, 26 C. C. A. 82.

In the absence of a statute imposing special duties, with corresponding liabilities, a county is not liable for the tortious acts of negligence of its officers or agents. Jasper County Com'rs v. Allman, 42 N. E. 206, 207, 142 Ind. 573, 39 L. R. A. 58; Cones v. Benton County Com'rs, 87 N. E. 272, 273, 137 Ind. 404.

Laws 1887, p. 237, making a county liable for property destroyed within it by a mob, without reference to its ability or exercise of diligence to prevent the destruction, is within the police power of the state. City of Chicago v. Manhattan Cement Co., 53 N. E. 68, 70, 178 Ill. 372, 45 L. R. A. 848, 69 Am. St. Rep. 321.

As quasi corporations.

Counties are quasi corporations. Price v. Sacramento County, 6 Cal. 254, 255.

Counties are quasi corporations organized as a part and parcel of the state government to subserve the public interest, and to this end, and in order to accomplish this effect, certain corporate powers are conferred upon them. Wells v. Cole, 27 Ark. 603, 605.

A county is a political division, and denominated a "quasi corporation." It assumes on itself some of the duties of the state, in a partial or detached form, and is to be considered in the light of an auxiliary of the government, and as a trustee of the people. Barton County v. Walser, 47 Mo. 189, 202 (citing Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Marion County, 36 Mo. 294, 303); Reardon v. St. Louis County, 36 Mo. 555, 560 (citing McKim v. Odom, 3 Bland, 407, 417).

A county is a political division, and denominated a "quasi corporation," and is invested with corporate power to do things. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Marion County, 36 Mo. 294, 303.

A county is a body politic having a corporate capacity only for particular specified ends and purposes, and is termed by legal writers a "quasi corporation"; that is, having corporate attributes sub modo. Williams v. Lash, 8 Minn. 496, 504 (Gil. 441, 446).

The term "county" has a well-defined meaning. By act the state has been divided into a certain number of territorial boundaries called "counties." Each county is a body politic and corporate for certain purposes, among which are to purchase and hold for the use of the county lands and personalty within the limits thereof, and to make all contracts and to do all acts in relation to the property and concerns of the county. Carolina, C., G. & C. Ry. Co. v. Tribble, 25 S. C. 260, 264.

A county is a corporation created by law. Like most corporations, its powers are necessarily specific and limited, and such powers as it may exercise it owes to legislative grant; and the Legislature may make such grant as broad as it sees fit, unless there is a constitutional provision which confines such grant to a specified limit. The people of the county are the corporators. 2 Kent, Comm. 274. And when it acts, as all corporations must when no other mode is prescribed, it must perform its functions through the action of a majority of its citizens entitled to speak in its elections. Ang. & A. Corp. §§ 84, 499; 1 Kyd, Corp. 422; 2 Kent, Comm. 236. As in other corporations, the minority must act with the majority, unless there is some rule to excuse them. If an obligation is contracted by a majority in a manner authorized by law, it must be discharged in a manner authorized by law. It cannot be repudiated because the minority complain, nor because the majority may subsequently change its views. Ex parte Selma & G. R. Co., 45 Ala. 696, 727, 6 Am. Rep. 722.

Counties are not corporations, but civil and political divisions of the state. For some purposes they are merely civil divisions, but for others they certainly are corporations. They are therefore called "quasi corporations." They are political, aggregate corporations, capable of exercising such powers as they may be vested with by the Legislature. Any body of persons capable of acting as one man, and in a single name, fixed by law, having succession, is in some sense a corporation. Without going into all the ramifications of this subject to be found in the books, it is sufficient to say that the counties in each state are clothed with the powers of attributes of corporations to a sufficient extent to be able to act and contract, and to become debtor and creditor, so as to subject all the persons and property within their limits to taxation in any mode that may be prescribed by the Legislature. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davidson County Court, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 637, 687, 62 Am. Dec. 424.

Counties, though possessing some corporate functions and attributes, are primarily political subdivisions—agencies in the administration of civil government—and their corporate functions are granted to enable them to perform their public duties. They are denominated in the books and known to the law as quasi corporations, rather than corporations proper. Beach v. Leahy, 11 Kan. 23, 29 (cited in Knowles v. Board of Education, 7 Pac. 561, 33 Kan. 692).

Counties are commonly designated as "quasi corporations," for the reason that, being but political subdivisions of the state, and organized purely for the purposes of government, they differ essentially not only from private corporations, but also such public corporations as towns and cities, which are voluntary, and are established largely for the private interest of their inhabitants; and hence, in the absence of statutory authority, a county cannot be subject to garnishment proceedings. City of Sherman v. Shobe, 58 S. W. 949, 94 Tex. 126, 86 Am. St. Rep. 825.

The designation of counties as "quasi corporations" distinguishes them, on the one hand, from private corporations aggregate, and, on the other, from municipal corporations proper, such as cities or towns acting under charters or incorporating statutes, and which are invested with more powers, and endowed with special functions relating to the political or local interests of a municipality, and to this end are granted a larger measure of corporate life. Shipley v. Hacheney, 55 Pac. 971, 972, 34 Or. 303 (citing Dill. Mun. Corp. [4th Ed.] § 25).

Counties, in a very important sense, occupy a double relation. In one relation, a county is a municipal corporation charged with corporate functions and duties, and invested with corporate powers. These are exercised for the benefit of the municipality, and in respect to these the county is responsible. A county is also a territorial and political division of the state, established as an instrumentality of government and municipal regulation. Some of the duties of county boards, as well as other county officers, relate to and are exercised in the discharge of their functions as governmental agencies. Of this character are the duties of the county treasurer and auditor, so far as they are connected with the revenue system of the state. In exercising these duties the officers exert a power delegated immediately to them by the state for the benefit of all the citizens who are affected by the sovereign power which pertains to the levying and collecting of taxes. The county, as a municipality, is not specially interested in the exercise of these powers, except so far as they relate to its own municipal affairs. It is, hence, not liable for derelictions of officers in respect to their conduct as mere agents of the government. Of course, in respect to such duties as are directly and absolutely imposed on a municipal corporation by law, or which concern interests specially committed to its charge, and for the performance of which certain agents or officers may have been designated, the delinquency or default of the agent may nevertheless render the municipality answerable. Liability in such cases grows out of the fact that the municipality failed to discharge some corporate duty which the law expressly and primarily laid upon it, and not on the officer or agent. Vigo Tp. v. Knox County Com'rs, 12 N. E. 305, 306, 111 Ind. 170.

A county may not improperly be called a quasi corporation, for it is in many respects like a corporation; but a county can neither sue nor be sued, except by express power conferred by statute, and in the manner so expressed; nor can any of the officers of a county, by virtue of such office, sue or be sued, except as provided by statute. Hunter v. Mercer County Com'rs, 10 Ohio St. 515, 520.

Considered with respect to their corporate powers, counties rank low down in the scale of corporate existences, and hence have been termed "quasi corporations." Frederick v. Douglas County, 71 N. W. 798, 799, 96 Wis. 411 (citing 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 23, 25). See, also, Nelson v. Hamilton County, 71 N. W. 206, 207, 102 Iowa, 229; Shipley v. Hacheney, 55 Pac. 971, 972, 34 Or. 303; Burnett v. Maloney, 37 S. W. 689, 693, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 697, 34 L. R. A. 541; Scates v. King, 110 Ill. 456, 466; Kennedy v. Queens County, 62 N. Y. Supp. 276, 279, 47 App. Div. 250.

Comp. Laws, § 332, provides: "Each organized county in this territory shall be a body corporate and politic, and as such shall be empowered to make all contracts and to do all things in reference to the property * * * necessary to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers." Coler v. Santa Fé County Com'rs, 27 Pac. 619, 622, 6 N. M. 88.

As tax district.

While a county, like towns and villages, is a political subdivision of the state, it has no board of assessors, as do towns and villages, and therefore does not come within the statutory definition of a "tax district" contained in the tax law as amended in 1901, c. 24. People v. Schoharie County Sup'rs, 79 N. Y. Supp. 145, 146, 39 Misc. Rep. 162.

As territory.

The word "county," as used in the act of 1895 providing that certain territory "is hereby set off from the county of Westchester, and annexed to, merged in, and made part of the city and county of New York," etc., is not used to refer to the political division of the state known as the "County of New York," but only in a geographical sense referring to the territory which had long been embraced prior thereto within the limits of the state and county of New York; thus not making the territory described a part of the political division known as the "County of New York." In re McKeon, 58 N. Y. Supp. 539, 590, 26 Misc. Rep. 464.

The word "county," in section 11 of the Nebraska Bill of Rights, providing that all persons charged with crime are entitled to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, is held to be used in a restrictive sense—to limit and control the exercise of both legislative and judicial power in the punishment of criminal offenders. It is intended to designate the precise portion of territory or division of the state over which the court of any particular city may exercise power in criminal matters. Olive v. State, 11 Neb. 1, 7 N. W. 444.

Const. 1895, art. 3, § 3, which divides the state into Senate districts by counties, uses the word "county" in the sense of a certain portion of territory, and not of a political organization. This is evident, because, in defining the boundary of the Twenty-First Senate District, metes and bounds are established, and there is added: "All that part of the county of New York not hereinbefore described." People v. Aldermen of City of New York, 35 N. Y. Supp. 817, 819, 89 Hun, 460.

It is expressly provided by Ann. St. 1899, § 32, that the word "county," as used in any of the laws of Arkansas which are put in force in the Indian Territory, shall be construed to embrace the territory within the limits of the judicial division in said Indian Territory, and, whenever in the laws of Arkansas the word "county" is used, the words "judicial division" may be substituted therefor in the Indian Territory. Simon v. United States (Ind. T.) 76 S. W. 280-282.

COUNTY AFFAIRS.

County affairs are those relating to the county in its organized and corporate capacity, and included within its governmental or corporate powers. Hankins v. New York City, 64 N. Y. 18, 22; Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 388, 58 Pac. 923.

Const. art. 3, § 7, prohibiting the Joint Assembly from passing any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, means such affairs as affect the people of the county; and hence P. L. 187, regulating the fees of sheriffs in counties having a certain population, is a special act, and unconstitutional.

Morrison v. Bachert, 5 Atl. 739, 112 Pa. 322, In Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, and Appeal of Scowder, 96 Pa. 422, an act authorizing the holding of special sessions of the courts of a county away from the county seat violated this provision of the Constitution; and in Frost v. Cherry, 122 Pa. 417, 15 Atl. 782, an act relating to the repeal of the fence law by the vote of the people was held invalid, as violating the same provision.

COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

A county agricultural society, under the statutes of Ohio, is a corporation for a public purpose, with defined and limited powers. It cannot mortgage the fair grounds to secure debts. Stewart v. Hardin County Agricultural Soc. (Ohio) 7 Am. Law Rec. 668, 6 Ohio Dec. 751.

COUNTY ASSESSOR.

Under Acts March 5, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 62), and March 11, 1885, the words "county assessors" do not mean county assessors and ex officio tax receivers. State v. Boyd, 19 Nev. 356, 359, 11 Pac. 36, 38.

COUNTY ATTORNEY.

The words "sheriff," "county attorney," "clerk," or other words used to denote an executive or ministerial officer, may include any deputy or other person performing the duties of such officer either generally or in special cases. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498.

COUNTY AUDITOR.

As judicial officer, see "Judicial Officer."

The words "county auditor," when used in the chapter relating to the assessment and collection of taxes, shall be construed to mean register or recorder, whenever it shall be necessary to use the same to the proper construction of the chapter. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1658.

COUNTY AUTHORITIES.

The commissioners for the management of a dispensary established under the act of December 16, 1897, are "county authorities," within the meaning of the tax law which imposes a tax on dispensaries operated by county or municipal authorities. Sheffield v. Commissioners of Dispensary in Blakely, 86 S. E. 302, 303, 111 Ga. 1.

Within Const. 1868, art. 1, § 28, providing that the General Assembly may grant the power of taxation to the county authorities of municipal corporations, to be exercised within their several territorial limits, a county board of education is included. Smith v. Bohler, 72 Ga. 546, 552.

COUNTY BOARD.

As court, see "Court."

The phrase "county board," as used in the Constitution, which requires such board to fix the compensation of all county officers, does not embrace any one particular body of persons, but means the body authorized to prosecute county business. It embraces the county court in counties not under township organization, and which in such counties was to be superseded by the board of county commissioners, and which, until so superseded, was the body for the transaction of county business. In counties under a township organization, it refers to the board of supervisors. Broadwell v. People, 76 Ill. 554, 556; Hughes v. People, 82 Ill. 78, 79.

"County boards," within the meaning of Laws July 1, 1898, § 41, providing that county boards who have heretofore acted as boards of review shall not hereafter have such power, etc., include county commissioners. People v. Cook County Com'rs, 52 N. E. 334, 337, 176 Ill. 576.

The term "county board," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include the board of supervisors—the board of county commissioners. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 5.

In the construction of statutes, the words "county board" shall apply to the board of county commissioners in counties not under township organization, and the board of supervisors in counties under township organization, and to the board of commissioners in Cook county. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 7.

The term "county board" includes both county commissioners and supervisors, as the case may be. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,405.

The words "county board" and "town board" import, respectively, the county board of supervisors and the town board of supervisors, unless otherwise clearly indicated. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4972.

COUNTY BRIDGES.

The term "bridges in the county," in Rev. St. 1881, § 2892, requiring the board of commissioners to keep all bridges in the county in repair, includes a bridge 40 feet long, 15 feet wide, and 8 feet above the ground, constructed by a county across a ditch on a free traveled road, which is a public highway of such county. Boone County Com'rs v. Mutchler, 36 N. E. 534, 535, 137 Ind. 140.

"The county is not required to maintain every structure which may be denominated a 'bridge.' On the contrary, the bridge must be one erected as a part of the public highway over a river, creek, pond, lake, or stream of water, natural or artificial, flowing in a channel between banks more or less defined, although such channel may be occasionally dry." A bridge across a natural outlet for surface water from adjoining lands and water from under a railroad near by is not a county bridge, within the rule making counties liable for negligence in failure to retain a county bridge in reasonably safe condition for travel. Reinhart v. Martin County Com'rs, 37 N. E. 38, 39, 9 Ind. App. 572.

"County bridges are such only as require for their erection an extraordinary expenditure of money—such bridges as cannot be constructed with the limited means under the control of the respective road districts of the county, or such as have been constructed by the county." Chandler v. Fremont County, 42 Iowa, 58, 59.

"County bridges" are only those of the larger class, which require an extraordinary expenditure of money, and do not include a small bridge which was not erected by the county, and which was under the supervision of the officers of the particular road district. Taylor v. Davis County, 40 Iowa, 295, 297.

"County bridges" are defined by an Iowa statute as all public bridges, exceeding 40 feet in length, over any stream crossing a state or county highway. Roby v. Appanoose County, 18 N. W. 711, 712, 63 Iowa, 113.

COUNTY CANVASSERS.

See "Canvassers."

COUNTY CLERKS.

Under Rev. St. 1894, § 432, providing that depositions may be taken without the state before the clerk of the court of record, a deposition taken before a county clerk of another state is not admissible in the absence of proof that he is the clerk of the county court. Bolds v. Woods, 36 N. E. 933, 936, 9 Ind. App. 657.

The acknowledgment of a tax deed executed by a deputy county clerk, which recites that such deputy county clerk appeared before the acknowledging officer and acknowledged the execution of the deed as such county clerk, should be construed to mean as such deputy county clerk. Ward v. Walters, 22 N. W. 844, 63 Wis. 39.

A county clerk, in this state, is not merely a clerk, as the name would seem to indicate, but he is also substantially the auditor of the county, and the assessor of the county for all property that may be omitted by the regular assessor; and he may administer oaths and affirmations, and take acknowledgments of deeds, mortgages, etc. Amrine v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 7 Kan. 178, 181.

In the construction of statutes, the words "county clerk" shall be held to include clerk of the county court, and the words "clerk of the county court" to include county clerk. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8.

The words "county clerk" may be held to include clerk of the district court. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

See "Board of County Commissioners."
As county officers, see "County Officer."
As court of record, see "Court of Record."

County commissioners are the agents, trustees, and managers of the county and its financial affairs. They are in a fiduciary capacity, and the money of the county is expended on orders drawn by them on the county treasury. They have the custody and control of the property of the county, and conduct all its litigation. They exercise all the corporate powers of the county. Commonwealth v. Krickbaum, 49 Atl. 68, 69, 199 Pa. 351.

The words "commissioner of the county court" and "county commissioner" shall be construed to mean and have reference to the commissioners, or one of them, composing the county court or an existing tribunal created in lieu of a county court. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17.

COUNTY CONTINGENT TAX.

A bond with a condition that A. should collect the county contingent tax, and in all things perform his duty as sheriff, should be construed strictly, and hence public taxes could not be recovered on the bond. Crumpler v. Governor, 12 N. C. 52, 56.

COUNTY CONTRACTS.

"A contract entered into by a board of supervisors for and on behalf of the county, and signed by the chairman of the board, is a contract of the county." Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488, 508.

COUNTY CONVICTS.

County convicts embrace all those sentenced to hard labor for the county, whether in or out of the county. Ex parte Gayles, 19 South. 12, 13, 108 Ala. 514.

A "county convict," as used in a provision for the erection of workhouses and establishment of county farms for the purpose of utilizing the labor of county convicts, is any person who may have been convicted of a misdemeanor or petty offense, and whose punishment has been assessed at imprisonment in the county jail for any term, or who, under a like conviction, has been adjudged to pay a pecuniary fine, and is unable so to do. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3728.

COUNTY COURT.

As an inferior court, see "Inferior Courts."

"As a general rule, when reference is made to a county court, or the action of a county court, it is understood as a court presided over by the county judge alone." As used in the charter of a railroad company, providing that whenever the said railroad company shall request the county court of any county, through or adjacent to which it is proposed to construct said railroad, to subscribe to the capital stock of the said company, the county court may, in their discretion, order an election, etc., it is not so limited, but means the county judge and a majority of the county justices of the peace. Bowling Green & M. R. Co. v. Warren County Court, 73 Ky. (10 Bush) 711, 717.

Const. Colo. §§ 22, 23, establishing "county courts," providing for the election of a county judge in each county, who shall be the judge of the county court, declaring them the courts of record, and prescribing their jurisdiction under this distinctive name, title, and designation, distinguish the court so established as the "county courts" of the Constitution, and gives the term a distinct meaning. So the term as used in article 6 of the Constitution (section 29), declaring that the judges of the county courts shall hold office until the next general election, means the county courts as established by the Constitution, and would not include a criminal court, though such court, in a certain sense, is a court of the county. People v. Rucker, 5 Colo. 455, 460.

The term "county court" includes the court of general sessions in the city and county of New York, wherever such inclusion does not conflict with other provisions of this Code. Crim. Code N. Y. 1903, § 961.

The term "county court," as used in the collateral inheritance and succession tax law, shall be construed to apply to the courts presided over and held by the chairman or county judge, and not to the quarterly county courts. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 756.

The words "county court," as used in the Probate Code, are to be understood as referring only to the exercise of the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the Code. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6166.

The words "county court" shall be construed and held to apply to and include any tribunal heretofore established and now existing in a county for police and fiscal purposes, in lieu of the county court. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 358, c. 43, § 55; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 198, c. 29, § 45; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 98, c. 4, § 13.

Probate court.

"In the United States, county courts are usually of limited jurisdiction, and confined to the fiscal and other local concerns of the county." As used in Act Cong. June 9, 1880, c. 164, 21 Stat. 169 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1407], providing that the affidavit in making final proof in pre-emption claims may be made before the clerk of the county court, it does not include the probate court. United States v. Hall, 21 Pac. 85, 5 N. M. 178.

Act Ill. Feb. 12, 1849, establishing a county court, and providing that the sheriff in each county shall, by himself or deputy, attend the sittings of the county court, was designed only to apply to the sittings of the county court for the transaction of county business, and would not apply to courts held for the transaction of probate business. St. Clair County v. Irwin, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 54, 56.

"County court," as used in 1 Stat. 88, 89, requiring depositions to be taken before a judge of a county court, includes a judge of the probate court. Fowler v. Merrill, 52 U. S. (11 How.) 375, 393, 13 L. Ed. 736.

COUNTY IMPROVEMENTS.

The term "county improvements," within the meaning of Gen. St. § 2415, providing that county commissioners shall require a bond for the security of laborers when they contract for work which, if performed for an individual, would give rise to a lien, or make improvements for the county, does not include a local ditch constructed under Gen. St. tit. 21, c. 1; such work being a purely local one, in which all expenses are payable by the district benefited, and in which the commissioners only act as statutory agents of the improvers. Wallace v. Skagit County, 36 Pac. 252, 8 Wash. 457.

COUNTY JAIL.

The county jail is a place of incarceration for the punishment of minor offenses, and custody of transient prisoners, where the ignominy of confinement is devoid of the infamous character which an imprisonment in the state jail or penitentiary carries with it, and which is regarded as a part of the punishment. United States v. Greenwald (U. S.) 64 Fed. 6, 8.

COUNTY JUDGE.

As county officer, see "County Officer."

The words "county judge," as used in the Probate Code, are to be understood as referring only to the exercise of the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the Code. Rev. Codes N. D. 1889, § 6166.

COUNTY OFFICER.

State officers, in a general sense, are officers whose duties and powers are coextensive with the territorial limits of the state. County officers, in the same sense, are those whose general authority and jurisdiction are confined within the limits of the county in which they are appointed, who are appointed in and for a particular county, and whose duties concern more especially the people of that county. Whether an officer unprovided for by the Constitution, but created solely by legislative enactment, is to be regarded as a state or county officer, must depend in a large measure upon the territorial scope of his jurisdiction, and upon the nature and character of his powers and duties. If the jurisdiction for the exercise of his powers and duties is coextensive with the limits of the state, then he is a state officer; if confined, like a sheriff or county judge, within the limits of a county, but coextensive with the limits of such county, then he is a county officer. State v. Burns, 21 South. 290, 295, 38 Fla. 367.

A county officer is one whose entire duties apply only to the county in which he is located, and for which he is elected or appointed. State v. Glenn, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 472, 473.

Within the meaning of Const. N. Y. art. 10, § 2, providing that all county officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by the Constitution shall be elected by the electors of the respective counties, or appointed by the boards of supervisors or other county authorities, as the Legislature shall direct, the term "county officer" would comprehend all those who are appointed or elected for a county, and who must reside and perform the duties of their offices within their counties, such as sheriffs, coroners, county clerks, etc. The health officer of the port of New York is not a county officer. In re Whiting, 2 Barb. 513, 517. 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 498, 500. The office of commissioner of loans is a county office. In re Carpenter, 7 Barb. 30, 34.

"County officers" as used in Const. 1874, art. 14, § 5, providing that, in all counties containing over 150,000 inhabitants, all county officers shall be paid by salary, means one by whom the county performs its usual political functions. Philadelphia v. Martin, 17 Atl. 507, 510, 125 Pa. 583 (citing Sheboygan County v. Parker, 70 U. S. [3 Wall.] 93, 18 L. Ed. 33).

Special persons appointed by the Legislature to make a subscription for a county to bonds of a railroad company, and the issue of bonds in behalf of the county therefor, are not county officers, within the Constitution of the state, providing that all county officers shall be elected by the electors of the county. Such persons, in the performance of their special duty, are in no proper sense county officers. They do not exercise any of the political functions of county officers, such as levying taxes, etc. They do not exercise continuously, and as a part of the regular and permanent administration of government, any important public policies, trusts, or duties. An officer of the county is one by whom the county performs its usual political functions—its functions of government. Sheboygan County v. Parker, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 93, 96, 18 L. Ed. 33.

The term "county officers," as used in the title relating to elections, shall include Senators in the General Assembly, judges of probate, assistant judges of the county court, state's attorney, sheriff, high bailiff, county commissioner, and justices of the peace. V. S. 1894, 57.

Sheriffs, coroners, county justices, etc., whose functions are confined to their respective counties, are commonly known as "county officers." State v. Dillon, 2 S. W. 417, 419, 90 Mo. 229.

As agent.

See "Agent."

County commissioner.

Gen. St. c. 13, §§ 1, 2, providing that all county officers, including justices of the peace, may be removed from office for official misdemeanors, and that the board of county commissioners shall have exclusive original jurisdiction thereof, does not include members of the board of county commissioners. Hutchinson v. Ashburn, 5 Neb. 402, 404.

Board of education.

The term "county officers," as used in Const. art. 17, relating to the tenure of county offices, does not seem to be used in any restricted sense; and a board of education elected by the voters of an entire county, whose jurisdiction extends over the whole county, comes within such designation. State v. Tilford, 1 Nev. 240, 244.

Constable.

The term "county and township officers," as used in Act Feb. 13, 1890, providing that the official bonds of county and township officers shall be filed with the county clerk, includes constables. State v. Yourex, 71 Pac. 203, 204, 30 Wash. 611.

County attorney.

The office of county attorney is a county office, and hence a statement of a contest of an election to the office of county attorney is within Code 1873, § 697, requiring the statement of contest in the case of an election to a county office to be filed 20 days after the votes are canvassed. Clark v. Tracy, 64 N. W. 290, 291, 95 Iowa, 410.

County collector.

A county collector is a very important county officer. He collects not only the revenue of the county, but of the state, city, and district schools, and is clearly an officer, under an act approved March 1, 1875, "to provide for the official bonds of county and township officers." Ex parte McCabe, 33 Ark. 396, 399.

County or probate judge.

An act creating the office of county judge provided that he should be elected at the same time as that prescribed "for other county elections," that he should be commissioned as other judges, and that he should have all jurisdiction and authority exercised by the chairman of the county court. The office was established in place of the quorum court and no further authority was given to the county judge than that formerly exercised by the quorum court, or the chairman elected by the justices. Held, that the county judge was a county officer, and that therefore his election at the time when other county officers, rather than at the time when judges and chancellors, were elected, was constitutional. Saffrons v. Ericson, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 1, 3. A county judge is a county officer, and therefore a statute directing that he be elected at the same time as other officers is not a violation of the Constitution, directing the election of judges on the same day that other county officers are elected. Moore v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 510, 513; State v. Glenn, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 472, 473.

The St. Louis scheme and charter which went into effect in 1876 established the city as a separate territorial division of the state, which is treated as a county. 1 Rev. St. 1899, §§ 41, 60, provides that the word "county," when used in the statutes, shall include such city. Const. 1875, art. 6, § 34, provides that the General Assembly should establish a probate court of record in every county. Act April 9, 1877, §§ 1, 13, established a probate court in every county and in the city of St. Louis, and provided that the judge should recover the fees allowed by law for his services. Held, that the judge of the probate court of the city of St. Louis is a county officer, within the meaning of Const. 1875, art. 9, § 12, declaring that the General Assembly shall, by a law uniform in its operation, provide for and regulate the fees of all county officers, and, for such purpose, may classify the county by population. Henderson v. Koenig, 68 S. W. 72, 73, 168 Mo. 356, 57 L. R. A. 659.

A county judge is not a county officer, within Const. 1870, art. 11, § 17, providing that no county office created by the Legislature shall be filled otherwise than by the people or the county court. State v. Glenn, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 472, 473.

County treasurer.

A county treasurer is an officer of the county for which he is appointed or elected. Bradford v. Justices of Inferior Court, 33 Ga. 332, 336.

County warden.

The office of county warden, created by section 409, Rev. St., is a county office, and cannot be filled by appointment. Const. art. 10, § 2. State v. Halliday, 55 N. E. 175, 61 Ohio St. 171.

District judge.

Pol. Code Cal. § 1312, providing that certificates of nomination for county officers must be filed with the clerks of the respective counties, means that certificates for nomination of officers to be voted for by electors of a single county shall be filed with the clerk of the particular county, and so includes a district judge of a district containing only one county. State v. Hays, 70 Pac. 321, 322, 27 Mont. 174.

Drainage commissioner.

Rev. St. 1881, § 943, providing that any officer of a county who fraudulently falls or refuses to account for and pay over all moneys, choses in action, or other property which may have come into his hands by virtue of his office, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, should be construed to include a drainage commissioner, for he is an officer of the county for which he is appointed. State v. Wells, 13 N. E. 722, 723, 112 Ind. 237.

Guardian of poor.

The Pennsylvania statute relating to writs of quo warranto against a county or township officer should be construed to include a guardian of the poor, such guardian being substantially the same officer as an overseer and director of the poor. Commonwealth v. Armstrong (Pa.) 9 Phila. 479, 480.

Jury commissioner.

The term "county officer," within the meaning of Const. art. 10, § 2, prohibiting the appointment of county officers by other than the board of supervisors or other county authorities, include jury commissioners; and therefore Laws 1901, c. 602, authorizing the appointment of such commissioners by justices of the Supreme Court, is invalid. In re Brenner, 71 N. Y. Supp. 44, 46, 35 Misc. Rep. 306.

Justice of the peace.

As used in Rev. St. p. 355, §§ 100-115, relating to the election of county officers, the words "county officers" are used in the common meaning of such terms in previous legislation, and would include justices of the peace. State v. Clark, 15 Atl. 831, 832, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 97.

The phrase "such other county or township officers provided by law," as used in the North Carolina election law of 1895, c. 159, providing for election ballots, includes a justice of the peace. Foushee v. Christian, 25 S. E. 793, 794, 119 N. C. 159.

Notary public.

The term "county officer," as used in Const. Ind. art. 6, § 4, declaring that no person shall be elected or appointed as a county officer who shall not be an elector of the county, does not include a notary public. Notaries have nothing to do with the affairs of the county, and they discharge no duties as county officers. United States v. Bixby (U. S.) 9 Fed. 78, 79.

School director.

Comp. St. 1893, p. 461, c. 28, § 70, confers jurisdiction on district courts to hear election contests between county officers. Held, that the term "county officers," as so used, did not include a school director; such provision evidently referring to the sheriff and clerks of courts—county officers proper, as distinguished from state officers, or officers of the divisions of the county, or municipal officers. Laird v. Leap, 60 N. W. 1043, 1044, 42 Neb. 834.

Sheriff.

The sheriff, who is ex officio collector of taxes, is a county officer, within an act providing for official bonds of county and township officers. Ex parte McCabe, 33 Ark. 396, 397.

Storekeeper.

Act March 14, 1890, providing for the appointment by the clerk of common pleas of a storekeeper for Hamilton county, and devolving on such storekeeper the duty to purchase and have charge of all blank books, stationery, printing, and office blanks for the offices of that county, and fixing an annual salary, and requiring a bond for the faithful performance of his duties, constitutes the storekeeper a county officer, and is in conflict with Const. art. 10, §§ 1, 2, requiring that all county officers shall be elected. State v. Brennan, 49 Ohio St. 33, 37, 29 N. E. 593.

Superintendent of irrigation district.

The term "county officer" does not include the superintendent of a portion of a county formed into irrigation districts, as his duties only relate to a portion of the county. Knox v. Los Angeles County Sup'rs, 58 Cal. 59, 60.

Superintendent or member of board of public instruction.

Though, in a sense, a county superintendent of public instruction is a county officer, and though called a "county superintendent," he is in fact an officer and agent of the state; the state having assumed the functions of maintaining free public schools for the education of the children throughout its domain; the counties being recognized, with reference to that business, merely as convenient subdivisions of territory, and some of their officers as proper agents for the administration of affairs relating to the public free schools. Such officers, with respect to such affairs, act for the state, and not for the county. This is the case even as to officers who in other respects are county officers in fact as well as in name. Webb County v. Board of School Trustees of Laredo, 65 S. W. 878, 881, 95 Tex. 131.

"A county officer is one which is usually provided in the organization of counties and county governments, whose duties pertain and are limited to the territory of the county. Members of the board of public instruction are county agents, whose duties pertain to and are limited to the county." Gadsden County v. Green, 22 Fla. 102, 110.

COUNTY ORDER.

A county order is, in legal effect, a promissory note of the county. It is assignable and presumed to be based on a sufficient consideration. Noble School Furniture Co. v. Washington School Tp., 29 N. E. 935, 937, 4 Ind. App. 270; Brownlee v. Madison County Com'rs, 81 Ind. 186, 187.

COUNTY PURPOSE.

The Constitution does not attempt to give a definition of "county purpose," and, to obtain a correct interpretation of that phrase, we must look to the contemporaneous legislation upon that subject, and the uniform action of the county courts under the territorial government. By this reference it will be abundantly demonstrated that, at the time the Constitution was adopted, "county purposes" were taken to embrace principally the erection and repair of courthouses and jails; the opening and maintaining of public thoroughfares within the limits of their respective counties, by opening roads, building bridges, and causeways, and keeping the same in repair; licensing and regulating ferries and tollbridges, etc. It is thus seen that the entire subject of highways was at that time an object peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the county authorities, and we are hence warranted in the assumption that it was so understood by the convention when they used the phrase "county purposes." Duval County Com'rs v. City of Jacksonville, 18 South. 339, 343, 36 Fla. 196 (quoting and approving Cotton v. Leon County Com'rs, 6 Fla. 610).

Const. Tenn. art. 2, § 28, which confers on the Legislature the power to authorize the several counties of the state to impose taxes for "county purposes," means such enterprises as would not advance the wants and demands of the community independently of public aid. Thus the building of courthouses, jails, poorhouses, and common roads and bridges by which they are made accessible to the people, are "county purposes," while hotels and mercantile, trading, banking, and manufacturing establishments would not be, though they might be highly necessary for the comfort and prosperity of the people at large. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davidson County, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 637, 663, 62 Am. Dec. 424.

"County purposes," as used in Const. art. 12, § 6, providing that the Legislature shall authorize the several counties and incorporated towns to impose taxes for county and corporation purposes, include the support of their officers; the building of courthouses and jails; the paying of the legitimate indebtedness of the counties; the construction of roads, bridges, and works of public necessity and convenience; and the expense of a county in the management of its affairs, the maintenance of internal police and good order, the public schools, "and such other matters of public concern as may peculiarly affect the people of the county in their property and local interests." Gadsden County v. Green, 22 Fla. 102, 110.

Armory.

The erection or maintenance of an armory in a county for the benefit of a company of state troops regularly enlisted as a part of the militia of the state is not a county purpose, within the Constitution, authorizing the counties of the state to impose taxes for county purposes. State v. Dickenson (Fla.) 33 South. 514, 515, 60 L. R. A. 42.

Bounties.

Where by acts of Legislature the real estate in a city, and the personal property of the inhabitants thereof, were exempted from taxation for county purposes, and subsequently the board of supervisors were authorized to make appropriations for bounties to volunteers for the army, to be collected and paid out as other county indebtedness, such tax was a tax for a county purpose, from payment of which the city was exempt. McDonough County Sup'rs v. Campbell, 42 Ill. 490.

County debt.

In Laws 1861, c. 6, § 2, providing that the maximum tax levied by any county for county purposes shall be three mills on the dollar, the term "county purposes" means the ordinary expenses of the county, and does not embrace the payment of a county debt, or the interest thereon. McCormick v. Fitch, 14 Minn. 252, 257 (Gil. 185, 189).

Drainage.

"County purposes," as used in an act authorizing the levy of taxes separately for county purposes, and for bridges, roads, etc., each to be kept distinct from any other, and forbidding the disbursement of moneys raised for one purpose in payment of obligations contracted for any other, save, in cases expressly named, does not include labor on a local drain or water course. State v. Seaman, 23 Ohio St. 389, 394.

Education.

Money received by the county treasurer, and disposed of in the county in payment of expenses incurred for governmental purposes, is money received for county purposes. It is true that "education," within some definitions of that term, is not a county purpose. Certainly it is not a county purpose in the sense of being a system established by the county for public good, but in such sense the county has not purposed and established any system of government in respect to the people of the county; but within Ann. Code, § 2016, allowing a county treasurer a commission on money received by him for county purposes, school funds are subject to the commission. Adams v. Watt, 28 South. 364, 365, 76 Miss. 667.

In Rev. St. § 3768, which provides that the county commissioners may levy a tax for the support of common schools, not to exceed 3 mills on the dollar, but that the aggregate tax for territorial and county purposes should in no case exceed 16 mills on the dollar per annum, the taxes for county purposes do not include taxes levied for the support of the common schools of the county. Powder River Cattle Co. v. Johnson County Com'rs, 29 Pac. 361, 362, 3 Wyo. 597.

COUNTY ROAD.

A county road is one which lies wholly within one county, and is thereby distinguished from a state road, which is a road lying in two or more counties. State v. Treasurer of Wood County, 17 Ohio, 184, 186.

The word "highway" may include a county bridge, and shall be equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," and "common road." Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 4.

COUNTY SEAT.

In every county of this state there is, and must be, a county seat. At it the county court is required to erect a good and sufficient courthouse and jail. The county, circuit, and other courts held for the county must sit there. There is no other place designated by law for that purpose. The name "county seat" indicates the object of its creation. It is, as defined by the Century Dictionary, "the seat of government of a county; the town in which the county and other courts are held, and where the county officers perform their functions." Williams v. Reutzel, 60 Ark. 155, 158, 29 S. W. 374, 375 (quoting Cent. Dict.).

The term "county seat," in common parlance, applied to a particular town or city, simply designates the town or city where the seat of the county government is for the time being established. In re Allison, 22 Pac. 820, 821, 13 Colo. 525, 10 L. R. A. 790, 16 Am. St. Rep. 224.

"County seat," as used in the various territorial acts of Michigan, meant the place designated for doing the county business—a place at which the public buildings were to be erected, where the probate and county courts were to be held and the county offices located, and where the board of supervisors were to hold their sessions. The county seat did not necessarily mean the same thing as "seat of justice," or the place of the holding of the circuit court. Whallon v. Gridley, 16 N. W. 876, 880, 51 Mich. 503.

Ordinarily the term "county seat" applies not merely to the lot and buildings used for transacting the public business, but to the territory occupied by such town as may be designated as the "county seat." A county seat is not necessarily coextensive with the town of its location. It is not identical with the municipality, and does not move by force of the latter's expansion. Thus, where an act of the Legislature selects a certain town as a county seat, the board of county commissioners had no authority to move the county courthouse to a portion of the town not embraced within its limits when the act was passed, notwithstanding the act of adding territory to the town was passed after the locating act, and that the actual establishment of the courthouse occurred after the enlargement of the town; such authority being especially wanting in view of Const. § 41, providing that no courthouse or county seat shall be removed, except by a majority vote of qualified electors in said county voting at an election held for such purpose. Marengo County v. Matkin, 32 South. 669, 670, 134 Ala. 275.

COUNTY SITE.

The terms "courthouse site" and "county site," in their ordinary use, mean the same thing, and are taken and understood to signify the seat of government of the county, and, in this sense, cannot be restricted and confined to the particular lot or the ground, by measurement, upon which the necessary public buildings are erected. Matkin v. Marengo County, 34 South. 171, 174, 137 Ala. 155.

COUNTY SUPPLIES.

See "Supplies."

COUNTY TAX.

The expression "county taxes," as used in a charter of a railroad company (Act Mo. 1847, p. 157, § 4) exempting such company from the payment of county taxes, should be construed to include a special tax known as a "road tax," to provide the necessary funds for opening, repairing, and improving roads, made in the same manner as the county revenue; being levied, collected, and disbursed by the county authorities; its rate being uniform over the whole county, and being a county burden. State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 13 S. W. 406, 409, 101 Mo. 120.

School taxes which originated after the granting of the charter of a railroad, exempting it from county taxes, are not within the exemption. Livingston County v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 60 Mo. 516, 519.

The term "county" has a well-defined meaning. Each county is a body politic and corporate for certain purposes. County commissioners are provided, who are the officials of the county and represent it; and where one township in a county votes a tax to pay for subscriptions to a railroad, not upon the report of the county commissioners, but by a vote of the people of the township, the tax so paid, though it may be a public benefit, will not be a county tax. Carolina, C., G. & C. Ry. Co. v. Tribble, 25 S. C. 260, 264.

A tax levied to pay the bonds of a county, given by it for stock in a railroad company, is a county tax, within the meaning of a clause in the charter of a railroad corporation exempting it from the payment of all county taxes. But a local tax levied only on property within the limits of a particular township, to pay township funding bonds given in a compromise and as payment for bonds issued by the township in aid of certain railroads, is not a county tax, within the meaning of such clause. State ex rel. Trammel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 13 S. W. 505, 507, 101 Mo. 136; State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 21 S. W. 14, 15, 113 Mo. 297.

The term "county taxes" includes all taxes due to the county, school district, and other subdivisions of the county, which are levied and collected by the county. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,406.

COUNTY TOWN.

The term "county town," as used in Const. art. 6, § 15, providing that two justices of the peace shall be elected in each civil district, except such districts as include county towns, which shall elect three, means the county seat where the courthouse is situated, so that the district including the county town where the courthouse is located is entitled to the additional justice of the peace. State v. Cates, 58 S. W. 649, 650, 105 Tenn. 441.

COUNTY TREASURER.

A county treasurer is a ministerial officer, and hence can be compelled to perform his duties in respect to paying claims properly audited. State ex rel. Wheeler v. Adams, 61 S. W. 894, 897, 161 Mo. 349.

COUNTY WARRANT.

A county warrant is the command of one duly authorized officer to another, whose duty it is to obey, to pay from the county funds a specified sum to a designated person, whose claim therefor has been allowed by the court of county commissioners. Savage v. Mathews, 13 South. 328, 98 Ala. 535.

A county warrant or order is an instrument, generally in the form of a bill of exchange, drawn by the proper officer of the county upon the county treasurer, directing him to pay an amount of money specified therein, upon a particular fund, to the person named therein, or to his order, or to bearer. Crawford v. Noble County Com'rs, 58 Pac. 616, 618, 8 Okl. 450.

A county warrant is the means by which funds for the payment of claims are reached in the county treasury. It is the mode whereby money is transferred from the treasurer of the county to its creditors, and the payment of its debts effected. The warrant is the authority of the treasurer to pay out the money of the county upon the debt, but its mere delivery to the creditor does not constitute payment. Its purpose is to enable him to secure the money to be applied in payment. People v. Rio Grande County Com'rs, 52 Pac. 748, 749, 11 Colo. App. 124.

As negotiable instrument.

See "Negotiable Instrument."

COUNTY WAYS.

County ways are roads leading from one town to another. Inhabitants of Waterford v. Oxford County Com'rs, 59 Me. 450, 452.

The word "highway" may include a county bridge, and shall be equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," and "common road." Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 4.

COUNTY WITNESSES.

County and state witnesses, within the meaning of Code, art. 25, § 7, which imposes on the county commissioners the duty of levying all needful taxes to compensate county and state witnesses, must be construed to mean such witnesses as are entitled to be paid by the public authorities. The section requires the county commissioners to pay all witnesses before justices of the peace summoned on behalf of the state, and all summoned on behalf of defendant when he is discharged, or fined only 15 cents, or acquitted, but not to pay fees due to the prisoner's witnesses when he is convicted. Schamel v. Washington County Com'rs, 34 Atl. 839, 83 Md. 128.

COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST.

See "Agency Coupled with an Interest"; "Power Coupled with an Interest."

COUPON.

As written instrument, see "Written Instrument."

A coupon is something intended to be cut off from another thing. Williams v. Moody, 22 S. E. 30, 32, 95 Ga. 8.

A "coupon" is defined to be "a remnant shred; papier portant interet; dividend in the public fund; an interest certificate, printed at the bottom of transferable bonds (state, railroad, etc.) given for a term of years." There are as many of these certificates as there are payments of interest to be made. At each time of payment one is cut off and presented for payment. Hence the name "coupon." "Coupons," from the French, is a term employed in England and elsewhere to denote the warrants for the payment of the periodical dividends on the public stocks, a number of which, being appended to the bonds, are severally cut off for presentation as the dividends fall due. The practice of appending coupons prevails chiefly in reference to foreign stock. Myers v. York & C. R. R., 43 Me. 232, 239.

The term "coupon" is derived from the French "couper," and is defined by Worcester to signify one of the interest certificates attached to transferable bonds, and of which there are usually as many as there are payments to be made, so called because it is cut off when it is presented for payment. The contract between the payor and the holder is contained in the bond, but the coupons are furnished as convenient instruments to enable the holder to collect interest, without presenting the bond, by separating and presenting the proper coupon. Coupons are substantially a minute repetition of what is contained in some concise terms in the bond. The coupon is not an independent instrument, like a promissory note for a sum of money, but is given for interest thereafter to become due on the bond, which interest is parcel of the bond and partakes of its nature. These coupons are substantially but copies from the body of the bond in respect to the interest. While such coupons perform new and important functions in commercial transactions, they are in their legal essence no less interest, the product of the use for money borrowed, than if incorporated alone in the body of the bond itself, and constitute "interest," within the meaning of Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552, and Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], requiring the matter in dispute to exceed, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, in order to give the United States Circuit Court jurisdiction. Howard v. Bates County (U. S.) 43 Fed. 276, 277.

Coupons are written contracts for the payment of a definite sum of money on a given day, and being drawn and executed in a form and mode for the purpose, that they may be separated from the bonds to which they are usually attached, it is held that they are negotiable, and that a suit may be maintained on them without the necessity of producing the bonds. Each matured coupon upon a negotiable bond is a separable promise, distinct from the promises to pay the bonds or the other coupons, and gives rise to a separate cause of action. Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 82, 88, 19 L. Ed. 42; Nesbit v. Independent District of Riverside, 144 U. S. 610, 12 Sup. Ct. 746, 748, 36 L. Ed. 562 (cited and approved in Edwards v. Bates County, 16 Sup. Ct. 967, 968, 163 U. S. 269, 41 L. Ed. 155). See, also, Butterfield v. Town of Ontario (U. S.) 44 Fed. 171, 172.

A "coupon," said Mr. Justice Nelson, in City of Kenosha v. Lanson, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 477, 483, 19 L. Ed. 725, "is not an independent instrument, like a promissory note or a sum of money, but is given for interest thereafter to become due upon the bond, which interest is parcel of the bond and partakes of its nature." State v. Spartanburg & U. R. Co., 8 S. C. (8 Rich.) 129, 163.

COUPON BOND.

The term "coupon bonds" is used to designate bonds that "are made payable to bearer and are provided with interest warrants, called 'coupons,' for each installment of interest, also payable to bearer, which, when actually detached, are negotiable and payable to bearer. The result is that a security of this class is passed easily from hand to hand, and is convenient for use among bankers and moneyed institutions that desire a security which is easily, readily, and quickly convertible into money by sale, the title to which may be passed from hand to hand without any formality, except the mere tradition of the paper. The collection of the interest is made by simply detaching the coupon and presenting it at the place of payment, either directly or through the usual course of bank exchanges, where it is paid without inquiry as to the ownership of the bond from which it has been cut." Benwell v. City of New York, 36 Atl. 663, 669, 55 N. J. Eq. 260.

The expression "coupon bonds of the state of Tennessee" implies state bonds with coupons for interest attached, in the ordinary form in use, whereby the faith of one of the United States was pledged for their payment. Tennessee Bond Cases, 5 Sup. Ct. 974, 985, 114 U. S. 663, 29 L. Ed. 281.

COUPON NOTE.

A coupon note is defined to be a promissory note with coupons attached, the coupons being notes for interest written at the bottom of the principal note, and designed to be cut off when the notes are presented for payment or paid, so that, as used in a mortgage stating that it is given to secure a debt evidenced by coupon notes, a purchaser of land subject to the mortgage is put on notice of the matters contained in the coupons. Williams v. Moody, 22 S. E. 30, 32, 95 Ga. 8.

COURAGE.

In holding that the use of the word "courage," in the phrase "ordinary temper and courage," instead of the words "ordinary temper," was erroneous in a homicide case, in view of Pen. Code 1895, art. 700, defining adequate cause, and article 698, defining manslaughter as voluntary homicide committed under the immediate influence of sudden passion arising from any adequate cause, but neither justified nor excused by law, as that which would commonly produce a degree of anger in a person of ordinary temper sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection, the courts say that courage is not the same thing as temper. Temper means disposition of mind; as inclination to give way to anger, resentment, or the like. Courage means that quality of mind which enables one to encounter dangers and difficulties with firmness, or without fear or depression of spirits; valor, boldness, bravery, etc. A man may be a person of mild and agreeable temper or disposition, capable of patience or forbearance, with coolness under great insults or provocation, and yet he may be a man of great courage, or vice versa. A man of ordinary temper might become excited with passion long before a man of courage would be under similar circumstances; and to lay down a rule going beyond the statute, authorizing the jury to regard the defendant, not only as a man of ordinary temper, but as a man of courage, was charging an additional and different requisite on which to base his defense of manslaughter than is provided by the statute. Gardner v. State, 48 S. W. 170, 171, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 19.

COURONNES.

"Couronnes," when not made for export, is the tangled slubbing, or wool top, which through accident becomes disarranged in the process of spinning it into yarn. Standard Varnish Works v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 456, 457, 8 C. C. A. 178.

COURSE.

See "Of Course."

Keep her course, see "Keep."

"Course," as used in a description of the location of a surveyed line in the following words: "Up the said O'Neil's Branch, the general course being south," etc.—means that the line should follow the winding of the stream in a southerly direction. Wharton v. Brick, 8 Atl. 529, 530, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 289.

A line, in surveying and dividing grounds, means prima facie a mathematical line, without breadth; yet this theoretic idea of a line may be explained by the facts referred to and connected with the division to mean a wall, a ditch, a cricket fence, or a hedge; a line having breadth. A course given from corner to corner is prima facie to be intended a right line; yet this may be explained, by a reference to acts of the surveyor and the marker, to be a curved line. Even the courses expressed must yield and change, so as to be accommodated to the objects and abutments referred to in the certificate of survey, grant, or deed. Baker v. Talbott, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 179, 182.

COURSE DESIGNATED BY EXISTING LAWS.

A direction in a will that, in case of the death of testator's widow, the land devised to her is "to take the course designated by existing laws," is to be construed as meaning that, in case of the happening of the contingency, the property shall be distributed according to the laws establishing the rules of descent of the real property of an intestate. McGuire v. Brown, 41 Iowa, 650, 656.

COURSE OF ACTION.

In an act providing that whenever, in the course of any civil action, it appears that the defendant is in the service of the United States in the army, the action shall be suspended, the word "course" means progressive action in a suit or proceeding not yet determined; and hence the enlistment of a defendant in the active militia of the state or of the United States constituted no ground for staying proceedings on a judgment of foreclosure rendered before the time of the enlistment. Williams v. Ely, 14 Wis. 236, 237.

COURSE OF ADMINISTRATION.

See "Due Course of Administration."

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

See "Due Course of Business"; "Ordinary Course of Business"; "Regular Course of Business"; "Usual Course of Business."

In the mercantile law, with reference to the legal character of the transfer of negotiable paper, the expression "in the course of business" is a mere formulary for stating a conclusion of law on certain facts, which in the given case may be shown to exist, to the effect that the transfer was made while the paper was current for a sufficient consideration moving between the parties and bona fide. Clough v. Patrick, 37 Vt. 421, 429.

The transfer by indorsement to a creditor of negotiable paper before maturity, merely as security for an antecedent debt, although it was without an express agreement or gratuity, is a transfer in the usual course of business. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank of the Republic of New York, 102 U. S. 14, 28, 26 L. Ed. 61.

A sale of his entire stock to one or more persons by a retail merchant conducting a country store in a small town is not in the usual and ordinary course of business of such merchant, within the meaning of Bankr. Law, § 35, declaring that fraudulent sales not made in the "usual and ordinary course of the business" of a debtor shall be prima facie evidence of fraud, since the usual and ordinary course of such debtor's business was to sell at retail a miscellaneous stock of goods common to country stores in a small town in the interior of a state. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 577, 581, 21 L. Ed. 489.

COURSE OF COMMON LAW.

See "According to Course of Common Law."

COURSE OF DEALING.

Where a person only performed one act for another, that of transferring a loan from one creditor to another, there is no course of dealing between the parties which would amount to a holding out of the right of the person transferring the loan to sign another's name to the notes or other instruments. Sanders v. Chartrand, 59 S. W. 95, 97.

COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.

The "course of employment," in the sense in which it is used in regard to the duties imposed by the particular service, is not to be understood as restricted and confined to the prescribed duties set apart for the performance of the servant. Whatever may be incident to the employment must necessarily belong to it. Where a railroad employee's duties were to attend the ladies' room, this might imply that he was to take charge of it, or at least to see to the seating and comfort of passengers who might enter, and this would further imply the duty of putting out improper or disorderly persons and of preventing entrance by an intruder. If by error of judgment he should forcibly and violently eject a party who had a right to be there, or in like manner prevent admission to one entitled to enter, the defendant would not be excused on the ground that such employé was not acting within the scope of his service. Redding v. South Carolina R. Co., 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 1, 7, 16 Am. Rep. 681.

COURSE OF DRAINAGE.

See "Natural Course of Drainage."

The word "course," in the expression "the principal course of drainage" in a city, means those lines along which the principal drainage does or would flow; the word being defined by Webster as "motion considered with reference to its direction; line of progress; direction." Bayha v. Taylor, 36 Mo. App. 427, 442.

COURSE OF LAW.

See "Ordinary Course of Law."

COURSE OF PROCEEDING.

Under a statute directing courts to proceed and give judgment according as the right of the cause and matter in law shall appear to them, without regarding any imperfections or defects or want of form in the writ, declaration, or other pleading, return, process, judgment, or course of proceeding, it is held that, although verdicts are not specially mentioned, yet the words "or course of proceeding whatever," are broad enough to include them. Parks v. Turner, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 39, 46, 13 L. Ed. 883.

COURSE OF RIVER.

The course of the river is a line parallel with its banks. It is not synonymous with the current of the river. Attorney General v. Paterson & H. R. R. Co., 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 526, 550.

COURSE OF STUDY.

A certificate entitling a party to all the privileges of a course of study at an educational institution does not confine his right to demand instruction to the term at which he was entered, but permits it at any reasonable time thereafter. To confine the term to the privileges belonging to it before it had commenced would not be warranted by the meaning of the word or the spirit of the contract. Course is what is termed in higher institutions of learning "curriculum," and the original meaning of that is "raceground." Surely the permitted times of entry on the race are a part of the privileges of the course. Iron City Commercial College v. Kerr (Pa.) 3 Brewst. 196, 200.

COURSE OF TRADE.

See "Due Course of Trade."

COURSE OF TRIAL.

The expression "course of the trial," as used in Cr. Prac. Act, § 404, providing that the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial for any substantial error arising during the course of the trial, includes every step taken in the trial, after the issue of fact was joined, up to and including the verdict on the issue. People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370, 371.

COURSE OF VEIN.

"Course of the vein," as used in mining law, is that which is indicated by the surface outcrop or surface explorations and workings. The law may be imperfect in this respect, as the court said in Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463, 25 L. Ed. 253, "and perhaps the true course of the vein should correspond with its strike, or the line of a level run through it"; but it added that this question can rarely be ascertained until considerable work has been done and after claims and locations have become fixed. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Mining & Smelting Co., 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 1184, 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. Ed. 98.

COURSE OF THE YEAR.

A lithographing company contracted to make and furnish in the course of the year designs of certain buildings of a manufacturing company, with sketches of its trademarks; to execute engravings, etc. Held, that the words "in the course of the year" should not be construed as of the essence of the contract, so as to justify a repudiation thereof, because of a delay in delivery of six or eight days after the expiration of the year. The contract was one for work and labor requiring artistic skill, and, there being nothing in the contract to indicate a binding agreement for the delivery of the goods, etc., by the end of the year, the words "in the course of the year" should not be construed as words of limitation of the time in which the contract might be performed. Reck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Colorado Milling & Elevator Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 700, 705, 3 C. C. A. 248.

COURT.

The term "court" is used in England to designate the portion of the ground surrounding the dwelling and outhouses of all kinds, and inclosed by a fence or stone wall. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, 251.

When used in connection with a piece of land, is synonymous in law with the words "park" and "square." Conrad v. West End Hotel & Land Co., 36 S. E. 282, 283, 126 N. C. 776.

Other court, see "Other."

A court is a place where justice is judicially administered. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Harden, 38 S. E. 949, 950, 113 Ga. 453, 456; Commonwealth v. Brower, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 254, 255; Lenox v. Pike, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 14, 19; Johnston v. Hunter, 40 S. E. 448, 450, 50 W. Va. 52; Losee v. Dolan, 74 N. Y. Supp. 685, 688; United States v. Clark (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 441, 442; Fuller v. County of Colfax (U. S.) 14 Fed. 177, 178.

A court is a tribunal charged, as a substantive duty, with the exercise of judicial power. Waldo v. Wallace, 12 Ind. 569, 583.

"A court is a tribunal established for the administration of justice, and is composed of one or more persons assembled under authority of law for the hearing and trial of causes and transaction of judicial business. It is an organized body, with defined powers, meeting at certain times and places for the hearing and decision of causes and other matters brought before it, and aided in this, its proper business, by its proper officers." State v. Atherton, 10 Pac. 901, 906, 19 Nev. 332.

In England, from whence our system of courts and the practice governing them are derived, the tribunal was called "curia" or "court" because it was held by the king himself originally. The judgments of the courts read as the judgments of the king, and when he ceased to hold the court in person, and delegated this function to one of his officers, the character of the judgment was the same. In this country the power vested in the king vests in the body of the people, and the courts sit as their representative. The law, from principle and policy, requires that full confidence should be given to their judgments while in force, and an action for damages for acts done in obedience to a judgment while in force cannot be maintained on the subsequent reversal of such judgment. Bridges v. McAlister, 51 S. W. 603, 605, 106 Ky. 791, 45 L. R. A. 800, 90 Am. St. Rep. 267.

A court is an instrumentality of government. It is a creation of the law, and in some respects it is an imaginary thing, that exists only in legal contemplation, very similar to a corporation. A time when, place where, and the persons by whom judicial functions are to be exercised are essential to complete the idea of a court. It is its organized aspect, with all these constituent elements of time, place, and officers, that completes the idea of a court in the general legal acceptance of the term. White County Com'rs v. Gwin, 36 N. E. 237, 242, 136 Ind. 562, 22 L. R. A. 402.

Courts are the only agencies of the law by which a cause can be heard and determined. They are the only depositaries of judicial power. Without them it lies dormant and inactive in the sovereignty of the state. Its active and potent existence is inseparable from that of a court. To constitute a court, the judge or judges must be in the discharge of judicial duties at the time and in the place prescribed by law for the sitting of the court. Works, Courts, 1. The proceedings of a court at a time and place other than that prescribed by law are void. It is not the act of a court at all. Johnston v. Hunter, 50 W. Va. 52, 55, 40 S. E. 448 (citing Doss v. Waggoner, 3 Tex. 515; Baker v. Chisholm, 3 Tex. 157).

Courts are an integral part of the government, and entirely independent, deriving their powers directly from the Constitution, in so far as such powers are not inherent in the very nature of the judiciary. A court of general jurisdiction, whether named in the Constitution or established in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, cannot be directed, controlled, or impeded in its functions by any of the other departments of the government. The security of human rights and the safety of free institutions require the absolute freedom of action and integrity of courts. Vigo County Com'rs v. Stout, 35 N. E. 683, 685, 136 Ind. 53, 22 L. R. A. 398.

A court may be particularly described as an organized body with defined powers, meeting at certain times and places for the hearing and decision of causes and other matters brought before it, and aided in this, its proper business, by clerks to record and attest its acts and decisions and ministerial officers to execute its commands and secure due order in its proceedings. Ex parte Gardner, 39 Pac. 570, 22 Nev. 280. See, also, Fitzpatrick v. Simonson Bros. Mfg. Co., 90 N. W. 378, 381, 86 Minn. 140.

The office and purpose of a court is to administer exact justice as nearly as may be to all those before it, without favor to any. The debtor is to have his rights administered and protected, but in no larger share than the creditor. Hinson v. Adrian, 92 N. C. 121, 127.

Blackstone defines a court as consisting of at least three constituent parts, namely, the actor, or plaintiff, who complains of an injury; the reus, or defendant, who is called upon to make satisfaction for it; and the judex, or judicial power, which is to examine the truth of the fact, to determine the law arising upon that fact, and, if any injury appears to have been done, to ascertain, and by its officers to apply, the remedy. People v. Board of Trustees of Village of Saratoga Springs, 39 N. Y. Supp. 607, 610, 4 App. Div. 399 (citing 3 Bl. Comm.); People v. Van Allen, 55 N. Y. 31, 35.

The word "court," as used in Code Iowa, § 2229, providing that, where a divorce is decreed, the court may make such an order in relation to the children, property, parties, and the maintenance of the parties which shall be right and proper, does not confine the jurisdiction to the district court rendering the decree, but the word must be construed in the plural, as "courts." Shaw v. McHenry, 2 N. W. 1096, 1099, 52 Iowa, 182.

Federal courts included.

The term "court," in Code 1868, c. 130, § 5, authorizing the admission in evidence of an attested copy of any record or paper in the clerk's office of any court in lieu of the original, includes the District Court of the United States held within the state. Dickinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390, 415.

The word "court," as used in Gen. Laws, 1889, c. 46, § 111, providing that all matters which are pending against a deceased person at the time of his death may, if the cause of action survives, be prosecuted to final judgment, and, if judgment is rendered against an executor or administrator, the court rendering it shall certify the same to the probate court, and the amount thereof shall be paid in the same manner as other claims allowed against the estate, includes a federal court sitting within the territorial limits of the state. In re Kittson's Estate, 48 N. W. 419, 45 Minn. 197.

Board of arbitrators.

A board of arbitrators is not a "court" or "judicial tribunal" in any proper sense of those terms. It has none of the powers that appertain to courts to regulate their proceedings or enforce their decisions. An award, when made, is more in the nature of a contract than of a judgment. It is but the consummation of the contract of submission; its appropriate and legitimate result. Hence it is held that the fact that a judgment rendered on Sunday is void does not render an award made on Sunday illegal. Blood v. Bates, 31 Vt. 147, 150.

Board of assessors.

St. 1837, c. 221, § 1, provides that if any person is embarrassed, restrained of his liberty, or held in duress, unless it be in the custody of some public officer of the law by force of a lawful warrant or other process issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, he shall be entitled as of right to a writ of personal replevin, and to be thereby delivered, etc. Held, that the word "court" as used in such section, was not used in its technical meaning as confined to the judiciary established by the state Constitution, but was sufficiently broad to include a board of assessors having authority to issue a warrant for the arrest of a party on whom a tax is assessed, by whose warrant such person is arrested and deprived of his liberty. Aldrich v. Aldrich, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 102, 106.

Board of village trustees.

A board of village trustees, sitting to hear charges against a village officer constitutes a court. People v. Trustees of Saratoga Springs, 39 N. Y. Supp. 607, 610, 4 App. Div. 618.

City council.

A court is a tribunal empowered to hear and determine issues between parties, on pleadings either oral or written, and on evidence to be adduced under well-defined and established rules according to settled principles of law; but a city council, though an inferior court under the statute, with a limited jurisdiction, does not act in that capacity in granting a liquor license. State v. City of Columbia, 17 S. C. 80, 82.

In those enactments which confer jurisdiction or power, or impose duties, when the words "superior court," or "court," in reference to a superior court, are used, they mean the clerk of the superior court, unless otherwise specially stated, or unless reference is made to a regular term of the court, in which cases the judge of the court alone is meant. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 132.

Clerk of court.

While the clerk of a court is a very proper officer to keep regular and fair minutes of all the proceedings of the court, the court can live and move and have its being without him. His office is not necessary to the existence of the court. Mealing v. Pace, 14 Ga. 596, 629.

Within the meaning of statutes requiring an oath to be administered by the court or judge would be included an oath administered by the clerk in open court under the direction of the court. Oaks v. Rodgers, 48 Cal. 197, 200.

Commissioners of appeal.

A tribunal known as "commissioners of appeal for the state of Texas," created by an act of the Legislature of that state July 9, 1879, is held not to be a court, because lacking in the following essential elements: It was able to act only by consent of both parties, and even then was without jurisdiction to render or power to enforce a judgment. It had no jurisdiction, on the ground that jurisdiction could not be given by consent. Its opinion settled no law and affected only the particular case referred to it. Henderson v. Beaton, 52 Tex. 29, 42.

Commissioners of claims.

A court, as understood in its full modern signification, consists of at least three constituent parts, the actus, reus, and judex. The actus, or plaintiff, complains of an injury done; the reus, or defendant, is called upon to make satisfaction for it; and the judex, or judicial power, is to examine the truth of the fact, and, if any injury appears to have been done, to ascertain, and by its officers to apply, the remedy. 3 Bl. Comm. 25. The findings of the commissioners of claims, appointed under Act March 28, 1871, are not judgments of a court of law against the state, but are only in the nature of a judgment, which the commissioners shall make out and deliver to the complainant, who may file them with the Auditor of State, who shall draw his warrant on the treasurer, payable out of the moneys appropriated for that purpose. Clayton v. Berry, 27 Ark. 129, 134.

County board.

A court is a body in the government organized for the public administration of justice at the time and place prescribed by law. County boards, acting on allowance and audit of claims, do not constitute courts. Stenberg v. State, 67 N. W. 190, 193, 48 Neb. 299.

The board of supervisors of a county is not a court. Gurnee v. County of Brunswick (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 117.

"A court is a body in a government to which the public administration of justice is delegated; a tribunal established for the administration of justice." A board of commissioners sitting to decide an election contest, invested with original, supreme, and final power to adjudicate and determine the rights and privileges of the parties to the contest, is a court." Pratt v. Breckinridge, 65 S. W. 136, 142, 66 S. W. 405, 407, 112 Ky. 1.

"A court is a body in the government to which the public administration of justice is delegated. The one common and essential feature of all courts is that of a judge or judges having some sort of judicial function, power, or authority. Boards of commissioners have no judicial functions, and cannot be vested therewith, and therefore are not courts. They are not among the courts specified by the act of Congress vesting the judicial power of the territories in certain courts." Rupert v. Alturas County Com'rs, 2 Pac. 718, 720, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 19.

A board of county commissioners of a county created by the laws of Nebraska is not a court, within the meaning of the acts of Congress providing for the removal of suits from state to federal courts. Fuller v. County of Colfax (U. S.) 14 Fed. 177, 178.

County judge.

In the construction of statutes the term "court" shall in all necessary cases be deemed to refer as well to county judges and justices of the peace as to courts of record. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 4185, cl. 13.

Court commissioners.

A court is defined to be a place in which justice is judicially administered. It is the exercise of judicial power by the proper officer or officers at a time and place appointed by law. United States v. Clark, 1 Gall. 497, Fed. Cas. No. 14,804. So that a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner is not a proceeding in any court of the United States, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 5406 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3657], imposing a penalty for conspiring to deter a witness from attending or testifying in such a proceeding. Todd v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 889, 891, 158 U. S. 278, 39 L. Ed. 982.

Under the statute providing that, whenever the statute authorizes an order or proceeding to be made or taken by the court, it must be done by the court in session, and the statute authorizing the court or presiding judge to request pleadings to be more definite and certain, a court commissioner has no authority to require such acts. Balkins v. Baldwin, 54 N. W. 403, 404, 84 Wis. 212.

Court-martial.

A court-martial is a court, within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 6, declaring that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and in any trial, in any court whatever, the party accused shall be allowed to appear and defend in person and with counsel as in civil actions. People v. Van Allen, 55 N. Y. 81, 85.

2 Wds. & P.—43

Court of inquest.

A court of inquest to assess damages in condemnation proceedings brought by a railroad company cannot be regarded as a court within the usual acceptance of that term, they having no judicial functions; and in addition thereto commissioners or members of such jury form no part of the machinery of a court, and the appropriation of private property for public use has never been held to come under the judicial power. Grand Rapids, L. & D. Ry. Co. v. Chesebro, 42 N. W. 66, 68, 74 Mich. 466.

Election commissioners.

The term "court" has a well understood and accepted meaning, and, as used in a provision of the Constitution, gave the Supreme Court supervisory control over all other courts in the state, and the term "other courts in the state" gives it no other authority to issue writs to a board of commissioners of elections. Ex parte Carson, 5 S. C. (5 Rich.) 117, 119.

General Assembly.

Though the General Assembly of the state may have power to set aside the judgment of a state court, yet, since it cannot render a judgment, it does not constitute the "highest court of law or equity of the state," within the meaning of act of Congress allowing a removal of causes from such state court in specified cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. Olney v. Arnold, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 308, 318, 1 L. Ed. 614.

Hearing of criminal complaint before district judge.

The word "court," as employed in Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 18, providing that, if any person commit perjury in any controversy pending in any court of the United States, he shall be punished, etc., does not include a hearing of a criminal complaint before the district judge. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 441, 442.

As judge.

The words "judge" and "court" are interchangeable. Guild v. Meyer, 46 Atl. 202, 59 N. J. Eq. 390.

By the term "court," as used in the statute requiring the application of an administrator for leave to sell real estate to be heard by the court and the sale thereunder to be reported to the court, is meant the court or judge thereof when authorized to act. Maul v. Hellman, 58 N. W. 112, 114, 39 Neb. 322.

In Rev. St. 1881, § 1222, providing that a receiver may be appointed by the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, in certain specified cases, "court" is synonymous with "judge" in legal parlance. In a legal sense, the judge of a court is the court. There can be no court without a judge, so that the word "court" may be understood as meaning "judge." Pressley v. Lamb, 4 N. E. 682, 690, 105 Ind. 171.

A judge alone does not constitute a court. Proceedings at another time or place, or in another manner than specified by law, though in the personal presence and under the direction of the judge, are coram non judice, and void. Ex parte Gardner, 39 Pac. 570, 22 Nev. 280.

A court is a tribunal organized according to law, and sitting at fixed times and places for the administration of justice, not an individual holding a judicial office. Therefore the statute authorizing the appointment of commissioners by the county judge is in violation of the statutory provision requiring such commissioners to be appointed by a court of record. People v. Village of Haverstraw, 45 N. E. 384, 386, 151 N. Y. 75.

The word "court" may be used in an indictment for perjury, alleging that defendant was then and there by the court duly sworn, although the statute provides that oaths shall be administered by a judge or clerk, and does not expressly authorize a court to administer oaths, as the term "court" may sometimes be construed to mean judge of the court, depending upon the connection and object of its use. A court is defined as the judge or body of judges presiding over a court. State v. Caywood, 65 N. W. 385, 386, 96 Iowa, 367 (citing Black, Law Dict. tit. "Court").

The term "court," in statutes granting appeals from final judgment of courts, does not include a judge of the superior court, and therefore such statutes have no application to his decisions in matters committed to his determination as such judge. Appeal of Central Ry. & Electric Co., 35 Atl. 32, 33, 67 Conn. 197.

By the use of the word "court" in Code, c. 131, § 9, providing that the court may in vacation make up and sign any bill of exceptions, is meant the judge who presided at the trial of the case, regular, special, or temporary. As to such cases he remains the court until everything is done thereon that a court may do. Carper v. Cook, 19 S. E. 379, 380, 39 W. Va. 346.

There is a manifest distinction between a court and a judge; a distinction well known by the profession and frequently announced in the books. The court has inherent power to do many things which a judge does not possess, and, while the court may set aside an order theretofore made by it, a judge, as such, has no power to vacate, modify, or suspend a judgment or order of the court. Whitlock v. Wade, 90 N. W. 587, 588, 117 Iowa, 153.

As used in Pub. Acts 1893, c. 661, § 5, relating to actions to quiet title, which says that the court shall hear the several claims and determine the rights of the parties, "court" may mean the judge of the tribunal in which the proceedings are pending, as opposed to the jury, or it may mean—as, for instance, it certainly seems to in one of the principal sections of the practice act (Gen. St. § 877)—the tribunal itself, as established by law for the public administration of justice. The court in this case was of the opinion that it should be held to mean the latter. "We think the Legislature in this act intended to clothe the superior court, and the inferior courts having common-law powers, with power to hear and determine cases of this kind, if in other respects within their jurisdiction according to existing laws, and that the word 'court,' as used in this fifth section, is to be construed just as if it was qualified by the name of some specific court. The word 'court,' when so read, unquestionably means the tribunal, and not merely the judge thereof. The act, then, does not deprive the parties of the right to try by jury questions proper to be tried in that way, and consequently the objection to its validity, founded on the assumption that it does so, cannot prevail." And hence the act does not contravene Const. art. 19, § 21, declaring that the right of trial by the jury shall remain inviolate. Miles v. Strong, 36 Atl. 55, 58, 68 Conn. 273.

Under the charter of the city of Hartford, providing that appeals from sewer assessments may be taken to the judge of the superior court, who shall have, for the purposes of the case, all powers of the superior court, etc., the judge, in sitting upon such appeals, was not to be regarded as constituting a "court," within the meaning of the Constitution, providing that the judges of inferior courts shall be appointed annually. Clapp v. City of Hartford, 35 Conn. 220, 222.

A change of judges after verdict and before final decree does not change the court, which for all judicial purposes remains identical, and the succeeding judge may render a final decree of divorce, allowing alimony to the wife, without hearing any evidence, where answers by the jury to special interrogatories show the amount of the husband's property. Hedrick v. Hedrick, 28 Ind. 291, 293.

A "court" is defined by Bacon to be "an incorporeal political being, which requires for its existence the presence of its judges, or a competent number of them, and a clerk or prothonotary, at or during which and at a place where it is by law authorized to be held, and the performance of some public act indicative of a design to perform the functions of a court"; and it is defined by Lord Coke as "a place where justice is judicially administered," although Lord Coke probably did not mean by his definition that the judicial presence was not indispensable. The casual presence of a judge in the courtroom to direct or overlook his clerk, and not for the performance of judicial functions, does not constitute a court. Lewis v. City of Hoboken, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 377, 379.

A court has been defined to be a body in the government organized for the public administration of justice at the time and place prescribed by law; and it has been said that a court is an incorporeal being, which requires for its existence the presence of the judge. People v. Opel, 58 N. E. 996, 999, 188 Ill. 194; Davis v. Delaware Tp., 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 55, 56; In re Terrill, 34 Pac. 457, 458, 52 Kan. 29, 39 Am. St. Rep. 327. A clerk, therefore, has no authority to open and adjourn court in the absence of the judge. In re McClaskey, 37 Pac. 854, 856, 2 Okl. 568.

The word "court," as used in Const. 1895, art. 5, § 25, providing that each of the justices of the Supreme Court shall have the same power at chambers to issue writs of habeas corpus, etc., as when in open court, implies a court made up of all the justices, so that the provision gives to each justice in chambers the same power as all the justices when in open court. La Motte v. Smith, 27 S. E. 933, 934, 50 S. C. 558 (approved in Salinas v. C. Aultman & Co. 49 S. C. 325, 27 S. E. 385).

A court is a legal entity. Its judges, or some of them, form by their presence a constituent element of its being. It is, as Bacon defines it, "an incorporeal being, which requires for its existence the presence of the judges or a competent number of them." What shall be such competent number to form a court of general jurisdiction must be determined by the terms of the edict creating it, the emanation of some power endowed with suitable control over it, by its own established usage, or, in the absence of either of these forces to control it, by its own will. A single judge of the court of common pleas may hold that court and perform its functions. Gray v. Bastedo, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 453, 455.

Separated from its officers, the court is invisible, intangible, and exists only in contemplation of law. It lives and moves and has its being only in the acts and personality of living men. The ideal thing called the "court" is beyond the reach of force or fear or fraud. Ex parte McLeod (U. S.) 120 Fed. 130, 131.

A court is an incorporeal political being, which requires for its existence the presence of judges. Davis v. Delaware Tp., 41 N. J.

Law (12 Vroom) 55, 56 (citing Bac. Abr. "Courts").

A court is an incorporeal political being, which requires for its existence the presence of its judges, or a competent number of them, and a clerk or prothonotary, at or during which and at a place where it is by law authorized to be held, and the performance of some public act indicative of the design to perform the functions of the court. In re Terrill, 34 Pac. 457, 458, 52 Kan. 29, 39 Am. St. Rep. 327 (citing Bacon); In re Lawyers' Tax Cases, 55 Tenn. (8 Heisk.) 565, 650. To give existence to a court, then, its officers and the time and place of holding it must be such as are prescribed by law. In re McClaskey, 37 Pac. 854, 856, 2 Okl. 568 (citing Hobart v. Hobart, 45 Iowa, 501, 503). In another sense the judges, clerk or prothonotary, counselors, and ministerial officers are said to constitute the court. In re Lawyers' Tax Cases, 55 Tenn. (8 Heisk.) 565, 650.

As judge at chamber or presiding.

The word "court," in Code Civ. Proc. § 582, providing that a judgment rendered or final order made by the district court may be reversed, vacated, or modified by the Supreme Court for errors appearing on the record, means not only the tribunal over which a judge presides, but also the judge himself, when exercising at chambers judicial power conferred by statute. Porter v. Flick, 84 N. W. 262, 60 Neb. 773.

The term "courts," as used in Const. art. 3, § 45, providing that the power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, to be exercised in such manner as shall be provided by law, means the judges presiding. Cox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 282, 34 Am. Rep. 746.

"A court has been defined as a place where justice is judicially administered. Co. Litt. 58; 3 Bl. Comm. 23. This definition, however, has often been criticised as too narrow, being limited by the word 'place.' The prominence of the word 'place' in this definition no doubt arises from the ancient idea that the king was the fountain and dispenser of justice, and wherever he was domiciled was a court or place where justice was dispensed. In modern times and under our form of government, the judicial power is exercised by means of courts. A court is an instrumentality of government. It is a creation of the law, and in some respects it is an imaginary thing, that exists only in legal contemplation, very similar to a corporation. A time when, a place where, and the persons by whom the judicial functions are to be exercised are essential to complete the idea of a court. It is an organized aspect, with all its constituent elements of time, place, and officers, that complete the idea of a court in the general legal acceptance of the term; but a court may exist in legal contemplation without any officers charged with the duty of administering justice. The officers might all die or resign, and still the legal fiction would continue to exist. The judge of a court, while presiding over a court, is by common courtesy called 'the court,' and the words 'the court' and 'the judge,' or 'the judges,' are frequently used in our statutes as synonymous." Levey v. Bigelow, 34 N. E. 128, 130, 6 Ind. App. 677.

Gen. Laws, § 575, declares that on an appeal from the final judgment of a county court to the district court of the same county, if the judgment be not for the payment of money, the penalty of the appeal bond shall be in such a sum as the court shall deem sufficient. Held, that the term "court," as used in the statute, is not employed synonymously with "judge," and hence the judge has no authority to fix a penalty to a bond, save in open court, when acting as a judge thereof. Gruner v. Moore, 6 Colo. 526, 529.

An order of a state judge at chambers, restricting a plea in a higher court proceeding, is not an order of a court, within Rev. St. § 709 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 575], allowing a writ to return from the Supreme Court of the United States, to the final judgment of the highest court of the state in which a decision of the suit can be had; the single judge at chambers not being regarded as a court within the meaning of the act. United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 252, 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325 (citing McKnight v. James, 15 Sup. Ct. 248, 155 U. S. 685, 39 L. Ed. 310).

As judge in vacation.

Within Act March 3, 1887, forbidding the payment of per diem or attendance fees, except for days when the court is opened by the judge for business or business is actually transacted by the court, the word "court" means something more than a court that is opened by the judge for business at the beginning of a regular term, and continued by adjournment until the close thereof, but will include all acts by the judge as a court which are performed in vacation. Butler v. United States (U. S.) 87 Fed. 655, 664.

In the Constitution, vesting the judicial power of the state as to matters of law and equity in certain courts therein named, the word "courts" is used in its technical sense. A court is a judicial assembly. The judge of the court is its presiding officer. While the judge is often called the court, yet he is only so rightly called when the tribunal over which he presides is in session. The Supreme Court of California has said a court is a tribunal presided over by one or more judges for the exercise of such judicial power as has been conferred upon it by law; but it is also essential that this place be designated by law, and that the person or persons authorized to administer justice be at that place for the purpose of administering justice at such times as must be also designated by law. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 99 Cal. 511, 34 Pac. 109. Hence a Legislature does not have power to confer the judicial power on judges in vacation. State ex rel. Ballew v. Woodson, 61 S. W. 252, 255, 161 Mo. 444.

The word "court" is often used interchangeably with the word "judge." A judge in vacation is not the court, but the term "court" may be interpreted to mean a judge in vacation, where it is necessary to effect the intention of the Legislature; and, where a statute authorized the court to extend the time for filing a bill of exceptions, an order granting such extension may be made by the judge during vacation. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McDonald, 31 South. 417, 418, 79 Miss. 641.

The term "court," in Rev. St. 1843, c. 37, § 40, providing that an appeal may be allowed from any interlocutory order of the court granting an injunction, is not limited in meaning to a judge or judges actually holding court, but will be construed to mean judge as well; and hence an appeal may be taken from an interlocutory order granting an injunction which is not made in term time. "The words 'the court' and 'the judge,' or judges, are frequently used in our statutes as synonymous, and, when used with reference to orders made by the court or justices, they were, we think, intended to be so understood." Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Northern Indiana R. Co., 3 Ind. 239, 244.

Jury as component part.

"The term 'court,' in its general and enlarged sense, comprehends within its purport both the justice and the jury; both being component parts of a court of law. The right of a jury trial, as guarantied by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, necessarily leads one to the conclusion that the jury is an essential part of a court of law, and that a court of law without a jury is not constitutionally organized." In re Brenner, 70 N. Y. S. 744, 747, 35 Misc. Rep. 212.

The word "court," in the acts of 1890 and 1888, authorizing comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine, includes both judge and jury in a case where a jury is present. The statute does not operate to take the entire question of genuineness of documents from the jury, but only requires that the question of genuineness be first presented to the judge to determine their admissibility. People v. Molineux, 61 N. E. 286, 308, 168 N. Y. 264, 62 L. E. A. 193.

"The term 'court' may be construed to include a jury, as well as judges and a clerk, or as used in contradistinction from a jury, according to the connection and object of its use." Gold v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 19 Vt. 478, 482.

The court, within a statute providing that the court shall allow a reasonable attorney's fee, includes both judge or jury, or judge alone, according as the court may be constituted when the trial occurs; and hence it is not error to submit the question of reasonable attorney fees to the jury in a cause triable before a jury. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Merrill, 19 Pac. 793, 795, 40 Kan. 404.

The term "court," as used in Acts 1897, c. 94, § 3, providing that, on violation of the act, the violator, on conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $5,000, in the discretion of the court, does not refer to the judge alone, but to the tribunal, including both judge and jury, and the act, therefore, is not repugnant to Const. art. 6, § 14, as authorizing the court to lay a fine exceeding $50, not assessed by the jury. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1040, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

Acts 1822, c. 29, provides that the affidavit of a mother of an illegitimate child as to the father of such child shall not be conclusive on the county court, but that the reputed father may file his affidavit setting forth that justice requires an issue to be made to try the truth of the charge, and that thereupon it shall be the duty of the court to hear proof and determine the matter as to right and justice may appertain. Held, that the statute did not confer upon the defendant the right to a trial by jury. Whyte, J., dissenting, held that, since the issue was one of fact, and since it was the policy of the common law that issues of fact should be tried by a jury, the word "court" should be considered in a broader sense, as signifying both judge and jury, and that therefore the defendant was entitled to his trial by jury. Goddard v. State, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 96, 98.

In discussing at what time in progress of arraignment and other formalities preparatory to a trial the trial may be said to be entered into, it was said that a prisoner cannot be put on trial unless he is before a court competent to try the offense, and that one of the members of the court indispensably necessary to a trial for a felony is a jury. State v. Burket (S. C.) 2 Mill, Const. 155, 156, 12 Am. Dec. 662.

A court is defined in Burrill's Law Dictionary as an organized body, with defined powers, meeting at certain times and places for the hearing and decision of causes and other matters brought before it. Lord Coke describes it as "a place where justice is judicially administered." Thus a contempt committed in the jury room, after the jury had retired to consider their verdict, was in the presence of the court; the jury being a constituent part. People v. Barrett, 9 N. Y. Supp. 321, 322, 56 Hun, 351.

The word "court," in Pub. Acts 1893, c. 66, giving a right of action to quiet title to lands against others claiming an adverse interest therein, and providing that the court shall hear the several claims and determine the rights of the parties, means the tribunal, and not merely the judge thereof, as opposed to the jury; and hence the act does not contravene Const. art. 1, § 21, declaring that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate. Miles v. Strong, 68 Conn. 273, 286, 36 Atl. 55, 58.

The word "court," as used in Civ. Code, § 4793, authorizing the court to order a sale of land on partition, applies to the judge, and not to the jury. Rodgers v. Price, 31 S. E. 126, 127, 105 Ga. 67, 68.

Justices of the peace and justices' courts.

In the construction of statutes the term "court" includes justices of the peace, as well as all courts of record. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 19.

The word "court" may extend and be applied to a justice's court. V. S. 1894, 6.

The public administration of justice is delegated to justices of the peace. They are among the bodies in whom Const. art. 6, § 1, vests the judicial powers of the state. While engaged in a performance of their public duties as judicial officers, they are courts, within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 29, providing that "all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation." Tissier v. Rhein, 130 Ill. 110, 114, 22 N. E. 848, 849.

A justice of the peace is not necessarily a court. He is not a court when elected, simply by virtue of his election, and is not vested by the election alone with judicial power; but if the Legislature, after or before his election, vests judicial power in that officer, the exercise of which is made the chief and permanent duty of his office, he thus becomes a court. A court is a tribunal charged as a substantive duty with the exercise of judicial power, and a judicial officer is the person appointed to exercise that power. A judge will be none the less a judicial officer because some duties he may have to perform are administrative in their character; nor will an administrative become a judicial officer, simply because some acts which he may perform may be to some extent judicial in their character. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Town of Whiting (Ind.) 68 N. E. 266, 270.

As used in Const. art. 6, § 1, providing that the powers of the state shall be vested in the Supreme Court, superior courts, courts of ordinary, and justices of the peace, a justice of the peace is an officer clothed with judicial powers, when acting in his judicial capacity and within his jurisdiction, and is to all intents and purposes a court. State v. Port (U. S.) 3 Fed. 117, 123.

Master commissioner.

The predominant idea, in all definitions of courts and text writers, is "that a court is a tribunal organized for the purpose of administering justice, and is presided over by a judge or judges." Our Constitution means, by the term "court," a judicial tribunal, presided over by a judge or judges. A master commissioner is not a court, and judicial duties which courts only can exercise cannot be conferred upon him. Shultz v. McPheeters, 79 Ind. 373, 375, 376.

Notary public.

As the term "court" is used in the rule of law that parties to a suit and their witnesses are protected from arrest in coming to, attending upon, and returning from court, it has received a very liberal construction, and includes any lawful tribunal having jurisdiction of any matter pending before it, but will not include the attendance of a party before a notary public to assist in the taking of depositions. Greer v. Young, 11 N. E. 167, 169, 120 Ill. 184.

As persons constituting.

Act Va. Oct., 1875 (12 Hen. St. p. 154), requiring conveyances of lands made by persons not resident in Virginia to be acknowledged before "any court of law," and certified by such court, meant that the acknowledgment should be before persons constituting a court of law, and not that the acknowledgment should be taken in open court or by the members of the court as a court. Loree v. Abner (U. S.) 57 Fed. 159, 164, 6 C. C. A. 302.

As prescribed time and place.

A court is defined to be "a place where justice is judicially administered." Co. Litt. 58a. Certainty, both as to time and place, is essential to the conception of a court of justice. It would be eminently Caligulan could it act when and where it pleases the judge. Without recourse to the notion of a court as a sort of incorporate entity, it is obvious that a judge does not at all times and places constitute a court, and that he cannot, when he pleases, assert and enforce his judicial power. He becomes a judge when he is appointed or elected, but he becomes a court only when, at the time and place designated by law, he performs judicial duties. As said in Dunn v. State, 2 Ark. 229, 35 Am. Dec. 54, the time and place designated by law and the presence of the judge there, acting judicially, are the "union and combination of circumstances" which constitute a court. Jurisdiction is not predicated of the judge, but of the court. It is true that, by force of statutes and of rules established by courts as essential to the administration of justice, the judge may perform certain judicial acts elsewhere than at the place and at other than the time fixed for the usual administration of justice; but the existence of this limited class of ancillary acts, which he may do elsewhere and at another time, has the force of a denial that he can so act, except with reference to the particular matters embraced in that class. It is the recognized difference between a court and a judge—between acts done in court and at chambers. Venhoff & Co. v. Morgan, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 276, 278.

The meeting together of the judge and officers of a court, and the holding proceedings at a place not authorized by law, does not constitute a court. Williams v. Reutzel, 29 S. W. 374, 375, 60 Ark. 155.

Where by the law establishing a county court the terms were fixed, and no provision made for holding a special term, a meeting of the court at special term, and business and proceedings had thereat, were void. Chaplin v. Holmes, 27 Ark. 414, 417.

The meeting together of the judge and officers of court at the place, but not at the time, fixed by law for holding the court, is not a court, but a mere collection of officers, whose acts must be regarded as coram non iudice, and void. Brumley v. State, 20 Ark. 77, 78 (citing Dunn v. State, 2 Ark. [2 Pike] 229, 35 Am. Dec. 54); Ex parte Jones, 27 Ark. 349, 353; Scott v. State, 22 Ark. 369, 371.

"A court consists of persons officially assembled under authority of law at an appropriate time and place for the administration of justice," and where the court was held at a county seat, which was recognized and used as such for 12 years, the rightfulness of holding the court there as the proper place cannot be attacked in habeas corpus. In re Allison, 22 Pac. 820, 821, 13 Colo. 525, 10 L. R. A. 790, 16 Am. St. Rep. 224.

A court was, when the king was the sole dispenser of justice, defined as "the house or place where the king remaineth with his retinue." When and since the authority to hear and determine controversies has been delegated to constituted tribunals, a court is generally defined as "the place where justice is administered." When judges were created, to whom the judicial power residing in the sovereign was delegated, for a time they were accustomed to attend the sovereign and exercise the power only while in attendance on him. One of the guaranties of Magna Charta is that the court—the power exercising judicial functions—should not migrate with the king, but should hold its sittings at a place and time fixed and certain. When the time and place are fixed by statute, they are essential elements of jurisdiction. Ex parte Branch, 63 Ala. 383, 384.

A court is a tribunal presided over by one or more judges for the exercise of such judicial power as has been conferred upon it by law. Blackstone, following Coke, defines it as "a place where justice is judicially administered." 3 Bl. Comm. 23. But it is also essential that this place be designated by law, and that the person or persons who are authorized to administer justice be at that place for the purpose of administering justice at such times as may be also designated by law. The term "court," as used in the Code of Civil Procedure, means sometimes the place where the court is held, sometimes the tribunal itself, and sometimes the individual presiding over the tribunal, and in many cases is used synonymously, as well as interchangeably, with "judge." Under the present Constitution, whenever a judge of the superior court is present at the place designated for the transaction of judicial business, and there assumes to transact such business, his acts are the acts of the court. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 34 Pac. 109, 110, 99 Cal. 511.

Quorum distinguished.

In determining how many judges shall constitute a court, or a quorum of a court, no distinction can be drawn between the words "quorum" and "court." Each term implies a body capable of exercising the functions of a whole body not otherwise reserved. Therefore the rule that in the House of Lords, the Supreme Court of England, a small minority may sit in deciding appeals, is applicable to show the propriety of the statutory provision that a minority of the Supreme Court judges, constituting the Supreme Court, may constitute a quorum of such court for the transaction of certain business. Floyd v. Quinn, 52 Atl. 880, 882, 886, 24 R. I. 147.

Referee or register.

In section 64, par. "a," of the bankruptcy act of 1898, providing that the court shall order the trustee to pay all taxes due and owing by the bankrupt, and, in case of any question as to the amount or legality of any such tax, the same shall be held and determined by the court, the word "court" includes the referee. In re Tilden (U. S.) 91 Fed. 500, 501.

"Court," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall mean the court of bankruptcy in which the proceedings are pending, and may include the referee. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

Bankr. Act 1867, § 29, providing that the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge of his debts, and the court shall thereupon order notice to be given by mail to all creditors to show cause, etc., means the court, and not the register. In re Comstock (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 235, 236.

Blackstone, adopting Coke's definition, says "a court is a place where justice is judicially administered." But this definition obviously wants fullness. It is limited to the place of a court in its expression. In addition to the place, there must be the presence of the officers constituting the court, a judge or judges certainly, and probably a clerk, authorized to record the action of the court. Time must be regarded, too; for the officers of a court must be present at the place and at the time appointed by law, in order to constitute a court. A divorce proceeding, being required by law to be tried in open court, cannot be, therefore, before a referee. Hobart v. Hobart, 45 Iowa, 501, 503.

As the same court.

Act July 27, 1868, in the proviso of section 2, providing that this section shall not be construed so as to deprive aliens, who are citizens or subjects of any government which accords to citizens of the United States the right to prosecute claims against such government in its courts, of the privilege of prosecuting claims against the United States in the Court of Claims as now provided by law, cannot be construed to limit the right of action in a foreign government in a court organized in such government in all respects similar to the Court of Claims. The requirement of the statute will be complied with if a citizen of the United States have the legal right, according to the forms of procedure in such government, to prosecute in its courts to judgment against the government a claim which, if the case arose under this government, he could under the same circumstances prosecute to judgment against the United States. Rothschild v. United States (U. S.) 6 Ct. Cl. 204, 219.

Code, § 1292, providing that, where a judgment is set aside for any cause upon motion, the court may direct and enforce restitution in like manner, with like effect, and subject to the same conditions, as when a judgment is reversed upon appeal, means the court which set aside the judgment. Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 7 N. E. 302, 303, 102 N. Y. 464.

As used in Gen. Laws, c. 245, § 10, providing that, wherever a case is at issue in the common pleas division involving accounts, the court may appoint auditors, etc., the word "court" means the common pleas division, and not the appellate division. Blanding v. Sayles, 42 Atl. 872, 873, 21 R. I. 211.

Under Gen. St. c. 22, § 12, the court by which an action is referred, under the statute, and afterwards finally disposed of, is "the court before whom the action is tried." Cooley v. Eastman, 57 N. H. 503, 505.

Under the rule that an application for an extra allowance can only be made "to the court before which the trial is had," the application must be made to the court at which the cause was tried. Osborne v. Betts (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 31, 32.

Special tribunals.

By the term "courts," as used in Const. art. 6, § 1, providing that the judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court, in circuit courts, in probate courts, and in justices of the peace, is meant the permanent organizations for the administration of justice, and not those special tribunals that are occasionally called into existence by particular exigencies and that cease to exist with such exigencies. Streeter v. Paton, 7 Mich. 341, 347; Shurbun v. Hooper, 40 Mich. 503, 505. Hence the banking act, empowering receivers of insolvent banks to allow or reject claims presented against it, does not clothe him with judicial power in violation of Const. art. 6, § 1, vesting such powers in specified courts. Bissell v. Heath, 57 N. W. 585, 586, 98 Mich. 472.

The phrase in the Constitution, that in condemnation proceedings, if the landowner refuses to accept the damages assessed, they should be paid into "court" for the owner, must be construed to mean that, if the owner refuses to accept the award of damages, the money shall be paid to the officer or the tribunal designated by the Legislature for the administration of justice in that particular condemnation proceeding. It does not mean, and has not been so construed, that these proceedings can only be conducted in a court in its judicial sense. Shively v. Lankford, 74 S. W. 835, 839, 174 Mo. 535.

As term of court.

The word "court," in a recognizance to appear at a certain court and not depart from said court without license therefor, means the term of court at which the defendant is recognized to appear. State v. Baker, 50 Me. 45, 56.

In Rev. St. § 828 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 635], relating to clerk's fees for attendance, which is as follows: "For traveling from the office of the clerk, where he is required to reside, to the place of holding any court required by law to be held," etc., the word "court" is used in the sense of "term" or "session" of the court, because it is the term or session of the court which is "required by law to be held." Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 476, 2 L. R. A. 229.

Within the meaning of the statute providing that, where an offer for judgment and consent to be defaulted is made in writing by defendant and filed in court, the court shall thereupon enter judgment, such an offer filed in vacation will not be a compliance with the provision during the vacation. But, where it continues on file till the next term, it then becomes operative, and should be entered of record as of the first day of the term, and should be taken as having been made in court on the first day of the term next after it was filed in the clerk's office. Madden v. Brown, 97 Mass. 148, 150.

COURT BELOW.

Rev. St. § 6722, declares that the court below may give leave to enforce a judgment, notwithstanding a supersedeas bond, etc. Held, that when a petition in error is pending in the district court, and a supersedeas bond is given to supersede a judgment of the common pleas, the court of common pleas would be the "court below," within such section; but if the case were a judgment of the district court, superseded by a bond in prosecuting a petition in error in the Supreme Court, then the district court would be the court below which could grant leave. In other words, the court below is the court from which the appeal is taken. Going v. Schnell, 6 Ohio Dec. 932, 933.

The term "court below" includes the district or county court from which an appeal or writ of error is taken. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 1386.

COURT COMMISSIONERS.

As court, see "Court."
As judge, see "Judge."

COURT COSTS.

The term "court costs" includes a fee for entering a case on the docket. Ball v. Duncan, 30 Ga. 938, 939.

COURT DAY.

The provision in the statute that, if plaintiff desire an execution to issue, the clerk shall issue the same, so as the day of such return be upon a court day, the term "court day" must be rejected, as there is nothing of a similar description in our legislation which can give meaning to the term. Harrell v. Martin, 4 Ala. 650.

COURT HAVING A CLERK.

Under Act April 14, 1802, providing that any court of record having a clerk or prothonotary may receive an alien's preliminary declaration of his intention to become naturalized, it is held that the phrase "court having a clerk," etc., means a court having a clerk distinct from the judge of the court, so that a court of record, whose recording officer is the judge thereof, is not regarded as a court of record having a clerk. Ex parte Cregg (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 796, 797.

COURTHOUSE.See "Nearest Courthouse."

A "courthouse" means the building occupied and appropriated for the holding of courts. Harris v. State, 18 South. 387, 388, 72 Miss. 960, 33 L. R. A. 85.

A "courthouse," as the term implies, is chiefly for the use of the court; the remaining uses being subordinate and to a great extent incidental. Vigo County Com'rs v. Stout, 35 N. E. 683, 685, 136 Ind. 53, 22 L. R. A. 398.

Under a statute authorizing a board of supervisors to locate and keep in repair a good and convenient courthouse, the board has power to make an appropriation for shade trees in the courthouse yard. Allgood v. Hill, 54 Miss. 666, 667.

Where a power of sale, given in a deed of trust, restricted the sale "at the courthouse door in the county of Benton," the court said: "It must be remembered that we are here dealing with a power created in a private contract, by a person using language in its usual and ordinary signification, and when he says 'courthouse in Benton county,' nothing else appearing, he means the house provided by the county for the purpose, and in which are held the terms of the various courts of the county, and in which are generally the offices of the county officers; for that is the meaning usually and ordinarily given to the term 'courthouse' in the counties of Missouri." Schanewerk v. Hoberecht, 117 Mo. 22, 27, 22 S. W. 949, 950, 20 L. R. A. 783.

Chancery clerk's office.

A courthouse is a house where courts are held, and means the building occupied and appropriated according to law for the holding of courts, and the term does not include a chancery clerk's office maintained outside of the courthouse, but in which no court is ever held, and therefore a statute requiring a board of supervisors to meet in the courthouse does not authorize their meeting in the chancery clerk's office. Harris v. State, 18 South. 387, 388, 72 Miss. 960, 33 L. R. A. 85.

Dedication to public implied.

A designation of certain blocks on a map of the city of Austin, purporting to have been filed in 1840, when an act was in effect requiring certain eligible lots to be set aside for public purposes, which map was on file in the land office since 1850, was construed to show a dedication of such lot, not to the republic of Texas or the city of Austin, but to the county of Travis, which alone could require such buildings. Travis County v. Christian (Tex.) 21 S. W. 119, 121.

A designation on a map of public lands of a certain block as "courthouse" and "jail" operated as a dedication of the use of such block to the county for constructing and keeping on it the buildings designated, so long as the county might elect to occupy it for such purpose, but the fee remained in the state. State v. Travis County, 21 S. W. 1029, 1030, 85 Tex. 435.

The word "courthouse" written on a block marked on a map of a town site filed in laying out the town, considered in connection with the fact that lots are sold with reference to such map, constitutes an irrevocable dedication to the use of the public of the space so represented on the map as a public square. Town of San Leandro v. Lebreton, 13 Pac. 405, 407, 72 Cal. 170.

Destruction of building as affecting.

Where a trust deed provides for a sale on default at the north door of the courthouse, these words are not restrictive to the site of the courthouse in existence at the date of the instrument, but, on its destruction by fire, the sale may be made at the north door of the building used as a courthouse. Alden v. Goldie, 82 Ill. 581, 583.

Where a trust deed provided for the sale on foreclosure at the north door of the courthouse, and before the time of the sale it was destroyed by fire, a sale made on the ground immediately in front of where the north door was at the time of the execution of the deed was a sale at the north door of the courthouse. Chandler v. White, 84 Ill. 435, 440.

Where a sale by a sheriff should have been at the courthouse, but there was nothing but the ashes of one, and none other substituted, the sheriff could sell there, or in full view of it, after proclaiming within the hours of sale to the assembled bidders that they would go to a shady place hard by to escape the oppressive heat of the sun. Longworthy v. Featherston, 65 Ga. 165, 168.

The term "courthouse," in a trust deed which provides that a sale of the property may be made at a certain door of the courthouse, cannot be construed to be limited to the courthouse as existing at the time of the execution of the trust deed, without regard to changed conditions, and therefor, if the courthouse is partially destroyed by fire, a sale can be properly made at the ruins of the designated door. The essential element in the power is that the place of sale is rendered certain by the description, and whether the same door, or a new one, or none at all, is at the place at the time of sale, is wholly immaterial. In so holding, the court say that if the courthouse should be destroyed by fire, and a new one erected at the same location, a sale could be made at the designated door of the new courthouse. Waller v. Arnold, 71 Ill. 350, 353.

Temporary removal as affecting.

"Courthouse," as used in the execution law, requiring judicial sales to be made at the door of the courthouse, means the door of the building used and occupied as a courthouse; and hence, where a judicial sale was made at the door of a church in which the circuit court held its sessions, because the usual courthouse was occupied by a troop of soldiers, and not in condition to be used as a courthouse, the sale was proper. Kane v. McCown, 55 Mo. 181, 198.

"Courts are necessarily to be held at the seat of justice, because it is such holding in pursuance of law that characterizes the place as the seat of justice. So the building in which such courts are permanently held becomes, by virtue of such holding and the law authorizing the same, the courthouse. The mere fact that, when the exigency of a case requires it, the court may temporarily be held in a different building, does not prevent the building constructed for the court permanently from continuing to be such courthouse, notwithstanding such building in which the courts are from necessity so temporarily held is to "be deemed by statute (Rev. St. § 650) the courthouse for the time being for all purposes. The courthouse must be at the county seat, except in the special cases prescribed, when from necessity courts may be temporarily held elsewhere." Pepin Co. v. Prindle, 21 N. W. 254, 255, 61 Wis. 301.

A deed of trust, which described the place where a sale was to be made as "at the courthouse door," meant the door of the building which was appropriated for courthouse purposes, pending repairs in courthouse proper. Hambright v. Brockman, 59 Mo. 52, 57.

COURTHOUSE DOOR.

By the courthouse door of a county is meant either of the principal entrances to the house provided by the proper authorities for the holding of a district court; and, where from any cause there is no such house, the door of the house where the district court was last held in that county shall be deemed to be the courthouse door. Where the courthouse or house used by the court has been destroyed by fire or other cause, and another has not been designated by the proper authority, the place where such house stood shall be deemed to be the courthouse door. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 2368. See, also, Boone v. Miller, 86 Tex. 74, 79, 23 S. W. 574.

COURTHOUSE PURPOSES.

The words "courthouse purposes," as used in a deed conveying land to a county, to hold as long as the county shall use the same for courthouse purposes, includes any incidental and collateral use to which the lot in question may be temporarily devoted, which does not conflict or interfere with its use by the county for courthouse purposes, as by the failure to inclose it entirely with a fence, allowing hitching posts for public use to be erected on the uninclosed portion or a temporary structure for posting bills. Henry v. Etowah County, 77 Ala. 538, 540.

COURTHOUSE SITE.

The terms "courthouse site" and "county site," in their ordinary use, mean the same thing, and are taken and understood to signify the seat of government of the county, and in this sense cannot be restricted and confined to the particular lot or the ground by measurement upon which the necessary public buildings are erected. Matkin v. Marengo County, 34 South. 171, 174, 137 Ala. 155.

COURTHOUSE SQUARE.

The words "courthouse square," written on a block in a plat of a town, when considered in connection with the statute providing that such plats shall vest the fee of lands intended for public use in the county in which such city or town is situated in trust for the uses therein named, expressed, or intended, and for no other use or purpose, operates to vest the fee in the block in the county, in trust for and to be used as a courthouse square, and for no other use or purpose. The county must exercise the control and subordination to the conditions of the trust. Such a trust is not executed by the sale of a portion of the block and the application of the proceeds to the erection of a courthouse. Franklin County Com'rs v. Lathrop, 9 Kan. 453, 462.

COURT NOT OF RECORD.

A court not of record is the court of a private person intrusted with legal jurisdiction, whom the law will not intrust with any discretionary powers over the fortune or liberty of his fellow subjects. Erwin v. United States, (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 488, 2 L. R. A. 229 (citing and approving 3 Bl. Comm. 24).

"Blackstone defines a court not of record as one that can hold no plea of matters cognizable by the common law, unless under the value of 40 shillings, nor of any forcible injury whatever." In re Dean, 22 Atl. 385, 386, 83 Me. 489, 13 L. R. A. 229.

COURT OF APPEALS.

As Supreme Court, see "Supreme Court."

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

"Courts of bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include the District Courts of the United States and of the territories, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States Court of the Indian Territory and of Alaska. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

"A court of chancery," says 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 34, 35, "as a regular tribunal for the administering of equitable relief and extraordinary remedy, is usually spoken of as dating from a decree of King Edward III; but it is certain that the royal action was merely confirmatory of a process which had come on through many preceding years. The delegation made by this order of the king conferred a general authority to grant relief on all matters, of what nature soever, requiring the exercise of the prerogative of grace. This authority differed wholly from that upon which the jurisdiction of the courts of law was based. These latter tribunals acquired jurisdiction in each case which came before them by virtue of a delegation from the crown contained in the particular writ on which the case was founded, and a writ for that purpose can only be issued in cases provided for by the positive rules of the common law. This was one of the fundamental distinctions between the jurisdiction of the English common-law courts under their ancient organization and that of the English court of chancery. These distinctions have never existed in the United States. The highest courts of law and of equity, both state and national, derive their jurisdiction either from the Constitution or from the statutes. This distinction, as far as inherent powers are concerned, has been destroyed in this state by the statute which provides that there shall be but one form of action hereafter for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress of private wrongs, which shall be called a "civil action." Parmeter v. Bourne, 35 Pac. 586, 587, 8 Wash. 45.

The expression "court of chancery," as used in a bond reciting the obligor's intention to obtain an injunction, and conditioned to perform such order or decree as the court of chancery shall pass in the premises, does not include the county court sitting as a court of equity, which grants such an injunction, and hence a failure to perform the decrees or orders of the county court does not give a right of action on such bond. Morgan v. Morgan (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 395, 401.

An injunction bond, conditioned to pay damages if the same is dissolved by the chancery court, is to be construed as including the Supreme Court, and hence the bondsmen are liable for damages when the injunction is dissolved by the latter court. Bolling v. Tate, 65 Ala. 417, 428, 39 Am. Rep. 5.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The term "court of claims" as used in Const. Ky. art. 4, declaring that the General Assembly may provide by law that the justices of the peace in each county shall sit at the court of claims and assist in laying the county levy and making appropriations, are employed to designate the county court when it sits for the purpose, among others, of ascertaining the claims against the county and expenses incurred by it, and of providing for their payment by appropriations out of the county levy; such levy being the annual tax imposed for county purposes, not on property, but on persons residing in the county without reference to the value of their property. Meriweather v. Muhlenburg County Court, 7 Sup. Ct. 563, 564, 120 U. S. 354, 30 L. Ed. 653.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

The court of common pleas is the general foundation of justice, and where the rights of a citizen, either derived from the common law or the statutes, are invaded, and the power to protect them is conferred upon no special jurisdiction, he may seek redress in that court. Moore v. Barry, 30 S. C. 530, 534, 9 S. E. 589, 590, 4 L. R. A. 294 (citing Geiger v. Drafts, 17 S. C. 155).

COURT OF COMPETENT AUTHORITY OR JURISDICTION.

See "Competent Authority"; "Competent Jurisdiction."

COURT OF CONSCIENCE.

The term "court of conscience" is sometimes used to designate a court of equity. Harper v. Clayton, 35 Atl. 1083, 1085, 84 Md. 346, 35 L. R. A. 211, 57 Am. St. Rep. 407.

COURT OF EQUITY.

A court of equity is a court of conscience, and whatever is unconscionable is odious in its sight. Dowell v. Goodwin, 47 Atl. 693, 695, 22 R. I. 287, 51 L. R. A. 873, 84 Am. St. Rep. 842.

Story's Equity, p. 32, says the "most general, if not the most precise, description of a court of equity, in the English and American sense, is that it has jurisdiction in cases of rights recognized and protected by the municipal jurisprudence, where a plain adequate and complete remedy cannot be had at law. Thomas v. Phillips, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 358, 423.

COURT OF INQUEST.

As court, see "Court."

COURT OF LAW.

The term "court of law," as used in Acts 1874, c. 320, providing that in all judgments rendered in any court of law an execution or attachment may issue at any time within 12 years from the date of the judgment, does not include a justice's court. Weikel v. Cate, 58 Md. 105, 110.

COURT OF RECORD.

The common-law definition of a "court of record" is a court that hath authority to fine and imprison. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 438 (citing Groenvelt v. Burwell, Salk. 200; Grenville v. College of Physicians, 12 Mod. 386, 388; In re Groenvelt, 1 Ld. Raym. 213, 3 Bl. Comm. 24; Bac. Abr. "Courts," D 2, p. 101); Erwin v. United States, 37 Fed. 470, 488, 2 L. R. A. 229; Wahrenberger v. Horan, 18 Tex. 57, 59; Hooker v. State (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 272, 273; Bucher v. Thompson, 32 Pac. 498, 7 N. M. 115.

A "court of record" is defined to be a court where the acts and proceedings are enrolled in parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony. The Thomas Fletcher (U. S.) 24 Fed. 481, 482 (citing 3 Black. Comm. 24); Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 488, 2 L. R. A. 229; Bucher v. Thompson, 32 Pac. 498, 7 N. M. 115; Bellas v. McCarty (Pa.) 10 Watts, 13, 24; Wheaton v. Fellows (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 375, 377; Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 422, 94 Am. Dec. 742; Lenox v. Pike, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 14, 19; Lenox v. Pike, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 14, 19; Wheaton v. Fellows (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 375, 377; Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 422, 94 Am. Dec. 742; Adair's Adm'r v. Rogers' Adm'r (Ohio) Wright, 428, 429; Planters' & Mechanics' Bank of Columbus v. Chibley, Ga. Dec. 50, 51, pt. 1; Wheaton v. Fellows (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 375, 377 (citing and approving 3 Bl. Comm. 324). The privilege of having these enrolled memorials constitutes the great leading distinction in English and American law between courts of record and courts not of record, or, as they are frequently designated, superior and inferior courts. Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 422, 94 Am. Dec. 742.

A court of record is one the history of whose proceedings is perpetuated in writing. Adair's Adm'r v. Rogers' Adm'r (Ohio) Wright, 428, 429.

A court of record is a judicial tribunal having attributes and exercising functions independently of the person of the magistrate, designated generally to hold it, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. Ex parte Thistleton, 52 Cal. 220, 225; United States v. Hall (N. M.) 21 Pac. 85, 86; Bucher v. Thompson, 32 Pac. 498, 7 N. M. 115.

A court of record is sometimes defined to be a court which has a seal. Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564, 580.

A "court of record" is a court whose proceedings are fully recorded by authorized persons, such as clerks or prothonotaries. Ex parte Cregg (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 796.

A court of record necessarily requires some duly authorized person to record the proceedings. When an act speaks of courts of record, it speaks of courts whose proceedings are duly recorded by authorized persons. State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245, 251, 9 Am. Rep. 196 (citing Ex parte Cregg, 6 Fed. Cas. 796).

This classification of courts of record is made by Sir Matthew Hale: "Courts are of two kinds: First, courts of record; second, not of record. Of courts of record, there is this diversity, namely: First, supreme; second, superior; third, inferior. The latter he styles inferior courts of record." Rhinehart v. Lance, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 311, 314, 39 Am. Rep. 592.

City criminal court.

The city criminal court of the city and county of San Francisco is a court of record, because it has a clerk and bailiff, and has power to fine and imprison, though it has no seal. Ex parte Thistleton, 52 Cal. 220, 225.

It is urged that this is not a "court of record," because, although it has a clerk and record, it has no seal. But this suggests too narrow a definition of the words "courts of record," as these words are employed in modern days, and too broad a definition, perhaps, as they were formerly used. In England and in some of the states every court which had jurisdiction to fine and imprison was a court of record, and the very erection of a new jurisdiction with power of fine and imprisonment made instantly a court of record. 3 Bl. Comm. 24, 25. The city criminal court has power to fine and imprison, and is, therefore, plainly a court of record within the older definition. Ex parte Thistleton, 52 Cal. 220, 224.

County commissioners.

A court of record, as defined by Blackstone, is a court having power to inflict fines for contempt. Thus, where the board of county commissioners had such power, it thereby became a court of record, and its acts could only be proved by the records thereof. State v. Conner (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 325, 327.

As used in Act Cong. April 14, 1802, authorizing district courts to naturalize aliens, and providing that any court of record in any individual state, having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk, or prothonotary, shall be considered a district court, within the meaning of the act, is not simply a tribunal that has a recording officer and seal, and in fact keeping a permanent record of its proceedings; for the probate court and the court of county commissioners would fulfill all of these requirements, and yet neither of these tribunals is deemed technically to be a court of record. It must be an organized judicial tribunal, having attributes and exercising functions independently of the person of the magistrate design-nated generally to hold it, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. It is distinguished from the case of a justice of the peace, on whom certain judicial powers are conferred by law. Two centuries ago, in the case of Groenvelt v. Burwell, 1 Salk. 200, Chief Justice Holt said: "Whenever a power is given to examine, hear, and punish, it is a judicial power; * * * and whenever there is jurisdiction erected, with power to fine and imprison, that is a court of record, and what is there done is matter of record." Blackstone adopts this statement, adding that the proceedings of a court of record are enrolled as a perpetual memorial. 3 Bl. Comm. 24. Thus in Woodman v. Inhabitants of Somerset, 37 Me. 29, 38, Chief Justice Shepley says: "A court of record is one which has jurisdiction to fine and imprison, or one having jurisdiction of civil cases above 40 shillings and proceeding according to the course of the common law." In re Dean, 22 Atl. 385, 386, 83 Me. 489, 13 L. R. A. 229.

A court of record is one which has jurisdiction to fine or imprison, or having jurisdiction of civil cases above 40 shillings, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. 1 Inst. 117b, 260a. Whether a court be a court of record does not depend upon the fact that it does or does not keep a record of its proceedings, or that it is or is not required by law to do so. The court of county commissioners is not a court of record. Woodman v. Inhabitants of Somerset County, 37 Me. 29, 37, 38.

Federal and admiralty courts.

The court of admiralty, having a very extensive criminal jurisdiction and power to punish by fine and imprisonment, is a court of record, though its proceedings are according to the course of the civil law, and an appeal, and not a writ of error, lies thereto. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 438.

The Circuit Court of the United States is a court of record since a writ of error lies to it. The Thomas Fletcher (U. S.) 24 Fed. 481, 482 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 24).

Justice's court.

A justice court is a court of record. Stidham v. Thatcher (Del.) 47 Atl. 1005, 1006, 2 Pennewill, 567; Stone v. Proctor (Vt.) 2 D. Chip. 108, 113.

A court that is bound to keep a record of its proceedings, and that may fine or imprison, is a "court of record." A justice court is within that definition. Hooker v. State (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 272, 273.

Justices of the peace being required to keep a docket, in which to make fair and accurate entries of all suits before them, with their proceedings thereon, which docket is a public book and goes to their successors, their courts are courts of record. Adair's Adm'r v. Rogers' Adm'r (Ohio) Wright, 428, 429.

Justices of the peace do not hold courts of record, as they do not enroll on parchment (or paper) their proceedings, and do not hold plea according to the course of common law of real or mixed actions or action quare vi et armis, or have jurisdiction beyond 40s. originally. Planters' & Mechanics' Bank of Columbus v. Chipley, Ga. Dec. 50, 51, pt. 1.

A justice court in Pennsylvania is not a court of record. A docket and short minutes of his proceedings are all that is kept by the justice. Hence the act of Congress relating to the manner in which records and proceedings of courts of another state shall be proved does not apply to the judgment of a justice court, but such judgments are "judicial proceedings" to which full faith and credit is required to be given by the Constitution of the United States. Silver Lake Bank v. Harding, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 546, 547.

Courts of justices of the peace are not courts of record. They do not proceed according to the course of the common law, and are confined strictly to the authority given them by statute. Therefore a suit cannot be maintained in one state on a judgment obtained in a justice's court in a sister state, unless the statute organizing such court is shown. Thomas v. Robinson (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 267, 268.

The words "court of record," as used in a statute prescribing the time within which an action on a judgment may be brought, do not include justices of the peace, however true it may be that for some other purposes they were courts of record. Mead v. Bowker, 46 N. E. 625, 168 Mass. 234 (citing In re Gladhill, 49 Mass. [8 Metc.] 168, 170; Thayer v. Commonwealth, 53 Mass. [12 Metc.] 9, 11).

The justice's court of the city of Albany is not, as between party and party, a court of record, though it may be for some purposes. Wheaton v. Fellows (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 373, 377.

A justice court is not a court of record. Searcy v. Hogan (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 927.

Courts of record are such as have general jurisdiction of causes of action, and the acts of which are authenticated by seal and recorded in its official records. Courts of justices of the peace are not courts of record, as they do not proceed according to the courts of common law, but are confined to the authority given them by statute, and can take nothing by implication, but must show their authority in every instance, and must comply with the forms prescribed by the statute creating them. Thomas v. Robinson (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 267, 268.

Police court.

The police court of Lowell is a court of record, within Act Cong. April 14, 1802, relating to the naturalization of aliens by courts of record, and is to be holden by learned, able, and discreet persons, appointed and commissioned by the Governor, pursuant to the Constitution, vested with all the civil and criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and exercising a common-law jurisdiction. Ex parte Gladhill, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 168, 170. See, also, Bannegan v. Murphy, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 251, 253.

Probate court.

The probate court of New Mexico, having a seal, and all its orders, decrees, etc., being entered of record, which imports verity, and having power to fine and imprison and considerable common-law jurisdiction, is a court of record authorizing its clerk to administer oaths. Bucher v. Thompson, 32 Pac. 498, 7 N. M. 115. But see United States v. Hall, 21 Pac. 85, 86, 5 N. M. 178, holding that the same court was not a court of record.

The "court of probate," though of limited jurisdiction, is a court of record with large powers, and as to proceedings within its jurisdiction cannot be said to be, in the ordinary sense of the term, an inferior court. The functions of the court are judicial, and not merely ministerial, resting on the discretion of the judge, not only in making the order of sale, but in executing titles. State v. Burnside, 33 S. C. 276, 278, 11 S. E. 787, 788.

COURT OFFICER.

The county treasurer is not an officer of the court, within Rev. St. c. 3027, as to whom a motion on the motion docket is made notice, not only to the officer, but to the sureties. He is a county officer, not connected with the court, and only subject to its control by proceedings had in due course of law. Caldwell v. Guinn, 54 Ala. 64, 66.

Under Rev. Code, § 3577, making disclosure of indictment by an "officer of court" or grand juror an indictable offense, it is held that a deputy sheriff is an officer of court within the meaning of the statute. White v. State, 44 Ala. 409, 412.

An attorney at law is an officer of the court, and, if his authority is denied, the burden of proving that he is unauthorized rests on the party making the denial. Schlitz v. Meyer, 21 N. W. 243, 244, 61 Wis. 418.

Code, § 1166, declares that all process authorized by the Code to be issued by any court or officer thereof shall run in the name of the state of Oregon, and be signed by the officer issuing the same, and, if issued by the clerk of the court, he shall affix thereto his seal of office. Held, that while an attorney was in one sense an officer of the court, he was not such an officer as was meant or referred to by that term as used in the statute, so as to authorize an attorney for a party to issue process of the court. Bailey v. Williams, 6 Or. 71, 73.

The expression "officer of the county court," in Pen. Code Ga. § 1092, providing that any officer of the county court, having a claim for insolvent costs, may present to the county judge an itemized bill of the costs claimed, and, when the same is approved and entered on the minutes of the county court, the order of approval shall be a warrant on the county treasurer payable out of the fines and forfeitures arising in the county court, does not include any other person than one who is directly and officially connected with that court, and hence does not include officers of the superior court. Hardwick v. Burke, 39 S. E. 433, 113 Ga. 999.

COURTS-MARTIAL.

As court, see "Court."

Courts-martial were instituted for the trial of naval and military offenses, and existed as early as the reign of James II, and probably had their origin in the ancient court of chivalry. They are regarded as a necessity in every civilized government, in order to properly discipline the military forces by punishing offenses therein. The tribunal is recognized as a court in the elementary works. Bouvier defines it to be "a military or naval tribunal which has jurisdiction of offenses against the law of the service, military or naval, in which the offender is engaged." Greenleaf says: "A court-martial is a court of limited and special jurisdiction." 3 Greenl. on Ev. 470. A court-martial has all the elements of a court. It has judges to hear the evidence and to determine the facts and apply the law. It has parties, prosecutor and defendant. It has pleadings and a formal trial, renders judgment, and issues process to enforce it. In short, it does everything within the sphere of its jurisdiction which any judicial tribunal can do to administer justice. People v. Van Allen, 55 N. Y. 31, 35.

The court-martial is one of the ordinary judicial institutions of the country, employed in time of peace as well as in time of war to administer justice according to the articles of war upon persons actually or constructively in the military service. Carver v. United States (U. S.) 16 Ct. Cl. 361, 385.

In the language of Attorney General Cushing, "a court-martial is a lawful tribunal existing by the same authority that any other exists by, and the law military is a branch of law as valid as any other, and it differs from the general law of the land in authority only in this: that it applies to off-cers and soldiers of the army, but not to other members of the body politic, and that it is limited to breaches of military duty." In re Bogart (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 796, 801 (citing 6 Op. Attys. Gen. 425).

* Courts-martial "are lawful tribunals existing by the same authority as civil courts of the United States, have the same plenary jurisdiction in offenses by the law military as the latter courts have in controversies within their cognizance, and in their special and more limited sphere are entitled to as untrammelled an exercise of their powers." In re Davison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 618, 620.

A court-martial is a court of limited jurisdiction. It is a creature of the statute—a temporary judicial body authorized to exist by acts of Congress under specified circumstances for a specified purpose. It has no power or jurisdiction which the statutes do not confer upon it. Deming v. McLaughry (U. S.) 113 Fed. 639, 650, 51 C. C. A. 349.

In Wise v. Withers, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 331, 2 L. Ed. 457, the court reversed the judgment of the Circuit Court because a court-martial had no jurisdiction over a person not belonging to the militia, and its sentence in such case, being coram non jure, furnishes no protection to the officer who executes it. This decision proves only that a court-martial was considered as one of those inferior courts, with limited jurisdiction, whose judgments may be questioned collaterally. They are not placed on the same high ground with the judgments of a court of record. Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 193, 208, 7 L. Ed. 650.

A court-martial, under the laws of the United States, is a court of special and limited jurisdiction. It is called into existence for a special purpose and to perform a particular duty. When the object of its creation has been accomplished, it is dissolved. Thus, in Wise v. Withers, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 331, 2 L. Ed. 457, according to the interpretation given it by Chief Justice Marshall in Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 193, 209, 7 L. Ed. 650, 655, a court-martial was ranked as one of those inferior courts of limited jurisdiction whose judgments may be questioned collaterally. McLaughry v. Deming, 22 Sup. Ct. 786, 791, 186 U. S. 49, 46 L. Ed. 1049; Barrett v. Hopkins (U. S.) 7 Fed. 312, 313.

The naval courts-martial were instituted under Act Cong. April 23, 1880, which created a naval code of martial law for the punishment of crimes and offenses committed in the naval service of the United States. It has been from the beginning an adjudicated principle that the federal courts have no criminal jurisdiction, except what is expressly conferred upon them by act of Congress, but naval courts-martial have jurisdiction to try all crimes and offenses whatever committed in the United States navy, and the sounder opinion is that the jurisdiction of such courts is in such cases exclusive, and the courts of the United States of civil jurisdiction have no lawful cognizance of such cases. "Courts-martial come under a distinct and peculiar code," says Lord Mansfield; "an established military code, which the wisdom of judges has formed, which punishes all particular crimes, and all crimes committed by persons belonging to the navy, and not therein specified, according to the laws and customs in such cases at sea." United States v. Mackenzie (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 1160, 1162.

COURTS OF ORDINARY.

"The courts of ordinary in Georgia are courts of original, exclusive, and general jurisdiction over decedents' estates, and the subject-matter of their orders and judgments are no more open to collateral attack than the judgments, decrees, or orders of any other court." Veach v. Rice, 9 Sup. Ct. 730, 737, 131 U. S. 293, 33 L. Ed. 163.

COURTS OF SAME CLASS OR GRADE.

Within the meaning of Const. § 34, providing that all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation, and the proceedings and practice of all of the courts of the same class or grade, so far as regulated by law, shall be uniform, the circuit and the county courts, so far as they have concurrent jurisdiction, are courts of the same class or grade. McLain v. Williams, 73 N. W. 391, 392, 11 S. D. 60.

COURTS OF SESSIONS.

Bacon, in his Abridgment, title "Courts of Sessions," etc., says: "Sessions held for the general execution of the authority of the justices of the peace, which are usually holden in the four quarters of the year, are called 'general sessions'; and sessions holden on a special occasion, for the execution of some particular branch of the authority of justices of the peace, are called 'special sessions.'" The term "courts of sessions" in Laws 1859, c. 339, § 4, giving the courts of sessions power to grant new trials, includes the court of general sessions of the city and county of New York. People v. Powell (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 91, 93.

COURTS OF THE STATE.

The term "courts of the state," within the meaning of the statute relative to the service of process in any of the courts of the commonwealth on foreign corporations, includes the Circuit Court of the United States sitting in Pennsylvania. Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369-376, 24 L. Ed. 853.

Insolvent Law Minn. 1881 (Gen. Laws 1881, c. 148) § 1, declares that, whenever the property of any debtor is attached or levied on by any officer by virtue of any writ or process issued out of a court of record of this state, etc., such debtor may make an assignment of all his property, etc. Held, that the term "court of record of this state" meant a domestic court of record, and was not limited to courts which derived their jurisdiction from state laws only, but included as well federal courts sitting within the territorial limits of the state; they being regarded as domestic courts, inasmuch as they, as well as the state courts, enforce the same laws. Simon v. Mann, 23 N. W. 858, 33 Minn. 412.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The courts of the United States are courts established under the authority of the United States. "They are courts of limited, but not inferior, jurisdiction. Their judgments are conclusive between the parties until reversed, although their jurisdiction does not appear upon the record." Busteed v. Parsons, 54 Ala. 393, 401, 25 Am. Rep. 688 (citing McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. [10 Wheat.] 192, 6 L. Ed. 300; Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. [3 Pet.] 193, 7 L. Ed. 650; Kennedy v. Bank of Georgia, 49 U. S. [8 How.] 586, 12 L. Ed. 1209).

When there is mention of the courts of the United States in any statute, we may conclusively assume that only the courts of general jurisdiction intended by the Constitution are meant, unless there is special reason, to be deduced from the context of the statute, for giving to the expression a different meaning. United States v. Mills (D. C.) 11 App. Cas. 500, 507.

Courts of District of Columbia.

The "courts of the United States," within 13 Stat. 551, providing that in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor (in civil actions) because he is a party or interested in the issues tried, includes the courts of the District of Columbia. Noerr v. Brewer (D. C.) 1 MacArthur, 507, 508.

Although the superior court of the District of Columbia is a court of the United States, the question whether an act of Congress using the words "court of the United States" applies to such court, as well as higher courts, is one of intention. Ex parte Norvell, 20 D. C. 348, 353.

Military court in Mexico.

Every court of the United States must derive its jurisdiction and judicial authority from the Constitution or the laws of the United States; and neither the President nor any military officer can establish a court in a conquered country, and authorize it to decide upon the rights of the United States, or of individuals in prize cases, nor to administer the laws of the nations. The courts established or sanctioned in Mexico during the war, by the commanders of the American forces, were nothing more than the agents of the military power. Their decisions were under control of military power, whenever the commanding officer thought proper to interfere. They were not, therefore, courts of the United States, and had no right to adjudicate upon a question of prize or no prize. Jecker v. Montgomery, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 498, 515, 14 L. Ed. 240.

Territorial courts.

Territorial courts are courts of the United States, within 1 Stat. 91, § 33. United States v. Haskins (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 213, 217.

The fact that Congress established the superior courts in the late territory of Florida did not make them United States courts. Beatty v. Ross, 1 Fla. (Branch) 198, 208.

The fact that judges of the district and Supreme Courts of the territories are appointed by the President under acts of Congress does not make the courts which they are authorized to hold courts of the United States. Such courts are but the legislative courts of the territory, created in virtue of the clause of the Constitution which authorized Congress to make all rules and regulations respecting the territories belonging to the United States. Accordingly jurors summoned into them under the acts of Congress applicable only to the courts of the United States—i. e., courts established under the article of the Constitution which relates to the judicial power—are wrongfully summoned, and a judgment on their verdict cannot, if properly objected to, be sustained. Clinton v. Englebrecht, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 434, 447, 20 L. Ed. 659.

Though Act Cong. May 17, 1884, § 3, creates a district court in the district of Alaska, with the jurisdiction, civil and criminal, of the District Courts of the United States and of the District Courts exercising the jurisdiction of Circuit Courts, such court, in common with other territorial courts, is not a court of the United States, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 1768, which excepts judges of the courts of the United States from the authority therein given the President to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. McAllister v. United States, 11 Sup. Ct. 949, 951, 141 U. S. 174, 35 L. Ed. 693.

The words "United States courts," as used in St. Okl. 1890, p. 930, § 2, are used in the same sense as such words are used in the Constitution of the United States, and therefore merely refer to such courts as are a part of the federal judiciary of the United States, under article 3 of the federal Constitution, and do not include the United States courts of a territory. Fuller & Fuller Co. v. Johnson, 58 Pac. 745, 746, 8 Okl. 601.

COUSIN.

See "First Cousin"; "Second Cousin."

"Cousin," as used by a testator in giving legacies to cousins and children of cousins, means first cousins. Caldecott v. Harrison, 9 Sim. 457, 461.

Where a will provided that "my aunt C. and my cousins [naming seven persons] shall take an equal share" in certain real estate, the word "aunt" and the word "cousins" will be regarded as merely descriptive of the persons named, for the purpose of identification, and not as indicating a class. Moffett v. Elmendorf, 46 N. E. 845, 847, 152 N. Y. 475, 57 Am. St. Rep. 529.

COUSINS-GERMAN.

"Cousins-german," as used in a bequest to testator's first cousins or cousins-german, is synonymous with "first cousins," and in the dictionaries both are explained as meaning children of a brother or sister. Thus, in Chambers' edition of Johnson: "The children of brothers and sisters are called 'cousins-german,' the only sense in which the phrase is now used." So in Boniface's French Dictionary: "First cousins; cousins-german; children of brothers and sisters." So in Ainsworth, under "Patruells": "A cousin-german by the father's side; a father's brother's son." It does not conclude the descendants of first cousins. Sanderson v. Bayley, 4 Myl. & C. 58, 59.

COVE LANDS.

Land flowed by the tide in 1870 would naturally fall within the designation of "cove lands"; for that is what the cove originally was. Murphy v. Bullock, 37 Atl. 848, 849, 20 R. I. 35.

COVENANT.

A covenant is an agreement duly made between the parties to do or not to do a particular act. Johnson v. Gurley, 52 Tex. 222, 226 (citing Tayl. Landl. & T. § 245); Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492, 494. It is a promise under seal. Greenleaf v. Allen, 127 Mass. 248, 253; Cheney v. Straube, 53 N. W. 479, 480, 35 Neb. 521; Johnson v. Hollensworth, 48 Mich. 140, 142, 11 N. W. 843; Kelley v. Palmer, 42 Neb. 423, 426, 60 N. W. 924; Kennedy v. Howell, 20 Conn. 349, 352; Bull v. Follett (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 170, 172. It is an agreement in writing, under 2 Wds. & P.—44 seal. Petty v. Trustees of Church of Christ, 70 Ind. 290, 297 (citing Whart. Law Dict.). It is a written agreement under seal, in the nature of a deed between two or more parties. Northrup v. Northrup (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 296, 297. It is a contract or agreement to do or suffer a particular thing, evidenced by a writing, under seal, sometimes defined as a "contract by deed." Benson v. Hobbs (Md.) 4 Har. & J. 285. It is an "agreement or consent of two or more by deed in writing, sealed and delivered, whereby either one of the parties doth promise to the other that something is done already or shall be done afterward." Commonwealth v. Robinson (Pa.) 1 Watts, 158, 160 (citing Jacob, Law Dict. and Shep. Touch.); Kent v. Edmondston, 49 N. C. 529-531 (citing Shep. Touch. 160). It is an agreement between two or more parties, reduced to writing and executed by a sealing and delivery thereof, whereby some of the parties named therein engaged, or one of them engages with the other or others, or some of them therein also named, that some act hath or hath not already been done, or for the performance or non-performance of some specified duty. De Bolle v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. (Pa.) 4 Whart. 68, 71, 33 Am. Dec. 38; Benbury v. Benbury, 22 N. C. 235, 238. It is an agreement, convention, or promise of two or more parties, by deed in writing, signed and delivered, by which either of the parties pledges himself to the other that something is either done or shall be done, or stipulates for the truth of certain facts. Sabin v. Hamilton, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 485, 490; Wright v. Tuttle (Conn.) 4 Day, 313, 321.

As any contract.

In Rev. St. art. 649, relating to counterclaims, and providing that if the suit be founded on a certain demand the defendant shall not be permitted to set off unliquidated or uncertain damages founded on a tort or breach of covenant on the part of the plaintiff, the word "covenant" is not used in its limited and technical sense of a promise evidenced by a sealed instrument, but in its wider signification of a contract in general. Riddle v. McKinney, 2 S. W. 748, 749, 67 Tex. 29.

Plaintiff issued a summons in debt "on a verbal promise and covenant," and filed a statement, agreeable to Act March 21, 1806, § 5, regulating arbitration and proceedings in courts of justice, setting forth a verbal promise only for the payment of money. It was held that although the act did not embrace actions founded on technical covenants, yet the word "covenant," used in this instance, did not vitiate the statement, but might be rejected as surplusage, or understood according to its acceptance among persons unlearned in the law, and construed to mean a verbal covenant, which signifies no more than a verbal promise. Dixon v. Sturgeon (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 25, 28.

Agree synonymous.

See "Agree."

Condition distinguished.

See "Condition"; "Condition Subsequent."

Creation.

There is no fixed or essential form for a covenant. In ordinary deeds of conveyance several averments are generally contained. Each covenant may constitute a separate sentence, and a single promise may embody the substance of several covenants. Johnson v. Hollensworth, 48 Mich. 140, 142, 11 N. W. 843.

A covenant may be created by any words expressing the intention of the parties, and no precise or formal terms are necessary to constitute a covenant more than any other agreement. Bull v. Follett (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 170, 172; Wright v. Tuttle (Conn.) 4 Day, 313, 321.

Any words in a sealed instrument by which a party manifests an intention to do or not to do an act, either by himself or a third person, if the act be lawful, will make a covenant. Hambly v. Delaware, M. & V. R. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 541, 551.

"No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a covenant. Any words will be effectual which show that the parties to the deed have concurred and assented to the performance or forbearance of a future act, or which show that the vendor has stipulated as to the quantity or quality of property sold by him." Minge v. Smith, 1 Ala. 415, 417.

"Any words in a deed which show an agreement to do a thing make a covenant, but where words do not amount to an agreement covenant does not lie, as if they are merely conditional to defeat the estate, as a lease on condition that the lessee collect and pay the rents of his other houses. There need not be any formal words, as 'covenant,' 'promise,' and the like, to make a covenant on which to ground an action of covenant, for a covenant may be had by any other words. Words of proviso and condition will be construed into the words of covenant when such is the apparent intention and meaning of the parties." Hale v. Finch, 104 U. S. 261, 268, 26 L. Ed. 732.

Any words in an instrument, under the hand and seal of the party, importing an agreement, will be sufficient to create a covenant on which an action will lie. It is said that where a man transfers and assigns a chose in action, though nothing passes thereby, yet it amounts to a covenant that the other shall have the thing, and an acknowledgment to be accountable for money is held to be a covenant. Kendal v. Talbot, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 614 (citing 1 Bac. Abr.); Hal- lett v. Wylle (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 44, 48, 3 Am Dec. 457.

"A covenant can only be created by deed, but may be by a deed poll (the party named in the deed) as well as by indenture; and where lands are conveyed by indenture to a person who does not seal the deed, yet if he enters upon the land and accepts the deed in other matters, he will be bound by the covenant contained in it." Tayl. Landl. & T. § 245. Where a grantor, in consideration of certain cash and of the building of a railroad, conveyed to the railroad company a right of way through his land, by a deed reciting that a depot and station was to be located and given to the grantor on the land conveyed, to be permanently located for the benefit of him and his assigns, and to be used for the general purposes of the railroad company, the company, by accepting such deed, entered into a covenant to comply with its terms, which covenant ran with the land, and became obligatory upon any second company purchasing all the rights, privileges, franchises, and property of the former company. Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492, 494.

Same—Writing.

While there may be no substantial difference between sealed and unsealed instruments as matters of evidence, there is no such thing as a "covenant" in legal parlance, which is not in writing. Petty v. Trustees of Church of Christ, 70 Ind. 290, 297.

The word "covenant" as used in a complaint on a lease, relative to a covenant of insurance, must be considered as intended and understood by the pleader in the sense of a written promise and not referring to any parol agreement. Johnson v. Kindred State Bank (N. D.) 96 N. W. 583, 589.

Same—Seal.

A covenant is a promise, and something more. It is a promise under seal. If the seal affixed is not that of the party who substantially makes the promise and who is to be charged by it, the promise remains, and is not changed in a contract of a proper nature. Cram v. Bangor House Proprietary, 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 354, 358.

The word "covenant" or "agreement" does not import a sealed instrument, as does the word "deed," "indenture," or "writing obligatory." There is a distinction between "covenants in deed" and "covenants in law," and to show that it is the former an express averment is necessary. An allegation in a declaration that the parties made their covenant, without alleging that they sealed it, is not sufficient, although the covenant is set out in hac verba, including the words "witness our hands and seals." Hays v. Lasater, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 565, 568.

Gen. Laws, c. 202, § 4, provides that no seal shall be required on an instrument conveying land, and that the word "covenant" shall have the same effect as though a seal had been affixed. It was held that the word "covenant" as used in the statute must have been in the sense of an obligation assumed, and not that if the word "covenant" appeared anywhere in the instrument it thereby determines the form of the obligation, without reference to its significance or application; that the statute in its true meaning is to apply only to cases where a party has expressly assumed the covenant, as by the words "I covenant," etc., where "covenant" is the operative word; and hence, where the operative words in a contract are "agree," "agreement," etc., the use of the word "covenant" in a clause, "in consideration of the faithful performance of the foregoing covenants by the party of the first part," etc., the word "covenant" does not make the instrument a specialty. Providence Telegram Pub. Co. v. Crahan Engraving Co., 52 Atl. 804, 805, 24 R. I. 175.

Interpretation.

A covenant is simply a contract of a special nature, and the primary rule of interpretation thereof is to gather the intention of the parties from their words by reading, not simply a single clause of the agreement, but the entire context, and, where the meaning is doubtful, by considering such surrounding circumstances as they are presumed to have considered when their minds met. Clark v. Devoe, 124 N. Y. 120, 124, 26 N. E. 275, 276, 21 Am. St. Rep. 652. See, also, Stubbs v. Page, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 378, 381, and Perry v. Rice, 10 Tex. 367, 371.

Kinds.

Covenants are either dependent and concurrent, or mutual and independent. The first depends on the prior performance of some act or condition, and until the condition is performed the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. In the second, mutual acts are to be performed at the same time, and if one party is ready and offers to perform his part, and the other neglects or refuses to perform his, he who is ready and offers has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act. The third sort is where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by breach of the covenants in his favor, and it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. Bailey v. White, 3 Ala. 330, 331; Hambly v. Delaware, M. & V. R. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 541, 551, 553; Jones v. Barkley (Mich.) 2 Doug. 684, 690, 691; Northrup v. Northrup (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 296, 297.

Covenants in deeds are to be considered dependent or independent, according to the intention of the parties and the good sense of the case, and technical words should give way to such intention. Bream v. Marsh (Va.) 4 Leigh, 21, 25.

Covenants are either real or personal. The former are such as are annexed to an estate or are to be performed on it, and are said to run with the land, so that he who has the one is subject to the other. A covenant by a lessee to pay rent, and to furnish the lessor with gas to heat and light the dwelling on the demised premises, was a covenant running with the land. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. v. Hinton, 64 N. E. 224, 225, 159 Ind. 398.

As Liability.

See "Liability."

COVENANT (Action of).

"Covenant," at common law, is an action upon a deed. It is the form of action applicable to a claim upon an instrument operating as a deed, although such instrument is not under seal. Where an agreement involving the sale and purchase of lands used throughout the word "covenant," purported to bind the heirs of the respective parties as well as their personal representatives, and was declared to be "the act of the parties, in witness whereof," and they thereunto set their hands and seals, it operated as a deed, although no actual seal or scroll was affixed, and covenant was the proper action thereon. Jerome v. Ortman, 66 Mich. 668, 669, 33 N. W. 759.

"Covenant" is a remedy recognized by law for the recovery of damages for the breach of a covenant or contract under seal. Stickney v. Stickney, 21 N. H. (1 Fost.) 61, 68.

An action of covenant at common law, "though in form for the recovery of damages, is the action based on a contract under seal." State v. Harmon, 15 W. Va. 115, 124.

In Jerome v. Ortman, 66 Mich. 668, 33 N. W. 759, it is held that an action of "covenant" in Michigan, as at common law, was an action upon a deed. Rondot v. Rogers Tp. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 202, 209, 39 C. C. A. 462.

An action of covenant lies on a specialty exclusively, not on a specialty modified or enlarged by a simple contract. Vicary v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Watts, 451, 458, 27 Am. Dec. 323.

The word "covenant" is of too general a character to be used in a record on appeal from a justice of the peace stating that the case is an action of assumpsit on covenant, but the cause of action must be specifically set out, so as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the justice. Guarantee Friendly Fund of Temperance Mut. Ben. Ass'n of Pennsylvania v. Henderson (Del.) 50 Atl. 535, 536, 3 Pennewill, 157.

COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

A "covenant against incumbrances" is a stipulation against all rights to or interest in the land which may subsist in third persons to the diminution of the value of the estate, and, though consistent with the passing of the fee by deed, such covenant, if there be an incumbrance, is broken as soon as made. People's Sav. Bank Co. v. Parissette, 67 N. E. 896, 897, 68 Ohio St. 450, 96 Am. St. Rep. 672.

A covenant against incumbrances is a covenant that the grantor will defend the title and possession of the grantee against all claims and liens, whether contingent or not. Shearer v. Ranger, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 447, 448.

"A covenant against incumbrances is an assurance that the property, at the time of the enrolling and delivery of the deed, is then free therefrom." Sanford v. Wheelan, 7 Pac. 324, 328, 12 Or. 301.

COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURANCE.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

The statutory "covenant for further assurance," implied in the words "grant, bargain, and sell," embraces such incumbrances only as the offender has control of. Where the defect in the title cannot be supplied by the offender, he cannot be made liable on his covenant for further assurance. Armstrong v. Darby, 26 Mo. 517, 520.

COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

Covenant of seisin distinguished, see "Covenant of Seisin."

Covenant of warranty as, see "Covenant of Warranty."

The "covenant for quiet enjoyment" is one of the covenants for title in a conveyance. It is also said to be an assurance consequent upon a defective title. Poposkey v. Munkwitz, 32 N. W. 35, 37, 68 Wis. 322, 60 Am. Rep. 858 (citing Rawle, Cov. 17, 125).

The "covenant of quiet enjoyment" is a covenant that there will be no disturbance in or cessation of possession by the prosecution and operation of legal measures. Stewart v. Drake, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 139, 141.

The "covenant for quiet enjoyment," in a lease, is for the protection of the lessee from the claims of third persons having title paramount to the lessor, and is defined to be an assurance against the consequence of a defective title, and of any disturbance thereupon. Kane v. Mink, 19 N. W. 852, 853, 64 Iowa, 84.

At common law, from the ordinary words of grant or demise in an instrument relating to real estate, was implied a covenant that the grantor would protect the grantee from lawful interference by others in enjoying the demised premises. This is called a "covenant for quiet enjoyment." Koeber v. Somers, 84 N. W. 991, 992, 108 Wis. 497, 52 L. R. A. 512.

"A covenant for quiet enjoyment gives no assurance against the wrongful eviction of the covenantee by a third person, nor does it afford any remedy for damages consequent on such an eviction." Chestnut v. Tyson, 16 South. 723, 725, 105 Ala. 149, 53 Am. St. Rep. 101.

The "covenant of quiet enjoyment" is a covenant which does not necessarily imply that the covenantor has a perfect title, but is an agreement to defend the covenantee in his possession. The covenant of quiet enjoyment goes to the possession, and not to the title, and therefore to prove the breach it is ordinarily necessary to give evidence of an entry upon the grantee, or expulsion from, or some actual disturbance in, the possession, and this, too, by reason of some adverse right existing at the time of making the covenant, and not of one subsequently acquired. Christy v. Bedell, 61 Pac. 1095, 1096, 10 Kan. App. 435.

COVENANT IN LAW.

"Properly speaking, a 'covenant in law' is an agreement which the law infers or implies from the use of certain words having a known legal operation in the creation of an estate, so that, after they have had their primary operation in creating the estate, the law gives them a secondary force by implying an agreement on the part of the grantor to protect and preserve the estate so by these words already created." Williams v. Burrell, 1 C. B. 402, 429.

COVENANT OF GENERAL WARRANTY.

See "Covenant of Warranty."

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

Covenant of seisin distinguished, see "Covenant of Seisin."

The term "general warranty" has often been held by this court to be in substance equivalent to the several special covenants in use under the common law, as that one is seised of the land sold, that he has good and perfect right to convey, that the land is free from incumbrances, that the grantee shall quietly enjoy possession, and that the grantor will warrant and defend the title against all claims of all persons. Smith v. Jones, 31 S. W. 475, 476, 97 Ky. 670 (citing Butt v. Riffe, 78 Ky. 352; Pryse v. McGuire, 81 Ky. 608).

A covenant of general warranty in a deed "is usually treated as synonymous with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, since the same concurrence of circumstances is necessary to their breach. They equally possess the capacity of running with the land, and the rules as to the measure of damages are the same as to both. Rawle on Cov. 196. Such a warranty is not broken till actual eviction, or something equivalent to actual eviction." Bostwick v. Williams, 86 Ill. 65, 70, 85 Am. Dec. 385.

A "general warranty" is a covenant for quiet possession. Harr v. Shaffer, 43 S. E. 89, 91, 52 W. Va. 207.

A general warranty does not usually extend to defects of apparent or simple inspection, requiring no skill to discover them, nor to defects known to the buyer. Meickley v. Parsons, 23 N. W. 265, 266, 66 Iowa, 63, 55 Am. Rep. 261.

COVENANT OF RIGHT TO CONVEY.

As covenant of seisin, see "Covenant of Seisin."

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

Mr. Rawle, in speaking of the covenant for "right to convey," says: "The covenant is that a particular state of things exists at the time, and if this be not true the delivery of the deed which contains such a covenant causes an instant breach." Prestwood v. McGowin, 29 South. 386, 389, 128 Ala. 267, 86 Am. St. Rep. 136 (citing Rawle, Cov. §§ 205, 214).

COVENANT OF SEISIN.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

A covenant of seisin is an assurance to the purchaser that the grantor has the very estate which he purports to convey. Pecare v. Chouteau's Adm'r, 13 Mo. 527, 528; Recobs v. Younglove, 67 Tenn. (8 Baxt.) 385, 387; Park v. Cheek, 44 Tenn. (4 Cold.) 20, 27; Curtis v. Brannon, 98 Tenn. 153, 156, 38 S. W. 1073; De Long v. Spring Lake & Sea Girt Co., 47 Atl. 491, 493, 65 N. J. Law, 1; Wetzell v. Richcreek, 40 N. E. 1004, 1006, 53 Ohio St. 62; Howell v. Richards, 11 East, 633, 641; Brandt v. Foster, 5 Iowa (5 Clarke) 287, 294.

A "covenant of seisin," or, what is equivalent, that the party has a good right to convey, does not, if he afterwards acquires a good title, cause such title to inure to his grantee by way of estoppel. The seisin of the grantee may afterwards be divested on elder and better title, and this may subsequently be lawfully purchased by the grantor for his own use, and it will inure to the grantee, who can have no claim whatever for breach of covenant. Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 227, 231, 17 Am. Dec. 221.

A vendor who has given a covenant of seisin can be called upon at any time after the execution of the deed, and at the caprice of his covenantee, to make out a perfect title. Affirmatively, the covenantee is not required to prove a negative; the grantor and covenantor is bound to show that he was seised in fee at the time of executing the deed, if that issue is made. The covenant of seisin is a covenant in present, and if the grantor had no title it was broken as soon as made. It is an affirmative covenant, and the party making it must establish it. The onus is upon him. Baker v. Hunt, 40 Ill. 264, 266, 89 Am. Dec. 346.

As covenant of title or possession.

The words have come to be looked upon less as one of the parts of a title than as synonymous with the title itself, and a covenant that one was "seised in fee" is to be regarded as a covenant for title, in contradistinction to a covenant for quiet enjoyment, which is called a "covenant for the possession." Rawle, Cov. to Tit. 50. In the United States a covenant that one "is seised" or "lawfully seised" means, by the weight of authority, seised of an indefeasible estate, and a covenant of seisin is regarded as a covenant for the title. Greenby v. Wilcocks (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 379; Hastings v. Webber, 2 Vt. 407; Thomas v. Perry (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 964; Pollard v. Dwight, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 421, 430, 2 L. Ed. 666; Fitzhugh v. Croghan, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 429, 430, 19 Am. Dec. 139; Martin v. Baker (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 232; Woods v. North, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 309, 44 Am. Dec. 312; 4 Kent, Comm. 472; Gray v. Briscoe, Noy. 142; Howelle v. Richards, 11 East, 641; Young v. Raincock, 7 C. B. 310. In Massachusetts, Maine, and to a qualified extent in Ohio, it has been decided that a covenant of seisin is answered by the transfer of an actual seisin, even though tortious, if it be a seisin under color of title. Marston v. Hobbs, 2 Mass. 433, 439, 3 Am. Dec. 61; Bearce v. Jackson, 4 Mass. 408; Cushman v. Blanchard, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 266, 268, 11 Am. Dec. 76; Griffin v. Fairbrother, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 91, 95; Backus' Adm'rs v. McCoy, 3 Ohio (3 Ham.) 211, 17 Am. Dec. 585; Foote v. Burnet, 10 Ohio, 317, 327, 36 Am. Dec. 90. But, in accordance with the general doctrine, where one had no valid right to land which he purported to convey by a deed containing a covenant of seisin, the covenant was broken at the time of the conveyance, and the grantee was entitled to set off any and whatever damages he sustained by reason of such want of title as a defense to an action on the note given for the purchase money. Brandt v. Foster, 5 Iowa (5 Marke) 287, 294.

A covenant of "seisin" has generally been regarded as a covenant for title, the word being used as synonymous with "right." It would seem to be susceptible of but one construction, and that is that the grantor has not only a seisin in deed, so that the possession may be delivered without violation of the champerty act, but that he has likewise seisin in law, or such a legal interest as will pass to the purchaser the quantity and quality of interest in the estate which he purports to sell or convey. And if the grantor has not, at the time of the covenant, the very estate which he purports to convey, the covenant is broken the instant it is made, and an immediate right of action accrues to the purchaser. The Massachusetts doctrine, that the covenant requires merely a seisin in deed, and not a good title, is contrary to the weight of authority both in England and in this country. Kincaid v. Brittain, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 119, 121.

A covenant of seisin is a covenant that is satisfied only by the transfer of an indefeasible title, especially where the covenant is for an indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple. De Long v. Spring Lake & Sea Girt Co., 47 Atl. 491, 493, 65 N. J. Law, 1.

If the grantor is in the exclusive possession of the land at the time of the conveyance, claiming a fee adverse to the owner, although he was in by his own disseisin, his covenant of seisin is not broken until the purchaser or those claiming under him are evicted by title paramount. He has a "seisin in deed," as contradistinguished from a "seisin in law," sufficient to protect him from liability under his covenant so long as those claiming under him may continue so seised. "Actual disseisin," or the actual adverse possession of the lands of another, is the commencement of a right which by lapse of time may ripen into a perfect title in the disseisor or possessor; and, during the time that the grantee of disseisor remains in the undisturbed possession of the land by reason of the conveyance of such disseisor, he cannot maintain an action upon the covenant of seisin. No breach of such covenant will have taken place if the grantor was seised in deed at the time of the conveyance, however that seisin may have been acquired. When the grantor is not seised, either in deed or in law, at the time of conveying, the covenant of seisin must be broken at the moment of executing the deed containing it, and becomes thereby a mere chose in action, and no longer annexed to or passing with the land. Backus' Adm'rs v. McCoy, 3 Ohio (3 Ham.) 211, 221, 17 Am. Dec. 585.

The "covenant of good right to convey" is synonymous with "covenant of seisin." The actual seisin of the grantor will support both, irrespective of his having an indefeasible title. The covenants, if broken at all, are broken when made. They are personal, and do not run with the land. Consequently, where a grantor put his grantees into possession at the time of the execution of the deed, and the possession continued undisturbed, there was no breach of either the covenant of good right or the covenant of seisin contained in the deed. Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91.

"Seisin" means, ex vi termini, the whole legal title. A covenant of seisin is broken if the covenantor have not the possession, right of possession, or the right of legal title. Seisin includes the right to sell. Accordingly, where a declaration in an action for a breach of covenant of seisin charged that a grantor was not seised of the legal title, a plea setting up seisin of the legal title was responsive to the entire breach in the declaration. Fitzhugh v. Croghan, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 429, 430, 19 Am. Dec. 139.

Covenant of right to convey synonymous.

The "covenant of right to convey" amounts to a "covenant of seisin." The two covenants are synonymous, and the principles and practices applicable to the one apply to the other. Adams v. Shiffer, 17 Pac. 21, 32, 11 Colo. 15, 7 Am. St. Rep. 202 (citing 3 Washb. Real Prop. 448).

The "covenant of good right to convey" is synonymous with "covenant of seisin." The actual seisin of the grantor will support both, irrespective of his having an indefeasible title. Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91.

Quiet enjoyment and warranty distinguished.

The marked distinction between a "covenant of seisin" and those for quiet enjoyment and general warranty consists in this: that the covenant of seisin, if broken at all, must be so at the very instant it is made; whereas in the latter covenants the breach depends upon the subsequent disturbance and eviction, which must be affirmatively alleged and proved by the party complaining of the breach. Abbott v. Allen (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 248, 253.

"Covenants of seisin" differ from "covenants of warranty" in that the former do not deprive the grantor from setting up an after-acquired paramount title in himself; otherwise in covenants of warranty. Thompson v. Thompson, 19 Me. (1 App.) 235, 240.

As a general rule, a plaintiff cannot recover in an action for a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment without showing an eviction from the possession under a paramount title, and the measure of damages in such cases is the price paid for the land, with interest. But in an action upon a covenant of seisin, all the plaintiff need show is that defendant had no title or no right to convey. The reason of the distinction is that a covenant for quiet enjoyment is a covenant for possession, and that of "seisin" is a covenant for title, the word being used as synonymous with "right." In an action upon the former covenant an eviction must be alleged in the complaint or declaration, but on the latter it is only necessary to negative the words of the covenant, and to allege that the grantor had no seisin or title to the land; and, as a general rule, the measure of damages is the same for a breach of covenant of seisin as for a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment. Price v. Deal, 90 N. C. 290, 294.

COVENANT OF TITLE.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."
Covenant of seisin as, see "Covenants of Seisin."

A "covenant of title" is an assurance to the purchaser of land that the grantor has the very estate in quantity and quality which he purports to convey. Bowne v. Wolcott, 48 N. W. 336, 337, 1 N. D. 415 (citing Howell v. Richards, 11 East, 633).

COVENANT OF WARRANTY.

See "Covenant of General Warranty";
"Deed with Covenant of Warranty."
As covenant running with the land, see
"Covenant Running with the Land."

The "covenant of warranty" is a contract by which the grantor of land undertakes to protect the land granted from all lawful claims and demands existing at the time of the grant, and the contract is made not only with his immediate grantee, but with whomsoever may become the owner of the land by a title derived through the grantee. King v. Kilbridge, 19 Atl. 519, 520, 58 Conn. 109.

A covenant of warranty, "in an agreement for the sale of lands means a warranty of title to the fee simple of the land, and not merely such an estate as the grantor may have therein." Conover v. Tindall, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 214, 40 Am. Dec. 220.

A "covenant of warranty" is regarded as an assurance to the purchaser of a permanent, undisturbed possession of the premises conveyed, and is only broken by his eviction, actual or constructive. Kincaid v. Brittain, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 119, 124; Wight v. Gottschalk (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 140, 141.

A "covenant of warranty" is a covenant which does not necessarily imply that the covenantor has a perfect title, but is an agreement to defend the covenantee in his possession. Christy v. Bedell, 61 Pac. 1095, 1096, 10 Kan. App. 435.

A "covenant of warranty," in a deed conveying land or any interest in land, is an undertaking by the warrantee that on the failure of the title which the deed purports to convey, either for the whole estate or for a part only, by setting up a superior title, he will make compensation in money for the loss sustained by such failure of title. It is commonly, in express terms, extended to the heir and assignee of the grantee, but this is immaterial. King v. Kerr's Adm'rs, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 154, 155, 22 Am. Dec. 777.

A condition to convey a valid title in fee simple with the "usual covenants of warranty," or to cause the same to be done, means a warranty against all other titles and incumbrances. McAllister v. Moye, 30 Miss. 258, 263.

A "covenant of warranty," when applied to freehold, has always had a peculiar and technical signification, which is that, if the covenantee was evicted from the freehold, the covenantor would give him lands of equal value instead. Chapman v. Holmes' Ex'rs, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 20, 26.

A "warranty" is defined to be a covenant real, annexed to lands or tenements. To make a warranty binding, there must be some estate conveyed to which the warranty may be annexed. Hence, if one covenant to "warrant" land to another, and make him no estate, or make him an estate that is not good, the warranty is void; and, if the warranty be void, it results that it cannot operate as an estoppel. Kercheval v. Triplett's Heirs, 8 Ky. (1 A. K. Marsh.) 493, 495.

A "warranty," according to the law of real estate, was formerly understood to mean a covenant real, by which the feoffor or donor of lands undertook to defend the feoffee or donee in possession, and to give land of equal value in case the latter was evicted therefrom. Kelley v. Palmer, 42 Neb. 423, 426, 60 N. W. 924, 925 (citing Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

As covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The "covenant for quiet enjoyment" and the "covenant of warranty of title" are practically identical in operation, and whatever constitutes a breach of one constitutes a breach of the other. Each extends to all lawful outstanding adverse claims upon the premises conveyed. Prestwood v. McGowin, 29 South. 386, 388, 128 Ala. 267, 86 Am. St. Rep. 136 (citing Copeland v. McAdory, 100 Ala. 553, 559, 13 South. 545). See, also, Bostwick v. Williams, 36 Ill. 65, 69, 85 Am. Dec. 385.

"Our covenant of warranty is a personal covenant, and is substantially a covenant for quiet enjoyment, although, as Mr. Justice Boyce says in Williams v. Wetherbee (Vt.) 1 Alk. 233, we regard a covenant of this description as something more than one for quiet enjoyment. It is a covenant to defend, not the possession merely, but the land and the estate in it. It is connected with the land, and passes to the assignee of it, so that it becomes a covenant to the assignee of the land for the time being that he shall not be disturbed in his enjoyment of the premises by any paramount right." Kramer v. Carter, 136 Mass. 504, 508.

A "covenant of warranty" is in the nature of a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and is defined in King v. Kerr's Adm'rs, 5 Ohio, 155, 22 Am. Dec. 777, as an undertaking by the warrantor that on failure of title which the deed purports to convey, either for the whole estate or for a part only, by the setting up of a superior title, he will make compensation in money for the loss sustained by such failure. People's Sav. Bank v. Parissette, 67 N. E. 896, 897, 68 Ohio St. 450, 96 Am. St. Rep. 672.

COVENANT PERFORMED.

The plea "covenants performed," with no "absque hoc" to a declaration in covenant averring performance, was an admission of the plaintiff's performance. Zents v. Legnard, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 192, 194.

COVENANT PERFORMED ABSQUE HOC.

In an action of covenant the plea of "covenants performed absque hoc" amounts to a denial of the allegations of the declaration. Wilkinson v. Pittsburgh Farmers' & Mechanics' Turnpike Co., 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 398.

A plea of "covenants performed absque hoc," though in substance a denial of the breach of covenant alleged, is nevertheless an affirmative plea, and does not put in issue the execution of the instrument sued on, nor do the words "absque hoc"—without this—change such effect, for such words only put in issue the performance on the part of the plaintiff as alleged in his narr. The words "with leave, etc.," attached to such plea, always imply an equitable defense, such as arises out of special circumstances, which the defendant intimates that he means to offer in evidence. Farmers' & Mechanics' Turnpike Co. v. McCullough, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 303, 304; Ellmaker's Ex'rs v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 183, 189; Bender v. Fromberger (Pa.) 4 Dall. 436, 439, 1 L. Ed. 898.

A plea of "absque hoc" in an action of covenant applies only to those covenants of the plaintiff which he must prove as a preliminary to a recovery. Stewart v. Bedell, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 336, 339.

COVENANT RUNNING WITH THE LAND.

A covenant is said to "run with the land" when the liability to perform it on the one hand, or the right to enforce it on the other, passes to the vendee or other assignee of the land. Such covenant must relate to, or, as is more commonly said, "touch and concern" the land, and not as merely collateral to it, in order that the assignee to the land may be charged with their benefit or burden. Gilmer v. Mobile & M. Ry. Co., 79 Ala. 569, 572, 58 Am. Rep. 623; Shaber v. St. Paul Water Co., 14 N. W. 874, 875, 30 Minn. 179; Savage v. Mason, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 500, 505; Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 436; Willard v. Warsham, 76 Va. 392, 396.

A covenant which "runs with the land" is one which follows the interest demised. It exists when the right or obligation created by the covenant is attached to the interest conveyed, or to the estate out of which it is created, so that the right or obligation, upon an assignment of the estate, devolves upon the assignee. Tillotson v. Prichard, 14 Atl. 302, 307, 60 Vt. 94, 6 Am. St. Rep. 95; West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co., 22 W. Va. 600, 631, 46 Am. Rep. 527. A covenant does not "run with the land" unless contained in a grant thereof, or of some estate therein. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112. It seems to be well settled in law that, if a covenant is not in nature and kind a real covenant, the mere declaration of the parties that it was "running with the land" will not make it a real covenant, though so stated in the document. Hurxthal v. St. Lawrence Boom & Lumber Co., 44 S. E. 520, 522, 53 W. Va. 87 (citing Gibson v. Holden, 3 N. E. 282, 115 Ill. 199, 56 Am. Rep. 146).

There are certain covenants concerning realty so necessarily connected with it as to pass with it of necessity, and operate between other parties than the original parties to the covenant. The reason why these covenants run with the land is that unless they do so they cannot be effectual, nor can the party for whose benefit they are created derive from them the benefit intended. There is another class of covenants of a doubtful or equivocal character, and which may be treated either as merely personal, or as annexed to or running with the land. With respect to these it is doubtless competent for the contracting parties to make them either the one or the other, as they think expedient. When, therefore, the party covenants for himself and his assigns, it evinces an intent to bind the land, and the obligation becomes connected with and qualifies his estate. It seems, therefore, that the question whether a covenant runs with the land or not depends upon the nature and purpose of the covenant, and, where this is not decisive, the intent of the parties as expressed in their deed will determine. Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550.

Certain covenants contained in grants of estates in real property are appurtenant to such estates, and pass with them so as to bind the assigns of the covenantor, and to vest in the assigns of the covenantee in the same manner as if they had personally entered into them. Such covenants are said to "run with the land." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1460. Certain covenants contained in grants of estates in real property are appurtenant to such estates, and pass with them, so as to bind the assigns of the covenantor, and to vest in the assigns of the covenantee in the same manner as if they had personally entered into them. Such covenants are said to "run with the land." Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1136.

In Spencer's Case, 3 Coke, 31, which is recognized as the leading authority on this subject, the rule is said to be that when a covenant extends to a thing in esse, part of a demise, the thing to be done by force of the covenant is annexed and appurtenant to the thing demised, and shall go with the land and bind the assignee, though he be not bound by express words; but when the covenant extends to a thing which is not in being at the time of the demise, it cannot be appurtenant or annexed to the thing which has no being. Those covenants which are held to run with the land and inure to the benefit of the assignee are such as generally affect the land itself and confer a benefit on the grantor. Gulf, O. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 9 S. W. 865, 866, 72 Tex. 122, 2 L. R. A. 281. See, also, Hadley v. Bernero, 71 S. W. 451, 454, 97 Mo. App. 314.

The capacity of running with the land only exists with respect to a covenant that is about or affects the land, although not directly to be performed upon it, if it tends to increase or diminish its value in the hands of the owner. Trustees of Columbia College v. Lynch, 39 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Jones & S.) 372, 378.

When an instrument conveys or grants an interest or right in land, and at the same time contains a covenant in which a right attached to the estate or interest granted is reserved, or when the grantee covenants that he will do some act on the estate or interest granted which will be beneficial to the grantor, either as respects his remaining interest in the lands out of which an interest is granted, or lands adjacent thereto, such covenant is one which may become annexed to and run with the land, and bind its owners successively. A covenant which may run with the land must have relation to the interest or estate granted, and the act to be done must concern the interest created or conveyed.

Conduitt v. Ross, 102 Ind. 166, 169, 26 N. E. 198, 199.

When a covenant in a conveyance of real estate is broken the instant it is made, it does not run with the land, but the obligation is then merely personal, and is limited to the parties to the covenant, and confers no right of action on subsequent purchasers of the estate. Davidson v. Cox, 4 N. W. 1035, 10 Neb. 150; Chapman v. Kimball, 7 Neb. 399.

To create a "covenant running with the land," it is essential that with the making of the covenant there be a transfer of title from one party to the other, unless there is the equivalent of a grant of an easement or servitude which may attach to the possession of the land and run with it regardless of any change of ownership. Where one party covenants with another in respect of land, and at the same time, with and as a part of the making of a covenant, neither parts with nor receives any title or interest in the land, nor creates an easement, nor a right in the nature of an easement, for the benefit of the land, such covenant is at best but a mere personal contract. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Webster, 61 S. W. 1018, 1020, 106 Tenn. 586.

Where the covenant is not of a nature that the law permits it to be attached to the estate as a "covenant running with the land," it cannot be made such by the agreement of the parties. So it is held that where the owners of adjoining properties agreed to construct a party wall, and by the terms of the agreement one of the parties was to build the wall, and the other party was to pay one-half of the cost before he had the privilege of using the wall, and the agreement to pay half the cost was expressly agreed to be a covenant running with the land, nevertheless the covenant was a personal one, and did not pass by a grant of the land to the purchaser. Gibson v. Holden, 3 N. E. 282, 285, 115 Ill. 199, 56 Am. Rep. 146.

Particular covenants.

A provision in a deed whereby a father conveyed his land to a son, to the effect that the father should have his support and a home as long as he should live, is a "covenant running with the land." Martin v. Martin, 24 Pac. 418, 419, 44 Kan. 295.

An agreement to furnish an aged man with a home, and to take care of and assist him to live in a comfortable manner, in consideration of a conveyance by him of his lands, was a personal agreement, and not a covenant running with the land, binding a purchaser from the covenantor. Divan v. Loomis, 31 N. W. 760, 761, 68 Wis. 150.

A covenant for a renewal of a lease, made in terms merely in favor of the lessee, runs with the land to one who, by assignment, comes to stand in the place of the covenantee. Leppla v. Mackey, 16 N. W. 470, 31 Minn. 75.

A covenant, in a deed granting a right of way to a railroad, stipulating that, whenever any portion of the land crossing the line of the railroad should be inclosed and used for pasturage, the railroad company should construct a fence on each side of the right of way, is not a covenant that runs with the land, so as to give assignees of the grantor, not named in the deed, a right of action for a breach thereof. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 9 S. W. 865, 866, 72 Tex. 122, 2 L. R. A. 281.

In an action for damages against a railroad company for breach of contract, the evidence showed that the railroad company had contracted with plaintiff's husband for a right of way over his land as long as the company should desire it, and had agreed to build its track above the overflow of a certain river. After the death of the husband, plaintiff occupied the land as her homestead. The company failed to build its track above the overflow as agreed in the contract, and plaintiff sued for damages caused by an overflow by reason of the neglect of defendant to so construct its track. Defendant claims that it had no contract with plaintiff, that she was not a party in interest, and could not recover. Held, that the contract was a covenant which ran with the land, and that plaintiff could maintain the action. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. v. O'Baugh, 5 S. W. 711, 49 Ark. 418.

Plaintiff's grantor sold defendant's grantor a right of way for a railroad, the deed requiring "the waters on the southeast side of the road to be made to run on the same side of the road, instead of through the cattle guards." Defendant built a culvert carrying the water through the cattle guards. Held, that the provision was a covenant running with the land. Peden v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 35 N. W. 424, 425, 73 Iowa, 328, 5 Am. St. Rep. 680.

A covenant by a landowner, whereby he agrees that the produce of a stone quarry shall be transported to market exclusively over one line of railroad, is not a covenant real, and does not run with the land. Kettle River R. Co. v. Eastern Ry. Co. of Minnesota, 43 N. W. 469, 470, 41 Minn. 461, 6 L. R. A. 111.

A conveyance of a railroad right of way recited, as the consideration thereof, the promise of the grantee to construct a fence on both sides of the track when completed. Held, in an action brought on the contract, by one who afterwards bought the land, against a subsequent purchaser of the railroad, its franchisees, etc., that the undertaking was a covenant running with the land, and inseparable from the easement. Midland

Ry. Co. v. Fisher, 24 N. E. 756, 757, 125 Ind. 19, 8 L. R. A. 604, 21 Am. St. Rep. 189.

A covenant which may "run with the land" must have relation to the interest or estate covenanted, and the act to be done must concern the interest or estate conveyed. Where a landowner, through part of whose land a levee connected with a drain owned by a waterworks company extends, agreed that if the company would construct a levee to a certain point he would continue it through his lands, maintaining the part built by him, and would release the company from liability for damages from high water, past or future, his agreement to maintain his part of the levee did not constitute a "covenant running with the land," and an averment of a sale of all such property of the company under a judicial decree did not show an assignment of the agreement. Indianapolis Water Co. v. Nulte, 126 Ind. 373, 377, 26 N. E. 72, 73.

A covenant not to cut timber or plough up meadow lands is one which runs with the land. Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550.

Plaintiff entered into a written contract with R. to furnish him water on his land by means of an irrigating ditch at a stated price for 40 years. The contract declared that "this agreement and the covenants therein contained on the part of the party of the second part run with and bind the land." Held, that the clause providing that the contract should run with the land created a lien thereon for its enforcement. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Dunbar, 22 Pac. 275, 277, 80 Cal. 530.

A clause in a deed of land reciting that the grant is on the "express condition" that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall not thereafter maintain a nuisance on the premises, does not create a condition subsequent, but is a covenant running with the land; and a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of the granted premises cannot refuse to complete his purchase on the ground of defect in the title, as the covenant does not bind him any further than he would be bound by law in the absence of any covenant. Clement v. Burtis, 24 N. E. 1013, 121 N. Y. 708 (affirming 10 N. Y. Supp. 364).

In 1807 the owner of two large farming estates, "A" and "C," in the upper portion of New York Island, agreed to sell and convey "A" to M. The agreement contained the clause, "upon the special condition that no part of the land or buildings should ever be used or occupied as a tavern." Four years later, in 1811, the owner conveyed both estates in trust, the conveyance of "A" being subject to the agreement, and a few months afterwards the trustees and the owner joined in a deed for "A" to M., which conveyed the estate in fee, with covenants of title and warranty, the habendum clause containing the following: "Provided always, and these presents are upon the express condition, that the aforesaid premises shall not, nor shall any part thereof, or any building or buildings thereon erected or to be erected, be at any time hereafter used or occupied as a tavern or public house or tavern of any kind." In 1812 "C" was sold and conveyed by the owner and the trustees without any such restrictions on its use. Held, in view of the situation of the parties, that the restrictive clause in the deed created a covenant running with the land, and not a condition subsequent. Post v. Well, 22 N. E. 145, 115 N. Y. 361, 5 L. R. A. 422, 12 Am. St. Rep. 809.

While in some cases it may be difficult to determine whether the particular covenants therein involved are such as run with the land, yet there is no doubt that a covenant to surrender possession to the lessors and his assigns is a covenant that runs with the land, and passes to the assignee entitled to its benefit. Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 436. See, also, Garrison v. Sandford, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 361, 364.

The ordinary covenants for title, to wit, that the grantor is lawfully seised, that he has a good right to convey, and that the land is free from incumbrances, are personal covenants, and do not run with the land, while the covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment run with the land, and descend to the heirs, and vest in assignees. Carter v. Denman's Ex'rs, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 260.

Same—Covenant against incumbrances.

Covenants against incumbrances are not "covenants running with the land," since, if broken at all, they are broken upon the execution of the deed, and right of action then accrues. Swasey v. Brooks, 30 Vt. 692. See, also, Lawrence v. Montgomery, 37 Cal. 183, 188; Davis v. Lyman, 6 Conn. 249, 255; Sanford v. Wheelan, 7 Pac. 324, 328, 12 Or. 301; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91; Jewett v. Fisher, 58 Pac. 1023, 9 Kan. App. 630; Allen v. Little, 36 Me. 170, 175; McClure v. Dee, 88 N. W. 1093, 1094, 115 Iowa, 546, 91 Am. St. Rep. 181; Ceman-sky v. Fitch (Iowa) 96 N. W. 754, 756; Davis v. Lyman, 6 Conn. 249, 255; Smith v. Perry, 26 Vt. 279, 292; Fuller v. Jillett (U. S.) 2 Fed. 30, 31.

A "covenant against incumbrances" is a continuing covenant, inuring to the benefit of the grantee, upon whom the loss may fall in regular line of succession, but upon the breach of which only nominal damages can be recovered before a loss occurs. Walker's Adm'r v. Deaver, 5 Mo. App. 139, 147, 149.

Same—Covenant against waste.

A covenant against waste runs with the land. Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550.

Same—Covenant for further assurance.

A "covenant for further assurance" runs with the land. Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 436; Garrison v. Sandford, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 261, 264; Colby v. Osgood (N. Y.) 29 Barb. 339, 349. See, also, Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392, 396.

Same—Covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The "covenant of quiet enjoyment" is a covenant real, which runs with the land, that is, passes with the land according to its subsequent alienation. Garrison v. Sandford, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 261, 264; Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392, 396; Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 436.

Same—Covenant of general warranty.

A "general warranty," in its nature, is a covenant real, which runs with the land conveyed, descends to heirs, and vests in assignees. Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, 517.

The "covenant of general warranty," binding the grantor to warrant and forever defend the title to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, is universally held to be a continuing obligation, and a covenant running with the land. Flaniken v. Neal, 4 S. W. 212, 214, 67 Tex. 629.

Same—Covenant of right to convey.

The "covenant of right to convey" is a personal covenant, not running with the land or passing to the assignee, for there is a breach of them as soon as the deed is executed, and they become choses in action, which are not technically assignable. Jewett v. Fisher, 58 Pac. 1023, 9 Kan. App. 630; Lawrence v. Montgomery, 37 Cal. 183, 186, 188; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91; Smith v. Perry, 26 Vt. 279, 292.

A covenant that land conveyed is "the property of the grantor," and that it "has a good right to sell and convey the same," runs with the land, and will inure to the benefit of his subsequent transferee. Hall v. Scott (U. S.) 7 Fed. 341.

Same—Covenant of seisin.

Covenants of seisin are not covenants running with the land, since, if broken at all, they are broken upon the execution of the deed, and right of action then accrues. Swasey v. Brooks, 30 Vt. 692. See, also, Davis v. Lyman, 6 Conn. 249, 255; Sanford v. Wheelan, 7 Pac. 324, 328, 12 Or. 301; McClure v. Dee, 88 N. W. 1093, 1094, 115 Iowa, 546, 91 Am. St. Rep. 181; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91; Jewett v. Fisher, 58 Pac. 1023, 9 Kan. App. 630; Lot v. Thomas, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 407e, 410e, 2 Am. Dec. 354; Curtis v. Brannon, 98 Tenn. 153, 156, 38 S. W. 1073; Allen v. Little, 36 Me. 170, 175; Lawrence v. Montgomery, 37 Cal. 183, 186, 188; Clement v.

Bank of Rutland, 17 Atl. 717, 61 Vt. 298, 4 L. R. A. 425; Smith v. Perry, 26 Vt. 279, 292.

A "covenant of seisin" is a covenant of indemnity, and runs with the land. Johnson v. Johnson, 70 S. W. 241, 245, 170 Mo. 34, 59 L. R. A. 748 (citing Allen v. Kennedy, 91 Mo. 324, 2 S. W. 142).

The phrase, "grant, bargain, and sell," conveying by statute an express covenant of indefeasible seisin in fee simple of the land conveyed, constitutes a covenant of indemnity which runs with the land, continuing to successive grantees, and inuring to the one on whom the loss falls. Rights which may arise under such covenant, but which have not yet inured at the time of the bankruptcy of the grantor, are not barred by his discharge from bankruptcy. Magwire v. Rigin, 44 Mo. 512, 514.

When a defeasible title, or possession without any title, has passed under a deed containing the words, "grant, bargain, and sell," the statutory covenant of defeasible seisin implied in such words is one of indemnity, which, running with the land until the damage is sustained, inures to the benefit of the party on whom the loss falls. Dickson v. Desire's Adm'r, 23 Mo. 151, 166, 66 Am. Dec. 661.

A covenant of seisin extends not only to the land itself, but to whatever is properly appurtenant to and passes by the conveyance of land, and is appropriate in leases and assignments of them. Therefore a contract by an assignor of a lease stipulating that the lease was in full force and effect at the time of its assignment and delivery to the assignee, and guarantying to him the right and title to said lease, amounted to a covenant of seisin. Wetzel v. Richcreek, 40 N. E. 1004, 1006, 53 Ohio St. 62.

Same—Covenant of warranty.

A covenant of warranty runs with the land, and inures to the benefit of the assignee of the covenantee, who may bring an action for breach of it in his own name against the original covenantor. Suydam v. Jones (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 181, 184, 25 Am. Dec. 552; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 58, 25 L. Ed. 91; Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550; Willard v. Warsham, 76 Va. 392, 396; Allen v. Little, 36 Me. 170, 175; Smith v. Ingram, 44 S. E. 643, 644, 132 N. C. 959, 61 L. R. A. 878, 95 Am. St. Rep. 680 (citing Wiggins v. Pender, 44 S. E. 362, 132 N. C. 628, 61 L. R. A. 772).

The "covenant of warranty" is said to be the most effective of the covenants in American deeds, and in some of the states is in general use. It runs with the land, passes with the fee to any subsequent grantee of the same title, and the last vendee with warranty may therefore maintain an action for a breach of the covenant against the first or any other warrantor. Real v. Hollister, 24 N. W. 333, 335, 17 Neb. 661.

A "covenant of warranty" is a covenant real, in the sense that it is annexed or incident to the estate conveyed by the deed, and runs with it inseparably for the benefit of all who may succeed to the title by purchase, and who sustain the relation toward the original covenantee of privies in estate, whether those who should succeed to the title as assignees are expressly named as such in the covenant or not. Lewis v. Cook, 35 N. C. 193; Markland v. Crump, 18 N. C. 94, 27 Am. Dec. 230. In this state the warranty has been treated as a personal covenant annexed to the estate, and it is not regarded strictly as a covenant real, within the meaning of the old law and the operation of the principles concerning real actions. Wiggins v. Pender, 44 S. E. 362, 366, 132 N. C. 628.

"Covenants of warranty" in a deed are regarded as personal covenants only, and the remedy of the covenantee, in case of eviction, is by action on the covenant against the grantor, or his real or personal representatives, to recover any damages for the land lost. Pollock v. Spedel, 17 Ohio St. 439.

A "warranty" is a covenant running with the land, which, by the ancient law, bound the grantor, and those to whom his estate descended, to give to the grantee land of equal value in case of eviction from the land conveyed. Patterson's Lessee v. Pease, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 190, 192.

Same—Covenant to convey.

It is held in Vermont that the covenant in a lease by which the lessor agreed to convey the land to the lessee during the term ran with the land and was assignable by the lessee, although the covenant did not require anything to be done upon the land itself. "This covenant did not bind the lessor to the doing of anything upon the land itself," said the court, "but did bind him to that which would affect the estate granted by the lease in respect to the time it should continue, and upon what land, by providing for an enlargement of it into an estate in fee. This covenant was a chose in action, and, apart from the estate in the land, would not have been assignable at law. It could not pass to an assignee of the lease, so that an action at law could be maintained upon it in the name of the assignee, unless it would pass as a part of, and with the estate in, the land; in other words, unless it would run with the land." But as the covenant in question respected the thing leased, and affected the value of the term and of the reversion, and hence the land, it was held that it passed with an assignment of the lease. Hagar v. Buck, 44 Vt. 235, 239, 5 Am. Rep. 368.

Same—Covenant to pay.

A covenant by the grantee of mortgaged premises to pay the mortgage debt is a mere personal covenant; it does not run with the land, and is binding only upon him who creates it. Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392, 396.

A covenant running with the land is created by an agreement of a lot owner for himself, his heirs and assigns, that he or they will pay the full value of one-half the original cost of a party wall, whenever he or they shall, in any building to be erected on the lot, use the wall or any part thereof. Conduitt v. Ross, 102 Ind. 166, 169, 26 N. E. 198, 199.

A promise by an adjoining lot owner to the builder of a party wall to compensate him for the use thereof is personal to the promisee, and not a covenant running with the land. Cook v. Paul (Neb.) 93 N. W. 430.

Where a lease of land for a term of five years provided that the lessee was to have the privilege to erect thereon a store building, to be paid for by the lessor at the end of the term, at a fair valuation, the covenant to pay for improvements was a covenant running with the land, and bound not only the lessor, but the assignee of the lease receiving rent as such assignee during the term. Ecke v. Fetzer, 26 N. W. 266, 267, 65 Wis. 55.

Same—Covenant to repair.

A covenant to repair runs with the land. The subsequent grantee takes the property charged with the burden of any agreement whereby property otherwise real becomes, by the terms of the covenant, personal in character. Mitchell v. McNeal, 34 Pac. 840, 841, 4 Colo. App. 36; Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550; Scheldt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 436. See, also, Garrison v. Sandford, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 261, 264.

While assignees of a leasehold are tenants in common, they are jointly and severally liable on covenants to repair and deliver up at the end of the term, which covenants are connected with the estate and run with the land, and bind the assignees of the lease although they are not mentioned in the lease. Coburn v. Goodell, 14 Pac. 190, 193, 72 Cal. 498, 1 Am. St. Rep. 75.

Where a riparian owner contributes so much of his lands, dam, ditch, etc., as may be necessary for the creation and enjoyment of a new water privilege to be owned jointly by himself and two others, his covenant to keep the dam for the new privilege in repair, and to rebuild it if necessary at the sole expense to himself, his heirs and assigns, runs with the land, as it is connected with the subject of the grant and enters into its value. Nye v. Hoyle, 24 N. E. 1, 3, 120 N. Y. 195.

COVENANT TO PAY.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

There is an essential difference in legal effect between "covenants of indemnity" strictly—that is, of indemnity against loss—and "covenants to pay" or assume or stand for the debt, or a surety's liability thereon. A right of action accrues on those of the latter class as soon as the debt matures and is unpaid, because the liability then becomes absolute, and the failure to pay is a breach of the express terms of the covenant; while those of the former class are not broken, and no right of action accrues, until the indemnitee has suffered a loss against which the covenant runs. This distinction grows out of the express terms of the contract, and is well established by authority. It is expressed by Mr. Justice Swayne in Wicker v. Hoppock, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 94-99, 18 L. Ed. 752, 753, as follows: "In that class of cases [contracts of indemnity] the obligee cannot recover until he is actually damaged, and he can recover only to the extent of the injury he has sustained up to the time of the institution of the suit. But there is a well-settled distinction between an agreement to indemnify and an agreement to pay. In the latter case a recovery may be had as soon as there is a breach of the contract, and the measure of damages is the full amount agreed to be paid." Henderson-Achert Lithographic Co. v. John Shillito Co., 60 N. E. 295, 298, 64 Ohio St. 236, 83 Am. St. Rep. 745.

COVENANT TO RENEW.

A "covenant to renew" gives a privilege to the tenant, but is nevertheless an executory contract, and until the tenant has exercised the privilege he cannot be held for the additional term. Andrews v. Marshall Creamery Co., 92 N. W. 706, 707, 118 Iowa, 595, 96 Am. St. Rep. 412, 60 L. R. A. 399 (citing Swank v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 423, 63 N. W. 1088; Id., 72 Minn. 380, 75 N. W. 594).

COVENANT TO REPAIR.

As covenant running with the land, see "Covenant Running with the Land."

At common law there was no duty resting on the lessor to repair, and where he made an express covenant to repair it was construed to mean in a reasonable time after notice from the tenant. Sieber v. Blanc, 18 Pac. 260, 261, 76 Cal. 173 (citing 1 Tayl. Landl. & Ten. [8th Ed.] § 330; Wood, Landl. & Ten. [Ed. 1881] 610).

COVENANT TO STAND SEISED.

"Covenants to stand seised" are a species of conveyance, founded upon the statute of uses. It is in form a covenant by the landowner to stand seised to the use of another. The use of the words "covenant to stand seised" is not absolutely necessary, but the conveyance must be based on a consideration. The conveyance creates a use in favor of the person to whom the property is to be conveyed, which is immediately executed by the statute of uses. French v. French, 3 N. H. 234, 261.

Blackstone defines a "covenant to stand seised to uses" to be a conveyance "by which a man seised of land covenants, in consideration of blood or marriage, that he will stand seised of the same lands to the use of his wife, child, or kinsman; but this covenant can only operate when made on such weighty and interesting considerations as those of blood or marriage." Corwin v. Corwin (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 219, 224. It is where a man seised of lands in fee covenants, in consideration of blood or marriage, to stand seised of the same to the use of his children, wife, or some other relation. Barrett v. French, 1 Conn. 354, 363, 6 Am. Dec. 241.

No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a "covenant to stand seised." The consideration is the chief requisite to characterize it, and to support it as such a conveyance. This consideration is blood and marriage. If the consideration appears on the deed, though there be no express words of consideration, yet it is sufficient to raise a use by the way of covenant. Barry v. Shelby, 5 Tenn. (4 Hayw.) 229, 231.

A deed containing the words "grant, bargain, and sell," etc., and a proviso that "it is understood that the parties of the first part reserve to themselves the use of the premises during their natural lives," will operate as a covenant to stand seised, and, where the right of one of the parties of the first part was only an inchoate right of dower, it will be effectual to secure to her the enjoyment of the premises during her life, though it could not have had that effect as an exception or reservation. Jackson v. Swart (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 85, 87, 88.

Bargain and sale distinguished.

Burton says: "The only essential difference between a covenant to stand seised to uses and a bargain and sale, setting aside the external formalities required to give validity to the latter—that is, the enrollment thereof—is the nature of the consideration; and hence the deed may operate for the benefit of the different parties both as a bargain and sale and a covenant to stand seised." Burt. Real Prop. 45, pl. 145. Cornish also takes it for granted that there is no difference between a bargain and sale enrolled, and a covenant to stand seised, in conveying a future freehold under the statute of uses; hence he concludes that a grant of lands generally by either of these modes of conveyance, with the habendum limiting the freehold to commence in futuro, will be valid to convey such estate, though it could not be thus limited by any common-law conveyance. Rogers v. Eagle Fire Co. of New York (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 611, 630 (citing Cornish, Purch. Deeds, 35).

Where a grantor covenants to "stand seised of his land to the use of another," such language creates a good deed of bargain and sale, if made for a pecuniary consideration, or one of pecuniary value, though ever so small, even a barleycorn. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 316.

COVENTRY ACT.

The "Coventry Act" was that of 22 and 23 Car. II, c. 1, which enacted that if any person shall of malice aforethought, and by lying in wait, unlawfully cut and disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, cut off the nose or lip, or cut off or disable any limb or member of any person, with intent to maim or disfigure him, such person should be guilty of felony, etc. It was enacted "in consequence of an assault on Sir John Coventry in the street, and slitting his nose, in revenge, as it is supposed, for some obnoxious words uttered by him in Parliament." State v. Cody, 23 Pac. 891, 894, 18 Or. 506.

COVER.

Webster defines the verb "cover": "To overspread; envelop the surface or whole body; to lay or set over; to enwrap; to enfold." When the outside pages of a publication, though of the same color as the rest of the publication, overspread or overlay the publication, such pages may be considered the outside "cover," within the meaning of Act Sept. 26, 1888, c. 1039, § 3, 25 Stat. 496, making it criminal to place defamatory, indecent, or threatening language on the outside cover of any mail matter, and making such matter nonmailable. United States v. Burnell (U. S.) 75 Fed. 824, 829.

An ordinance providing that, where steps projecting beyond the line of street and descending into cellars are "covered," they shall be inclosed with rails, with gates, and chains across the entrance, means those flights of steps which are covered by movable coverings, by the raising of which the steps may be made of service in connection with the basement to which they lead. Schroeck v. Reiss, 61 N. Y. Supp. 1054, 1056, 46 App. Div. 502.

A firm wrote to their agent: "We herewith hand you exchange covering commissions for last year's business." The language used showed that this was intended as a remittance in full for the commissions. The word "covering" was obviously used in the sense expressed in the following definitions of "cover" by the Century Cyclopædia and Dictionary, vol. 2: "To be equal to, be of the same extent or amount, be coextensive with; as, 'the receipts therein cover the expenses'; to counterbalance; compensate for; as, 'to cover one's loss.'" Off v. J. B. Inderrieden Co., 74 Ill. App. 105, 109.

COVERED BY.

A circular issued by a commission firm inviting consignments of produce, and stating that it would be "covered by insurance" as soon as received, did not mean that the firm personally were to be the insurers of such produce against fire, but was merely a promise that the produce should be insured as soon as received, and was fulfilled by obtaining a reasonable and proper security against a contingent loss. Johnson v. Campbell, 120 Mass. 449, 453.

A note reciting that it shall be "covered by" a prior mortgage shows an intention on the part of the maker to create an equitable lien or mortgage on the premises described in the mortgage, and hence the note must be construed as an equitable mortgage. Butts v. Broughton, 72 Ala. 294, 298.

COVERED INTO.

"Covered into the treasury," as used in the United States Treasury Department, means that money has actually been paid into the treasury in the regular manner, as distinguished from merely depositing it with the Treasurer. United States v. Johnston, 8 Sup. Ct. 446, 454, 124 U. S. 236, 31 L. Ed. 389.

COVERINGS.

A "covering" is anything which covers or conceals, as a roof, a screen, a paper, clothing, etc.; but to speak of a liquid as being "covered" by the bottle which contains it is such an extraordinary use of the English language that nothing but the most explicit words of a statute would justify that construction, and hence the duty on filled glass bottles prescribed by the tariff act of 1883 was not repealed by the provision of the customs administrative act of 1890, § 19 (Act June 10, 1890, c. 407, 26 Stat. 139 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1924]), that the duty on ad-valorem goods shall be assessed upon their actual market value, including the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, and coverings of any kind. United States v. Nichols, 22 Sup. Ct. 918, 919, 186 U. S. 208, 46 L. Ed. 1173.

COVERTURE.

See "During Coverture."

The term "coverture" implies that the wife is, during its continuance, under the protection of her husband, and the common law will not allow her to do anything which may prejudice her rights or interests, without his advice, consent, and approval. In this respect she is incapable of acting alone. In defining the meaning of the word "coverture," Mr. Webster has laid down this rule of law with much succinctness and perspicuity. He says: "The coverture of a woman disables her from making contracts to the prejudice of herself or husband, without his allowance or confirmation." I am incapable of adding anything to this statement of the rule of common law without detracting from its force. Osborn v. Horine, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 124, 125.

"Coverture" is a personal disability springing from the conjugal relation, and does not attach to the administrator of the wife. Roberts v. Lund, 45 Vt. 82, 86.

COVIN.

"Covin" is defined by Lord Ellenborough as a contrivance between two to defraud or cheat a third. Mix v. Muzzy, 28 Conn. 186, 191.

"Covin" is a secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another of his rights. To establish covin, it is necessary to prove both of the persons charged therewith with having secretly assented to the doing of something prejudicial to another. Anderson v. Oscamp (Ind.) 35 N. E. 707, 708.

"The common law doth so abhor fraud and covin, that all acts, as well judicial as others, and which of themselves are just and lawful, yet being mixed with fraud and deceit, are in judgment of law wrongful and unlawful." Fermor's Case, 3 Co. 78. "Covin may be when the title is good, and the title shall not give benefit to him that has it by reason of the covin; for the mixture of good and evil together makes the whole bad; the truth is obscured by the falsehood, and the virtue drowned in vice." Hyslop v. Clarke (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 458, 465 (quoting Wimbish v. Tailbois, Plow. 54).

Prov. St. 1742-43, c. 27, § 4, declaring that if any person losing money by playing at cards should not, without "civin or collusion," sue and with effect prosecute for the thing lost, it should be lawful for any person to sue and recover treble the value thereof, means covin or collusion between the person who lost and the person who won. Cole v. Applebury, 136 Mass. 525, 529.

COW.

See "Milch Cow."

As beef, see "Beef."

As beast, see "Beast."

In construing a statute exempting one cow from execution, the courts say that the word "cow" implies something more than simply an animal of that species, otherwise the word "ox" would have been equally appropriate. Brigham v. Bush (N. Y.) 33 Barb. 596, 600.

A cow is a mature female of bovine animals, and hence an indictment describing the animal stolen as "a cow" is sufficient, under Comp. Laws 1897, § 79, making it an offense to steal any neat cattle. Wilburn v. Territory, 62 Pac. 968, 969, 10 N. M. 402.

A cow is a female of the bovine genus of animals; hence, under an indictment for "stealing a cow," a defendant cannot be convicted of stealing a bull. State v. Mc-Minn, 34 Ark. 160, 162.

Heifer.

In the construction of statutes, "cow" includes heifer. Ky. St. 1903, § 456.

"Cow," when used in the exemption statute, includes a two year old heifer, if the debtor has no other cow. "Possibly, if the statute were a penal one, it might be considered that the term 'cow' only applies to the animal after she has brought forth a calf: This is undoubtedly not only the common, but the correct, meaning of the term; but the tendency of the courts to construe exemption statutes liberally has led to a general holding that the term 'cow' should be construed to include a heifer not with calf." Freeman v. Carpenter, 10 Vt. 433, 434, 33 Am. Dec. 210.

The Vermont statute exempting one "cow," etc., from execution, includes a two year old heifer forward with calf, when the debtor has no other cow. Dow v. Smith, 7 Vt. 465, 29 Am. Dec. 202; Kennedy v. Bradberry, 55 Me. 107, 92 Am. Dec. 572.

There is a general tendency of the courts to hold that, where a statute exempts "cows," young animals of the species and description, that by time and subsequent growth would become such in a popular sense, are within the meaning and import of that term as used in the statute. Berg v. Baldwin, 18 N. W. 821, 822, 31 Minn. 541 (citing Mundell v. Hammond, 40 Vt. 641; Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 203).

Under a statute exempting a "cow" from execution, it did not require that the animal should be actually giving milk, but included a heifer calf taken with the expectation and purpose of keeping her for a cow. Carruth v. Grassie, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 211, 71 Am.

Dec. 707; Johnson v. Babcock, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 583. See, also, Nelson v. Fightmaster, 44 Pac. 213, 215, 4 Okl. 38; Stirman v. Smith (Ky.) 10 S. W. 131, 132. Contra, see Mitchell v. Joyce, 28 N. W. 473, 474, 69 Iowa, 121.

In a replevin suit a writ described an animal as a "heifer," and in the certificate of appraisement it was described as a "cow." Held, that the words should be construed as practically synonymous, and hence there was no variance justifying the dismissal of the writ. Pomeroy v. Trimper, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 398, 403, 85 Am. Dec. 714.

Same—In criminal law.

Under the rule that penal statutes must be construed liberally in favor of an alleged offender, it has been held in Richard Cooke's Case, Leach's C. L. 109, that an act made to punish the person who stole a "cow" is not applicable to him who steals a heifer. Daggett v. State, 4 Conn. 60-64, 10 Am. Dec. 100.

The defendant was indicted for stealing a "cow," and the proof was that the animal alleged to have been stolen was a heifer about 1½ years old. It was contended that this was a fatal variance between the indictment and the proof. In the principal dictionary of our language a "heifer" is defined to be a young cow. The Penal Code provides that the rule of common law that penal statutes are to be strictly construed has no application to the Code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. The statute enumerates by particular designation "cows," "bulls," "steers," and "calves," and it cannot reasonably be inferred that it intended to exclude heifers, but rather that it intended to designate them as "cows." People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67, 70.

Where an indictment charged the defendant with stealing a "cow, the personal property of R.," there was no variance precluding the conviction, the evidence being that the animal stolen was a heifer between two and three years old that had never had a calf. Parker v. State, 39 Ala. 365.

Where an indictment charges the larceny of a "heifer," there is no variance between it and the verdict fixing the value of the "cow" stolen at a certain sum, as a "heifer" is defined to be a young cow. Garvin v. State, 52 Miss. 207, 209.

A heifer two or three years old that had never had a calf may be described in an indictment for larceny as a "cow." Parker v. State, 39 Ala. 365, 366.

COWKEEPER.

A farmer who found it a convenient and profitable mode of cultivating his farm to keep cows for the purpose of consuming the produce on the land, and who sold the surplus of milk over that for his own use, is not a "cowkeeper" within Bankr. Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, § 65, the same referring to persons keeping cows for the purpose of carrying on the trade of dealers in milk. Bell v. Young, 15 C. B. 524, 530.

COW KIND.

Rev. Code, § 3706, making the stealing of animals of the "cow kind" grand larceny, should be construed to include a steer. "We entertain no doubt that the statute was intended to embrace, and such is the proper signification of the words, every animal which is the offspring of the female of the bovine genus of animals." Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 150.

COWARDICE.

"Cowardice" is an antonym of "courage," and hence an instruction that if a person shoots another through mere "cowardice," or under circumstances which are not sufficient to induce a reasonable and well-grounded belief of danger to life, etc., in the mind of an ordinarily fearless person, it will not constitute self-defense, is not erroneous. Coil v. State, 86 N. W. 925, 928, 62 Neb. 15.

CRACK-LOO.

"Crack-loo" is a game played by two or more persons tossing up a coin and letting it fall on the floor, the one whose coin falls and remains nearest a crack in the floor being the winner. The court remarks, in the course of the opinion, that the dictionaries and the books on gaming, so far as they have found, do not contain the word, or any definition thereof, and that it seems to be peculiarly a Texas game; but it is ultimately decided that under Pen. Code, art. 388, making it criminal for any person to bet or wager on poker dice, jackpot, or high dice, dominoes, muggins, "crack-loo," or any game of any character that can be played with dice or dominoes, conviction may be had for betting at a game called "crack-loo," though it is not played with dice or dominoes, but in the manner as above described. Donathan v. State, 66 S. W. 781, 782, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 427.

CRAFT.

As an occupation.

In an act allowing the books of all persons in the practice of any regular craft to go to the jury in proof of open accounts, the term "craft" applies to any occupation which makes it necessary for books to be kept as a record of its transactions—the monuments of its daily business—as factories, foundries, forges, gasworks, banks; no matter what, if books are required to be kept, these books are to be let in under the law. Ganahl v. Shore, 24 Ga. 17, 23.

2 Wds. & P.—45

As a vessel.

See "Bay Craft"; "River Craft"; "Water Craft."

Other craft, see "Other."

"Craft," as used in St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 75, § 37, imposing a penalty on any person who, not being a freeman of the watermen's company, shall work or navigate any "wherry, lighter or other craft" upon the Thames for hire or gain, does not include a steamtug of 87 tons burden employed in moving another vessel. Reed v. Ingham, 3 E. & B. 888, 898; Regina v. Reed, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 135.

The word "craft" generally implies small vessels, though it is sometimes used to embrace vessels of all sizes; and, in an act regulating the anchorage of bay or river "craft," it was not intended to confine the privilege as to the use of wharves to small vessels. The privilege was intended to be given to the bay and river trade. The word "craft" may have been used because at that time the bay and river trade was exclusively conducted in small sail vessels, and therefore the whole trade was included in the exemption given to bay and river craft. That it is now conducted in steamboats, instead of sail vessels, makes no difference, and the word therefore embraces steamboats as well as sailing vessels, though it would not probably have been chosen if steamboats of 500 tons burden had been in use when the word was first used in this connection. The Wemonah (Va.) 21 Grat. 685, 697.

CRAMP.

The word "cramp" is a common term, well understood to relate to a painful affection of the muscles, and frequently associated with an acute disease of the stomach or bowels; so that the term "cramp cure" is descriptive of the purpose of the medicine, and hence cannot be appropriated as a trademark. Harris Drug Co. v. Stucky (U. S.) 46 Fed. 624, 626.

CRANK.

Calling a person a "crank" is not of itself an actionable slander. "It is not a word which by its common meaning in the English language imports that a person has been guilty of a crime, or exposes him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, obloquy, or which would tend to injure him in his trade or profession. The word has no necessary defamatory meaning, and, if it was used by the defendant in a defamatory sense, such sense must be given it by an appropriate allegation or innuendo to that effect. It is urged that since the assassination of President Garfield by Guiteau the word 'crank' has obtained a definite meaning in this country, and is understood to mean a crack-brained and murderously inclined person, and is so used by the public press. I do not think so short a term of use would give to such a word a libelous sense or meaning, without an allegation or innuendo as to the sense in which it is used by defendant. In Ogilvie's Imperial Dictionary, published in England in 1889, and republished in this country in 1885, the word is found in the supplement with the following definition: 'Crank: Some strange action caused by a twist of judgment; a caprice, a whim, a vagary; violent temper subject to sudden cranks. Carlyle.' So that by this authority, which I think may be deemed the latest and probably the best, the word would seem to have no necessary defamatory sense. It would not necessarily imply that a man had been guilty of a crime, or tend to subject him to ridicule, or to say of him that he is capricious or subject to vagaries or whims; and such implications or intent could only be shown by an apt averment and proof in support of such an averment." Walker v. Tribune Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. 827, 828.

CRAPE VEILS.

Tariff Act June 30, 1864, c. 171, § 8, 13 Stat. 210, taxed imported silk veils at 60 per cent. ad valorem, and provided that manufacturers of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided, should be taxed at 50 per cent. ad valorem. Held that, though crape veils were manufactured from silk, the crape is a material composed of silk, and to which a resinous substance has been applied; and as neither the merchant nor the ordinary buyer understands "crape" to be identical with "silk," such veils were not classifiable under the 60 per cent. schedule as "silk veils," but should be classified as "manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value." Arthur v. Morrison, 96 U. S. 108, 24 L. Ed. 764.

CRAPS.

The game of "craps" or "ooutz" is a game ordinarily played with two dice. "They are shaken up in the hand, and then rolled or thrown from it. The player wins if he throws the numbers 7 or 11; otherwise he loses. It can be played with any four-cornered thing or cube, with numbers on it, that can be thrown or rolled, and upon any surface, as the floor, the ground, a box, a hat, etc." Commonwealth v. Kammerer (Ky.) 13 S. W. 108.

The game of "craps" is played by one man taking two dice and throwing them on the table, betting on 7 and 11 to win, the other party betting against him. First one and then another will throw the dice. The game can be played on any flat surface. Chappell v. State, 27 Tex. App. 310, 312, 11 S. W. 411.

CRAZY.

In its popular sense, the term "crazy" imports a broken, shattered or deranged mind, rather than one enfeebled by age or disease, and is not an equivalent of "testamentary incapacity." Shaver v. McCarthy (Pa.) 5 Atl. 614, 615.

CREAM.

It is true that the word "cream" is often used to designate the best part of a thing, but not the thing itself, as, for instance, the "cream of a story"; but only in that relation is the word given any such signification. The word "cream" in combination with other words, as "Price's Cream Baking Powder," is not descriptive of the article, or of its quality or kind. The baking powder is neither composed of part cream, nor does that word convey the idea that it is the best or choicest. Price Baking-Powder Co. v. Fyfe (U. S.) 45 Fed. 799, 800.

CREAMERY.

A "creamery" is an establishment or place for the making of butter, and a company which has a right to the exclusive use of its corporate name. The "Elgin Butter Company" cannot claim the exclusive right to the use of the "Elgin Creamery Company," so as to prevent another corporation doing business under the latter name, notwithstanding the former added to its title the words, "Proprietor of the Elgin Creamery Company." Elgin Butter Co. v. Elgin Creamery Co., 40 N. E. 616, 617, 155 Ill. 127.

For the purpose of the pure food act, "creamery" shall be defined as "a factory where cream from milk, with or without the addition of salt and coloring matters, is churned into butter." Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 9410.

CREATE.

The word "create" has a clear, well-settled, and well-understood significance, and means to bring into existence something which did not exist. Roth v. State, 63 N. E. 460, 469, 158 Ind. 242.

Rev. St. c. 73, § 11, provides that all trusts concerning land must be created and manifested by some writing signed, etc. Held, that the words "created and manifested," as used in prior statutes, were not synonymous with the words "created or declared," but it was sufficient, under the statute as changed, that the trust should be subsequently declared by a writing signed by the party charged with the trust, though it was not created originally by a writing. McClellan v. McClellan, 65 Me. 500.

"Created," as used in Act Dec. 22, 1812, § 10, providing that every estate in lands or slaves "which now is, or shall hereafter be created an estate in fee tail, shall from henceforth be an estate in fee simple," is broad enough to include devises as well as conveyances. Edwards v. Bibb, 54 Ala. 475, 481.

As applied to corporations.

"Create," as used in speaking of the creation of a charter, means to make one which never existed before. Moers v. City of Reading, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 188, 189.

The creation of a corporation is the bringing into being of an artificial person having the essential attributes of a corporation; the creation of a distinct independent franchise called a "corporation," which when created has a capacity, among other things, by its corporate name to receive and enjoy such other franchises, privileges, and immunities, property and rights, as the Legislature itself, or other persons with its permission, may grant to it. The word has a clear, well-settled, and well-understood signification. It means to bring into being, to cause to exist, to produce. It appears to be one thing to create or bring into being a corporation, and quite another to deal with it as an existing entity, a person, after it is created, by regulating its intercourse, relations, and acts as to other existing persons, natural and artificial. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Orton (U. S.) 32 Fed. 457, 473.

The word "create" has a clear, well-settled, well-understood signification, meaning to bring into being, to cause to exist, to produce, to make, etc.; and hence an act limiting fares of a street railway company to a certain amount in cities having a certain population does not violate Const. art. 11, § 13, which provides that corporations other than banking shall not be created by special act, it being one thing to create or bring into being a corporation, and quite another to deal with it as an existing entity, after it is created, by regulating its intercourse, relations, and acts as to other existing persons. City of Indianapolis v. Navin, 47 N. E. 525, 528, 51 N. E. 80, 151 Ind. 139, 41 L. R. A. 337, 344.

An act providing that building and loan associations might bring and maintain suits, after the expiration of their charter, for the sole purpose of enabling them to wind up their affairs, is not in violation of article 1, § 25, Const., declaring that no law shall "create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation." The act neither created charters, nor did it renew or extend the time of their existence, within the meaning of the Constitution. Cooper v. Oriental Savings & Loan Ass'n, 100 Pa. 402, 406.

A statute that does not profess to create a banking corporation, but merely remedies defects in the organization of one already existing, is not a violation of the constitutional prohibition against granting special charters for banking purposes. Syracuse City Bank v. Davis (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 188, 193.

Any corporation accepting the provisions of Act March, 1889, providing generally that railroad companies organized under the laws of another state may be incorporated in the state on compliance with certain conditions, was "created and organized" under the laws of the state, within the meaning of Act April 24, 1899, providing that no corporation shall hereafter be created or organized under the laws of the state without the payment of a certain fee into the state treasury. State v. Sioux City & N. R. Co., 44 N. W. 1032, 43 Minn. 17.

CREATED BY LAW.

See "Liability Created by Law."

CREATURE.

See "Reasonable Creature."

CREDIBLE—CREDIBILITY.

"Credibility" and "competency" are sometimes applied to a witness as if they were synonymous in meaning. Credibility relates to whether the witness is such as is entitled to credit or belief. It may not attach by reason of extreme youth, idiocy, insanity, or, under our statutes, conviction of perjury. Competency relates more to the relation of witnesses to the matter under investigation. The person, though incompetent in a particular matter, may be a credible witness in other relations to such matters. Formerly incompetency arose from being directly interested in the matter under investigation, or because charged with the commission of the crime under investigation, or because of his relation to the party interested, as husband or wife. Smith v. Jones, 34 Atl. 424, 68 Vt. 132.

CREDIBLE PERSON.

A credible person is one worthy of belief, and, as used in the statute providing that the summons may be served by any credible person, the person must be one worthy of belief. This appears from the use of the distinguishing word "credible," and again from the provision which follows, "and the return of such person verified by his affidavit shall be evidence of the time and manner of service," for, if the return of process by persons unworthy of credit is to be held conclusive and unassailable, the property and rights of individuals would no longer be safe. Peck v. Chambers, 28 S. E. 706, 708, 44 W. Va. 270.

The expression "credible person," as used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 404, providing that an information shall not be presented by the district or county attorney until oath has been made by some credible person, charging the defendant with an offense, meant a competent as well as a credible witness. "Such has been the construction of the word 'credible' by our Supreme Court in the case of attesting witnesses to a will, and the reasons given for so holding in that case apply with equal force here." And therefore, as the husband is not a competent witness against the wife in a prosecution for adultery, to the same extent he is incompetent to make an affidavit charging her with the offense. Thomas v. State, 14 Tex. App. 70, 72.

Code Cr. Proc. art. 583, providing that the credibility of the persons making an affidavit for change of venue, or their means of knowledge, may be attacked by the affidavit of a credible person, means persons who are not only truthful, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but who, from motives, intent, feelings, or relationship to the party, and the like, and their opportunities and means of knowledge, would be likely to testify to the truth. Dunn v. State, 7 Tex. App. 600, 605.

In discussing the meaning of the word "disinterested," the court stated that in Wakefield v. State, 41 Tex. 556, it was held that the words "credible person," as used in the provision for change of venue on the oath of two credible persons, involved more than a general character for truth, but embraced the means of knowledge, the intelligence, and the relation of such persons with the defendant. Territory v. Leary, 43 Pac. 688, 689, 8 N. M. 180.

CREDIBLE WITNESS.

The term "credible," as applied to a witness, means deserving of confidence; but, as applied to a story, it may signify worthy of belief, or probable only, or barely not incredible. Noland v. McCracken, 18 N. C. 594, 595.

A credible witness is one who, being competent to give evidence, is worthy of belief. Peck v. Chambers, 28 S. E. 706, 708, 44 W. Va. 270.

The phrase "credible witness" refers only to the integrity of the witness. Bierbach v. Goodyear Rubber Co., 11 N. W. 514, 517, 54 Wis. 208, 41 Am. Rep. 19.

The term "credible witness," as used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 746, providing that no person shall be convicted of perjury, except on the testimony of two credible witnesses, or one credible witness corroborated strongly by other evidence, means one whose character for truth is above reproach. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines a credible witness "to be one who, being competent to give evidence, is worthy of belief." Smith v. State, 2 S. W. 542, 544, 22 Tex. App. 196; Wilson v. State, 10 S. W. 749, 750, 27 Tex. App. 47, 11 Am. St. Rep. 180. And hence it cannot be construed to mean one whose credibility was impaired by proof that his general reputation for truth and veracity was bad. Kitcken v. State, 14 S. W. 392, 29 Tex. App. 45.

The statute providing that a record might be proved by a copy certified under the hand of the clerk and the seal of his office, or by a copy examined and sworn to by credible witnesses, meant witnesses giving testimony under the sanction of the witnesses' oath, and who might be cross-examined as to the existence of the record and the accuracy of the copy. Dibble v. Morris, 26 Conn. 416, 425.

The use of the word "creditable," as applied to witnesses within an act authorizing a conviction on the oath of one or more creditable witnesses, is synonymous with "credible." The use of the word to signify worthy of belief is said by lexicographers to be obsolete, but in the statute it means one whose testimony is worthy of credit, credence, belief; that is, in more modern phrase, a credible witness. State v. Kenilworth, 54 Atl. 244, 245, 69 N. J. Law, 114.

As competent.

The phrase "credible witnesses," in a statute requiring a will to be attested by credible witnesses, means competent witnesses. Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. Brown, 55 N. E. 632, 633, 183 Ill. 42, 47 L. R. A. 798; In re Noble, 15 N. E. 850, 851, 124 Ill. 266; Harp v. Parr, 48 N. E. 113, 117, 168 Ill. 459; Fisher v. Spence, 37 N. E. 314, 315, 150 Ill. 253, 41 Am. St. Rep. 360; In re Sloan's Estate, 56 N. E. 952, 953, 184 Ill. 579; Fuller v. Fuller, 83 Ky. 345, 349; Hall v. Hall, 18 Ga. 40, 44; Smalley v. Smalley, 70 Me. 545, 548, 35 Am. Rep. 353; Jones v. Larrabee, 47 Me. 474, 476; Warren v. Baxter, 48 Me. 193, 195; In re Trinitarian Congregational Church & Society of Castine, 40 Atl. 325, 326, 91 Me. 416; In re Marston, 8 Atl. 87, 94, 79 Me. 25; Hawes v. Humphrey, 26 Mass. (9 Pick.) 350, 357, 20 Am. Dec. 481; Workman v. Dominick (S. C.) 3 Strob. 589, 590; Appeal of Combs, 105 Pa. 155; Garland v. Crow's Ex'rs (S. C.) 2 Bailey, 24; Snelgrove v. Snelgrove (S. C.) 4 Desaus. 274, 279; Kennedy v. Upshaw, 1 S. W. 308, 313, 66 Tex. 442; Brown v. Pridgen, 56 Tex. 124, 126; Eustis v. Parker, 1 N. H. 273, 274; Smith v. Chamberlain, 2 N. H. 440, 441; that is, such persons as are not legally disqualified from testifying in courts of justice by reason of mental incapacity, interest, or the commission of crime, or other cause excluding them from testifying generally, or rendering them incompetent in respect to the particular subject-matter, or in the particular suit, Robinson v. Savage, 15 N. E. 850, 851, 124 Ill. 266; and is not used in a loose sense, as descriptive of persons of a good moral character and reputation—in fact, a person worthy of belief. The word “credible” denotes persons capable of obtaining credit, Haven v. Hilliard, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 10, 16; nor does it require such witnesses to be persons of veracity. Johnson v. Johnson, 58 N. E. 237, 240, 187 Ill. 86.

The question of competency relates to the time of attestation. Rucker v. Lambdin, 20 Miss. (12 Smedes & M.) 230, 250; Sears v. Dillingham, 12 Mass. 358, 361; Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 140, 92 Am. Dec. 666; Taylor v. Taylor, 1 Rich. Law, 531, 534; Hindson v. Kersey (Conn.) 1 Day, 41, 50, note, per Campden, J., dissenting; Hodgman v. Kittredge, 32 Atl. 158, 67 N. H. 254, 68 Am. St. Rep. 661; Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 8, 42 Am. Rep. 565; Gillis v. Gillis, 23 S. E. 107, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121; Frink v. Pond, 46 N. H. 125, 126; Carlton v. Carlton, 40 N. H. 14, 17. The term includes a party who takes an interest under the will. Act 1864, c. 109; Estep v. Morris, 38 Md. 417, 424.

“A credible witness to prove a will” means a witness who is competent to testify at common law, or, in other words, a person having no pecuniary interest in the estate. This, however, does not prevent a will from being proved or established by reason of the fact that one or more of the witnesses is not a credible or competent witness, by reason of interest, if such witness, before testifying, remove his incompetency by releasing his interest. Mathews v. Marchants, 20 N. C. 33, 35.

“Credible witnesses to a will,” as used in St. 1783, c. 24, § 2 (Rev. St. c. 62, § 6), requiring a will to be signed by credible witnesses, means witnesses who would not sustain any loss or inconvenience if the will should be set aside—persons having no interest either in the probate or disallowance of the will. Bacon v. Bacon, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 134.

The term “credible witnesses,” used in a statute in speaking of witnesses to wills, means competent witnesses; and the use in instructions of the words “incompetent” and “incredible,” as applied to witnesses, as being synonymous terms, is correct. In re Noble's Estate, 22 Ill. App. 535, 537.

“Credible witness,” as used in the statute of wills, means competent; and those witnesses are credible whom the law will trust to testify to a jury, who may afterwards ascertain the degree of credit they have. Amory v. Fellowes, 5 Mass. 219, 228.

The wife of a person named as executor is a credible witness to the execution of a will, if such executor takes no beneficial interest under it. Stewart v. Harriman, 56 N. H. 25, 31, 22 Am. Rep. 408.

CREDIT.

See “Bill of Credit”; “For Collection and Credit”; “Full Faith and Credit”; “Letter of Credit”; “Line of Credit”; “Mutual Credit”; “Rolling Credit.”
Of witness, see “General Credit.”

Credit is confidence or trust reposed in one's ability to pay what he may promise. Abb. Law Dict. The ability to borrow on an opinion conceived by the lender that he will be repaid. Bouv. Law Dict. Credit is the capacity of being trusted. People v. Wasservogle, 19 Pac. 270, 77 Cal. 173 (citing Dry Dock Bank v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 3 N. Y. [3 Comst.] 344, 356).

“Credit” may be defined as the ability to borrow money or obtain goods by virtue of the opinion conceived by the lender or sender that the party will repay. Donnell v. Jones, 13 Ala. 490, 513, 48 Am. Dec. 59 (cited in Seattle Crockery Co. v. Haley, 33 Pac. 650, 653, 6 Wash. 302, 36 Am. St. Rep. 156).

“The credit of an individual is the trust reposed in him by those who deal with him that he is of ability to meet his engagements, and he is trusted because, through the tribunals of the country, he may be compelled to pay. The credit of a government is founded on a belief of its ability to comply with its engagements, and a confidence in its honor—that it will do that voluntarily which it cannot be compelled to do.” Owen v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 3 Ala. 258, 267.

The word “credit,” derived from the Latin “credere,” to trust, is used in Cr. Code, § 97, providing that “whoever, by any false representations in writing, signed by him, of his own respectability, wealth or mercantile correspondence or connections, obtains credit, and thereby defrauds any person of money, goods,” etc., “shall be sentenced,” etc., in its commercial sense. It is the confidence reposed in the ability and intention of a purchaser or borrower to make payment at some future time, either specified or indefinite. When a merchant sells his wares upon an expressed or implied promise that the purchaser will pay for them at some future time, he gives credit. When the banker or broker lends money upon the promise of the borrower to repay it at some future time, he thereby gives credit. It may be given because of the reputation or representations for solvency and honesty of the purchaser or borrower, or because of tendered and approved security. It is against the obtaining of it by false representations, whereby the seller or lender is defrauded of his money or goods, that section 97 is directed. Where a loan is procured by false representations of the borrower as to his solvency, the case falls within the section. Lucas v. People, 75 Ill. App. 662, 665.

An indorsement by a mortgagee on notes secured by a mortgage of a certain sum "as the balance of credit" for certain lands conveyed to said mortgagee by third parties "implies a right of the person credited to that for which he is given credit." Lyman v. Babcock, 40 Wis. 503, 513.

Every contract for labor not paid for in advance is necessarily a contract upon credit, because the labor, when once performed, cannot be recalled. It is otherwise in case of the purchase of property to be paid for on delivery. Still, if the property consists of several parcels, as of several loads of lumber or of stone, to be delivered at different times, and paid for when all are delivered, this is a contract upon credit for all, except the last load. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 356, 364.

By "credit"—one of the sources from which the profits of a partnership may be drawn—is meant not only a reputation for responsibility as to pecuniary concerns, but also any quality or other circumstance that may acquire the good will of others and contribute to the prosperity of the partnership. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2810.

"Credit" is a term attaching to the creditor, and designates property possessed by him, in contradistinction to the word "debt," which has reference to the debtor, and a personal obligation resting upon him. North Carolina R. Co. v. Commissioners of Alamance, 91 N. C. 454, 456.

"Credit," is a term attaching to the creditor, and designates property possessed by him, in contradistinction to the correlative word "debt," which has reference to the debtor, and the personal obligation resting upon him. North Carolina R. Co. v. Commissioners of Alamance, 91 N. C. 454, 456.

Extensions of credit in guaranty included.

A guaranty was in the following words: "If you give him credit, we will be responsible that his payments will be regularly made." Held, that such guaranty was not a guaranty of credit on any particular terms, but should be construed to bind the guarantors if the principal was given, not the usual credit, but credit generally, which might properly be interpreted, "If you trust him to a fair and reasonable credit, we will be bound." The difficulty arises from the use of the word "credit," since, if, after the time for payment has elapsed, time was given to the principal, the guarantors would be discharged; and therefore the term was not here used in the sense of an extension of credit after debt due, but merely that the creditor should be paid his debt according to the terms on which they and the principal should deal. Simpson v. Manley, 2 Crompt. & J. 12.

As used in a written guaranty stipulating that a writer would be accountable to the person addressed, that a third party "will pay you for a credit on bonds," etc., "which he may require in his business," the words "a credit" are not used in a limited or restricted sense, but in an enlarged and commercial sense, as implying reputation and confidence—a basis on which a third party might trade as he desired, without payment to the extent limited, and looking to a continuous credit, including several extensions of credit. Rindge v. Judson, 24 N. Y. 64, 71.

As payment or security.

"Credited," with reference to accounts between partners, is synonymous with "paid." Thus, where one partner was credited with a sum of net profits, he was, therefore, as much paid his share of the same as if it had actually been handed to him in cash; and this though the credit was subsequently exhausted by a debit of losses. Welsh v. Canfield, 60 Md. 469, 475.

In an instrument directed to a certain company, as follows, "53 days after date credit P. & Co. or order with the sum of 500 pounds in cash, on account of this corporation," the words "credit in cash" was an order to hold to the use at the command of P. & Co. the sum named. It meant to pay the money to him. Wiles, C. J. "Credit in cash" clearly means "pay over the money." Creswell, J. "Credit in cash" is equivalent to "pay." Williams, J. Ellison v. Collingridge, 9 C. B. 570, 573.

As used in a letter relating to the terms of a purchase of brimstone, in which the purchasers stated that they opened credit in reimbursement of purchases with certain firms, "credit" is a term perfectly well understood in commercial circles, and implies security for the meeting of his obligations by the holder of the credit, and is not intended ordinarily as a substitute for those obligations. "A credit with a banker," said Chief Justice Gibson, "is not payment, but a means of payment, more or less secure, according to the solidity of the depository, and the greater or less certainty of the security cannot affect the question of its character. It is but a security still." Ainis v. Ayres, 16 N. Y. Supp. 905, 906, 62 Hun, 376.

Credit with a banker is not payment, but a means of payment, more or less secure, according to the solidity of the depository, and the greater or less certainty of the security cannot affect the question of its character; and that the consignee of goods had given the consignors a credit with the banking house, to enable them to draw on it in payment of purchases, was not a payment for such goods, so as to prevent a stoppage in transitu. Bell v. Moss (Pa.) 5 Whart. 189, 203.

As standing.

In an action for malicious prosecution, the court, having submitted the element of exemplary damages to the jury, charged that, if they found for plaintiff, the measure of actual damages would be such sum as would be compensation for the injury sustained as the proximate result of the prosecution, taking into consideration the injury, if any, to plaintiff's feelings, credit, and reputation. Held, that the word "credit," as so used, related to standing in the community in which plaintiff lived, and not to credit in a commercial sense. Curlee v. Rose, 65 S. W. 197, 198, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 259.

CREDIT COMPANY.

Credit companies, such as the Credit Foncier and the Credit Mobilier, are strictly analogous to land mortgage banks, except that they invest their funds in loans on the security of general industrial undertakings, to which business they have added the functions of negotiators of direct loans between companies formed for the conduct of such undertakings and the capitalistic public. Barrett v. Bloomfield Sav. Inst., 54 Atl. 543, 551, 64 N. J. Eq. 425 (citing Encyclopædia Britannica, p. 382).

CREDIT MAN.

A credit man is one in a commercial house whose special business it is to inquire in reference to the merits of all persons applying to purchase on credit, and who determines to whom credit shall be given, and the amount. The credit man of a house may or may not be a principal. It frequently occurs that he is a mere clerk or agent. Erber v. Dun (U. S.) 12 Fed. 526, 534.

CREDIT THE DRAWER.

The words "credit the drawer," written on the face of a note by an indorsee, do not imply an undertaking on his part, but are merely a direction to all persons to whom the note may be presented to trade with the maker as the owner, notwithstanding the apparent title of the indorsee. Temple v. Baker, 17 Atl. 516, 517, 125 Pa. 634, 3 L. R. A. 709, 11 Am. St. Rep. 926.

CREDIT MY ACCOUNT.

The words "credit my account," indorsed on a bill of exchange, are restrictive, and put an end to the negotiability of the bill. It is an appropriation of the proceeds which renders any other appropriation illegal. The credit should be given when the bill became payable. This is the ordinary course of dealing, and the court will not presume a different course. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch Bank, 15 Fed. Cas. 149, 151.

An indorsement on a bill of exchange of the words "credit my account," signed by the payee, is restrictive in its character, and suspends the further transfer and negotiability of the bill. The instrument is intended to authorize the indorsee to hold the bill until its maturity, and receive the proceeds and place them to the credit of the indorser. The words are equivalent to a direction to credit the proceeds to the account of the indorser. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch Bank, 15 Fed. Cas. 149, 151.

CREDIT OF THE BUILDING.

It was contended that where a laborer, in working on granite columns, did not know into what building they were to be placed, he could not have done the labor on the credit of the building, within the mechanic's lien law; but it was held that if these columns were not furnished by the plaintiff on the credit of the building, in the technical sense in which that term is ordinarily used, yet, as the statute creates this credit, and carries it to every laborer performing work and furnishing skill, in cases of this kind we may not inappropriately say that, in law, such labor and skill were furnished on the credit of the building, and that the creditor may safely rely on such credit in the performance of such work and furnishing such skill. Emery v. Hertig, 61 N. W. 830, 832, 60 Minn. 54.

The ordinary and almost universal definition of the word "creditor" is a person to whom a debt is owing by another person. Nicollin v. Welland, 56 N. W. 587, 588, 55 Minn. 130; Woolverton v. George H. Taylor Co., 43 Ill. App. 424, 426.

A creditor is one to whom a sum of money or other thing is due by obligation, promise, or in law. New Jersey Ins. Co. v. Meeker, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 282, 300 (citing Webster).

A creditor is a person who has a right to require the fulfillment of an obligation or contract. Walsh v. Miller, 38 N. E. 381, 387, 51 Ohio St. 462 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.),

State v. Georgia Co., 17 S. E. 10, 11, 112 N. C. 34, 19 L. R. A. 485; Foss v. Lord, 59 N. H. 529; Dunnigan v. Stevens, 13 N. E. 651, 654, 122 Ill. 396, 3 Am. St. Rep. 496; *Mohr v. A. 741; Kalkhoff v. Nelson, 62 N. W. 332, 334, 60 Minn. 284; In re Wilson's Estate, 80 Ill. App. 217, 218, 219.

Any one is a creditor who has a right by law to demand, either presently or upon some future contingency, the fulfillment of any obligation or contract. Gannard v. Eslava, 20 Ala. 732, 741.

A creditor is one who gives credit in business matters. Rea v. Jaffray & Co., 48 N. W. 78, 81, 82 Iowa, 231 (citing Cent. Dict.); Swarts v. Siegel (U. S.) 117 Fed. 13, 17, 54 C. C. A. 399.

A creditor is any one who has a debt or demand against another on contract, express or implied, for the payment of money. Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank, 48 N. W. 187, 188, 45 Minn. 341, 12 L. R. A. 741.

A creditor is any one who has a legal right to damages, capable of enforcement by judicial process. Bishop v. Redmond, 83 Ind. 157.

A creditor, in its strict, legal sense, is one who voluntarily trusts or gives credit to another for money or other property, but, in its more general or extensive sense, is one who has a right by law to demand and recover of another a sum of money on any account whatever. Keith v. Hiner, 38 S. W. 13, 14, 63 Ark. 244; Cardenas v. Miller (Cal.) 39 Pac. 783, 785, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84; De Ruiter v. De Ruiter (Ind.) 62 N. E. 100, 103; Stanly v. Ogden (Conn.) 2 Root, 259, 261; Walsh v. Miller (Ohio) 38 N. E. 381, 387; Stewart v. Walterboro & W. Ry. Co., 41 S. E. 827, 828, 64 S. C. 92; Deseret Nat. Bank v. Kidman (Utah) 71 Pac. 873, 878. Or he is a creditor who has a legal demand on another for money or other property after it has come into the hands of another without his consent, by mistake or accident, which he is entitled to have, or to compensation in damages for, on the ground of an implied promise. Stanly v. Ogden (Conn.) 2 Root, 259-261. The word is susceptible of latitudinous construction. El Paso Nat. Bank v. Fuchs, 34 S. W. 206, 207, 89 Tex. 197.

A "creditor" is one in whose favor an obligation exists, by reason of which he is or may become entitled to the payment of money. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3430; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4481; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5048; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2364; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2770; Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 25, 53 Pac. 416.

An obligee or creditor is the person in favor of whom some obligation is contracted, whether such obligation be to pay a sum of money, or to do or not to do something. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 20.

The word "creditor" includes every person having a claim or demand upon which a judgment for a sum of money, or directing the payment of money, could be recovered in an action. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 2514, subd. 3; Cook v. Woodward (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 97, 100.

Every one who owes to another the performance of an obligation is called a "debtor," and the one to whom he owes it is called the "creditor." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5113; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2447; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2786.

"Creditor," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include any one who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy, and may include his duly authorized agent, attorney, or proxy. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419; Swarts v. Seigel (U. S.) 117 Fed. 13, 17, 54 C. C. A. 399; In re Lazaris (U. S.) 120 Fed. 716, 717.

The word "creditor" does not mean, under all circumstances, a person having an obligation against another which is capable of legal enforcement. Champion v. Buckingham, 42 N. E. 498, 499, 165 Mass. 76.

Unless there be a debtor—one whose duty it is to pay, and of whom the debt can be demanded—there cannot be a creditor to enforce and compel payment. One of these parties cannot have a being without his correspondent, and it would be a most perplexing task, should we attempt to sustain an assertion that there still remained a creditor after the debt, as such, had ceased to exist. One who has released a debt due from a corporation is no longer a creditor thereof. Mohr v. Minnesota Elevator Co., 41 N. W. 1074, 1076, 40 Minn. 343.

As all creditors.

Rev. St. c. 32, § 16, declaring that the directors and officers of a corporation whose indebtedness exceeds the amount of its capital stock shall be personally liable to creditors for such excess, etc., means not one creditor of the corporation, but all, and therefore contemplates a pro rata distribution of the amount received from the imposition of such liability among all the creditors, in a proceeding in a court of equity. Woolverton v. Taylor, 23 N. E. 1007, 1009, 132 Ill. 197, 22 Am. St. Rep. 521 (citing Low v. Buchanan, 94 Ill. 76).

Acts 1857, § 9, declaring that stockholders of manufacturing corporations shall be severally and individually liable to creditors of the company, to the amount of stock held by them, for all debts, etc., meant all the creditors of the corporation, and therefore the liability in such a case was "not to some particular creditor, but should be enforced for the benefit of all the creditors." Harper v. Union Mfg. Co., 100 Ill. 225, 231.

"Creditors," as used in the bankrupt law, prohibiting a bankrupt from incumbering his property with the intent to defraud his creditors, meant all his creditors, as a body—generally—and would not relate to a mortgage given to secure a debt due to one of the creditors. In re Dunham (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 33, 35.

The term "creditors," as used in Bankr. Act 1841, § 5, providing that no creditor or other person coming in and proving his debt or other claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit therefor, etc., means every species of direct creditor of the bankrupt. Morse v. Hovey (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 187, 190.

St. 1799, c. 128, § 65, giving priority to the debts of the United States when a debtor not having sufficient property to satisfy all his debts shall have made a voluntary assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, means all his creditors.—United States v. McClellan (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1127, 1130.

The Code provides: "The words 'creditors' and 'purchasers,' where used in any previous section of this chapter [the recording act], shall not be restricted to creditors of and purchasers from the grantor, but shall extend to and embrace all creditors and purchasers who, but for the deed or writing, would have title to the property conveyed or a right to subject it to their debts." Therefore, in our recording acts, the word "creditors" means all creditors who, but for the deed or writing, would have a right to subject the land embraced therein to the payment of their debts. Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 288, 41 Am. Rep. 670.

The term "creditors," as employed in Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 3412, declaring void, as against creditors of the vendee, a conditional sale of chattels, unless evidenced by a recorded writing, applies to all creditors of the vendee, whether prior or subsequent. In re Frazer (U. S.) 117 Fed. 746, 747.

The words "creditors and purchasers," as used in the chapter dealing with acts valid between the parties, but void as to creditors and purchasers, shall not be restricted to the protection of creditors of and purchasers from the grantor, but shall extend to and embrace all creditors and purchasers who, but for the deed or writing, would have had title to the property conveyed, or a right to subject it to their debts. Code Va. 1887, § 2472.

The phrase "subsequent purchasers for value, and creditors," as used in Code, § 2465, providing that, so long as a deed remains unrecorded, it shall not affect subsequent purchasers for value and creditors, applies to all creditors, and not merely to subsequent creditors. Price v. Wall's Ex'r, 33 S. E. 599, 600, 97 Va. 334, 75 Am. St. Rep. 788.

The word "creditors," as used in Comp. Laws, § 4379, providing that a mortgage of personal property is void, as against creditors of the mortgagor, unless filed with the register of deeds of the county where the property is situated, embraces persons to whom the mortgagor was indebted at the time of the execution of the mortgage, as well as those to whom he may subsequently become indebted. Pierson v. Hickey (S. D.) 91 N. W. 339, 340.

The term "creditors," as used with reference to a chattel mortgage not followed by actual or conditional change of possession, includes all persons who were such while the chattels remained in possession of the mortgagor under an agreement for the sale of the same by him at retail, and it was not essential to their rights that they did not obtain judgment or a specific lien until after the delivery of the property to the mortgagee. Mandeville v. Avery, 124 N. Y. 376, 26 N. E. 951, 21 Am. St. Rep. 678.

The simple word "creditor," standing by itself, means creditor at large. So it is generally used and generally understood, and so it must be held to have been used in the statute (section 16) providing that, if the indebtedness of any stock corporation exceeded the amount of its capital stock, the directors and officers of such corporation assenting thereto shall be personally and individually liable for such excess to the creditors of such corporation. Woolverton v. George H. Taylor Co., 43 Ill. App. 424, 426.

The term "creditors" shall be construed to include all persons who shall be creditors of the vendor or assignor at any time whilst such goods and chattels shall remain in his possession or under his control. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2242.

As assignee of claim.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2717, providing that the creditor of an estate may petition the surrogate's court for the payment of his debt, should be construed to include the assignee of a claim against an estate, for the language of the section does not limit it to original creditors, but to any person who at the time of filing his petition is a creditor of such estate. In re Moderno, 17 N. Y. Supp. 781, 63 Hun, 261.

Assignee of judgment.

An assignee of a judgment is a creditor, within the statute making it lawful for any creditor to redeem from a sale on execution. He is a creditor having a lien, within the terms of the act, and comes within its spirit and object, which are to make the land pay as many judgments as possible. Van Rensselaer v. Sheriff of Onondaga County (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 443, 457.

As attachment, judgment, or lien creditors.

In order that a person having a claim against a judgment debtor may maintain a suit in equity to open or set aside the judgment, he must be a creditor of such judgment debtor, entitled to standing in a court of equity; and, in order to be such, he must be a judgment creditor, or be one whose claim is judicially established, and must have tried all other legal means of obtaining satisfaction of the judgment, and failed, before he can ask the court to aid him in a proceeding to set aside a judgment between other parties. Thus a plaintiff in attachment is not a creditor, as the term is so used, since he may or may not turn out to be so, according to the exigencies of his attachment suit. Melville v. Brown, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 363, 365.

Code 1876, § 2200, declaring that a latent equity affecting real property, good as against the trustee, shall be unavailing as against the title of creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, meant judgment creditors having a lien; and therefore, if a suit is pending to enforce a trust in lands when the lien of a creditor attaches, he is chargeable with constructive notice of it, and cannot claim the protection of the statute. Walker v. Elledge, 65 Ala. 51, 57.

As used in a statute declaring that no trust, whether implied by law or created by the parties, can defeat the rights of creditors or purchasers for value without notice, the word "creditors" means creditors having a lien. Carter v. Challen, 3 South. 313, 314, 83 Ala. 135.

A provision in a policy of insurance against fire that a loss under it shall not be payable until the assured produces the certificate of loss of a magistrate "not concerned in the loss as a creditor," means a magistrate not concerned in the loss by reason of having an interest in the property insured or in the policy as security for an obligation to him, and does not disqualify a magistrate who was a general creditor of the insured. Dolliver v. St. Joseph Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 39, 45.

The term "creditor," as used in Rev. St. 1853, c. 463, § 35, authorizing any creditor to maintain an action to procure the removal of a trustee of a corporation for an abuse of trust, means a judgment creditor, and does not include the owner of a paid-up policy issued on his life by a life insurance company. Belknap v. North American Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 282, 285.

Rev. St. c. 98, §§ 2, 3, and St. 1844, c. 154, § 10, requiring notice to be given to the creditor before any person committed on execution shall be discharged on taking the debtor's oath, means the judgment creditor. Folansbee v. Bird, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 289, 290.

As used in Act. 1858 (Laws 1858, c. 314), authorizing an assignee or other trustee of an insolvent, for the benefit of creditors, to disaffirm and set aside fraudulent conveyances by the debtor, the term "creditor" is not limited to judgment creditors, but includes, as well, simple-contract creditors. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424, 426.

The word "creditors," in the insolvent law (Pub. St. c. 201, § 26), providing that all pledges, payments, mortgages, sales, and transfers, whenever made, if fraudulent as to creditors, shall be void, cannot be construed in its general and popular sense, and means lien creditors having a right to attack and set aside such conveyances. Thompson v. Esty, 45 Atl. 566, 572, 69 N. H. 55.

It is not necessary that a person holding a claim against another, in order to be a creditor, as the term is used with reference to fraudulent conveyances void as to creditors, should have recovered a judgment, and issued an execution thereon, at the time of the transfer; but if at the time the claimant had recovered a judgment, which was then or afterwards appealed, and judgment was afterwards again rendered on the prior proceedings had in the appellate court, the holder of the judgment became a creditor, so as to entitle him to take advantage of the prior fraudulent transfer. Boles v. Henney, 32 Ill. 130, 131.

2 Rev. St. p. 116, § 18, declares that an order may be obtained by any creditor of a deceased person, whether at large or with a judgment, and whether judgment were by default or after trial on the merits, at any time after six months from the granting of letters testamentary, and not before. Held, that the word "creditor," as used in such statute, includes not only a judgment creditor having obtained his judgment by default, but also one who has no judgment, and any other person having a valid claim against the estate of a deceased person, which he could have enforced against him by action during his life. Mills v. Thursby (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 385, 392.

The term "creditors," as used in Comp. St. 1901, c. 32, § 14, making an unrecorded chattel mortgage void as to such creditors when the mortgagor retains possession of the property, applies only to such as by legal process have fastened a lien or charge upon the property for the satisfaction of their debts, and not to general creditors. Folsom v. Peru Plow & Implement Co. (Neb.) 95 N. W. 635, 636.

Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, § 67, subd. "a," 30 Stat. 564, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449], provides that claims which would not have been valid liens as against the claims of the creditors of the bankrupt shall not be liens against his estate; and subdivision "b," that whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created by his debtor, who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, the trustee of the bankrupt's estate shall be subrogated to the rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate. Section 70 provides that the trustee of a bankrupt shall be vested with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, except as to exempt property, property transferred in fraud of creditors, and property which prior to the filing of the petition the debtor could have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process. Held, that the word "creditors" referred only to those who had secured some specific claim or lien on the property involved in bankruptcy. Skilton v. Codington, 83 N. Y. Supp. 351, 355, 86 App. Div. 166.

As used in Rev. St. c. 65, § 24, providing that no creditor shall be allowed to enforce the lien created by the statute to the prejudice of any other creditor or incumbrancer, unless, etc., means a person who has a lien by contract made under the law. Shaeffer v. Weed, 8 Ill. (3 Gilman) 511, 514.

"Creditor," in connection with the rule of law that an oral chattel mortgage is good as between the parties and others having notice thereof, and invalid only as to creditors, means judgment, execution, or attachment creditors, and does not apply to a subsequent mortgagee with notice. Reiss v. Argubright (Neb.) 92 N. W. 988, 989.

The word "creditor," as used in connection with the provision of a statute that, where there has been no change of possession, a sale is void as to the creditors of the vendor, means one who has seized the property by judicial process. Dexter v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (Neb.) 94 N. W. 530, 531.

Same—in recording acts.

As used in a recording act, requiring a recordation of title papers, and declaring that they should be deemed notice to all subsequent purchasers and creditors, and take effect from and after the time of filing for record, and not before, as to all creditors, the term "creditor" meant one who, without actual or constructive notice of a prior conveyance or incumbrance, institutes such proceedings or takes such steps as effect a lien on the land before the recording of such conveyance or incumbrance, whether the debt be prior or subsequent to them, and whether the vendor at the time of conveying or incumbering had other property sufficient to pay the debt, or not. Martin v. Dryden, 6 Ill. (1 Gilman) 187, 217. This definition has been followed in many subsequent cases. In Massey v. Westcott, 40 Ill. 160, it is said: "Under the statutes, a purchaser and a judgment creditor having a lien stand upon the same equity." McFadden v. Worthington, 45 Ill. 362. The holders of judgments on claims against an estate are not creditors within such act (Conveyance Act, p. 944, § 30), since such creditors must be judgment creditors having a lien, and such judgments are not liens on land left by the intestate; and grantees of the intestate take the land free from such judgments, though their deeds were recorded after the judgments were entered. Noe v. Montray, 48 N. E. 709, 711, 170 Ill. 169.

Code Iowa, 1873, § 1922, providing that no sale or contract wherein the transfer of title to personal property is made to depend on any condition shall be valid against any creditor, unless, etc., means any creditor who has by suit perfected a right to impeach the transaction. Myer v. Car Co., 102 U. S. 1, 12, 26 L. Ed. 59.

The term "creditors," as used in the statute declaring unrecorded conveyances void as to all purchasers without notice and creditors, etc., refers to judgment creditors, or creditors having a lien; and such deed is not void as to general creditors, unless, perhaps, to those who have been induced to deal and give credit because of the apparent ownership. Pickett v. Banks, 19 Miss. (11 Smedes & M.) 445, 451; Loughridge v. Bowland, 52 Miss. 546, 547.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. 1895, §§ 3327, 3328, providing that chattel mortgages and deeds of trust, not accompanied by immediate delivery and change of possession, shall be void as to creditors unless recorded, includes all persons whose claims are upon certain conditions charged by law as specific liens upon certain property, such as holders of attachment, execution, judgment, landlords' and mechanics' liens, and excludes all others. Bowen v. Lansing Wagon Works, 43 S. W. 872, 875, 91 Tex. 385; Oak Cliff College for Young Ladies v. Armstrong (Tex.) 50 S. W. 610, 613; Berkey & Gay Furniture Co. v. Sherman Hotel Co., 16 S. W. 807, 810, 81 Tex. 135.

Comp. St. Neb. 1899, § 3188, provides that every mortgage of chattels not accompanied by actual delivery of the property mortgaged shall be filed in the office of the county clerk, or shall be absolutely void as to creditors. The term "creditor," as thus used, means a judgment or attachment creditor, or a creditor who is using the courts of law and their processes for the collection of his debts. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Anthony, 39 Neb. 343, 57 N. W. 1029, 1031. Under such definition, the creditors of the bankrupt who have instituted proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy are creditors. In re Pekin Plow Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 308, 309, 50 C. C. A. 257.

Chattel Mortgage Act, § 4, declaring unrecorded mortgages to be invalid as against creditors and purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, means judgment creditors. Milton v. Boyd, 22 Atl. 1078, 1082, 49 N. J. Eq. 142.

The term "creditor," as used in a statute providing priority of creditors over an unrecorded mortgage without notice, means a creditor who has recovered a judgment and sued out execution before notice of such unrecorded mortgage; and, unless such creditor is placed in that attitude before notice of the mortgage, he cannot claim priority over the same. Underwood v. Ogden, 45 Ky. (6 B. Mon.) 606.

The word "creditors," as used in an act requiring chattel mortgages to be filed, applies to simple-contract creditors, and is used in its most comprehensive sense, and does not require that the creditor shall be a judgment creditor, Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Baker, 46 N. Y. Supp. 266, 268, 20 Misc. Rep. 387; Karst v. Gane, 136 N. Y. 316, 323, 82 N. E. 1073; although such simple-contract creditors cannot assert their rights until they have obtained judgment, and, as to the personal property, had execution thereon, Thompson v. Van Vechten (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 458, 468.

The term "creditor," as used in Laws 1833, c. 279, § 1, providing that the failure to file a mortgage shall only render it void as against the creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, means "a creditor armed with legal process which authorizes him to seize the property—such as an execution issued upon a judgment, or an attachment." It does not include a simple creditor. Button v. Rathbone, Sard & Co., 27 N. E. 266, 126 N. Y. 187; Bullard v. Kenyon, 21 N. Y. Supp. 32, 66 Hun, 628.

The term "creditors," as used in a statute making chattel mortgages, unaccompanied by an affidavit of good faith, absolutely void, as against creditors of the mortgagor, includes all classes of creditors, and not merely secured creditors; and, where a person was an unsecured creditor, the mere fact that he, after the date of filing the mortgage, filed a lien on the property, does not affect his situation as a creditor; the term "creditor" having reference to the inception of the obligation of the creditor, rather than to the conditions which might afterwards arise. Blumauer v. Clock, 64 Pac. 844, 845, 24 Wash. 596, 85 Am. St. Rep. 966.

Claimant ex contractu.

The word "creditor," as used in Revision, p. 189, § 72, relating to insolvent corporations, and providing that, after the receiver has disposed of the assets, the creditors are to be paid proportionately to the amount of their debts, except mortgage and judgment creditors, is not used in a restrictive or technical sense, but will include all justly entitled to damages for breaches of contracts occasioned by insolvency and suspension. Spader v. Mural Decoration Mfg. Co., 20 Atl. 378, 47 N. J. Eq. 18.

A creditor is one who credits, believes, or trusts another; one who gives credit in business matters; hence one to whom money is due. Webst. But a person whose claim against another is for damages for breach of contract is not a creditor, within the provisions of a deed of trust conveying property for the payment of liabilities, and providing for notice to be given to the creditors of the enforcement of the deed. Witz v. Mullin's Personal Representative, 20 S. E. 783, 784, 90 Va. 805.

Rev. St. tit. 1, § 229, providing that any creditor may avail himself of process of foreign attachment against his debtor, includes a person having a claim against another for unliquidated damages growing out of contract, as well as persons having liquidated claims. New Haven Sawmill Co. v. Fowler, 28 Conn. 103, 108.

1 Gen. St. p. 920, § 72, provides that the assets of an insolvent corporation shall be collected and sold, and that the proceeds of the sale shall be divided among the creditors of the corporation. Held, that the term "creditor" is not used in any narrow, restricted, or technical sense, but includes claims sounding in unliquidated damages. Rosenbaum v. United States Credit System Co., 40 Atl. 591, 593, 61 N. J. Law, 543.

Claimant ex delicto.

A creditor, as usually defined and understood, is one to whom money is due. Strictly speaking, a person whose suit is founded upon a claim not arising from a contract is not a creditor until his action is merged into a judgment. Winans v. Beldler, 52 Pac. 405, 406, 6 Okl. 603.

The term "creditor," as used in the statute of frauds, providing against fraudulent conveyances of a debtor's property with intent to defraud creditors, was not used in a strict, technical sense, but includes all parties who have demands, accounts, interests, or causes of action for which they might recover any debt, damages, penalty, or forfeiture, and includes claims arising ex delicto as well as ex contractu. Bongard v. Block, 81 Ill. 186, 25 Am. Rep. 276; Walradt v. Brown, 6 Ill. (1 Gilman) 397, 399, 41 Am. Dec. 190; McKenna v. Crowley, 17 Atl. 354, 355, 16 R. I. 364.

Within the provision of the statute making transfers of property without consideration, and with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, void, one having a claim for tort is a creditor before the commencement of the action thereon, as well as after, and hence a person who has a cause of action for slander is a creditor. Chalmers v. Sheehy, 64 Pac. 709, 712, 132 Cal. 459, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62.

Rev. Codes, § 5052, provides that every transfer of property, etc., made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demand, is void as against all creditors of the debtor. Section 5048 provides that a creditor, within the meaning of this chapter, is one in whose favor an obligation exists, by reason of which he is or may become entitled to the payment of moneys. Under such definition, the term "creditors," in section 5052, will include a person who is entitled to recover from another damages for criminal conversation with his wife. In *Pierstoff v. Jorge*s, 86 Wis. 128, 56 N. W. 735, 39 Am. St. Rep. 881, the term "creditors," employed in such a statute, was held not to be used in its technical sense, but to be construed liberally, as including all parties who have demands, accounts, interests, or causes of action for which they might recover any debt, demand, penalty, or forfeiture. Soly v. Aasen, 86 N. W. 108, 109, 10 N. D. 108.

The term "creditor," as used in a statute relating to proceedings by a creditor against the trustees of concealed or absconding debtors, cannot be construed to include a person claiming damages for a conversion of his property. Hutchinson v. Lamb (Vt.) Brayt. 234, 235.

A railroad corporation, after acquiring all the stock of another railroad corporation, accepted a transfer of all the latter's property, "subject to its bonded indebtedness and all other indebtedness, without affecting the rights of creditors therein." Held, that the word "creditors" should be construed as including all persons holding claims against the grantors, whether such claims arise ex contractu or ex delicto. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Biddell, 66 S. W. 34, 35, 112 Ky. 494.

A claim for damages makes the claimant a creditor, within the meaning of an act authorizing the consolidation of railroads, but preserving unimpaired all rights of creditors. Stewart v. Walterboro & W. Ry. Co., 41 S. E. 827, 828, 64 S. C. 92. As used in Rev. St. art. 152, speaking of persons suing out attachments as creditors, the term does not include one holding a claim sounding in tort. El Paso Nat. Bank v. Fuchs, 34 S. W. 206, 207, 89 Tex. 197.

3 Rev. St. (8th Ed.) p. 1724, §§ 9, 10, providing that, on the dissolution of a corporation, the directors shall be trustees for the creditors and stockholders, cannot be construed to include a person having a claim against a corporation for damages resulting from personal injuries. Grafton v. Union Ferry Co., 19 N. Y. Supp. 966, 967, 22 Civ. Proc. R. 402. See, also, Marsteller v. Mills, 38 N. E. 370, 371, 143 N. Y. 398.

Within the statute making a transfer of property by a corporation in contemplation of insolvency void as to its creditors, the word "creditors" includes all those to whom the corporation was under an enforceable obligation, as well as those to whom it was indebted; and, within such definition, a person who is entitled to recover for a tort or for a personal injury is a creditor. Munson v. Genesee Iron & Brass Works, 56 N. Y. Supp. 139, 147, 37 App. Div. 203.

In Slater v. Sherman, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 206, it was held that one who had a claim against another growing out of an assault had the right to have a fraudulent conveyance set aside, though made before judgment in his favor. The doctrine in that case settles the question that one having an unliquidated claim for assault is a creditor of one being charged with intent to defraud. Anglin v. Conley (Ky.) 71 S. W. 926, 927.

A creditor, under the bankruptcy act, is one who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy. An unliquidated claim is not provable in bankruptcy, so that a claim arising out of a tort does not make the party a creditor. Beers v. Hanlin (U. S.) 99 Fed. 695.

A disputed claim for damages, sounding in tort, is not a debt before it has been prosecuted to judgment, and does not constitute the claimant a creditor, or vest him with the right given by law to creditors to question voluntary transfers of their debtor's property. Hill v. Bowman, 35 Mich. 191, 192.

Corporations Act, § 75 (P. L. 1896, p. 301), provides that the court may limit the time within which creditors of an insolvent corporation shall make proof of their claims, "and may bar all creditors and claimants failing to do so within the time limited," etc. Section 76 requires that every claim shall be presented in writing and on oath, and the claimant, if required, shall submit to such examination in relation to the claim as the receiver shall direct. Section 77 (page 302) provides that any creditor or claimant may demand a jury to decide on his claim. Held, in view of these provisions, that a claimant for a tort committed before the declaration of insolvency, but not reduced to judgment until after, could come in and share on an equality as a creditor, pursuant to section 86, providing for the distribution of the assets among the creditors. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Stevens & Condit Transp. Co., 63 N. J. Eq. 107, 110, 51 Atl. 446.

Claimant of specific property.

The term "creditor," in the provision of the probate law requiring creditors of an estate to present their claims, does not include the claimant of specific property. Gunter v. Janes, 9 Cal. 643, 658.

The insolvency law (Gen. Laws 1881, c. 148), relating to transfers of property by an insolvent to a creditor creating a preference, should be construed to include the holder of a wheat ticket or receipt issued by a warehouseman who has become insolvent, and does not mean a creditor in a strictly technical sense, having and holding an immediately provable claim or a pre-existing debt against the insolvent—according to the word “debt,” as used in this connection, its most limited and narrow construction—or that he must be a person resting under a liability in behalf of the insolvent. Bouvier defines a creditor as one who has a right to require the fulfillment of an obligation or contract, and in this sense it means more than a person to whom money may be owing. Burrill states that the word “debt” is of large import, and that, properly speaking, it includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise. The word “creditor” is used in its broad sense in the insolvency act. Daniels v. Palmer, 42 N. W. 855, 856, 41 Minn. 116.

Commissioner to collect purchase money.

A person appointed by a court of equity in a pending cause to receive and collect purchase money of land sold by him, as commissioner, under a previous decree in the cause, and for which he had taken a bond with surety to himself as commissioner, is not a creditor, in the sense of the statute, to whom a surety on the bond may give the notice to bring suit upon it. Davis' Adm'r v. Snead (Va.) 33 Grat. 705, 709, 710.

Contingent liability as affecting.

A creditor is one to whom a debt is owing by another person, called the “debtor.” In its strictest sense, a creditor is one to whom money is due. In a more extensive sense of the term, a creditor is one who has a right to recover money of another on any account whatever. Thus, where a city, in granting a franchise to a railroad company to use its streets, received in payment certain shares of the company, with a provision that, in case the company should become indebted, the city should have a lien on the company's franchise and property, the city was not a creditor of the railroad company. Guaranty Trust Co. v. City of Galveston (U. S.) 107 Fed. 311, 317, 46 C. C. A. 305.

8 Rev. St. (6th Ed.) p. 143, § 9, providing that every mortgage of goods and chattels, unaccompanied by an immediate delivery, shall be absolutely void against the creditors of the mortgagor, unless the mortgage, or a true copy thereof, shall be filed as directed, cannot be construed to include an indorsee of commercial paper indorsed by the mortgagor, where the liability of the indorser has not become fixed, for, until the maker of the paper is in default, no obligation is created by it against the indorser; and it is only from the time when the paper shall become dishonored, and the liability of the indorser fixed in this manner, that the indorsee can be held to be a creditor of the indorser. Karst v. Gane, 16 N. Y. Supp. 385, 386, 61 Hun, 533.

The holder of a note is a creditor of the indorser, within 2 Rev. St. p. 137, § 1, providing that every conveyance made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors shall be void, though the note is not due. The mere fact that the liability was contingent at the time of the conveyance does not make any difference. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Fonda, 41 N. Y. Supp. 112, 114, 18 Misc. Rep. 114.

The term “creditor,” as used in a statute against fraudulent conveyances, authorizing any creditor of the grantor to maintain a suit to set the same aside, means one having a contingent liability, as well as one whose claim is certain and absolute. The rights of a surety or other contingent promisor are regarded for many purposes as commensurate in point of time with the date of the suretyship, and not with the date when the surety actually paid the security debt for the principal. Keel v. Larkin, 72 Ala. 493, 500; Loughridge v. Bowland, 52 Miss. 546, 547.

Rev. St. c. 3, § 67, providing that any creditor whose debt or claim against a decedent's estate is not due may present the same for allowance and settlement, should be construed to include the indorsee of a note indorsed by the decedent, who has waived presentment for payment, protest, and notice of protest and nonpayment, though the note is not due. Dunnigan v. Stevens, 13 N. E. 651, 654, 122 Ill. 396, 3 Am. St. Rep. 496.

In Cutler v. Steele, 85 Mich. 627, 48 N. W. 631, the court said that the term “creditors,” as used in statute making chattel mortgages void, as against creditors of the mortgagor, unless filed in the office of the township clerk, includes those who have entered into contracts with parties as indorsers, guarantors, or sureties. Under such definition, one who takes from the executors of an estate, as part of his patrimony, a note made by a third person to the testator, becomes on that date a creditor of the maker, within the meaning of such statute. Cutler v. Huston, 15 Sup. Ct. 863, 870, 158 U. S. 423, 39 L. Ed. 1040.

Until it has been decided by the probate court that the living apart of the wife from her husband is justified, she is not a creditor, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 151, § 2, cl. 11, or Id. § 3, providing for creditors' bills. Willard v. Briggs, 36 N. E. 687, 688, 161 Mass. 58.

The charter of a corporation provided that each stockholder should be liable for dues from the corporation, over and above stock by him owned, to a further sum at least equal in amount to such stock. Rev. St. § 3258, provides that the stockholders of a corporation shall be deemed liable to the creditors of the corporation, to secure the payment of the debts and liabilities of such corporation, in addition to their stock, in an amount equal to such stock. Held, that the use of the word “creditor” in the statutes does not have the effect to limit or narrow the liabilities of stockholders who had sold their stock to insolvents, on sums owed by the corporation, the liabilities for which had accrued prior to the sale, but which were not due until after the sale. Herrick v. Wardwell, 50 N. E. 903, 906, 58 Ohio St. 294.

Wag. St. p. 89, § 40, authorizing the executor or administrator of any estate to assign any note or bond of the estate to any creditor in discharge of the amount of his claim, equal to the amount of such note or bond, means a person having a direct legal claim against the estate, and not a person to whom the estate is liable in a collateral manner only, as, where a person is jointly liable with the estate on a note, he is not a creditor of the estate until he has become such by paying off the note. Chandler v. Stevenson, 68 Mo. 450, 452.

"Creditors," as used in a statute invalidating voluntary conveyances as against creditors of the transferor, has always been construed literally, and includes every person who has a right, claim, or demand founded on contract, whether contingent or absolute, for the performance of a duty, or the payment of damages in case of nonperformance, though no breach may occur until after the execution of the conveyance. Anderson v. Anderson, 64 Ala. 403, 405.

Where a negotiable note not yet due is indorsed by the payee and held by an indorsee, the indorsee, and not the indorser, is the creditor of the maker, in the sense in which that term is used in the statute with regard to the estates of deceased persons. Meriden Steam Mill Lumber Co. v. Guy, 40 Conn. 163, 168.

A creditor of an infant in Illinois, whose debt the infant is entitled to repudiate at majority, cannot have the infant adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, since he is not a creditor in the sense of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]. In re Eldemiller, 105 Fed. 595, 5 Am. Bankr. R. 570.

Covenantee in deed.

The covenantee in a deed for land, containing a general covenant of warranty, is a creditor of the covenantor from the making of the deed, within the meaning of the statute of frauds (Clay's Dig. p. 254, § 2), in all cases where there is a paramount outstanding title by which he may be, or actually is, afterwards evicted. The debt created by such a deed from the warrantor to the warrantee differs in no essential particular from the debt created by a bond with condition. In both cases it is "debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro," upon a contingency. The deed is in substance but a bond for the purchase money, with a condition that the penalty of the bond shall be paid if the grantee be evicted, or that the grantor shall refund to the grantee whatever sum it may become necessary for him to pay out in the purchase of a paramount outstanding title to save himself from such eviction. Gannard v. Eslava, 20 Ala. 732, 741.

Creditor antecedent to conveyance.

3 Rev. St. (6th Ed.) p. 143, § 9, providing that every mortgage of goods and chattels, unaccompanied by an immediate delivery, and not followed by an actual and continued change of possession, shall be void as against the "creditors of the mortgagor," unless the mortgage, or a true copy thereof, shall be filed as required by law, cannot be construed as designed only for the protection of persons who became creditors of the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage, and prior to the time when they were filed, but includes creditors generally; including all persons sustaining that relation during the time the mortgage is withheld from the files, whether their debts were created before the execution of the mortgage or afterwards. Karst v. Gane, 16 N. Y. Supp. 385, 386, 61 Hun, 533; Karst v. Gane, 32 N. E. 1073, 136 N. Y. 316; Cardenas v. Miller, 39 Pac. 783, 785, 108 Cal. 250, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84. See, also, under Illinois recording act, Martin v. Dryden, 6 Ill. (1 Gilman) 187, 217; Massey v. Westcott, 40 Ill. 160, 163; McFadden v. Worthington, 45 Ill. 362, 365.

The term "creditor," as used in a statute providing that mortgages of personal property, given with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, shall be void, includes any person whose debt accrued either before or after the chattel mortgage was given, or before it was filed. Stephens v. Perrine, 24 N. Y. Supp. 21, 22, 69 Hun, 578 (citing Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N. Y. 568; Vreeland v. Pratt, 17 N. Y. Supp. 307, 63 Hun, 626).

The term "creditors," as used in Laws 1890-91, c. 7, §§ 5, 11, making a chattel mortgage void, as against creditors, unless, within 60 days after maturity, affidavit of interest be filed as therein provided, includes antecedent creditors. First Nat. Bank v. Ludvigsen, 56 Pac. 994, 995, 8 Wyo. 230, 80 Am. St. Rep. 928.

Under a statute requiring contracts for the sale of property to a railroad to be registered, in order to be valid against subsequent purchasers for value without notice or creditors, one is not a creditor who at the time of his levy, or before the sale under execution, receives notice that the property is subject to an unrecorded lien or mortgage. A previously existing mortgagee of the property of the railroad is not a creditor, within such statute. Evans v. Kister (U. S.) 92 Fed. 828, 834, 35 O. C. A. 28.

As creditor at appointment of receiver.

By the expression "creditors of the bank," as used in discussion of the rules of equity which should control the settlement of the affairs of an insolvent bank, is meant those to whom the bank was indebted at the date of the appointment of the receiver, whether the debts were then due or not. A creditor may thereafter assign his claim, but the assignee holds it subject to the receiver's right to set off against it claims he holds against the creditor. Davis v. Industrial Mfg. Co., 19 S. E. 371, 372, 114 N. C. 321, 23 L. R. A. 322.

As creditor at time of decedent's death.

Within the provisions of Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6141, declaring that if the persons entitled to letters of administration shall neglect for a certain time to petition therefor, or if one of the heirs or one or more of the principal creditors waive their right to administer, or if there be no principal creditors, the court may appoint any competent person to administer such estate, the term "creditors" relates only to such as were creditors of the deceased at the time of his death, and a creditor whose claim is for decedent's funeral expenses has no right to administer. In re Sullivan's Estate, 65 Pac. 793, 795, 25 Wash. 430.

Within Code, § 2643, declaring that no person shall be entitled to administration on the estate of a deceased person unless he is a creditor of the decedent, or a person interested in the estate, the term "creditor" means a person having a claim contracted by the decedent in his lifetime; and hence a person who contracted with the executors of the deceased person was not a creditor, within the meaning of such term. Fowler v. Walter (N. Y.) 1 Den. Sur. 240.

A trustee of a company of which decedent was a shareholder was authorized to collect an assessment due said company, and had obtained judgment against the decedent's estate. It was held that the trustee was not a creditor of decedent, within the provision that, if there be no relatives, administration should be granted to the largest creditor applying for the same. Glenn v. Reid, 24 Atl. 155, 74 Md. 238.

A creditor, within the meaning of the statute (Rev. St. § 48, c. 3) providing for the administration of estates, is one to whom a sum is due from, and to be paid out of, an estate, after allowing all just credits. Where the petition showed that, at the time of his death, decedent was indebted to the petitioner in a sum more than $200 less than the sum in which the petitioner was at the time indebted to the deceased, the petitioner was not a creditor, within the statute. In re Wilson's Estate, 80 Ill. App. 217-219.

As creditor of fraudulent grantor.

Under a statute making unrecorded deeds void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers, it is held that the phrase means subsequent purchasers from the grantor only, and does not include creditors of the grantee and subsequent purchasers from him. Pierce v. Turner, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 154, 165, 3 L. Ed. 64.

Although the word "creditor" is used in Rev. St. § 2507, providing that "in cases where personal property shall be sold, to be paid for, in whole or in part, in installments," etc., "on condition that the same shall belong to the person purchasing," etc., "whenever the amount paid shall be a certain sum, the title to the same shall remain in the vendor's hands until the value of such property shall be paid, such condition in regard to the title so remaining until such payment shall be void as to all subsequent purchasers in good faith, and creditors, unless such condition shall be evidenced by writing," etc., "as provided in case of mortgages of personal property," is used in the statutes without qualification, and the word "purchasers" is qualified by the word "subsequent," yet we are clear, in view of the manifest purpose of the statute, that the word "creditors" should be construed to mean subsequent creditors. This construction comports with the general policy of all acts which require the recording of instruments conveying personal property. That policy is that a purchaser should not be allowed, by the possession of personal property which does not belong to him, or upon which another has a secret lien, to acquire a false credit, either by giving him credit, or by becoming a purchaser of the property. But the statute was never intended to enable a prior creditor to get title to the property of a stranger on no better ground than the fact that the stranger had been incautious enough to intrust the possession and use of the property to his debtor. Defiance Mach. Works v. Trisler, 21 Mo. App. 69, 71.

Creditor of partnership.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2514, subd. 3, defining a "creditor of an estate" as a person having a claim or demand on which a judgment for a sum of money could be recovered in an action, it was held that one who sold goods to a firm composed of a surviving creditor and an executor of the deceased partner, under whose will the executor could devote to the firm's business only so much of the estate as was invested in the firm at decedent's death, was not a creditor, within the provision of Code, § 2635, providing for the revocation of letters testamentary on the petition of a creditor of the estate. In re Sten's Estate, 9 N. Y. Supp. 445, 446, 2 Con. Sur. 204.

As creditor while possession is in debtor.

The term "creditors," as used in defining sales fraudulent as to creditors, shall be construed to include all persons who shall be creditors of the vendor or assignor at any time whilst such goods and chattels shall remain in his possession or control. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2028; Horner's Ann. St. Ind. 1901, § 4912; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 9521; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4220; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 2704; Roberts v. Hawn, 20 Colo. 77, 79, 36 Pac. 886; Densmore v. Tomer, 14 Neb. 392, 15 N. W. 734; Snyder v. Dangler, 63 N. W. 20, 21, 44 Neb. 600.

The statute of frauds declares that every sale made by a vendor of goods in his possession or under his control, and every assignment of goods by way of mortgage or security, unless the same be accompanied by the immediate delivery, and be followed by an actual and continued change of possession, shall be presumed fraudulent as against creditors of the vendor or mortgagor of the beneficiary, unless it be made to appear on the part of the person claiming under such sale or assignment that the same was made in good faith. Held, that the term "creditors" does not include all persons to whom the mortgagor or vendor may be indebted at any time, but means those who are his creditors while the sold or mortgaged property is in his possession or under his control. Turner v. Killian, 12 N. W. 101, 103, 12 Neb. 580; Murch v. Swenson, 42 N. W. 290, 291, 40 Minn. 421; Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424, 426; Allen v. Steiger, 31 Pac. 226, 227, 17 Colo. 552.

As creditor with claim allowed against estate.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589, 1590, which direct the administrator, on the application of creditors of the decedent, to sue for the purpose of setting aside fraudulent conveyances made by decedent in his lifetime, only creditors whose claims have been allowed by the administrator, or who have established them by judgment, can compel the administrator to bring the action. Ohm v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 26 Pac. 244, 245, 85 Cal. 545, 20 Am. St. Rep. 245.

The term "creditor," as used in a statute authorizing the surrogate, on the application of any creditor of an estate, to decree the payment of the debt, or a portion thereof, after six months from the time of granting letters, etc., "means a person having claims that are recognized and admitted, or such as have been ascertained and established by the judgment of a competent court, and not those that have been disputed or rejected." Wilson v. Baptist Education Soc., 10 Barb. 308, 319.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 55, § 5, giving creditors a right of action upon the executor's bond, means those who have been found or determined to be such by an allowance of their claims by the person or tribunal provided by statute for the examination and allowance of claims against the estates of decedents. First Nat. Bank of St. Paul v. How, 9 N. W. 626, 627, 28 Minn. 150.

Within the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1589, authorizing the administrator to sue to set aside a deed of his intestate, as void against creditors, a creditor is one whose claim has been allowed by the administrator, or is evidenced by a judgment. Ohm v. Superior Court, 26 Pac. 244, 85 Cal. 545 (followed in Field v. Andrada, 39 Pac. 323, 324, 106 Cal. 107).

As creditor with claim filed or proved in bankruptcy.

Within Act March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 517) § 9, providing that in cases of voluntary bankruptcy no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to 30 per cent. of the claims proved against his estate on which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of at least one-fourth of his creditors in number, and one-third in value, the term "creditors" means creditors to whom he is liable as principal debtor, and who have proved their debts against his estate. In re Derby (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 517, 518.

By Bankr. Law 1898, c. 541, § 4, 30 Stat. 547 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423], notice to all creditors who have proved their debts, and other persons in interest, to appear and show cause why a discharge of the bankrupt and certificate shall not be granted is required. In re King (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 507, it was held that the term "other persons in interest," used in this section, is employed to designate those who could not prove debts as creditors, and does not embrace, but excludes, creditors. That these words may embrace those who are not properly creditors, but have an interest in the matter, may be admitted, but that they exclude creditors who have not proved their debts is a gratuitous assumption, not warranted by law. Such persons, if not strictly creditors of the bankrupt, are at least equitable creditors, and have an interest in the property to be administered in bankruptcy. In re Book (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 867, 868.

Gen. Laws 1889, c. 30, § 6, provides that, on the petition of a majority in number and amount of the creditors of an insolvent, it shall be the duty of the court to remove an assignee or receiver appointed under the statute, and appoint another. Held, that "creditor" means any person to whom an insolvent is actually indebted, and a creditor need not file his claim with the assignee or receiver in order to take part in proceedings to remove such assignee or receiver. Nicollin v. Welland, 56 N. W. 587, 588, 55 Minn. 130.

The term "creditor," as used in the insolvent act (Gen. St. 1878, c. 41), providing that no creditor of an insolvent debtor shall receive any benefit under the provisions of the act unless he shall have filed with the clerk of the court, in consideration of the benefits of the provisions of the act, a release to the debtor of all claims other than such as may be paid under the provisions of the act for the benefit of such debtor, means a person who was a creditor at the time of the filing and allowance of the claim, and in whose behalf it was filed and allowed. Adamson v. Cheney, 29 N. W. 71, 35 Minn. 474.

The Court of Appeals held in Re Pekin Plow Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 308, 50 C. C. A. 257, that, though the term "creditor," employed in a correlative statute, means a creditor armed with legal process, yet all creditors of a bankrupt, after adjudication in bankruptcy and the presentation of their claims, become creditors, within the meaning of the statute aforesaid and the various provisions of the bankrupt act. In re Fraizer (U. S.) 117 Fed. 746, 747.

As creditor with money judgment.

The word "creditor," as used in the California probate act, requiring that any creditor of an estate shall present his claim to the administrator for payment before he can maintain an action to recover the same, must be construed to mean a person having a money judgment against a deceased, and not one merely entitled to enforce an equitable claim against his estate. Toulouse v. Burkett, 10 Pac. 26, 28, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 184.

The word "debts," as used in the Code, relating to the sale of a decedent's land for the payment of his debts, includes any claim or demand upon which a judgment for a sum of money, or directing the payment of money, can be recovered in an action, and the word "creditor" includes any person having such a claim or demand. In re Wilcox's Estate (N. Y.) 11 Civ. Proc. R. 115, 125.

Directors of corporation.

"Creditors," as used in Laws 1848, c. 40, § 10 (General Manufacturing Act), providing that all stockholders of the corporations named in the act shall be liable to creditors thereof until the entire stock shall have been paid in, means outside creditors of a corporation, dealing with and trusting it, and generally ignorant of its precise financial condition, and cannot be construed to include directors of the corporation, to whom the corporation is indebted for salaries, for it can have no relation to the creditors, of the corporation, who manage its affairs, and can generally know its condition, who create the debts, and can generally protect themselves, if creditors, before disaster overtakes them. McDowall v. Sheehan, 29 N. E. 299, 301, 129 N. Y. 200.

Grantee with warranty of title.

Within the meaning of the statute of frauds (Clay's Dig. p. 254, § 2), prohibiting the transfer of property with intent to defraud creditors, the term "creditor" includes the covenantee in a deed for land containing a general covenant of warranty. Gannard v. Eslava, 20 Ala. 732, 741.

Where one warrants the title of personal property, and in fact the title is defective, the purchaser is not the creditor of the seller, or of the personal representative of the seller after his death, until the assertion and establishment of the adverse title, and consequently the statute of limitations does not commence to run until such time. Caplinger v. Vaden, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 629, 630.

A person who was entitled to sue for a breach of a covenant which runs with the land is a creditor of a railroad company, within the meaning of the act of Alabama authorizing a consolidation of the railroad company with another, and providing that the consolidation shall not affect the rights of the creditors of the consolidated company. The word "creditors," there used, includes the secured and unsecured creditors as well. Mobile & M. Ry. Co. v. Gilmer, 5 South. 138, 141, 85 Ala. 422.

Heirs of estate.

Gen. St. c. 180, § 12, authorizes the judge of probate to extend the time allowed to the creditors of an estate for proving their claims. In answer to a contention that the term "creditors" should be construed so as to include heirs, and authorize an extension of time for an heir to contest a creditor's claim, the court said that neither term had any technical or legal meaning different from that belonging to it in the ordinary sense of language, and that, so far from being synonymous or associated in the class of similar condition, they were, when applied to an interest in an estate, so dissimilar as to be antagonistic. Graves v. Graves, 58 N. H. 24.

Heirs and distributees cannot be deemed creditors, within the purview of Acts 1788, c. 66, providing that "no executor or administrator that shall hereafter undertake that trust shall be compelled or held to answer to the suit of any creditor of his testator, or intestate, unless the said suit shall be commenced within the term of three years," etc. Trecothick v. Austin (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 165, 168.

Holder of equitable right.

We are told in Anderson's Law Dictionary that a creditor is one who has a right by law to demand and recover of another a sum of money on any account whatever. In Bishop v. Redmond, 83 Ind. 157, a creditor is defined as one having a legal right to damages, capable of enforcement by judicial process. A wife having equities in her husband's real estate which may subsequently ripen into legal, subsisting claims, she is a present and continuous creditor of her husband, and is within the protection of the statute against fraudulent conveyances. De Ruiter v. De Ruiter, 62 N. E. 100, 103, 28 Ind. App. 9, 91 Am. St. Rep. 107.

In Rev. St. p. 436, § 172, providing that every conveyance or assignment, in writing or otherwise, of any estate or interest in lands, or any goods in action, or the rents and profits thereof, made with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors or other persons, shall be void, the term "creditors or other persons" embraces others than those who are strictly creditors. Even the word "creditor" does not receive a strict definition, for a party who is not, strictly speaking, a creditor, may stand in the equity of a creditor, and have an interest that may be defrauded. Twell v. Twell, 9 Pac. 537, 543, 6 Mont. 19.

Indorsers, guarantors, or sureties.

The term "creditor," used in a recording act, includes those who have entered into contract with parties, either as indorsers, guarantors, or sureties. Cutler v. Steele, 85 Mich. 627, 632, 48 N. W. 631, 633.

An indorser, an accommodation maker, or a surety on the obligation of a bankrupt is a creditor, under Bankr. Act 1898. Goldberg v. Harlan (Ind.) 67 N. E. 707, 710 (citing Swarts v. Siegel [U. S.] 117 Fed. 13, 54 C. C. A. 399).

The relation of debtor and creditor between principal and surety, so as to entitle the latter to avoid a voluntary conveyance made by the former, commences at the date of the obligation by which the surety becomes bound, and not from the time he makes payment. Howe v. Ward, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 195. A surety on an administrator's bond, against whom a judgment in an action on such bond has been rendered, is a creditor, within the statute protecting creditors from fraudulent conveyances. Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 300, 318, 50 Am. Dec. 460.

As one relying on property conveyed.

Recording Act, § 2, declares that conveyances made in consideration of marriage shall not be good against a purchaser for valuable consideration or any creditor unless recorded. Held, that the word "creditor," as used in such statute, meant persons only who had trusted the grantor on the faith of the ownership of the property, and therefore, if an alleged creditor trusted the grantor while he was not in possession of the property, want of possession being constructive notice of the conveyance, he could not be said to have trusted the grantor on the faith of the ownership of such property, and was therefore not a creditor, as the term was used in the statute. Dixon v. Lacoste, 9 Miss. (1 Smedes & M.) 70, 106, 107.

Comp. Laws, § 4379, providing that a mortgage of personal property is void, as against creditors of the mortgagor, unless the original or an authenticated copy thereof be filed in the office of the register of deeds, refers only to those who have given credit to, or changed their position with reference to, the mortgagor, to their detriment, relying on the record, after the execution of the mortgage, and before the filing thereof. Union Nat. Bank of Oshkosh v. Olum, 54 N. W. 1034, 1037, 3 N. D. 193, 44 Am. St. Rep. 533.

As one who loans credit.

A firm who signs the notes of a dry goods company thereby gives it credit, and one who loans his credit to another is as much his creditor as one who loans his money to him. Swarts v. Selgel (U. S.) 117 Fed. 13, 17, 54 C. C. A. 399.

Purchaser.

A creditor who takes a bill of sale from the debtor in payment of his debt becomes a purchaser of the property, and therefore is not within the protection of Laws 1883, c. 279, § 1, providing that a chattel mortgage, unless filed, shall be absolutely void as against creditors of the mortgagor. Volckers v. Struke, 42 N. Y. Supp. 84, 85, 18 Misc. Rep. 457.

Where land which had previously been conveyed by a warranty deed, which had not been recorded, was sold by a trustee under a power in a deed of trust to secure payment of a note, the grantee in the trustee's deed stands on the footing of a junior purchaser, and not of a lien creditor; thus putting the burden of proof on the grantee in the trust deed to show that he had no notice of the senior unrecorded mortgage. Turner v. Cochran, 61 S. W. 923, 924, 94 Tex. 480.

Purchaser of unassigned dower right.

Purchasers of the mere rights of a widow to dower before assignment, levied on and sold under a judgment against a subsequent husband, are not creditors, within the meaning of Dower Act 1845, § 31 (Rev. Code 1845, p. 435), or Dower Act 1855, § 38 (Rev. Code 1855, p. 676). "To sell the right of dower at public auction, and then have it assigned, the purchaser taking the risk whether it will be assigned or not, would generally cause a sacrifice of it. The creditor should have the dower actually assigned before it is sold." Waller v. Mardus, 29 Mo. 25, 27.

Receiver.

Acts 1870, c. 270, exempting an insurance policy on the life of the husband for the benefit of his wife and children from creditors of the husband, unless the amount on the annual premium exceeds the sum of $500, and providing that, where the amount is in excess of such sum, the lien of the creditor shall attach to the excess so paid, cannot be construed to include a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings against the husband. Masten v. Amerman, 4 N. Y. Supp. 681, 682, 51 Hun, 244.

Shareholder of insolvent building association.

Within the meaning of a statute reciting that the securities of a building and loan association (a foreign corporation) shall be held by the Secretary of State in trust for the benefit of the creditors of such corporation within the state, the term "creditors" is not limited merely to officers or agents who have claims against the company for services rendered, or to dealers who have furnished stationery or coal or light for the company's office. It is admitted that, while a building and loan association is a going concern, no shareholder becomes a creditor until the maturity of his shares; but, when insolvency occurs, the rights and liabilities of the shareholders and borrowers are radically changed. The borrower becomes liable to pay his debt at once, and, upon the confirmation of the final account of the receiver, the shareholder becomes entitled to his distributive share. The right of the shareholder to this ascertained portion of such fund then becomes as secure as the right of a holder of matured shares. In both instances the shareholder becomes a creditor, within the meaning of the statute. Irwin v. Granite State Provident Ass'n, 38 Atl. 680, 682, 56 N. J. Eq. 244.

State.

The statute declaring that "the creditors of any person deceased shall make their claim within seven years after the death of such debtor, otherwise such creditors shall be forever barred," in its character, object, and effect, is wholly different from the ordinary statutes of limitation. The term "creditors," it may be remarked, properly includes artificial persons, as bodies politic or corporate, as much as natural persons, and a remarkable feature of the law is that it contains no exceptions or saving clause in favor of the rights of any person whatever. It must, therefore, upon the established principles of construction applicable to statutes of limitation, be taken to run against all persons—and artificial persons as well as natural—and to apply to a debt due to the state, as well as one due to an individual. State v. Crutcher's Adm'r, 32 Tenn. (2 Swan) 504, 511.

Stockholder.

See "Stockholder."

Trustee or cestui que trust.

A creditor is "one to whom money is due" (Webster's Dict.); and the mother of an illegitimate child, to whom an allowance has been made in bastardy proceedings for the support of such child, is none the less a creditor of the father because the money must pass into her hands with a moral trust or obligation to apply it for the maintenance of the bastard. State v. Parson, 20 S. E. 511, 512, 115 N. C. 730.

Where the treasurer of a board of education deposited money—school funds—in a bank without authority, and the owner of the bank had knowledge of the character of the funds, the board of education does not thereby become a creditor of the bank, so as to file a claim therefor on the assignment of the bank for benefit of creditors; such money being a trust fund. Myers v. Board of Education, 32 Pac. 658, 663, 51 Kan. 87, 37 Am. St. Rep. 263.

Wife.

According to Anderson's Law Dictionary, a creditor is one who has a right by law to demand and recover of another a sum of money on any account whatever. In Bishop v. Redmond, 83 Ind. 157, a creditor is defined as one having a legal right to damages, capable of enforcement by judicial process. The wife is a present and continuous creditor of her husband, and is entitled, in an action for divorce, to attack a conveyance by him to his daughter as fraudulent and void. De Ruiter v. De Ruiter, 62 N. E. 100, 103, 28 Ind. App. 9, 91 Am. St. Rep. 107.

Of corporation.

The word "creditor," as used in Rev. St. § 2640, requiring corporations for profit to keep a stockbook, open to the inspection of any stockholder, member, or creditor, means a creditor of the corporation, not a private creditor of a stockholder. Mapleton Bank v. Standrod (Idaho) 71 Pac. 119, 121.

Creditors of a corporation who happen also to be stockholders and directors of the corporation are not precluded by reason of such relation from commencing proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy against the corporation. In re Rollins Gold & Silver Min. Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 982, 985, 4 Am. Bankr. R. 327.

The term "creditor," in P. L. 1829, p. 58, entitled "An act to prevent fraud by incorporated companies," and authorizing creditors of such companies to institute proceedings to enjoin them from exercising their franchises, is not to be construed in a narrow and technical sense, but is used in a broad sense, so that where a corporation, by pledging its stocks and securities to a trust company, procures the issuance of certificates based on its assets, and agrees to pay a sum semiannually to the trust company for distribution among certificate holders, such holders are creditors, within the meaning of the statute. In this case it is held, in general terms, that if a party is so related to the corporation and its assets as to be entitled to a share of what is divided among creditors—in other words, if the party can come into the proceedings as a claimant, and prove his claim, so as to be entitled to a dividend—he is a creditor. Galagher v. Asphalt Co. of America (N. J.) 55 Atl. 259, 260.

CREDITOR AT LARGE.

A simple-contract creditor, or "creditor at large," is one who has not established his debt by a judgment rendered, or has not an acknowledged debt, with an interest in the property of the debtor, or a lien thereon created by contract or by some distinct legal proceeding. United States v. Ingate (U. S.) 48 Fed. 251, 254.

A creditor at large is one who has not procured a lien on the property by some legal process as distinguished from a creditor who has obtained some process by which the property may be lawfully seized, and by which it is made liable either immediately or ultimately to be appropriated in satisfaction of his debt. Wolcott v. Ashenfelter, 23 Pac. 780, 784, 5 N. M. 442, 8 L. R. A. 691.

CREDITOR HAVING A LIEN.

Within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 81, § 16, providing that if there is no redemption from a foreclosure sale by advertisement by the mortgagor, etc., the senior "creditor having a lien," legal or equitable, on the real estate, or some part thereof, subsequent to the mortgage, may redeem, etc., a second mortgagee is a "creditor having a lien," and may redeem on complying with the statute. Nopson v. Horton, 20 Minn. 268, 270 (Gil. 239, 242).

The term "creditor having a lien," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 323, and chapter 81, § 16, relative to the redemption of real estate, and giving a creditor having a lien a right to redeem, means a creditor having a provisional and inchoate lien, like that of an attachment on mesne process, and is not limited to liens fixed and definite, either by judicial determination, or by the contract of the party. Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank, 48 N. W. 187, 188, 45 Minn. 341, 12 L. R. A. 741.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 81, § 16, allowing redemption from a mortgage by a creditor having a lien, should not be construed in the limited sense of a personal creditor, but embraces one having the right of recourse to the land for the satisfaction of his claim or demand, though he may have no personal claim against the mortgagor. Buchanan v. Reid, 45 N. W. 11, 12, 43 Minn. 172.

CREDITORS' BILL.

It has long been the practice for a creditor who has exhausted his remedies at law by procuring a personal judgment and an unavailing execution to file what has always been called a "creditors' bill," to obtain from his debtor a discovery of his assets, and for the subjection thereof to the payment of the judgment. The relief thus sought can be obtained by compelling the debtor to surrender to the court such of his property as he has in his possession or under his control, and, if necessary, by the appointment of a receiver to sue for and collect any demands or choses in action that may be due to the judgment debtor. Hudson v. Wood (U. S.) 119 Fed. 764, 775.

A creditors' bill, properly speaking, is either a bill filed for an account of a decedent's assets and a settlement of the estate, or else it is a bill filed to set aside a fraudulent conveyance. Yates v. Seitz, 7 D. C. 11, 27.

A creditors' bill, in American practice, is a proceeding to enforce the security of a judgment creditor against the property or interest of his debtor. The action proceeds upon the theory that the judgment is in the nature of a lien such as may be enforced in equity, or by means of which a party seeks to remove a fraudulent conveyance out of the way of his execution. Huneke v. Dold, 32 Pac. 45, 47, 7 N. M. 5.

A creditors' bill is usually in the nature of a bill of discovery, and is intended not only to reach property described therein, but also every other species of assets; and even debts due the debtor, of which the creditor knows nothing, may be reached and applied to the claim. Fink v. Patterson (U. S.) 21 Fed. 602, 608.

A creditors' bill is a bill by which the creditor seeks to satisfy his debt out of some equitable estate of the defendant which is not liable to a levy and sale under execution at law, and not a naked bill to remove a fraudulent conveyance out of the way of his execution. Newman v. Willetts, 52 Ill. 98, 101.

A creditors' bill is a bill for relief against fraudulent transfers of property. A bill by a surety against a co-surety to compel contribution, and to set aside certain conveyances, and subject the property conveyed to the satisfaction of such liability, is not a creditors' bill. Moore v. Baker (U. S.) 34 Fed. 1, 3.

In the case of Gould v. Torrance (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 560, the court, in defining "creditors' bills," says that they are in the nature of additional or equitable executions, and are not in any sense a new suit. By these proceedings a summary mode is instituted for ascertaining what, if any, property a judgment debtor may have under his control or in his possession, subject to execution, and if any persons are owing him, and to what extent. Feldenheimer v. Tressel, 43 N. W. 94, 96, 6 Dak. 265.

The term "creditors' bill" was originally applied to those bills which were filed by creditors of the estate of a decedent against his personal representatives for the marshaling of the assets and for the demands of the creditors, according to their priority. They were, strictly speaking, bills to administer the estate of the decedent. At the same time, all bills brought by creditors for the purpose of securing their debts are creditors' bills. Mallory v. Kirkpatrick, 33 Atl. 205, 207, 54 N. J. Eq. 50.

A creditors' bill is an equitable proceeding quasi in rem, and may be conducted to a decree with only the constructive notice upon, and presence of, the debtor. It is directed rather against the thing than the person. Cunningham v. City of Cleveland (U. S.) 98 Fed. 657, 665, 39 C. C. A. 211.

A "creditors' bill," as used in Chancery Code, §§ 36, 37, is a bill by which a creditor seeks to satisfy his debt out of some equitable estate of the defendant which is not liable to levy and sale under an execution at law; but there is a creditors' bill of a different sort, very nearly allied to the former, by means of which a party seeks to remove a fraudulent conveyance out of the way of his execution. This he may file so soon as he obtains his judgment, and he is not required to show that he could not obtain satisfaction out of the other property of the defendant. To maintain a bill of the first character, the creditor must have exhausted his remedy at law by obtaining a judgment and getting an execution returned nulla bona. A naked bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, which seeks no discovery of any property belonging to the defendant, and which ought to be subjected to the payment of his judgment, is not a creditors' bill. Newman v. Willetts, 52 Ill. 98, 101.

CREDITORS' SUIT.

A creditors' suit is a proceeding by creditors to subject equitable assets to the payment of their debts. It may be maintained wherever the creditor has exhausted his remedies at law by failure to recover the amount of his debt by execution or other legal process, and there are equitable assets belonging to the debtor on which the judgment of the creditor is not a lien which the creditor desires to have subjected to the payment of the judgment. McCartney v. Bostwick, 32 N. Y. 53, 57.

A creditors' suit, strictly so called, is where the creditor seeks to satisfy his judgment out of the equitable assets of the debtor which cannot be reached on execution. Generally an action of this kind cannot be brought until the creditor has exhausted his remedy at law by the issue of an execution, and its return unsatisfied. The second class is where property legally liable to execution has been fraudulently conveyed or incumbered by the debtor, and the creditor brings the action to set aside the conveyance as an obstruction to the enforcement of his lien. State Bank of Ceresco v. Belk (Neb.) 94 N. W. 617, 618.

CREDITS.

See "Solvent Credits."

Goods, effects, and credits, see "Goods."

The term "credit," when used in the chapter of the Code relating to taxation, includes every claim and demand for money, labor, merchandise, or other valuable thing, and money and property of any kind secured by deed of trust, mortgage, or otherwise. Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 3906, subd. 4.

The term "credits," as used in the revenue act, means those solvent debts, not secured by mortgage or trust deed, owing to the person, firm, corporation, or association assessed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3617, subd. 6; Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 1313, subd. 6; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3680, subd. 6; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2505.

The term "credit," as used in the chapter relating to the revenue, includes every claim and demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing, and every annuity or sum of money receivable at stated periods; but pensions from the United States, and salaries or payments expected from services to be rendered, are not included in the above term. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 3782, cl. 5; Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 4019.

The word "credits," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include every claim or demand for money, labor, interest, or other valuable thing due or to become due, not including money on deposit. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 6.

The term "credit," as used in the chapter relating to the assessment of taxes, includes every claim or demand due or to become due for money, labor, or other valuable thing, every annuity or sum of money receivable at stated periods, and all money or property of any kind secured by deed, title bond, mortgage, or otherwise; but pensions of the United States, or any of them, or salaries or payments expected for services to be rendered, are not included in the above term. Code Iowa 1897, § 1309; Manning v. Spry, 96 N. W. 873, 874, 121 Iowa, 191.

The term "credits," whenever used in the revenue act, shall be held to mean the excess of the sum of all legal claims and demands, whether for money or other valuable thing, or for labor or services due or to become due to the person liable to pay taxes thereon, including deposits in banks or with persons in or out of the state, when added together (estimating every such claim or demand at its true value in money), from and above the sum of legal, bona fide debts owing by such person. In making up the sum of such debts owing, there shall be taken into account no obligation to any mutual insurance company; nor any unpaid subscription to the capital stock of any joint stock company; nor any subscription for any religious, scientific, literary, or charitable purpose; nor any acknowledgment of any indebtedness, unless founded on some consideration actually received, and believed at the time of making such acknowledgment to be the full consideration therefor; nor any acknowledgment of debt made for the purpose of diminishing the amount of credits to be listed for taxation; nor any greater amount or portion of any liability as surety than the person required to make the statement of such credits believes that such surety is in equity bound and will be compelled to pay or contribute. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 4900.

The term "credits," whenever used in the act relating to taxation, shall be held to mean and include every claim and demand for money or other valuable thing, and every annuity or sum of money receivable at stated periods, due and to become due, and all claims and demands secured by deed or mortgage, due or to become due. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5064. See, also, State v. Moffett, 67 N. W. 68, 69, 64 Minn. 292; State v. Rand, 40 N. W. 835, 836, 39 Minn. 502.

The term "credits," whenever used in the chapter relating to the revenue, shall be held to mean and include every deposit which the person owning, holding in trust, or having the beneficial interest therein, is entitled to withdraw in money on demand, and every claim or demand for money, interest, or other valuable thing due or to become due, or every annuity or sum of money receivable at stated periods, including pay and salaries accrued or due for any purpose whatever, and all income or interest accruing from government bonds, and all money loaned or invested, and all indebtedness secured by deed, contract, mortgage, or pledge of property of whatsoever kind: provided, that pensions due and to be received from the United States shall not be held to be annuities, within the meaning of the chapter. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

The word "credit" includes every demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing, whether due or to become due. Cobbe's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10.404; State v. Georgia Co., 112 N. C. 34, 38, 17 S. E. 10, 19 L. R. A. 485; Sellers v. Barrett, 57 N. E. 422, 424, 185 Ill. 466.

As used in the title relating to taxation, the term "credits" shall be held to mean the excess of the sum of all legal claims and demands, whether for money or other valuable thing, or for labor or services due or to become due to the person liable to pay taxes thereon, including deposits in banks, or with persons in or out of the state, other than such as are held to be money, when added together (estimating every such claim or demand at its true value in money), over and above the sum of legal, bona fide debts owing by such person; but, in making up the sum of such debts owing, there shall be taken into account no obligation to any mutual insurance company, nor any unpaid subscription to the capital stock of any joint-stock company, nor any subscription for any religious, scientific, literary, or charitable purpose; nor any acknowledgment of any indebtedness, unless founded on some consideration actually received, and believed at the time of making such acknowledgment to be a full consideration therefor; nor any acknowledgment made for the purpose of diminishing the amount of credits to be listed for taxation; nor any greater amount or portion of any liability as surety than the person required to make the statement of such credits believes that such surety is in equity bound and will be compelled to pay or to contribute in case there be no securities: provided, that pensions receivable from the United States shall not be held to be credits; and no person shall be required to take into account, in making up the amount of credits, a greater portion of any credits than he believes will be received or can be collected, or any greater portion of any obligation given to secure the payment of rent than the amount that shall have accrued on any lease and remain unpaid. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2730; Payne v. Watterson, 37 Ohio St. 121, 123; Chapman v. First Nat. Bank, 47 N. E. 54, 56, 56 Ohio St. 310; Treasurer Fayette County v. People's & Drovers' Bank, 25 N. E. 697, 701, 47 Ohio St. 503, 10 L. R. A. 196; Payne v. Watterson, 37 Ohio St. 121, 123; Collett v. Springfield Sav. Soc., 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 146, 154. This definition of "credits" applies equally to all persons and corporations, foreign or domestic. So that, where a duty is enjoined upon either to list for taxation its credits, the term "credits" implies the balance remaining after all bona fide debts are deducted from its legal claims and demands. Hubbard v. Brush, 55 N. E. 829, 831, 61 Ohio St. 252.

The term "credits" shall be held to mean the remainder due or to become due to a party after deducting from the amount of all legal debts, claims, and demands in his favor the amount of all legal debts and demands against him, whether such demands be payable in money, labor, or other valuable thing. But in ascertaining such remainder, no deduction shall be made for any obligation to any mutual insurance company, given for insurance, nor any subscription to the capital stock of any joint-stock company, nor of any taxes assessed against the party, nor of any subscription to any religious, scientific, literary, or charitable purpose, nor of any acknowledgment of a liability not founded on a legal and valuable consideration, nor any more of any joint liability with others than the party honestly believes he will be compelled to pay, nor of any acknowledgment of debt or liability made for the purpose of diminishing the amount of credit to be returned for taxation. Civ. Code S. C. 1902, § 265.

The word "credits," as used in the laws for the assessment and collection of taxes, shall be construed to mean all solvent debts, claims, or demands owing or coming to any person, whether the evidence of such debts, claims, or demands be in writing or not, and shall be construed to embrace all moneys and credits constituting a capital employed in business out of this state, by himself, his agent, or other person for him, to his credit with a bank, firm, or person. Code Va. 1887, § 489.

The word "credits," as used in the chapter relating to the assessment of taxes, includes all claims and demands, whether owing upon bond, note, certificate, book account, or otherwise, and whether due or not, whether payable in money, property, labor, or services, except only such demands as are included in the term "money," as defined. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 199, c. 29, § 47.

The term "credits," as used in the chapter relating to taxation and revenue, includes every claim and demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing; and every annuity or sum of money receivable at stated periods, and all money in property of any kind, and secured by deed, mortgage, or otherwise; but pensions from the United States, or any state, and salaries or payments expected for services to be rendered, are not included in the above term. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 1775.

The words "credits," in Rev. St. § 6336, is defined as whatever is due to the party from any other person, company, or corporation in the shape of labor, property, or money. It includes notes, mortgages, judgments, amounts due for goods or lands sold, for material furnished, for work and labor, and for professional services, but does not include money on hand or on deposit or call loans. Wasson v. First Nat. Bank, 8 N. E. 97, 99, 107 Ind. 206.

As assets.

The word "credits," as used by a testator in devising to a devisee a half "of any stock, notes, bonds, or other credits" of which he might die seised, was employed in the sense of "assets"—that is, something belonging to him, but of an intangible nature—and does not mean merely a balance of book accounts in favor of the credit side, or a trust given or received from one to another; and an interest in an insurance business passed under the term "credits." Brandon v. Yeakle, 50 S. W. 1004, 1005, 66 Ark. 377.

Cash or money.

"Credits" is a generic term, and embraces that species of personal property known in law as "choses in action" and "contract rights." In commercial circles the term is applied to incorporeal personal property, as contradistinguished from chattels, and is applied alike to bonds, shares of stock in corporations, bills, notes, mortgages, and open accounts, in all their multifarious forms, and is so used in Laws 1895, p. 508, relating to taxation of credits other than bank stock, and will not be held to include money. Pullman State Bank v. Manring, 51 Pac. 464, 465, 18 Wash. 250.

The term "credits or rights," in a statute authorizing the charging of a person as trustee who has in his hands credits or rights of the principal debtor, means cash in the hands of the trustee, or debts due from him, belonging to the principal debtor. Sargeant v. Leland, 2 Vt. 277, 280.

Choses in action and notes.

Choses in action are not credits, within the statutes relating to trustee process. Perry v. Cotes, 9 Mass. 537; Lupton v. Cutter, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 298, 300.

"Credits," as used in a will providing for the payment of legacies out of book accounts and other credits, should not be restricted to such as are the proper subjects of book account, but include, at least, all moneys due the estate by promissory notes or bonds. Webster v. Wiggin, 84 Atl. 990, 19 R. I. 466.

A promissory note in possession of a bank as collateral security for a debt of the defendant in attachment is a credit, within the rule that all debts and credits of a defendant in the possession of another are attachable by garnishment. Deering & Co. v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 41 Pac. 801, 804, 109 Cal. 73.

Promissory notes were credits, within Rev. St. 1881, §§ 6332, 6333, 6336, from which the bona fide indebtedness of the taxpayer might be deducted, so as to reduce the amount for taxation. Moore v. Hewitt, 46 N. E. 905, 147 Ind. 464.

Contract for sale of land.

"Credit," defined in Comp. Laws 1885, p. 945, to mean and include every demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing, whether due or to become due, but not secured by lien on real estate, would not include an agreement executed to sell real estate on condition precedent; no payment being made, and no title transferred. Branner v. Thomas, 15 Pac. 211, 213, 37 Kan. 282.

The term "credit," as it is used in the statutes which provide for the assessment of property for taxation, is defined by section 802 of the Code as including every claim and demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing. A verbal agreement to sell a farm and deliver a conveyance therefor on the coming day creates a credit, within the meaning of the statute. Perrine v. Jacobs, 19 N. W. 861, 862, 64 Iowa, 79.

Claims and demands arising under contracts for the sale of land, in which title is retained by the seller, to be transferred on the completion of the payments therein provided, are a species of property denominated "credits," and are taxable under Act March 30, 1872 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, pp. 1393, 1394), defining credits as every claim or demand for money, interest, or other valuable thing, due or to become due. Griffin v. People, 56 N. E. 397, 398, 184 Ill. 275.

Credits, under 1 Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831, subd. 6, making taxable all credits of every kind belonging to inhabitants of the state, includes balances due under contracts for the sale of land and timber, the property to remain with the vendor until such balances were paid; the obligations resembling, not agreements to pay future rent or salaries, or promises to buy merchandise to be delivered in the future, but credits secured by mortgage. City of Marquette v. Michigan Iron & Land Co. (Mich.) 92 N. W. 934.

As debts.

"Credits" and "debts," as used in the bankruptcy act, authorizing mutual debts or credits between parties to be set-off, are correlative. What is a debt on one side is a credit on the other, so that the term "credits" can have no broader meaning than the term "debts." Libbey v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 309, 26 L. Ed. 769.

As used in Revenue Law, § 27, authorizing individual taxpayers, except banks, to deduct the bona fide debts owing by them from the gross amount of their credits, and prohibiting any deduction from the value of any other item of property for taxation than credits, the word "credits" was not intended to include notes, securities, accounts due, or other credits which are the assets of any bank, banker, broker, or stockjobber, but was intended to cover debts due the taxpayers, growing out of other ordinary business transactions. Bressler v. Wayne County, 49 N. W. 787, 789, 32 Neb. 834, 13 L. R. A. 614.

The term "credits," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 544, providing that any person owing debts to the defendant, or having in his possession or under his control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, may be required to attend before the court, etc., was intended to mean something belonging to the defendant, but in the possession and control of the garnishee, like promissory notes or other evidences of indebtedness of third persons, which may be delivered up or transferred to the sheriff, and will be treated as separate and distinct from the word "debts," which are moneys owing by the garnishee to the defendant, which may be paid over to the sheriff. Hence an attachment of certain credits belonging to the defendant does not give the attaching creditor a lien on or right to a debt owing to the defendant by the party served with the writ. Gow v. Marshall, 27 Pac. 422, 423, 90 Cal. 565.

The word "credits," as used in Rev. Laws, c. 189, § 19, providing for trustee process against the "goods, effects, or credits" of the principal defendant, is the correlative of "debts"; and the use of that word in describing what choses in action can be trusted means that liquidated demands alone can be reached. Wilde v. Mahaney, 67 N. E. 337, 338, 183 Mass. 455, 62 L. R. A. 813 (citing Hugg v. Booth, 24 N. C. 282).

"Credits," as used in Revenue Law, § 18, providing that, when a person is doing business in more than one county, the property and credits existing in any of the counties are to be listed, and taxes in that county and credits not existing in or pertaining especially to the business in any one county are to be listed and taxed in that county where his principal place of business may be, includes debts which are due. Jones v. Seward County, 4 N. W. 946, 949, 10 Neb. 154.

Execution.

An execution in the hands of a sheriff for service is not "goods, effects, or credits" of the execution creditor, within the meaning of the statute empowering a creditor to attach the goods, effects, and credits of his debtor in the hands of a third person where they may be found, and who for this purpose is considered as a trustee of the defendant. Sharp v. Clark, 2 Mass. 91, 93.

Judgment debts.

Within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 245, § 19, providing for the garnishment of credits, the word "credit" is the correlative of "debt," so that the existence of a debt on the one part constitutes a credit on the other; and the general rule being that, where one person is indebted to another, he may be charged as the trustee of his creditor, the nature of the indebtedness, barring exemptions, is immaterial, and the statute is applicable to judgment debts as well as others, both in reason and equity. Isabelle v. Le Blanc, 39 Atl. 436, 437, 68 N. H. 409.

Land fraudulently conveyed.

Under a statute authorizing the institution of trustee process to reach goods, effects, and credits of the debtor, it is held that land fraudulently conveyed is neither goods, effects, nor credits, within the statute. Hunter v. Case, 20 Vt. 195, 196.

Legacies in hands of executor.

Pecuniary legacies in the hands of an executor in no proper sense can be denominated "credits," so as to be subject to trustee process. Without the relation of creditor and debtor, there can be no such thing as a credit; but a legatee can in no proper sense be said to be the creditor of the testator, nor a testator, merely as such, the debtor of a legatee. Barnes v. Treat, 7 Mass. 271, 274.

"Credits," as used in the term "effects and credits," in trustee writs, authorizes the attachment of a legacy in the hands of a trustee. Cummings v. Garvin, 65 Me. 301, 302.

Liability of stockholders.

The double liability of the stockholders of a bank is not a right or credit of the bank, which Rev. St. 1894, § 2908 (Rev. St. 1881, § 2671), authorizes the assignees for the benefit of creditors to collect, but is enforceable only by the creditors. Runner v. Dwiggins, 46 N. E. 580, 581, 147 Ind. 238, 36 L. R. A. 645.

Mortgage loan.

"Credits," as used in Rev. St. § 2731, providing that all money, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, or otherwise, of persons residing in the state, should be subject to taxation, should be construed to include a loan of money secured by mortgage in any form; it being a legal claim for money not included in the definition of "money." Myers v. Seaberger, 12 N. E. 796, 797, 45 Ohio St. 232.

As offsets.

The word "credits," in its most comprehensive signification, as contradistinguished from "debts," might possibly be held to embrace all that is necessary in a provision for the presentation of claims against a decedent, requiring an affidavit that all notes, legal offsets, payments, and credits have been allowed. But it has another and more restricted meaning, which would narrow it down to a signification nearly synonymous with "payments," which clearly would not fill the requirements of the statute, as in this sense it certainly does not include offsets. Walters v. Prestidge, 30 Tex. 65, 73.

As property.

See "Personal Property"; "Property."

Right of redemption.

In construing a statute providing that persons garnished are required to appear and answer such interrogatories as shall be propounded touching goods, chattels, rights, and credits of the judgment debtor, the courts say that it would seem that the words here used—particularly "rights and credits"—concerning which such garnishee must make disclosure, are sufficiently comprehensive to include the right of redemption in mortgaged or pledged personal property. Burnham v. Doolittle, 15 N. W. 606, 608, 14 Neb. 214.

Shares of stock.

Stocks are not credits, and credits are not stocks, within the meaning of the revenue act of the state, and the law does not authorize the deduction of the debts of the individual shareholder in a bank from his shares of stock. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Chambers, 61 Pac. 560, 561, 21 Utah, 324, 56 L. R. A. 346.

The word "credit," used in the chapter of the statute providing for the assessing and collecting of taxes, and defined in Gen. St. 1889, par. 6847, as meaning and including every demand for money, labor, or other valuable thing, whether due or to become due, but not secured by lien on real estate, does not include shares of stock in a national bank or other corporation. It is a strained construction of the word "credit" or the word "demand" to hold it to include stocks in a corporation. Shares of stock are rather certificates of an interest in the enterprise and in the property, of every description, subject to the liabilities of the corporation, rather than a demand for anything. Dutton v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 36 Pac. 719, 720, 53 Kan. 440.

The term "credits," within the meaning of Rev. St. §§ 2730, 2731, in reference to taxation, does not include national bank stock. Niles v. Shaw, 34 N. E. 162, 163, 50 Ohio St. 370.

Under the Louisiana laws, stock in an incorporated company is property, not a credit, and is therefore transferable and salable by actual contract and a delivery of the certificate, and can be pledged in the same manner. New Orleans Nat. Banking Ass'n v. Wiltz (U. S.) 10 Fed. 330, 332.

In Comp. Laws, c. 77, § 27, providing that a taxpayer, in listing his credits for assessment, may deduct the amount of all bona fide debts owing by him, the term "credits" includes investments in shares of national bank stock. Bressler v. Wayne County, 41 N. W. 356, 357, 25 Neb. 468.

Credits are property, by the Constitution of California. They are property in which other money capital is invested than such as is invested in national bank shares; and accordingly where by law debts owed by a private person were deducted from his credits before the assessment of such credits, and no such deduction was made in assessing national bank shares, there was a discrimination against the bank. Miller v. Heilbron, 58 Cal. 133, 138.

Tangible property.

"As ordinarily used in trade and business, the word 'credit' suggests nothing more than a chose in action. In bookkeeping it is the side of an account on which payment is entered; opposed to debit, as this article is carried to one's credit, and that to one's debit." Cent. Dict. As used in bookkeeping, Worcester gives this definition: "That side of a personal account on which everything is entered that answers as an offset to a debt, as to carry money, goods or notes to the credit of A. B.; that which is entered in an account as an offset to a debt, or for which the party in whose favor the entry is made becomes the creditor of another, as the credits exceed the debts." The word "credit" in Laws 1885, c. 334, providing that, when common territory is detached from one school district and annexed to another, such latter district shall be liable for its just share of liabilities and indebtedness, and shall receive its just share of the credits from the district from which such territory was detached, includes the value of the school sites, schoolhouse, furniture, and fixtures thereof, as well as the school tax levy, the county school tax, and cash in the treasury, less the debts and liabilities of the school district, as it is the universal rule, requiring no citation of authorities, that the statute is to be interpreted not only by its exact words, but also by its apparent general purpose. A thing which is within the intention of the makers of the statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter. Board of School Directors of Town of Pelican v. Board of School Directors of Town of Rock Falls, 51 N. W. 871, 873, 81 Wis. 428.

"Credits," as used in Laws 1885, c. 334, § 2, providing that, when any territory is detached from one school district and annexed to another, such latter shall receive its share of the credits, does not include school sites, schoolhouses, and furniture and fixtures, or the value thereof, or any tangible property whatever. (Per Pinney, J., dissenting.) School Directors of Town of Pelican v. School Directors of Town of Rock Falls, 81 Wis. 428, 52 N. W. 1049.

Trusts.

"Credits," and "debts," as used in the bankruptcy act, authorizing mutual debts or credits between parties to be set off, are correlative. What is a debt on one side is a credit on the other, so that the term "credits" can have no broader meaning than the term "debts." We find no warrant in the act for extending the term "credits," so as to include trusts. Generally we know that "credit" and "trust" are not synonymous terms. They have distinct and well-settled meanings, and there is no reason why they should be confounded in interpreting the bankruptcy act. Libbey v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 303, 309, 26 L. Ed. 769.

The term "credits and debts" in the bankruptcy act, authorizing set-offs in proof of claims, is more comprehensive than the term "mutual debts" in the statute of set-offs. The term "credit" is synonymous with "trust," and the trust or credit need not be of money on both sides, but, if one party intrusts the other with goods or value, it will be a case of mutual credit. Catlin v. Foster (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 303, 305.

"Credits," as used in a statute providing that every person having any goods, effects, or credits of the principal defendant intrusted in his hands after the service of the writ in trustee process may be summoned as a trustee, does not include every cause of action ex contractu, but extends only to such class of debts as are the ordinary result of a contract, either express or implied, creating a fiduciary relation. It is the fidel-commissarius of the civil law, and the factor of the common law. Barker v. Esty, 19 Vt. 131, 135.

Uncollected insurance premium.

The plain meaning of the word "credits," employed in the revenue law, includes the uncollected premiums of an insurance company. Its language is general. "All rights, credits and open accounts and other obligations." They are broad enough to cover the uncollected premiums of the company. State v. Board of Assessors, 18 South. 462, 470, 47 La. Ann. 1498.

CREEED.

A "religious creed" is the common belief of a religious sect. "Each sect has a creed which necessarily excludes all others. Different creeds constitute the different sects. Each sect has a particular name, and that makes it a denomination. What makes it a 'creed' is the fact that it is the common belief of the sect; not its length, or its brevity. It would be impossible to have a sect or denomination unless there were at least some one ground on which they believed, and, so far as there was a common belief, just so far they must have a creed or covenant; and the case is not changed whether the creed contains one article of faith, or thirty-nine. A man's 'creed' is what he believes. Trinitarians believe in the Trinity, or the tri-unity of God; that so far is their creed. Unitarians believe in the unity of God." Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 92, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

CREEK.

"Creek" signifies a small bay, inlet, or cove, according to Webster; but more generally, in this country, it is employed to mean a small river, and does not cease to be such merely because its course may be opposed by some obstruction, natural or artificial, since it will still flow. French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 96, 107.

"Creek" imports a recess, cove, bay, or inlet in the shore of a river, and not a separate or independent stream, though sometimes used in the latter meaning; and a creek which is merely a channel of a river between an island and the mainland is still a part of the river. Shermerhorn v. Hudson River R. Co., 38 N. Y. 103, 104.

Under the act of Congress of March 3, 1811, providing that every person who owns a tract of land bordering on any river, creek, bayou, or water course in the territory of Orleans, and not exceeding in depth 40 arpents, shall be entitled to a preference on becoming a purchaser of any vacant tract of land adjacent thereto, the words "river, creek, bayou, or water course" mean a navigable stream. Surgett v. Laprice, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 48, 69, 12 L. Ed. 982.

The terms "rivers," "haven," "creek," "basin," "bay," or "arm of the sea," in Rev. St. § 5346 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3630], providing that an assault committed with a dangerous weapon, or with intent to perpetrate a felony, on board of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States, while in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay, within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, are limited to the high seas and other waters connected with them, and do not include the rivers connecting the Great Lakes. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

As boundary.

The use of the word "creek," in a deed which fixes one boundary of land conveyed at a tide-water creek, carries the boundary to the center of the creek, unless limited by special words, even though the tide wholly ebbs at low water. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

Where a creek flowing into a lake, and maintaining the same level as the lake, is used to designate the boundary of land which is also bounded on the lake, which is navigable, the boundary will only extend to low-water mark on the creek. Fletcher v. Phelps, 28 Vt. 257, 261.

A conveyance giving one call of the land conveyed as being down the "creek," with the several meanders thereof, refers to the water in the bed of the creek, and not the top of the bank, and therefore the boundary is fixed at low-water mark. McCulloch's Lessee v. Aten, 2 Ohio, 307, 309.

CREEK CLAIM.

A "creek claim," in mining law, is a tract of 100 yards square, one side of which abuts on the creek, or, rather, extends to the middle thread of it. Chapman v. Toy Long (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 497, 498.

CREOLE.

The word "Creole" implies a person of mixed African and European blood, though the term is used in various other senses. Parker v. State, 23 South. 664, 118 Ala. 655.

CREOSOTE.

See "Soluble Creosote."

While creosote may be termed an "oil," still it is not known as a "distilled oil." In re Southern Pac. Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 311, 313

CRESYLIC.

The word "cresylic," when applied to distinguish an ointment made of soap and the article known in commerce as "cresylic acid," is descriptive of the nature and quality of the compound. Carbolic Soap Co. v. Thompson (U. S.) 25 Fed. 625, 626.

CREVICE.

In 2 Mills' Ann. St. § 3152, providing that a discovery shaft shall disclose a well-defined crevice at the depth of at least 10 feet from the lowest part of the rim of such shaft, clearly the term "crevice" means a mineral-bearing vein. Beals v. Cone, 62 Pac. 948, 958, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92 (citing Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. [U. S.] 8 Fed. 725; Terrible Min. Co. v. Argentine Min. Co. [U. S.] 89 Fed. 583; Cheesman v. Shreeve [U. S.] 40 Fed. 787).

CREW.

"The word 'crew' has several well-known significations. In its general and popular sense it is equivalent to 'company.' Thus, for example, we find the most general definition laid down in Johnson's Dictionary to be a company of people associated for any purpose. The general sense of the word 'crew,' then, is equivalent to 'ship's company.'" United States v. Winn (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 733, 734.

"Crew," as used in articles of agreement between master and seamen for employment during a voyage, providing, among other things, "the crew, if required, to be transferred to any other ship in the same employ," did not necessarily mean the crew as a whole, but would apply to a transfer of less than the whole. Frazer v. Hatton, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 512, 526.

Seamen become obligated to merchant vessels as a part of the crew from the time they sign the shipping articles, and from that time they may incur the penalties of desertion; they do not have to actually go upon board the vessel or enter upon performance of their duties. Tucker v. Alexandroff, 22 Sup. Ct. 195, 202, 183 U. S. 699, 46 L. Ed. 396.

Cook.

"Crews of vessels," used in the treaty of July 4, 1827, between the United States and the kingdom of Norway and Sweden, article 13, providing that all differences arising between the captains and "crews of vessels" belonging to the kingdom shall be settled by the consuls thereof without the interference of the local authorities, should be construed as including all of the ship's company—all the seamen, and all officers except the captain. "The crew of a vessel—the ship's company—in a general sense, comprises all persons who, in pursuance of some contract or arrangement with the owner or master, are on board the same, aiding in the navigation thereof; and it matters not whether the contract is verbal or in writing, or for a long or short voyage or period"; and hence one who shipped as cook on a Norwegian steamship is a member of the crew of such ship, and any difference between him and the captain should be settled by the Norwegian consul. The Mario (U. S.) 40 Fed. 286, 287.

Master and officers.

The term "crews" as clearly includes the master and officers of a vessel as it does the sailors. Millaudon v. Martin (La.) 6 Rob. 534, 540.

"Crew," as used in Rev. St. § 5359 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3639], punishing any one of the crew of a vessel for making revolt, includes the mate and all other officers inferior to the master. United States v. Huff (U. S.) 13 Fed. 630, 637.

Johnson's Dictionary says that the "crew of a ship," or "ship's crew," means the company of the ship, illustrating it by a verse from Dryden's translation of the Æneid: "The anchor dropped, his crew the vessel moor." Falconer, in his Marine Dictionary, says: "The crew of a ship comprehends the officers, sailors, seamen, marines, ordinary men, servants, and boys;" adding, "but exclusive of the captains and lieutenants in the French service." As used in 4 Stat. 776, authorizing the punishment of the master or other officer of a vessel for beating, wounding, or imprisoning any of the crew without justifiable cause, it is equivalent to "ship's company," and includes the officers.

United States v. Winn (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 733, 734.

Passenger.

A passenger on a ship has not been included, from the time of the Laws of Oleron down to the present day, as composing a part of the "crew" or the ship's company, and therefore he is not within a statute making certain acts on the part of a member of the crew or ship's company criminal. United States v. Libby (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 928, 931.

CRIB.

The word "crib" has various definitions, as the manger in a stable, a bin, a frame for a child's bed, a small habitation; and is used in the latter sense by Shakespeare. Nowhere else do we find it used in the sense of a building. Wood v. State, 18 Fla. 967, 969.

A crib, according to Webster, means, in the United States, a small building, raised on posts, for storing Indian corn. We are not aware that it has ever been used in that sense in England, nor has it been used in any of the acts of the Assembly of the state; so that it seems that a "barn" and a "crib" are houses of a different kind, and used ordinarily for different purposes, and they are so known throughout the greater part of the state. The burning of a "crib with corn in it" is, then, a different offense from burning a "barn with corn in it," and a prisoner charged with the latter cannot be convicted on proof of his having committed the former. State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 455, 458.

Of corn.

A "crib of corn," used in a receipt binding the receiptor to return out of the next year's crop and hold the same subject to order, denotes an indefinite quantity, not merely because the capacity of the crib is not stated, but because the expression in common usage does not necessarily denote a crib full of corn; and hence the language of the instrument should be construed to mean that the receiptor received and would return a quantity of corn which was in a certain crib, and it was error for the court to allow plaintiff to prove the dimensions of the crib and the quantity of corn which a crib of such dimensions would hold, and to refuse to allow defendant to show the actual quantity of corn which was in the crib. Masterson v. Goodlett, 46 Tex. 402, 403.

CRIBS.

The word "cribs," used in the meat trade, means "clear ribs." Pepper v. Western Union Tel. Co., 11 S. W. 783, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 534, 4 L. R. A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699.

CRIM. CON.

The abbreviation "crim. con.," as used in a newspaper article stating that a city was enjoying one of the "juiciest crim. con. scandals of the day," are usually understood as an abbreviation for "criminal conversation," and these words have of themselves acquired a fixed and universal significance. Gibson v. Cincinnati Inquirer (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 311, 312.

A "crime" is defined to be "an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it." Pounder v. Ashe, 54 N. W. 847, 848, 36 Neb. 564 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 5); Wilkins v. United States (U. S.) 96 Fed. 837, 841, 37 C. C. A. 588; State v. City of Savannah (Ga.) R. M. Charlt. 250, 255, 257; Campbell v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, 199; City of Kansas v. Clark, 68 Mo. 588, 589; State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, 511. By this is meant a wrong of which the law takes cognizance as injurious to the public, and punishes in what is called a "criminal proceeding," prosecuted by the state in its own name, or the people of the sovereign. In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383, 386 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 32); Pounder v. Ashe, 36 Neb. 564, 571, 54 N. W. 847; State v. Thibodeaux, 19 South. 680, 681, 48 La. Ann. 600; State v. McConnell, 46 Atl. 458, 459, 70 N. H. 158. It is otherwise defined as "an act of omission or commission, punishable as an offense against the state." Campbell v. Supreme Conclave Improved Order Heptasophs, 49 Atl. 550, 553, 66 N. J. Law, 274, 54 L. R. A. 576; Bohner v. Bohner, 64 N. W. 700, 701, 46 Neb. 204; State v. Ostwalt, 24 S. E. 660, 661, 118 N. C. 1208, 32 L. R. A. 396.

A "crime" or "public offense" is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments: (1) Death; (2) imprisonment; (3) fine; (4) removal from office; (5) disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under this state; (6) other penal discipline. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 6802, 7741; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 3; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4061; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 1924, 5138; Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1041; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1228; Pen. Rep. 149; Wheeler v. Donnell, 110 Cal. 655, 656, 43 Pac. 1.

A "crime" is a wrong which the government notices as injurious to the public. United States v. Lee Huen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 442, 445.

"Crimes and misdemeanors" are offenses against statutes, which involve the punishment prescribed therein. State v. Brazier, 37 Ohio St. 78, 79.

A "crime" is an offense against the sovereignty, and can only be taken notice of and punished by the sovereignty offended, and others have no concern in it, and must treat it as a matter of indifference. People v. Williams, 24 Mich. 156, 163, 9 Am. Rep. 119; People v. Martin, 76 N. Y. Supp. 953, 955, 38 Misc. Rep. 67.

All violations of penal statutes are, in popular language, "criminal," and are "crimes." In re Howard, 26 Vt. 205, 208.

"A crime is a voluntary act proceeding from a wicked motive." In re Eaves (U. S.) 30 Fed. 21, 26.

The definition of a "crime" is that which the law declares to be the offense, and which you are to take and apply to the evidence to see whether the evidence makes out such a state of case as the law says shall be established to make out the crime. United States v. Howell (U. S.) 56 Fed. 21, 23.

An offense made indictable by statute is a "crime," within the meaning of the Constitution and law of Congress on the subject of habeas corpus. In re Clark (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 212, 222.

Classification.

All "crimes," it is contended, are divided into three classes: Treasons, felonies, and misdemeanors. All the crimes known to our law that have been classified at all by any of our statutes are misdemeanors and high misdemeanors. Johnson v. State, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 453, 464.

Act and intention, or criminal negligence, necessary.

A "crime" or "misdemeanor" shall consist in the violation of public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of the act and intention, or criminal negligence. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 31; Kent v. People, 9 Pac. 852, 857, 8 Colo. 563; People v. White, 34 Cal. 183, 187; Yoes v. State, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 42, 43; State v. Parkersburg Brewing Co., 45 S. E. 924, 925, 53 W. Va. 591. See, also, Gen. St. Colo. § 689; City of Greeley v. Hamman, 20 Pac. 1, 12 Colo. 94. The mere fact of going to a place with the intention of doing an unlawful act will not of itself subject the party to the punishment denounced against such act, unless he also carries his intention into effect. Yoes v. State, 9 Ark. 42, 43.

To constitute a "crime" against human laws, there must be, first, a vicious will, and, secondly, an unlawful act consequent on such vicious will. People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 68, 69 Am. Dec. 642.

"Crimes" are offenses against the public. They are those acts or attempts which tend to the prejudice of the whole community, and as a general rule the criminal intent and the act charged to be criminal must concur to constitute a "crime." Gorman v. Budlong, 49 Atl. 704, 706, 23 R. I. 169, 55 L. R. A. 118, 91 Am. St. Rep. 629.

To constitute a "crime," there must in all cases be a criminal intent. People v. Stark, 12 N. Y. Supp. 688, 690, 59 Hun, 51; Walker v. State, 45 S. E. 608, 609, 118 Ga. 757.

All grades of offenses included.

"The word 'crime' has always been considered as embracing every species of indictable offense." In re Voorhees, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 141, 147.

The term "crime," when used in any statute, shall mean any violation of law liable to punishment by criminal prosecution. Code Miss. 1892, § 1502.

Any offense against the public good and the first principles of justice and common honesty is a crime; and that the violation of a statute law made for the universal protection of the community, and inflicting a penalty for the fraudulent privation of property, is of this description, there exists no doubt. State v. Bishop, 7 Conn. 181, 185 (citing 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 26).

"Crime," in its general sense, means any indictable offense, but in common usage it denotes such offenses as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye, as distinguished from smaller offenses, which are denominated "misdemeanors." Lehigh County v. Schock, 7 Atl. 52, 53, 113 Pa. 373; Callan v. Wilson, 8 Sup. Ct. 1301, 1303, 127 U. S. 540, 32 L. Ed. 223; Lord v. State, 23 N. W. 507, 509, 17 Neb. 526; Slaughter v. People (Mich.) 2 Doug. 334, 335, note; Van Meter v. People, 60 Ill. 168, 170; Commonwealth v. Curren (Pa.) 2 Chest. Co. Rep. 393, 395, 397; Price v. Lancaster County, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 225, 231; In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383, 386; Pounder v. Ashe, 36 Neb. 564, 571, 54 N. W. 847; State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, 511; In re Hughes, 61 N. C. 57, 64.

"Crime" is synonymous with "misdemeanor," and includes every offense below felony punished by indictment, as an offense against the public. Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 68, 76, 16 L. Ed. 717; State v. Thibodeaux, 19 South. 680, 681, 48 La. Ann. 600; In re Clark (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 212, 222.

The term "crime" shall be construed to mean every offense, as well misdemeanor as felony, for which any punishment by imprisonment or fine, or both, may by law be inflicted. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 2311; Rev. St. Mo. 1890, § 2396; State v. Blitz, 71 S. W. 1027, 1030, 171 Mo. 530; State v. Linthicum, 68 Mo. 66, 68.

Offenses in this state are distinguishable into what may be termed "crimes" and "misdemeanors," the former punishable capitally, or by confinement in the state prison, and the latter by fine, or imprisonment in the county jail. On the trial of these cases there is no difference in the mode of trial or the right of the respondent, and no reason exists in this state why one indicted for that which would be a felony at common law may not be convicted of a misdemeanor; the conviction would bar a subsequent prosecution, as well as a conviction for theft, under an indictment for burglary or robbery. State v. Scott, 24 Vt. 127, 130.

Crimes are punished capitally, or by confinement in the state prison, while misdemeanors are punished by fine, or imprisonment in the county jail. Corbett v. Sullivan, 54 Vt. 619, 622.

The word "crime," in the provision of the federal Constitution that a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in any other state, shall, on demand by the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up and be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime, "embraces every act forbidden and made punishable by the law of the state." People v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182, 188; Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 66, 76, 16 L. Ed. 717; In re Burke (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 732, 734; In re Hughes, 61 N. C. 57, 64; In re Leary (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 106, 110. It means every offense, from the highest to the lowest in grade, and embraces those which are called "misdemeanors," as well as treason and felony. State v. Stewart, 19 N. W. 429, 432, 60 Wis. 587, 50 Am. Rep. 388; Ex parte Reggel, 5 Sup. Ct. 1148, 1152, 114 U. S. 642, 29 L.

Ed. 250; Morton v. Skinner, 48 Ind. 123, 124; State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, 511. See, also, Hyatt v. New York, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 461, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. Ed. 657. The word "crime," being used without qualification in 2 Gen. St. p. 1397, § 1, providing that no person offered as a witness in any action or proceeding of a civil or criminal nature shall be excluded by reason of his having been convicted of crime, must be held to be used in its general sense to include any crime. State v. Henson, 50 Atl. 468, 469, 66 N. J. Law, 601.

"Crimes," as used in Pen. Code, § 531, declaring that the conviction of a witness of any crime may be proved either by a record, or cross-examination of the witness, means both felonies and misdemeanors. State v. Sauer, 44 N. W. 115, 116, 42 Minn. 258.

Author of offense essential.

A necessary part of the definition of every crime is the designation of the author of the offense upon whom the penalty is to be inflicted. When a statute designates an act of the corporation as a "crime," and prescribes punishment therefor, it creates a criminal offense which would not otherwise exist, and can only be committed by a corporation, and the designation of the corporation enters into the definition of the crime. Paragon Paper Co. v. State, 49 N. E. 600, 603, 19 Ind. App. 314.

Bastardy.

Bastardy, being punished by a fine, is a crime. State v. Ostwalt, 24 S. E. 660, 661, 118 N. C. 1208, 32 L. R. A. 396.

Charges and specifications against clergyman.

The word "crime" has a generally accepted, clear legal meaning, and, where individual rights or interests in property hinge upon the definition of this word, such meaning must prevail, and charges and specifications on which the clergyman of a church is tried when rights of property are involved is not a crime. Pounder v. Ashe, 86 Neb. 564, 571, 54 N. W. 847.

Disturbing religious meeting.

The term "crime" is not broad enough to include petty offenses subject to summary convictions by a magistrate, such as disturbing religious meetings. Thus in the Code the crimes are divided into "felonies" and "misdemeanors," and no provision is found for a trial of either before a magistrate as such; yet the Code at length prescribes the form and method of procedure in the cases of bastardy, proceedings under the poor laws, and proceedings against vagrants and disorderly persons. These are termed in the Code, not "prosecutions for crimes," but "special proceedings of a criminal nature." Proceedings against vagrants, and in certain cases against disorderly persons, are as essentially punitive as any sentence imposed for crime. It is therefore apparent that too broad a significance should not be given to the term "crime" as used in the Code. Steinert v. Sobey, 44 N. Y. Supp. 146, 148, 14 App. Div. 505.

Drunkenness or intoxication.

Laws 1896, c. 112, § 40, providing that any person intoxicated in a public place is a disorderly person, and shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, makes such intoxication a crime. People v. Markell, 45 N. Y. Supp. 904, 907, 20 Misc. Rep. 149.

Revision, p. 491, providing that if a tavern keeper shall be convicted of being drunk in his own tavern, besides the penalty consequent on the "crime" of drunkenness, his license shall become void, does not declare drunkenness to be an indictable crime. The word "crime" is used in the sense of offense. State v. Locker, 14 Atl. 749, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 512.

Where there is a statutory provision that the term "crime" shall be construed to mean any offense for which any criminal punishment may be by law inflicted, a person who has been found guilty of drunkenness under a statute making drunkenness an offense has been guilty of a crime. People v. Police Com'rs of City of New York (N. Y.) 39 Hun, 507, 510.

"Crime," as used in Consolidation Act, § 268 (Laws 1882, c. 410), providing that no person shall be appointed to membership in the police force who shall have been convicted of any crime, should be construed to include public intoxication, under the excise act of 1857 declaring that the "offense" of intoxication is an offense against the provisions of the act, and punishable, and that it should be the duty of an officer to arrest all persons found intoxicated, for "offense" is synonymous with "crime." It possesses all the elements of a crime, for public intoxication is offensive to public decency and dangerous to the good order and well-being of society. People v. French, 7 N. E. 913, 102 N. Y. 583.

Under an act providing that a person found intoxicated in any public place shall be tried for such offense, and upon conviction fined not less than $3 nor more than $10, it is held that intoxication in a public place is a "crime," within the meaning of the statute making persons who have been convicted of crime ineligible to hold the position of police officer. People v. Police Com'rs, 4 N. Y. Cr. R. 300, 302.

Expulsion or deportation of alien.

Congress may make it a crime for an alien to come into this country in violation of our laws, or, being herein, to remain in violation of such laws after being ordered to depart; and should this be done, and a punishment prescribed for the violation of such law, the trial would be by the judicial, and not by the executive, branch of the government, and the constitutional right of trial by jury would inure to the benefit of the offender. Proceedings for the exclusion or deportation of Chinese under the exclusion act are not criminal in character. United States v. Lee Huen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 442, 445.

Failure to pay per capita road tax.

Under Acts 1898, No. 135, § 1, providing that jurors shall be disqualified if charged or convicted of any "crime or offense," a person charged by information with having willfully neglected to pay a per capita road tax levied by an ordinance of the police jury of a parish is not a competent juror. State v. Nicholas, 33 South. 92, 93, 109 La. 84.

Libel and slander.

See "Libel."

Verbal slander, though a tort, is not a "crime" under our statutes, so as to permit a wife to testify against her husband in an action for slander. Bohner v. Bohner, 64 N. W. 700, 701, 46 Neb. 204.

As local offense.

"A 'crime' is essentially local, and is the creature of the law which defends or prohibits it." Thus a defendant indicted in New York for perjury cannot be convicted on proof of false swearing in New York to a certificate in reference to business in a sister state, and required by the laws of the latter, which would have been perjury in the latter state, but is not perjury by the laws of New York. People v. Martin, 76 N. Y. Supp. 953, 955, 38 Misc. Rep. 67.

Navigation of vessel without pilot or engineer.

A "crime" is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law forbidding or commanding it. If such law is supplemented by a provision imposing some punishment or penalty for its violation, the idea of the public offense is complete, though there are different degrees of crime, some being felonies and some misdemeanors. Under Rev. St. § 4426 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3029], requiring inspection of hulls and boilers of vessels, and its amendment, Act Jan. 18, 1897, c. 61, 29 Stat. 489 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3029], requiring engineers and pilots, the violation of the statute by navigating a vessel without an engineer or pilot comes within the definition of the word "crime," as being an omission to do what a public law has commanded. United States v. Nash (U. S.) 111 Fed. 525, 528.

Offense, criminal offense, and felonious offense synonymous.

The words "offense" and "crime" are synonymous when applied to convictions for violations of statutes of a public nature. Whenever a person does an act which is prohibited by law, which act is punishable by fine, penalty, forfeiture, or imprisonment, he commits a "crime." People v. Hanrahan, 42 N. W. 1124, 1127, 75 Mich. 611, 4 L. R. A. 751; State v. Thibodeaux, 19 South. 680, 681, 48 La. Ann. 600.

The terms "crime," "offense," and "criminal offense" are all synonymous, and are ordinarily used interchangeably, and include any breach of law established for the protection of the public, as distinguished from an enforcement of mere private rights for which a penalty is imposed or punishment inflicted in any judicial proceeding. State v. West, 43 N. W. 845, 847, 42 Minn. 147.

The word "crimes" is said to mean, technically, "felonious offenses." United States v. Coppersmith (U. S.) 4 Fed. 198, 201 (citing McGinnis v. State, 28 Tenn. [9 Humph.] 43, 49 Am. Dec. 697).

Public offense synonymous.

The word "crime" may be used interchangeably with the term "public offense." West v. Territory (Ariz.) 36 Pac. 207, 208.

"Public wrongs" are a breach and violation of public rights and duties, which affect the whole community considered as a community, and are distinguished by the harsher appellation of "crimes" and "misdemeanors." Cullinan v. Burkhard, 84 N. Y. Supp. 825, 827, 41 Misc. Rep. 321.

Punishment essential.

Punishment is as necessary to constitute a crime as a definition. Without either there is no crime, and the repeal of either leaves no crime. People v. McNulty, 29 Pac. 61, 63, 93 Cal. 427.

Sending threatening letter.

Under Wag. St. p. 256, § 24, it is an offense to send a letter threatening to accuse one of any crime, a misdemeanor as well as felony. The word "crime," as there used, has the signification fixed by said statute (page 516, § 36), and is not to be taken as limited or explained by the words "or felony," used in connection with it. State v. Linthicum, 68 Mo. 66, 68.

Suicide.

It is truly said that intentional suicide while sane was a felony at common law. It was punished by forfeiture of goods, but as we do not inflict such punishments it is now little more than the shadow of a crime. Technically, it is still a crime in this state, because we have retained the common law so far as it is not inconsistent with our laws and general situations; but it is not a "crime," within the ordinary meaning of the term, or any usual definition, because we have no statute punishing either suicide or attempted suicide. Mr. Bishop's definition of a "crime" (1 Bish. New Cr. Law, § 32) is:

"Any wrong which the government deems injurious to the public at large, and punishes through a judicial proceeding in its own name." This was approved by this court in Re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383. Such is undoubtedly the general conception of a criminal offense, namely, a violation of law for which there is a punishment. Patterson v. Natural Premium Mut. Life Ins. Co., 100 Wis. 118, 126, 75 N. W. 980, 983, 42 L. R. A. 253, 69 Am. St. Rep. 899.

Violation of license laws.

A violation of Rev. St. § 3124, forbidding any agent to act for any insurance company in transacting the business of insurance without procuring a certificate of authority, is a "crime," it being punishable by a fine. State v. Hogan, 78 N. W. 1051, 1052, 8 N. D. 301, 45 L. R. A. 166, 73 Am. St. Rep. 759.

Under an ordinance making it an offense to transact express business without the payment of a license fee, such offense is not a "crime" within the power of equity to stay criminal proceedings. A license imposed for revenue is the exercise of the taxing, not the police, power, and prosecutions before the corporate tribunal for doing business without a license are quasi penal only at most. In substance and legal effect they are civil proceedings. Southern Exp. Co. v. City of Ensley (U. S.) 116 Fed. 756-759 (citing Royall v. Virginia, 116 U. S. 572, 6 Sup. Ct. 510, 29 L. Ed. 735).

Violation of municipal ordinances.

A "crime" is an act committed in violation of public law, a law extensive with the boundaries of the state which enacts it. Consequently, it is held that a conviction for the violation of a city ordinance is not a conviction of crime. Ex parte Hollwedell, 74 Mo. 395, 401. See, also, City of Kansas v. Clark, 68 Mo. 588, 589, and Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, 199.

A "crime" or "misdemeanor" consists in a violation of a public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of acts and intention, or criminal negligence. Gen. St. § 689. A municipal ordinance is not, in a constitutional sense, a public law, but a mere local rule or by-law—a police or domestic regulation; hence a violation of an ordinance does not necessarily constitute a "crime." McInerney v. City of Denver, 29 Pac. 516, 519, 17 Colo. 302; City of Greeley v. Hamman, 20 Pac. 1, 12 Colo. 94.

Violations of municipal police regulations are not "crimes." Delaney v. Police Court of Kansas City, 67 S. W. 589, 591, 167 Mo. 667.

In an action to recover costs against a city on an acquittal in a prosecution under a city ordinance, the question arose as to whether the violation of the city ordinance constituted a "crime" or not, and it was said the legal definition of "crime" at common law was a capital offense; all other offenses were misdemeanors. It is now sought to limit the definition, not alone to capital offenses, but to such offenses as are declared to be criminal by positive legislative enactment, known as "felonies" and "misdemeanors," excluding therefrom offenses against the ordinances of a municipality, although imposed by legislative authority. The true definition of the word "criminal," as distinguished from the word "civil," as recognized by the laws of the state, is a violation of any law or ordinance of man, subjecting the offender to public punishment, including fine or imprisonment, and excluding redress for private injury, punitive or compensatory. The criminal character of the offense is not converted into a demand of a civil nature, for the reason that the proceedings under the ordinance are to conform as near as practicable to the regulations respecting civil actions. City of Charleston v. Beller, 30 S. E. 152, 45 W. Va. 44.

An ordinance validly enacted, prohibiting certain acts under fines, penalties, or imprisonment, is, within the jurisdiction of the municipality enacting it, as much entitled to respectful obedience, and is as much the law of the land for that locality, as a law enacted by the Legislature, and a person violating it commits an offense, and in one sense a "crime," for which he may be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor, if, under the authority of a statute, the ordinance so provides. People v. Hanrahan, 42 N. W. 1124, 1127, 75 Mich. 611, 4 L. R. A. 751.

CRIME AGAINST LAW OF NATIONS.

"Crimes against the law of nations" are crimes which all nations agree to punish. Commonwealth v. Kosloff (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 545, 546.

CRIME AGAINST NATURE.

In Louisiana a statute making punishable the "crime against nature" was adjudged to refer to sodomy, and to be sufficiently specific and definite. It is an infamous crime and a felony by the ancient common law. The crime of sodomy is carnal copulation by human beings with each other against nature, or with a beast. State v. Vicknair, 28 South. 273, 274, 52 La. Ann. 1921.

The "crime against nature" includes both sodomy and bestiality, and is any unnatural connection between one man and another man, or between a person and a beast of the opposite sex. Ausman v. Veal, 10 Ind. 355, 356, 71 Am. Dec. 331.

The "crime against nature," as used in Pen Code, § 950, prohibiting a crime so designated, is synonymous with and means the offense of "sodomy" or "buggery."—People v. Williams, 59 Cal. 397, 398.

CRIME UNDER REVENUE LAW.

Specific acts which are violations of the laws made to protect the revenue may be said to be "crimes arising under the revenue laws." But a conspiracy to defraud the government, though it may be directed to the revenue as its object, is punishable by the general law against all conspiracies, and can hardly be said in any just sense to arise under the revenue laws, such as a conspiracy to defraud the United States of the duties on certain imported goods.—United States v. Hirsch, 100 U. S. 33, 36, 25 L. Ed. 539.

CRIMEN FALSI.

The term "crimen falsi" is borrowed from the civil law, where, as it implies, it included every species of fraud and deceit, or wrong involving falsehood. But according to the better opinion it does not include all offenses which involve a charge of untruthfulness, but only such as injuriously affect the administration of public justice, such as perjury, subornation of perjury, suppression of testimony by bribery or conspiracy, to procure the absence of a witness, or to accuse one wrongfully of a crime, or barratry, or the like. Matzenbaugh v. People, 62 N. E. 546-548, 194 Ill. 108, 88 Am. St. Rep. 134; Little v. Gibson, 39 N. H. 505, 510; State v. Randolph, 24 Conn. 363, 365; Webb v. State, 29 Ohio St. 351, 358; United States v. Block (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1174, 1175.

The test by which it may be determined whether or not an offense is of the "crimen falsi" is whether a conviction would render a party incompetent to testify. United States v. Baugh (U. S.) 1 Fed. 784, 787.

The technical signification of the term "crimen falsi" is understood to be forgery of any kind, perjury, dealing with false weights and measures, making false keys, and the like. Johnston v. Riley, 13 Ga. 97, 131 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.); 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373.

CRIMINAL.

See "Quasi Criminal."

In an action against a city to recover costs on acquittal of a person accused of a violation of a city ordinance, it was contended that a prosecution for the violation of an ordinance was a civil and not a criminal proceeding. It was held that the true definition of the word "criminal," as distinguished from the word "civil" as recognized by the laws of the state, is a violation of any law or ordinance of man subjecting the offender to public punishment, including fine or imprisonment, and excluding redress for private injury, punitive or compensatory, so that such proceeding is a criminal proceeding; and the fact that the method of procedure is to be conformed as far as practicable to the regulations respecting civil actions before justices does not convert the criminal character of the offense into a demand of a civil nature. City of Charleston v. Beller, 30 S. E. 152, 45 W. Va. 44.

The word "criminal" means punishable by law, human or divine, so that Code provision, § 35, providing that, when the issue of paternity shall be found against the putative father, he shall be fined by the justice not exceeding the sum of $10, the fine being a punishment, such act will be construed an act of criminal nature. State v. Burton, 18 S. E. 657, 660, 113 N. C. 655.

In an action to recover a forfeiture provided by law in case a property owner shall "intentionally make a false statement in regard to his property," a verdict of "guilty not criminally but negligently" means that the defendant made the false statement, not intentionally, but negligently, and is equivalent to a verdict of "not guilty," since the statute declares no penalty for a negligent false statement. State v. Wolfrum, 60 N. W. 799, 800, 88 Wis. 481.

Felonious synonymous.

The term "felonious," when used in the statute, shall be construed as synonymous in meaning with the word "criminal." Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 11,792.

CRIMINAL ACTION.

See "Criminal Prosecution."

A "criminal action" is a prosecution in a competent court of justice, in the name of the government, for the punishment of a crime. Landers v. Staten Island R. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 346, 353. "An action is criminal when instituted on behalf of a sovereign or commonwealth, in order to vindicate the law by the punishment of a public offense." State of Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497-498, 3 L. R. A. 554 (quoting Rap. & L. Law Dict. p. 21). "Criminal actions" are those actions prosecuted in a court of justice, in the name of the government, against one or more individuals accused of crime. State v. Schomber, 63 Pac. 221, 222, 23 Wash. 573 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

A criminal action is one prosecuted by the state, as a party, against another person charged with a public offense, in order that punishment thereof may be meted out to said person after conviction. Ames v. Kansas, 4 Sup. Ct. 437, 442, 111 U. S. 449, 28 L. Ed. 482.

The proceeding by which a party charged with a public offense is accused and brought to trial and punishment, is known as a "criminal action." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7746;

Code Crim. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 4; Crim. Code N. Y. 1903, § 5; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 3992; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5131; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4510; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1233; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 683. In speaking of this definition, the court says that, though this definition is statutory, it gives correctly the general meaning of "criminal action." There cannot, of course, be a criminal case or action until an indictment has been found. United States v. Lee (U. S.) 84 Fed. 626, 630. So, also, Code Cr. Proc. § 5, People v. Olmstead, 55 N. Y. Supp. 472-474, 25 Misc. Rep. 346.

A "criminal action" is one prosecuted by the state, as a party, against a person charged with a public offense, for the punishment thereof. Every other is a civil action. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 5159, 5160; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, §§ 15, 16; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 4205, 4206; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3336; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, §§ 2598, 2599; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, §§ 5, 6; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 4435; Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 129.

A "criminal action" is an action prosecuted by the state, at the expense of an individual, to prevent an apprehended crime against his person or property. Every other is a civil action. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 130.

A "criminal action" means the whole or any part of the procedure which the law provides for bringing offenders to justice.—Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 26.

Const. amend. 5, declaring that no person shall be compelled in any criminal action to be a witness against himself, applies only to evidence in suits or proceedings instituted against the witness himself. United States v. McCarthy (U. S.) 18 Fed. 87, 89.

Action for penalty.

Under Act April 5, 1888, § 27, declaring that any railroad corporation guilty of extortion shall forfeit and pay the state not less than $1,000, nor more than $5,000, to be recovered in a civil action by ordinary proceedings instituted in the name of the state, an action for such penalty brought by the state is a criminal action. State of Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554.

Action for violation of municipal ordinance.

Actions for the violation of city ordinances are not criminal actions. City of Madison v. Horner, 89 N. W. 474, 15 S. D. 359.

A "criminal action" is the whole or any part of a procedure in a court of justice which the law provides for bringing an offender to justice, and therefore comprises a prosecution in the recorder's court of the city for repairing a wooden building in violation of the city ordinance, though prosecuted in the name of the city, and not in the name of the state. Bautsch v. State, 11 S. W. 414, 415, 27 Tex. App. 342.

A proceeding to collect a fine imposed for the violation of a city ordinance is not a criminal action, but a civil suit in form, and quasi criminal in its character. Kansas City v. Neal, 26 S. W. 695, 696, 122 Mo. 232.

Action to recover price paid for liquors.

An action to recover the price paid for intoxicating liquors while in the nature of an action for a penalty, is not of a criminal character. Woodward v. Squires, 39 Iowa, 435, 438.

Appeal.

A "criminal action or proceeding" is one instituted and prosecuted by the state for the punishment of crime. In such a proceeding the state is actor, plaintiff, and dominus litis, and one of the immediate purposes of the proceeding is to secure the conviction of the criminal in order to punish him for his crime. In an appeal from a conviction the person so convicted may, if he sees fit, bring the record of the criminal proceeding before the appellate court, to the end that any error at law shown by the record may be corrected. In this subsequent proceeding the defendant in the criminal action becomes actor, plaintiff, and dominus litis. It is instituted and prosecuted by him, at his pleasure, for the correction of a private wrong which he alleges was done to him in the trial of a criminal action or proceeding, within the provision of the Code providing that an attorney shall not become recognized or give any bond in any criminal action or proceeding in which he shall be interested as an attorney. State v. Costello, 23 Atl. 868, 869, 61 Conn. 497.

Disbarment proceedings.

A proceeding to disbar an attorney is a "criminal action," within the meaning of Comp. Laws, 258, § 151, providing for change of venue in criminal actions. In re Peyton, 12 Kan. 398, 405.

Synonymous terms.

The terms "prosecution," "criminal prosecution," "accusation," and "criminal accusation" are used in the same sense. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 26; Childers v. State, 16 S. W. 903, 905, 30 Tex. App. 160.

The terms "criminal actions," "offenses," and "petty offenses" are, in the main, interchangeable and synonymous terms, and any distinction sought to be drawn between them is hypercritical. Bautsch v. State, 11 S. W. 414, 415, 27 Tex. App. 342.

CRIMINAL BUSINESS.

The term "criminal business," in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county, unless a change of venue be taken in such cases as may be provided by law, means criminal acts constituting the crime (Condon v. Leipsiger, 55 Pac. 82, 17 Utah, 498), or such conduct, attended with such intent, as amounts to a crime as the law defines "crime" (Mosby v. Gisborn, 54 Pac. 121, 126, 17 Utah, 257).

CRIMINAL CASE OR CAUSE.

Any criminal case, see "Any."

A "criminal case" is one which involves a wrong or injury done to the republic, for the punishment of which the founder is prosecuted in the name of the whole people. Grimball v. Ross (Ga.) T. U. P. Charit. 175, 181.

A "criminal case," as usually understood under the common law, is a proceeding by the sovereign of a realm, in his own court, against one subjected to his authority on a violation of his laws. The United States is such a sovereign, and proceeds in such manner in the courts of the United States clothed with criminal jurisdiction. State v. Smalls, 11 S. C. 262, 279.

"A 'criminal case' is a public prosecution for a crime or misdemeanor." In re Shultz's Lessee v. Moore (Ohio) Wright, 280, 281.

A "criminal cause" is one where the proceeding against the defendant is by indictment. Mitchell v. State, 11 N. W. 848, 12 Neb. 538.

14 Stat. 27, § 3, giving the District Court of the United States concurrent jurisdiction with the Circuit Court of all "causes, civil and criminal," affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce the rights secured by such statute in the state courts, means "causes of criminal prosecution." United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 786.

The expression "criminal cases," as used in Act March 8, 1809, providing that thereafter in all criminal cases recognizances shall be taken to and in the name of the commonwealth, is used in contradistinction to "civil cases." The most general classification of cases is "criminal" and "civil." Whatever case does not come within one description, seems properly to belong to the other. Adams v. Ashby, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 96, 97; Montee v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 132, 142; Applegate v. Commonwealth, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 12. And in this sense all prosecutions by indictments may be denominated "criminal cases." Montee v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 132, 142.

Action for forfeiture or penalty.

A suit by the state of Texas for the recovery of penalties for violation of the anti-trust law of 1809 was not a "criminal case," within the constitutional restriction of juris-isdiction of a court of civil appeals. State v. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. (Tex.) 67 S. W. 1057, 1058.

The words "criminal case," as used in the constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, mean a case in which punishment of crime is sought to be visited upon the person of the offender in ordinary courts of criminal prosecution, in contradistinction to a "proceeding in rem" to effect a forfeiture of the thing to which the offense primarily attaches. When the judgment of forfeiture of property necessarily carries with it and as a part of it a conviction and judgment against the person for the crime, the case is of a criminal character; but when the forfeiture does not necessarily involve personal conviction and judgment for the offense, but such conviction and judgment must be obtained, if at all, in another and independent proceeding, the remedy by way of forfeiture is of civil, and not criminal, nature. Consequently it is constitutional to apply a statute requiring compulsory process for the production of books and papers of a claimant or defendant in any proceeding other than criminal, arising under laws relating to revenue, to a judicial proceeding consisting of an action against property for the enforcement of a forfeiture on the grounds of alleged violation of the revenue laws, the proceeding being in rem, and no punishment by fine or imprisonment being authorized. United States v. Three Tons of Coal (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 149, 154.

The words "criminal cases," used in the state and federal Constitutions, have been construed by the courts to extend to and include imprisonment, fines, forfeiture, and penalty, whether to be recovered in a criminal or civil proceeding; and when an immunity statute is couched in the same language as the constitution, the language of the statute will receive the same construction as that of the Constitution, and be held to grant immunity from imprisonment, fine, forfeiture, or penalty. People v. Butler St. Foundry & Iron Co., 66 N. E. 349, 355, 201 Ill. 236 (citing Coffey v. United States, 116 U. S. 436, 6 Sup. Ct. 437, 29 L. Ed. 684).

As after conviction.

Acts 1875, c. 157, giving a right of appeal in habeas corpus, but providing that the act shall not apply to parties held in custody in criminal cases, means only held on a criminal charge against whom there is a pending case; and one in custody on a judgment of conviction is not held in custody in a "criminal case," within the meaning of the proviso. In re Vanvabry, 12 S. W. 786, 787, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 334.

Appeals.

"Criminal cases," as used in Act No. 30 of 1878, which requires appeals in criminal cases to be made returnable within 10 days after granting the order of appeal, includes appeals from judgments on forfeited bonds. State v. Balize, 38 La. Ann. 542, 543.

Contempt proceeding.

A "criminal case" is defined to be an action, suit, or cause instituted to secure conviction and punishment for a crime, or to punish an infraction of the criminal law. A contempt proceeding is not a criminal case. Taylor v. Goodrich, 40 S. W. 515, 524, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 109.

St. 1869, p. 96, 2 Comp. Laws, § 3288 (the act in relation to fines), provides, among other things, that the court, in entering "a judgment that the defendant in a criminal case pay a fine, * * * shall, by such judgment, direct that if the judgment or any part thereof is not paid, the defendant be imprisoned one day for each $2.00 of the judgment not paid," and applies to all criminal cases, of every kind and character not otherwise especially provided for; to cases of contempt, when criminal, as well as to other misdemeanors. Ex parte Sweeney, 1 Pac. 379, 380, 18 Nev. 74.

A proceeding for contempt is a distinct and independent matter as much as a new suit, and requires a distinct notice of proceedings to be given. After an attachment issues, the proceedings are to be regarded and entitled as of a criminal character. State v. Matthews, 37 N. H. 450, 454.

As controversy.

See "Controversy."

As criminal offense.

"Criminal Case," as used in Const. 1846, art. 1, § 6, providing that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, means a "criminal offense." Counselman v. Hitchcock, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 201, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. Ed. 1110.

As criminal proceedings or prosecution.

See "Criminal Prosecution"; "Criminal Proceeding."

Disbarment proceedings.

A "criminal case" is defined to be an action, suit, or cause instituted to secure conviction and punishment for crime; and hence a proceeding to disbar an attorney is not a criminal case, even though it is required to be in the name of the state, and remedy is provided if the attorney be found guilty. Scott v. State, 24 S. W. 789, 86 Tex. 321.

Forfeiture of intoxicating liquors.

The proceeding under St. 1869, c. 415, for the forfeiture of intoxicating liquors illegally kept and intended for sale, is of a criminal nature. The intent to sell contrary to law, in which the criminality of the keeping consists, must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, according to the ordinary rules of criminal actions, or a decree of forfeiture cannot be had. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 115 Mass. 142, 143.

Proceeding against prosecutor for costs.

No proceeding, even though it was instituted in the name of the state, has ever been held to be a "criminal case" unless the judgment rendered might in some contingency result in loss of liberty to the person against whom the proceeding is had. A ruling that a proceeding in the name of the state, which at most could never result in anything but the property of the citizen being seized and sold for the payment of a debt due the state, was a criminal case, would indeed be an anomaly; so that a proceeding against a prosecutor for costs in a criminal proceeding which he had dismissed is not a criminal case. State v. Steele, 37 S. E. 174, 175, 112 Ga. 39.

Proceeding before grand jury.

A proceeding before a grand jury is a "criminal case," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that a person shall not be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. United States v. Rosenthal (U. S.) 121 Fed. 862, 866 (citing Councilman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110).

Prosecution for violation of municipal ordinance.

"Criminal cases," as used in Const. art. 3, § 1, guarantying trial by jury in criminal cases means acts of remission which are in violation of the public laws of the state, and not violation of local by-laws or police regulations of town and city corporations. Williams v. City Council of Augusta, 4 Ga. 509, 513.

"Criminal," as designating cases in which, under the Illinois Constitution, the criminal court of Cook county has jurisdiction, includes all offenses not crimes or misdemeanors, but in the nature of crimes, and which are punished, not by indictment, but by forfeitures and penalties. It includes all qui tam actions, prosecutions for bastardy, informations in the nature of a quo warranto, and suits for the violation of ordinances. Wiggins v. City of Chicago, 68 Ill. 372, 375.

The term "criminal cases," as used in the statutes, means prosecutions under the laws of the state, and does not embrace offenses against city ordinances. People v. Manistee County Sup'rs, 26 Mich. 422, 424.

Const. art. 6, § 24, gives the General Assembly power to create a criminal court having concurrent jurisdiction with the district court in all "criminal cases." Within the meaning of such provision, one brought for an offense committed against the laws of the state, and not against the ordinances of a municipal corporation within the state, is meant. Garland v. City of Denver, 19 Pac. 460, 11 Colo. 534.

A prosecution for crime, in the name of the state, for a violation of its criminal laws, is a "criminal case." It has been held that a prosecution for the violation of a municipal ordinance, although instituted in the name of the municipality, is to be treated for some purposes as a criminal case (City of Macon v. Wood, 109 Ga. 149, 34 S. E. 322; Barnett v. City of Atlanta, 109 Ga. 166, 34 S. E. 322), although such a prosecution is not always embraced within the term "criminal case," as that term is used in the statutes of this state. Holliman v. City of Hawkinsville, 109 Ga. 107, 34 S. E. 214.

"Criminal cases," as used in Const. art. 3, § 1, providing that the superior courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases, means violations of public laws of the state, and not the local by-laws or police regulations of the town or city not embraced in the elemental definitions of "crimes" as recognized in the penal laws. Floyd v. Town of Eatonton Com'rs, 14 Ga. 354, 356.

Recognizance to keep peace and scire facias.

The words "criminal cases" in 1 St. 199, requiring all processes on recognizances in criminal cases to conclude against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth, means "not civil," and in its most comprehensive meaning may be regarded as including all cases for the violation of the penal laws, and includes a scire facias on a recognizance to keep the peace. Applegate v. Commonwealth, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 12. So, also, a prosecution for binding a man to keep the peace is a criminal proceeding or case. Adams v. Ashby, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 96, 97.

CRIMINAL CHARGE.

"Criminal charge," as used in Bill of Rights, § 14, declaring that no man shall be put to answer any criminal charge but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment, should be construed to include assaults, affrays, and assault and battery. Eason v. State, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 481, 482.

A "criminal charge," strictly speaking, exists only when a formal written complaint has been made against accused and a prosecution initiated. It is true the popular understanding of the term is "accusation," and it is freely used with reference to all accusations, whether oral, in the newspapers, or otherwise. But in legal phraseology it is properly limited to such accusations as have taken shape in a prosecution. In the eyes of the law a person is "charged with crime" only when he is called upon in a legal proceeding to answer to such a charge. Mere investigation by prosecuting officers, or even the inquiry and consideration by examining magistrates of the propriety of initiating a prosecution, do not of themselves create a "criminal charge"; and such is the meaning of the word as used in Rev. St. § 827, giving per diem fees to United States commissioners for hearing and deciding criminal charges, being restricted to formal written complaints which have been legally preferred, and it does not include the examination of complaining witnesses to determine whether a warrant shall issue. United States v. Patterson, 14 Sup. Ct. 20, 21, 150 U. S. 65, 37 L. Ed. 999.

"Deciding and hearing any criminal charges," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 847, allowing a United States commissioner $5 a day for the time necessarily employed in hearing and deciding any criminal charges, includes hearing and deciding motions on bail, and the sufficiency thereof, and motions for continuance. United States v. Jones, 10 Sup. Ct. 615, 616, 134 U. S. 483, 33 L. Ed. 1007.

CRIMINAL CODE.

The term "Criminal Code" means the Code of Criminal Procedure. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 29.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

A "criminal conspiracy" is a corrupt combination of two or more persons, by concerted action, to commit a criminal or unlawful act, or an act, not in itself unlawful or criminal, by criminal or unlawful means (Ætna Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 503, 507, 51 S. W. 624, 627, 106 Ky. 864, 45 L. R. A. 355); "or an act which would tend to prejudice the public in general, to subvert justice, disturb the peace, injure public trade, affect public health, or violate public policy; or any act, however innocent, by means neither criminal nor unlawful, where the tendency of the object sought would be to wrongfully coerce or oppress either the public or an individual. It is the corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do, by concerted action, something unlawful, either as a means or an end, that constitutes a criminal conspiracy. The unlawful thing must either be such as would be indictable if performed by one alone, or of a nature particularly adapted to injure the public or some individual by reason of the combination. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a conspiracy, that the acts agreed to be done should be acts which, if done, would be criminal. It is enough that they are wrongful; that is, amount to a civil wrong. Every conspiracy to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act for an illegal, fraudulent, malicious, or corrupt purpose, or for a purpose which has a tendency to prejudice the public in general, is an indictable offense, regardless of the means whereby it is to be accomplished." 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 172, is to substantially the same effect. A combination for the purpose of maintaining rates of insurance is not an indictable offense as a conspiracy. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 51 S. W. 624, 627, 106 Ky. 864, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 503, 45 L. R. A. 355. Overt acts are not necessary to the consummation of the offense. Commonwealth v. Ward, 92 Ky. 158, 161, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 422, 423, 17 S. W. 283.

A "criminal conspiracy" is a combination of two or more persons to commit some crime. Whether the crime to be committed is the object of the conspiracy, or the means for the accomplishment of some other object, is immaterial. A combination to unlawfully inflict upon another some injury, dependent for its successful accomplishment on the force of combination, may also in certain instances be a criminal conspiracy, though no act to be done in its execution or consummation of its object would be a crime if done independently of the combination, by any one of the conspirators. A combination to commit a crime is something more than an intent, though nothing may be done in pursuance of the combination. There must be an act of endeavor adapted to effectuate the purpose. The fact of combination is an act of endeavor, by each one combining, intended and adapted to effect the criminal intent and purpose common to all. Conspiracy, therefore, is closely akin to an attempt to commit a crime. It differs from the common-law attempt in that it is not merged in the crime intended, if that crime was actually committed. Two elements, therefore, enter into the crime of conspiracy; that of wrongful combination and that of criminal intent. State v. Gannon, 52 Atl. 727, 729, 75 Conn. 206.

By Pen. Code, § 168, subd. 5, one of the definitions of "criminal conspiracy" is as follows: "If two or more persons conspire (5) to prevent another from exercising a lawful trade or calling or doing any other lawful act, by force, threats, intimidation, or by interfering or threatening to interfere with tools, implements or property belonging to or used by another, or with the use or employment thereof." Again, in Buffalo Lubricating Oil Co. v. Everest (N. Y.) 30 Hun, 586, 588, it is said "a conspiracy consists in the unlawful combination or agreement of two or more persons to do an act unlawful in itself, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means." Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Ass'n, 30 App. Div. 508, 514, 52 N. Y. Supp. 475; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320; Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540-555, 8 Sup. Ct. 1301, 32 L. Ed. 223; Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197-203, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419. Within such definition a boycott constitutes a "conspiracy." Matthews v.

Where two or more persons corruptly or wrongfully agree with each other that trains carrying the mails and interstate commerce shall be forcibly arrested, obstructed, and restrained, such conduct clearly constitutes "conspiracy." Or if two or more persons corruptly or wrongfully agree with each other that the employes of the several railroads carrying the mails and interstate commerce should quit, and that their successors should, by threats, intimidation, or violence, be prevented from taking their places, such acts would constitute a "conspiracy." In re Charge to Grand Jury (U. S.) 62 Fed. 823, 831.

In Jacob's Law Dictionary the essential elements of a "criminal conspiracy" are thus stated: "Confederacy (confederatio) is when two or more combine together to do damage or injury to another, or to do an unlawful act. A false confederacy between divers persons shall be punished, though nothing be put in execution. But this confederacy punishable by law, before it is executed, ought to have these incidents: First, it must be declared by some matter of prosecution, as by making of bonds or promises the one to the other; secondly, it must be malicious, as for unjust revenge; thirdly, it ought to be false against an innocent; and, lastly, it is to be out of court, voluntarily." State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271, 284, 22 Am. Rep. 719 (quoting Termes de la Ley, 158).

Criminal conspiracy "may be said to consist in an artful contrivance and combination to produce the injuries consequent on other crimes, in a manner calculated to elude the provisions and restraints of criminal law. The forms in which it appears are as various as the ingenuity of man is unbounded." Lambert v. People (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 578, 601.

Under St. § 3915, declaring that any corporation or association of persons who shall combine with others "for the purpose of regulating or controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured article, or property of any kind shall be guilty of a criminal conspiracy," it is not an offense to combine for the purpose of maintaining rates of insurance, as the rule of ejusdem generis applies in determining the meaning of the word "property." Ætna Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 503, 507, 51 S. W. 624, 627, 106 Ky. 864, 45 L. R. A. 355.

Civil conspiracy distinguished.

The terms "criminal" and "civil" are used respectively to designate a conspiracy which is indictable, or a conspiracy which will furnish ground for a civil action. To render a conspiracy indictable at common law, no overt acts in carrying out the design of the conspirators were necessary. But if, in carrying out the design of the conspirators, overt acts were done causing legal damage, the person damaged has a right of action. Hence arose the dictum that the gist of criminal conspiracy is the combination, and the gist of civil conspiracy is the injury or damage. So far as rights and remedies are concerned, all criminal conspiracies are embraced within civil conspiracies. Brown v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co., 41 S. E. 553, 554, 115 Ga. 429, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 126.

CRIMINAL CONTEMPT.

"Criminal contempts" are all acts committed against the majesty of the law, or against the court as an agency of the government, and in which, therefore, the whole people are concerned. In criminal contempts the proceeding is punitive, and the punishment operates in terrorem, and has a tendency to prevent the repetition of the offense. State v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 86, 177 Mo. 205.

"Criminal contempts" are all those acts in disrespect of the court or of its process, or which obstruct the administration of justice, or tend to bring the court into disrepute, etc. Ex parte Robertson, 27 Tex. App. 628, 631, 11 S. W. 669, 670, 11 Am. St. Rep. 207 (citing Rap. Contempt, § 21).

Code Civ. Proc. § 8, subd 1, defines "criminal contempt" as disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior committed during its sitting, in its immediate view and presence, and directly tending to interrupt its proceedings, or to impair the respect due to its authority. In re Teitelbaum, 82 N. Y. Supp. 887, 889, 84 App. Div. 351.

"'Criminal' contempts are those committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, such as insulting language or acts of violence which interrupt the regular proceedings in court. This class of contempts may and should be punished summarily by the order of the presiding judge, or by the court, after such hearing, at once, as the court may deem just and necessary." Androscoggin & K. R. Co. v. Androscoggin R. Co., 49 Me. 392, 400.

The term "criminal contempt" is defined by Mr. Rapalje in his work on Contempts, § 21, as "all those in disrespect of the court or its process, or which obstruct the administration of justice, or tend to bring court into disrespect." Wyatt v. People, 28 Pac. 961, 963, 17 Colo. 252.

The term "criminal contempt," when applied to the disobedience of the orders of a court, means a willful disobedience thereof. People v. Dwyer (N. Y.) 2 Civ. Proc. R. 379, 383.

A "criminal" contempt is one where contemptuous conduct is directed against the dignity and authority of the court. Welch v. Barber, 52 Conn. 147, 156, 52 Am. Rep. 567.

"Criminal contempt" involves no element of personal injury. It is of public character and indictable. It consists in the violation of the rights of the public as represented under their judicial tribunals. An element of willfulness exists in them, and they are published in the interest of public justice, not in the interest of individual litigation. The wilful disobedience of a preliminary injunction is a criminal contempt. People v. McKane, 28 N. Y. Supp. 981, 985, 78 Hun, 154.

A court of record has power to punish for a "criminal contempt" a person guilty of either of the following acts, and no others: (1) Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior, committed during its sitting, in its immediate view and presence, and directly tending to interrupt its proceedings, or to impair the respect due its authority. (2) Breach of the peace, noise, or other disturbance directly tending to interrupt its proceedings. (3) Willful disobedience to its lawful mandate. (4) Resistance willfully offered to its lawful mandate. (5) Contumacious and unlawful refusal to be sworn as a witness, or, after being sworn, to answer any legal and proper interrogatory. (6) Publication of a false or grossly inaccurate report of its proceedings. But a court cannot punish as a contempt the publication of a true, full, and fair report of a trial, argument, decision, or other proceeding therein. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1892, § 8. Such contempt may be divided into two classes: (1) That which is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, and (2) that which is committed out of court. When the contempt is committed in the view and presence of the court, it may be punished summarily. When not so committed, the party charged must be notified of the accusation, and have a reasonable time to make a defense. Code Civ. Proc. § 10. The publication of a false and grossly inaccurate report of a proceeding in court belongs to the latter class. People v. Court of Sessions of Albany County, 41 N. E. 700, 701, 147 N. Y. 290.

Refusal to obey a venire, while a "contempt" within the common-law definition of that term, given in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, is not a "criminal contempt," as defined in 2 Rev. St. 273, 274, authorizing a justice of the peace to punish as for a criminal contempt persons guilty of the following acts: Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior towards such justice while engaged in a trial of a cause, or in the rendering of any judgment, or in any judicial proceedings, which shall tend to interrupt such proceedings, or to impair the respect due to his authority; second, any breach of the peace, noise, or other disturbance tending to interrupt the official proceedings of a justice; third, resistance willfully offered by any person, in the presence of the justice, to the execution of any lawful order or process made or issued by him. Robbins v. Gorham, 25 N. Y. 583, 594.

Civil contempt distinguished.

The sole difference between a criminal contempt and a contempt in a civil case is that the former is a willful disobedience of an order of court, while the latter is a mere disobedience by which the right of a party to an action is defeated or hindered. People v. Dwyer, 90 N. Y. 402, 406.

There seems to be a well-defined distinction between contempts which are merely criminal or punitive and those which are termed "civil contempts," the latter applying to such as are remedial in character. The two classes of contempts are often distinguished as "direct" and "constructive" or "consequential." "Civil contempts" are those quasi contempts which consist in failing to do something which the contemner is ordered by the court to do for the benefit or advantage of another party to the prosecution before the court, while "criminal contempts" are those in disrespect of the court or its processes, or which obstruct the administration of justice, or tend to bring the court into disrespect. "Criminal contempts" are those committed in the immediate presence and view of the court, such as insulting language and acts of violence which interrupt the regular proceedings of the court. This class of contempts may and shall be punished summarily. Laramie Nat. Bank v. Steinhoff, 53 Pac. 299, 300, 7 Wyo. 464. This classification is not affected by the fact that the procedure is in most instances substantially the same whether the contempt be civil or criminal, nor is the character of the contempt in this regard controlled by the character of the court in which it occurs. State v. Downing, 66 Pac. 917, 921, 40 Or. 309.

Newspaper publications.

A "criminal contempt" at common law may generally be defined as any act which tends either to obstruct the course of justice, or to prejudice the trial in any action or proceeding then pending in court; but where a judge is a candidate for re-election, the publication in a newspaper of articles charging him with having been intentionally partial and corrupt in the trial of certain cases in his court, already disposed of and not then pending, and the circulation of such papers among the jurors and officers of the court, is not a criminal contempt. State v. Circuit Court for Eau Claire County, 72 N. W. 193, 194, 97 Wis. 1, 38 L. R. A. 554, 65 Am. St. Rep. 90.

The publication of an article in a newspaper which is printed and circulated in the place where the trial is had, pending the trial, and which concerns the cause on trial, which is calculated to prejudice the jury and prevent a fair trial, often has been held a criminal contempt of the court trying the cause. Citing O'Shea v. O'Shea, 15 Prob. Div. 59; Ex parte Green, 7 Times L. Rep. 411; Daw v. Eley, L. R. 7 Eq. 55; Ramsbotham v. Senior, L. R. 8 Eq. 575; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Where a corporation engaged in the publication of a newspaper publishes an article concerning a pending trial in the place where the trial is had, which is calculated to prejudice the jury and prevent a fair trial, it is guilty of a criminal contempt, though there was no fraudulent intent in such publication. Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Commonwealth, 52 N. E. 445, 446, 172 Mass. 294, 44 L. R. A. 159, 70 Am. St. Rep. 280.

Refusal to testify.

Under Pen. Code, § 143, subd. 6, providing that contumacious and unlawful refusal to be sworn as a witness, or, after being sworn, to answer any legal or proper interrogatory, shall be a "criminal contempt," the refusal to testify before a grand jury is a contempt committed in the presence of the court on which the grand jury is attending. In re Taylor, 28 N. Y. Supp. 500, 502, 8 Misc. Rep. 159.

CRIMINAL CONVERSATION.

See "Crim. Con."

"Criminal conversation" means adultery. Prettyman v. Williamson (Del.) 39 Atl. 731, 732, 1 Pennewill, 224.

The basis of the action of criminal conversation is trespass vi et armis, on the theory that the wife is not a free agent or separate person, and that therefore her consent is immaterial, so that the adulterer is pursued as a mere trespasser. Crocker v. Crocker (U. S.) 98 Fed. 702, 703.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

"Criminal informations" are in the name of the state, and only the allegations of the state attorney who exhibits them, and they are said by Mr. Chitty to be analogous to declarations for the redress of a personal injury, except that the latter are at the suit of the subject for the satisfaction of private wrong, and the former are for the punishment of offenses affecting the interest of the public. An "information," says Lord Coymyn, is a declaration of the charge or offense against one at the suit of the King.

And in Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2553, Lord Mansfield says: "An information for a misdemeanor is the King's suit. The title of the cause is the King against the defendant." State v. Barrell, 54 Atl. 183, 184, 75 Vt. 202.

Lord Coleridge says that a "criminal information" is a criminal cause or matter, only differing in mere form from an indictment, the King's coroner referring the information, instead of the jurors presenting the bill; but to all intents and purposes the one being as much a criminal matter as the other. The refusal of a defendant to plead to a criminal information will not defeat the jurisdiction of a circuit court. United States v. Borger (U. S.) 7 Fed. 193, 196, 197.

CRIMINAL INTENT.

"Criminal intent," when used in penal statutes, is an intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of his property. People v. Moore, 3 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 453, 460, 469.

CRIMINAL JUDGMENTS.

"Criminal judgments are divided into two kinds: (1) By express sentence to the punishment proper for the crime. (2) Judgments without any such sentence. Of the latter there are two kinds: (1) Outlawry; (2) abjuration. Judgment of outlawry in England is given by the coroner, and is in these words: 'Therefore, the said A. B., by the judgment of the coroner of our Lord the King, of the county aforesaid, is outlawed.'" Republica v. Doan (Pa.) 1 Dall. 86, 91, 1 L. Ed. 47.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.

"Jurisdiction" is the authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide cases; the power to hear and determine a cause. If the law confers the power to render a judgment or decree, then the court has jurisdiction. "Criminal jurisdiction" is that which exists for the punishment of a crime. Ellison v. State, 125 Ind. 492, 496, 24 N. E. 739. See, also, Landers v. Staten Island R. Co., 53 N. Y. 450, 457.

The term "criminal," when applied to and used with reference to the jurisdiction of a court of a judicial proceeding, generally has relation to the nature and form of the remedy and cause of action or occasion for instituting legal proceedings, and has respect to the object of the jurisdiction of the court, and not to the presence of suitors. In re City of Buffalo, 34 N. E. 1103, 1104, 139 N. Y. 422.

CRIMINAL LAW.

"Blackstone speaks of 'criminal law' as that branch of jurisprudence which teaches of the nature, extent, and degrees of every crime, and adjusts to it its adequate and necessary penalty." United States v. Reisinger, 9 Sup. Ct. 99, 101, 128 U. S. 398, 32 L. Ed. 480.

CRIMINAL LIBEL.

As an infamous crime, see "Infamous Crime."

"Whatever, if made the subject of civil action, would be considered libelous without laying special damages, is indictable." 2 Whart. Cr. Law (9th Ed.) 1598. Any representation in writing, or by pictures, effigies, or the like, calculated to create disturbances of the peace, to corrupt the public morals, or to lead to any act which, when done, is indictable. 2 Bish. Cr. Law (7th Ed.) § 907. Any publication which has a tendency to disturb the public peace or good order of society is a libel by the common law, and is indictable. Moody v. State, 10 South. 670, 94 Ala. 42 (citing Newell, Defam. 937).

A "criminal libel" is a malicious defamation, expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead or the reputation of one who is living, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. Malice is the essence of the offense, and is the wrongful doing of an act with the intention to do harm. Where the libel imputes crime, malice is implied, and the mere charge carries with it the element of malice. State v. Shaffner (Del.) 44 Atl. 620, 621, 2 Pennewill, 171.

A "criminal libel" is committed by any writing calculated to create disturbances of the peace, corrupt the public morals, or lead to any act which, when done, is indictable. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Johnson (Ky.) 72 S. W. 754, 755 (citing 2 Bish. Cr. Law, 907).

A "criminal libel" is prosecuted in the name of the people, not for the purpose of redressing an injury done to an individual, but is so prosecuted to punish as a crime, for the reason that it tends to provoke animosity and violence and disturb the public peace and repose. People v. Stokes, 24 N. Y. Supp. 727, 728, 30 Abb. N. C. 200.

CRIMINAL MATTERS.

The expression "criminal matters," as used in the Constitution, providing that sheriffs shall receive a certain compensation from the parish for their services in criminal matters, except the keeping of prisoners, conveying convicts to the penitentiary and insane persons to asylum, and service of process from another parish, was not used in its strict legal significance as synonymous with "criminal cases" and "criminal proceedings," but conveys the meaning of what ever pertained to sheriffs' services in criminal matters of every kind, and means some not strictly included in that designation. Lake v. Parish of Caddo, 37 La. 788, 791.

CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE.

"Criminal negligence," as the term is used in the statute requiring as a defense to an action for injuries that the person injured should have been guilty of criminal negligence, means such negligence as amounts to a flagrant and reckless disregard of one's own safety, and a willful indifference to the injury liable to follow. Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Chollette, 49 N. W. 1114, 1115, 33 Neb. 143; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Landauer, 54 N. W. 976, 981, 36 Neb. 642; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Porter, 38 Neb. 226, 235, 56 N. W. 808, 810; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hague, 66 N. W. 1000, 48 Neb. 97; Same v. Hyatt, 67 N. W. 8, 10, 48 Neb. 161; Same v. Martelle (Neb.) 91 N. W. 364, 367; Same v. Winfrey (Neb.) 93 N. W. 526, 530. It is such negligence as would amount to a flagrant and reckless disregard of his own safety, and amount to a willful indifference to the injury liable to follow. Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Chollette, 33 Neb. 143, 49 N. W. 1114; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Baier, 37 Neb. 235, 55 N. W. 913. Gross negligence is "criminal" negligence, as the word is used in the statute. Recklessness that is without thought or care, disregard of one's own safety, or a willful indifference or intentional disregard of the consequences likely to follow, is criminal negligence when accompanying the intentional doing of an act incompatible with a proper regard for one's own life. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Roeser (Neb.) 95 N. W. 68, 70. The purpose of the statute was not to fasten upon a common carrier of passengers a liability as insurer, but it was rather intended to authorize a presumption from an injury to a passenger that the damages inflicted were entirely attributed to the negligence of the railroad company; and to avoid liability it devolves upon the company to show that the injury was imputable to the criminal negligence of the party injured. Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Chollette, 33 Neb. 143, 146, 49 N. W. 1114; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Baier, 37 Neb. 235, 255, 55 N. W. 913; Clark v. Zarniko (U. S.) 106 Fed. 607, 608, 45 O. C. A. 494.

Criminal negligence cannot be imputed to a transportation company which hired a stevedore to load a ship, and furnished the gangway used for such purpose, when the accident occurred by reason of the alleged negligence of the stevedore or his agent in rolling resin barrels down the gangway so rapidly that the deceased was unable to manage the same, and in consequence was thrown into the river and drowned. If it plainly appeared, however, that the rapid handling of the barrels so as to cause the death was brought about under the orders and directions of the stevedore, such conduct on his part would amount to criminal negligence; but where it did not clearly appear from the declaration whether it was the stevedore or his agents who caused such rapid handling of the barrels, the stevedore cannot be held liable for the same under the rule of respondeat superior. Rankin v. Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co., 73 Ga. 229, 230.

If any person employed in any capacity by any railroad company doing business in the state shall, in the course of such employment, be guilty of negligence, either by omission of duty, or any act of commission in regard to the matters intrusted to him, or about which he is employed, from which negligence serious bodily injury, but not death, occurs to another, he is guilty of criminal negligence. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 115.

Code, § 4586, provides that any person employed in any capacity by any railroad company doing business in the state who shall be guilty of negligence, either by omission of duty, or by any act or commission in relation to the matter intrusted to him, by which any person is injured, shall be guilty of a penal offense. Held that, since by this section any neglect which caused serious injury to any person by an agent, servant, or employé of a railroad company was a crime, a waiver and release by which an employé released a railroad company from liability "which may result from the carelessness, negligence or misconduct of himself or any other person or employé connected with the road or in the service of said company, or from any other cause," was void as being a stipulation to waive criminal neglect. Cook v. Western & A. R. Co., 72 Ga. 48, 50.

CRIMINAL NEWS.

"Criminal news," as used in Pub. Acts 1885, p. 433, providing for the punishment of any person who shall sell any book, magazine, pamphlet, or paper devoted wholly or principally to the publication of criminal news, should be construed in its wide signification of information of wicked and immoral acts of recent occurrence or discovery. State v. McKee, 46 A. 409, 412, 73 Conn. 18, 49 L. R. A. 542, 84 Am. St. Rep. 124.

CRIMINAL OFFENSE.

A "criminal offense" consists in a violation of a public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of act and intention or criminal negligence (Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 645, c. 38, § 280; Spalding v. People, 49 N. E. 993, 997, 172 Ill. 40), and the intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the perpetration of the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the person accused. Howard v. People, 61 N. E. 1016, 193 Ill. 615.

"A criminal offense consists in a violation of a public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of act and intention, or criminal negligence." (Statutory definition.) Under this statute a nonresident landowner cannot be held criminally liable because a stray thistle here and there growing on his land was overlooked and went to seed, when he had in good faith done all that could be reasonably expected of him to prevent it, although Rev. St. c. 18, § 5, makes it the duty of the commissioners of Canada thistles to prosecute any person who might violate the law on the subject of Canada thistles. Story v. People, 79 Ill. App. 562, 565.

As all grades of crime.

The terms "crime," "offense," and "criminal offense," when used in any statute, shall be construed to mean every offense, as well misdemeanor as felony, for which any punishment by imprisonment or fine, or both, may by law be inflicted. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 2311; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 2396; State v. Blitz (Mo.) 71 S. W. 1027, 1030.

The expression "criminal offense," as used in Const. art. 1, § 11, providing that no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except, etc., is to be construed in its most comprehensive sense, as including both felonies and misdemeanors. Slaughter v. People (Mich.) 2 Doug. 334, 335.

A misdemeanor is defined by the statute to be a criminal offense. State v. Thornhill, 74 S. W. 832, 833, 174 Mo. 364.

Assault and battery.

Assault and battery is a "criminal offense" within the meaning of the article of the Constitution which declares that no man shall be put to answer any criminal offense but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment. Durr v. Howard, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 461, 463.

Contempts.

Contempt of court is a specific "criminal offense." But what class of "criminal offenses" contempt belongs to is nowhere defined. It may be punished by a fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the court, and there is no limit placed to the extent of either. So that a contempt incurred by violating an order of court prohibiting any one from interfering with the receivers of a railway, with its operation, is a criminal offense. In re Acker (U. S.) 66 Fed. 290, 292; McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 51 Pac. 696, 698, 119 Cal. 419; In re Reese (U. S.) 107 Fed. 942, 947, 47 C. C. A. 87; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 770, 771. It is punished sometimes by indictment, and sometimes in a summary proceeding. In either mode of trial the adjudication against the offender is a conviction, and the commitment in consequence is execution. In re Williamson, 26 Pa. 9, 19, 67 Am. Dec. 374.

A contempt of court is an offense against the state, and not against the judge personally. State ex rel. Van Orden v. Sauvinet, 24 La. Ann. 119, 121, 13 Am. Rep. 115; Yates v. Lansing (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 395, 417, 6 Am. Dec. 290; Sharp v. State (Tenn.) 49 S. W. 752, 753, 43 L. R. A. 788, 73 Am. St. Rep. 851.

Crime and offense synonymous.

See "Crime"; "Offense."

Duress as fraud.

See "Duress"; "Fraud."

Violation of city ordinance.

The violation of a city ordinance is not a criminal offense. Kansas City v. Neal, 26 S. W. 695, 696, 122 Mo. 232.

The violation of a city ordinance is not a "criminal offense" within the meaning of Const. 1875, art. 2, § 12, providing that criminal offenses shall be prosecuted by indictments or information. Ex parte Hollwedell, 74 Mo. 395, 401.

The term "criminal offense" includes any punishable violation of law, the doing of which a penal law forbids, or omitting to do what it commands, and hence includes all violations of municipal ordinances punishable by fine or imprisonment. State v. West, 42 Minn. 147, 43 N. W. 845, 847.

CRIMINAL OPERATION.

In a complaint charging that defendants entered into a collusion with defendant K. to cause a criminal operation to be performed upon the body of plaintiff, and to have said K. perform an abortion upon her body, the words "criminal operation" are used synonymously with "abortion." Miller v. Bayer, 68 N. W. 869, 870, 94 Wis. 123.

CRIMINAL ORGANIZATION.

"Criminal organizations" include all orders, organizations, associations, or by whatever name called, which teach, advise, counsel, encourage, or practice a commission of crimes forbidden by law." Wooley v. Watkins, 22 Pac. 102, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 590.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDING.

A "criminal proceeding" is the manner in which the government, in its own name, punishes a person guilty of crime. United States v. Lee Huen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 442, 455.

Criminal proceedings cannot be said to be brought or instituted until a formal charge is openly made against the accused, either by indictment presented or information filed in court, or at least by complaint before a magistrate. The submission of a bill or indictment by the attorney for the government to the grand jury, and the examination of witnesses before them, are both in secret, and are no part of the criminal proceedings against the accused, but are merely to assist the grand jury in determining whether such proceedings shall be commenced. The grand jury may ignore the bill and decline to file any indictment, and it cannot be known whether any proceedings will be instituted against an accused until an indictment against him is presented in open court. Post v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 611, 613, 161 U. S. 583, 40 L. Ed. 816.

Wherever a punishment is prescribed by law for an offense committed, it cannot be inflicted by Const. art. 11, § 14, but by indictment; yet it does not follow that, for the sake of inflicting it, a proceeding directed by the Legislature, which they intended to be a civil proceeding, shall therefore be converted into a criminal one by indictment. There will be a conflict between the punishment and the civil proceeding directed by the Legislature, and, as this civil proceeding cannot be converted into an indictment, therefore the punishment will be deemed impracticable, and the civil proceeding will remain, as it was intended by the Legislature. Sevier v. Justices of Washington County, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 334, 339.

Whether a proceeding is deemed "civil" or "criminal" depends upon the form permitted, not upon the question whether the penalty described is denominated a "fine" or "forfeiture." State v. McConnell, 46 Atl. 458, 459, 70 N. H. 158.

The words "criminal proceedings," as used in St. 1845, p. 188, relating to the reduction of town and county expenses (section 26), embrace proceedings against beggars and vagrants to prevent the commission of crime, against disorderly persons, and search warrants and proceedings thereon. People v. Ontario County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 260, 261.

Bastardy proceedings.

A prosecution under the statute for the support of bastard children is not a civil proceeding, but a criminal proceeding, and cannot be tried at a term of the court which is restricted to the transaction of civil business only. Hyde v. Chapin, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 77, 79.

A proceeding under the bastardy act is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding. Though in form criminal, it is essentially of the nature of a civil action, the object being not the imposition of a penalty, but merely to compel the putative father to contribute to the support of his illegitimate child. Therefore such a proceeding is not embraced within Laws 1879, § 88, providing that in all criminal cases below the grade of felony the appeal from the county court shall be taken directly to the Appellate Court. Rawlings v. People, 102 Ill. 475, 478.

Contempt proceedings.

See "Contempt."

Criminal case distinguished.

The terms "criminal case" and "criminal proceeding" are not equivalent, though the latter presupposes the existence of the former. "Criminal proceeding" means any step taken in the progress of a criminal action, but does not include criminal conduct on the part of a citizen against whom no charge has been legally preferred. Therefore an indictment charging a police officer with failing to disperse a mob could not be based upon Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2127, providing that any ministerial officer refusing to perform any duty he is required by law to perform in any "criminal case or proceeding" shall be fined, etc. Hopewell v. State, 54 N. E. 127, 129, 22 Ind. App. 489.

Divorce for adultery.

A libel for divorce for adultery partakes of the nature of a criminal proceeding, since, if the same be proved, the defendant suffers injury, not only to his good name, but he may also be deprived of his property. O'Bryan v. O'Bryan, 13 Mo. 16, 21, 53 Am. Dec. 128.

Habeas corpus and quo warranto.

See "Habeas Corpus"; "Quo Warranto."

Information in rem.

Proceedings on an information in rem are civil, and not criminal, proceedings. Anonymous (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 996, 997.

Proceeding on application for bankrupt's discharge.

The proceedings on a bankrupt's application for discharge are not criminal proceedings, or even criminal in their nature, like an action to recover a penalty or to enforce a forfeiture, but simply a civil proceeding instituted and prosecuted by the bankrupt for a discharge from his debts; and testimony given by the bankrupt is not excluded by Bankr. Act, § 7a, subd. 1, providing that no testimony given by the bankrupt shall be offered in evidence against him in a criminal proceeding. A criminal proceeding is an action instituted and prosecuted by the state against a person who is accused of crime, to punish him therefor. Criminal cases are those which involve a wrong or injury done to the republic, for the punishment of which the offender is prosecuted in the name of the whole people. In re Leslie (U. S.) 119 Fed. 406, 409.

Prosecution for penalty.

Prosecutions to recover penalties for the violation of a city ordinance are not criminal proceedings, but are civil suits. City of St. Louis v. Knox, 74 Mo. 79, 81.

A proceeding under a statute to enforce a penalty for illegally keeping billiard tables, etc., is criminal in character, the judgment provided for being both a fine and security for good behavior. Pardee v. Smith, 27 Mich. 33, 43.

CRIMINAL PROCESS.

The term "criminal process" is intended to signify any capias, warrant, citation, attachment, or other written order issued in a criminal proceeding, whether the same be to arrest, commit to jail, collect money, or for whatever other purpose used. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 28.

Criminal process issues to compel a person to answer for a crime or misdemeanor, where punishment of some kind or other must be the consequence of conviction. Ward v. Lewis (Ala.) 1 Stew. 26, 27.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

"Criminal prosecutions" involve public wrongs—a breach and violation of public rights and duties which affect the whole community, considered as a community, in its social and aggregate capacity. The end they have in view is the prevention of similar offenses, not atonement or expiation for crime committed. Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128, 136 (quoting 3 Bl. Comm. 2, 4, 5, 11).

"A 'criminal prosecution' is defined to be a prosecution in a court of justice, in the name of the government, against one or more individuals accused of a crime. The issue is between the government and the prisoner on a question of the guilt or innocence of the latter. It is not a question of property. A criminal prosecution, although instituted by an individual, is not in any sense an action between the person instituting it and the prisoner. It is not an action at all. That is defined to be the legal demand of one's rights, or the form given by law for the recovery of that which is due." Harger v. Thomas, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 128, 130, 84 Am. Dec. 422.

The term "criminal prosecution," as used in Const. art. 10, § 10, providing that in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right to be heard by himself and counsel, etc., means any prosecution carried on in the name of the commonwealth for any offense or crime against society. The word "criminal" is used as the opposite to "civil" suits or actions. The one includes all suits of the government, the end and design of which is the punishment of the accused; the other embraces all actions for individual redress. Ely v. Thompson, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 70, 74.

Action for forfeiture or penalty.

An action to recover a penalty for selling intoxicating liquors in violation of Comp. Laws 1871, § 2138, is a civil suit, and not a "criminal prosecution." People v. Bartow, 27 Mich. 68, 69.

The term "criminal prosecution," as used in St. 1864, c. 121, providing that in all criminal prosecutions in which the defendant relies for his justification on any license, appointment, or authority he shall prove the same, should be construed to include a proceeding under St. 1876, c. 162, for the forfeiture of intoxicating liquors illegally kept and intended for sale. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 122 Mass. 8, 11.

Under a complaint and search warrant under St. 1853, c. 215, § 25, for intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept for sale, liquors were seized, and subsequently the proceedings were quashed for informality, and the liquors ordered to be returned to the claimant, who moved for costs. The court were of the opinion that this was not a civil suit or proceeding in which the claimant could recover costs of the commonwealth. The process on which the liquors were seized was a criminal process, and the proceedings after the seizure were proceedings in a criminal prosecution. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 375, 376.

As an action, suit, etc.

See "Action"; "Suit."

Civil action, etc., distinguished, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

Criminal action, prosecution, accusation, and criminal accusation synonymous, see "Criminal Action."

Contempt proceedings.

A proceeding to show cause why a defendant should not be adjudged guilty and punished for contempt in refusing to obey an order directing him to pay temporary alimony and suit money is in the nature of a criminal prosecution, entitling defendant to an appeal to the Supreme Court, under Cr. Code, § 281, authorizing an appeal to the Supreme Court by defendant, as a matter of right, from any judgment against him. State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 416, 418.

Inquiries by grand jury.

"Criminal prosecutions," as used in the Constitution, declaring that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a right to be heard by himself and by counsel and to be confronted by witnesses, did not include inquiries before a grand jury. State v. Wolcott, 21 Conn. 271, 279.

Preliminary examination.

A preliminary examination of one charged with a felony is a "criminal prosecution." It is carried on in the name of the state to detect crime and the criminal, but the direct effect of it may be to deprive the accused of his liberty, and is within the provision of Rev. St. 1889, § 4174, providing for changes of venue in criminal prosecutions. Ex parte Bedard, 106 Mo. 616, 622, 17 S. W. 693.

Proceedings for violation of city ordinance.

Only prosecutions in the name of the state for the violation of a statute are to be regarded as "criminal prosecutions," and a proceeding under a city charter for a violation of some provision thereof is a penal action on the part of the city, and not a criminal prosecution. Cooper v. People, 2 N. W. 51, 41 Mich. 403.

"Criminal prosecutions" embrace all prosecutions under the general penal statutes of the state, even though such statute may have been re-enacted in the form of a city ordinance. "If the prosecution be under the statute, and in a court deriving its jurisdiction of the offense not from the city charter, but from the Constitution or statutes of the state, it is a criminal prosecution, and not a proceeding by a municipality to recover a penalty." People v. Controller of the City of Detroit, 18 Mich. 445, 454.

Const. art. 1, § 6, guarantying the right of trial by jury in all "criminal prosecutions," does not include offenses against ordinances enacted by a municipal corporation, in the exercise of its legitimate police authority, for the preservation of the peace, good order, health, or morals of a community, as they are not generally construed to be criminal cases. City of Mankato v. Arnold, 30 N. W. 305, 306, 36 Minn. 62.

Prosecutions to recover a penalty for a violation of a city ordinance are not criminal prosecutions. Delaney v. Police Court of Kansas City, 67 S. W. 589, 591, 167 Mo. 667.

The enforcement of a penalty for violating a city ordinance is not a "criminal prosecution," within the meaning of the constitutional provision relating to the right of trial by jury in criminal prosecutions. Wong v. City of Astoria, 11 Pac. 295, 297, 13 Or. 538.

Judge Dillon says: "If no imprisonment for the violation of a municipal regulation is authorized the prosecution is not criminal, and there is no constitutional right to a trial by jury; but if a limited imprisonment on default of paying a fine, or even as part of the punishment, is authorized by the Legislature, this does not necessarily make the case, if it be for a violation of a mere municipal regulation, one to which the right of trial by jury extends." In re Cox, 89 N. W. 440, 129 Mich. 635.

Synonymous terms.

A "criminal action," as used in the Penal Code, means the whole or any part of the procedure which the law provides for bringing offenders to justice, and the terms "prosecution," "criminal prosecution," "accusation," and "criminal accusation" are used in the same sense. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 26.

CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY.

The test of criminal responsibility is said to be whether, at the time the accused committed the act, he had the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong, and comprehend his relations to others, and to understand the nature and consequences of the particular act; that an act was morally wrong, or that he was conscious of doing wrong. This is called the "right and wrong test." State v. Harrison, 15 S. E. 982, 986, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 475).

CRIMINAL VIOLENCE.

The term "criminal violence," as used in Pen. Code, § 1322, providing that "except with the consent of both, or in case of criminal violence by one upon the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action to which one or both are parties," does not include violence before marriage. The words mean what they say—criminal violence on the wife by the husband, or criminal violence on the husband by the wife. People v. Curiale, 70 Pac. 468-470, 137 Cal. 534, 59 L. R. A. 588.

CRIMINALLY INCURRED.

Under Practice Act, § 123, amended by St. 1887, p. 55, allowing an attachment where the liability was "criminally incurred," an attachment will lie where the execution arose out of a rape on plaintiff's daughter. "The liability was criminally incurred because incurred in the perpetration of a crime, to wit, a rape." Kuehn v. Paroni, 19 Pac. 273, 274, 20 Nev. 203.

CRIMINATE.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the trial of Aaron Burr, said that the true sense of the rule that no man is bound to criminate himself is that no witness is compellable to furnish any of the links in a chain of evidence against himself. Kendrick v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 490, 497.

"Criminate," as used in the rule of evidence that a husband or wife cannot give testimony tending to criminate, means, in effect, the charging of a crime. To be objectionable, however, the evidence of the wife must directly criminate the husband, and a mere tendency to criminate is not enough to justify its rejection. Stewart v. Johnson, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 87, 94, 95.

CRIMINATIVE CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

"Criminative circumstantial evidence" is derived from the conduct of the party accused, and external objects or physical facts, with their appearances, as indicative of such conduct. As Mr. Burrill has remarked: "Where a case of suspected crime has become the subject of judicial investigation, and the general fact of the commission of a crime has been ascertained, and particularly where vigorous measures have been set on foot to trace out the perpetrator, the idea, now converted into prospect of discovery, and that becoming a more and more probable event as fact after fact is brought to light, naturally and almost necessarily fills the mind with alarm; particularly where the criminal finds his own person drawn, or likely to be drawn, within the sphere of investigation. Emotion and agitation exhibited under such circumstances, especially when no charge of guilt has yet been made, are regarded among the most convincing evidences of criminal agency that can be submitted to a human tribunal." Noftlinger v. State, 7 Tex. App. 301, 323 (citing Burrill on Cr. Ev. 466).

CRINOLINE CLOTH.

Tariff Act March 2, 1872 (14 Stat. 561), relating to duties on women's dress goods, composed wholly or partly of wool, worsted, hair, alpaca, or other materials, imposed certain duties on hair cloth known as "crinoline cloth," and on all other manufactures of hair not otherwise provided for. Held, that the term "crinoline cloth," as there used, included goods composed of 80 per cent. goat's hair and 20 per cent. cotton, such as brilliantines, lusterines, alpacas, and mohairs. Arthur's Ex'rs v. Butterfield, 8 Sup. Ct. 714, 717, 125 U. S. 70, 31 L. Ed. 643.

CRISP.

"Crisp," defined by Webster as "brittle or friable; in a condition to break with a short, sharp fracture"—adopted in discussion of qualities claimed for patented gunpowder. Atlantic Dynamite Co. v. Climax Powder Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 925, 934.

CRITICISM.

Criticism is a discussion or, as applicable in libel, a censure, of the conduct, character, or utterances of the person criticised. Belknap v. Ball, 47 N. W. 674, 675, 83 Mich. 583, 11 L. R. A. 72, 21 Am. St. Rep. 622.

CROP.

See "Agricultural Crops"; "Annual Crops"; "Entire Crop"; "Staple Crops"; "Way-Going Crop."
All crops, see "All."

The word "crop" is defined as "the top end or highest part of anything, especially of a plant; also that which is cropped, cut, or gathered from a single field, or of a single kind of grain or fruit, or in a single season, especially the valuable product of what is planted in the earth; fruit; harvest." The word also includes corn and other cultivated plants while growing. As applied to agriculture, the most general definition of "crop" seems to include that part of any agricultural product which is susceptible of being cropped for the uses of husbandry, whether already gathered or progressing toward maturity for that purpose. Where a policy of insurance against loss by fire or storm described the property insured under the general name of "crops," and the charter of the company authorized the insurance of hay, grain, or other agricultural products in barns, stacks, or otherwise, the term "crops" were sufficient to include crops growing in the field. De Haven v. Mutual Ins. Co. (Pa.) 1 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 98, 99; Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. De Haven (Pa.) 5 Atl. 65, 67.

"A crop is primarily some product of the soil gathered during a single year, and when a man speaks of his crop he will ordinarily be understood to mean a crop raised by himself; and yet the words do not of themselves import this meaning, but may be taken to mean a crop that is a portion of the present year's growth of the article in question, which had become his by purchase as well as by production." As used in a contract for the sale of the seller's crop of flax, evidence is admissible to show the meaning of the term. Goodrich v. Stevens (N. Y.) 5 Lans. 230, 231.

The words "crops raised," as used in Code 1883, § 1754, giving a landlord a lien on all crops raised, means simply the crop grown or gathered during the year. The Legislature had in mind no distinction between fructus industriales and fructus naturales. The word "crop" covers both. Webster defines "crop" as "that which is cropped, cut, or gathered in a single season." In Goodrich v. Stevens, 5 Lans. 230, 231, the court says "a crop is primarily some product of the soil gathered during a single year." State v. Crook, 44 S. E. 32, 33, 132 N. C. 1053.

The word "crops" may mean either gathered or growing crops. The word "crops," in a will, will pass crops growing on a farm at the death of the testator, where there are other words in the will by which the gathered crops would pass, such as "hay, fodder, produce, and provisions." Dana v. Lewis, 2 R. L. 492, 493.

As chattels or land.

See "Chattels"; "Land"; "Personal Property."

Fruit and berries.

"Crops," as used in Gen. St. c. 66, § 315, relating to levy of execution on growing crops, is equivalent to the common-law term "emblements," except that it possibly includes perennial grasses, but it does not include growing blackberries. Sparrow v. Pond, 52 N. W. 36, 37, 49 Minn. 412, 16 L. R. A. 103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 571.

"Crops," as used in the Political Code, prescribing the tests of lands which may be entered as agricultural as those which would produce ordinary agricultural crops, would include those suitable for the cultivation of the ordinary fruit and crops grown in the state. Reeves v. Hyde, 19 Pac. 685, 686, 77 Cal. 397.

Straw and corn stalks.

The term "crop," in a lease entitling the landlord to a share of the crop, includes straw. Rank v. Rank, 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 211, 213.

The term "crop," within the meaning of the rule that the rights of a mere cropper in rented premises terminate when the crop is gathered, includes the corn stalks remaining after the corn is gathered, as it is a well-known fact that they are of substantial use to farmers as feed for cattle. Moser v. Lower, 48 Mo. App. 85, 90.

Trees.

"Crop," as defined by Webster, is: "That which is gathered; the corn or fruits of the earth collected; harvest; the word which includes every species of fruit or product gathered for man or beast; corn or other cultivated plants, while growing (a popular use of the word); anything cut off or gathered. The etymology of the word 'crop' appears to be from the Saxon 'cropp,' or 'cropp,' signifying the crop of a fowl, a cluster of ears of corn, grapes, ears of corn, and from the Welsh 'croplad,' a gathering or taking hold of." Webst. verb. "Crops." The definition given by Webster is even broader than the popular signification of the word. Under the former, as we see, not only is meant grain produced from annual vegetation, but also fruits from trees and perennial plants. But it is at least doubtful if, under the common and restrictive acceptance of the term, anything more would be understood than products from annual plants, as cereals, maize, etc., and the latter appears to be the sense in which the term is employed in technical legal parlance. "Crop," says Bouvier, "is nearly synonymous with emblements, and by this term is understood the crops growing upon the land. By crops is here meant the products of the earth which grow yearly, and are raised by the annual expense and labor, or great manurance and industry, such as grain, but not fruits which grow on trees, which are not to be planted yearly, or grasses and the like, though they are annual." Bouv. Law Dict. verb. "Emblements." As used in a clause of the Constitution exempting growing crops from taxation, it does not include fruit trees. Cottle v. Spitzer, 4 Pac. 435, 436, 65 Cal. 456, 52 Am. Rep. 305.

In Civ. Code, § 465, providing that standing crops, etc., shall be considered, for purposes of taxation, as part of the land to which they are attached, the word "crops" means only the actual products of the soil, resulting from planting and cultivation, and does not include trees growing in their natural state. Globe Lumber Co. v. Lockett, 30 South. 902, 904, 106 La. 414.

CROP ENDS.

The crop ends of a Bessemer steel rail are the imperfect ends of such rails, which are cut off to bring the remainder down to a solid rail of regular length. Robertson v. Perkins, 9 Sup. Ct. 279, 280, 129 U. S. 233, 32 L. Ed. 686.

CROP TIME.

"Crop time," as used in an agreement to a planter and his overseer, means that portion of the year which is occupied in making and gathering the crop. Martin v. Chapman (Ala.) 6 Port. 344, 351.

CROP TO BE PLANTED.

A "crop to be planted," as used in a mortgage, creates an equitable lien on the land on which the crop is to be grown in favor of the mortgagee. Such a crop is not the same as a growing crop, or one the seed for which is already planted, and a mortgage on the crop to be afterwards planted creates only an equitable lien, which will not support an action of detinue for a recovery of the crop after it has matured. Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 435.

CROPPER.

A cropper is a person hired by the owner of land to cultivate the land, receiving for his compensation a portion of the crops raised. Under a pure or unqualified cropping contract the entire legal ownership of the crop is in the owner of the land until division. A cropper has no estate in the land; so, though he has possession of the crop, it is only the possession of a servant, and is in law that of the landlord. Wood v. Gar- rison (Ky.) 62 S. W. 728, 729; Steel v. Frick, 56 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 172, 175; Fry v. Jones (Pa.) 2 Rawle, 11, 12; Adams v. McKesson's Ex'x, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 81, 83, 91 Am. Dec. 183.

A cropper is "one who, having no interest in the land, works it in consideration of receiving a portion of the crop for his labor. A contract to raise a crop on the shares does not create the relation of landlord and tenant even between the owner of the land and one who does the work." Romero v. Dalton, 11 Pac. 863, 864, 2 Ariz. 210.

The term "cropper," and not "tenant," characterizes one who raises a crop upon the land of another under contract to raise the crop for a particular party, and therefore such person has a lien upon the crop for whatever is due him from the landlord. Burgie v. Davis, 34 Ark. 179.

Persons who are to receive half of a crop for planting it, working it, taking care of it, and packing it, are croppers, and as such acquire no property in the crop before it is divided. McCormick v. Skiles, 30 Atl. 195, 163 Pa. 590.

As laborer.

See "Laborer."

Tenant distinguished.

The difference between a tenant and a cropper is clear. The tenant has an estate in the land for the term, and consequently he has a right of property in the crop. If he pays a share of the crop for rent, it is he that divides off to the landlord his share, and until such division right of property and of possession in the whole is his. The landlord has no lien on the crop for rent, whether such lien be stipulated for or not. A cropper has no estate in the land. That remains in the landlord. Consequently, though he has in some sense the possession of the crop, it is only the possession of a servant, and is in law that of the landlord. The landlord must divide off to the cropper his share; in short, he is a laborer, receiving a share of the crop. Harrison v. Ricks, 71 N. C. 7, 10, 11 (quoted in Strain v. Gardner, 21 N. W. 35, 39, 61 Wis. 174).

In Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415, it is said the true test to be applied to cases in which the rent is to be paid in shares is as follows: "On the other hand, if A. should demise, lease, and let the farm to B., to have and to hold for the term of one or five years, to be cultivated in a husbandlike manner, rendering and paying to A. an annual rent for the use of the farm, to wit, one-half of the crop raised, I see no reason why the parties should not be deemed to intend an actual and technical lease." Thus an agreement whereby the party of the first part does hereby lease her farm, etc., one-third of the grain, roots, and hay to be delivered, where the tenant has all the buildings on the premises and is to keep them in repair, the term is that one year from December to December (a longer time than a cropping season merely), and there is no possession reserved to the landlord during the term, or any control over the premises, if it is under seal and made to bind heirs, executors and assigns, is a lease, and not a cropping contract. Strain v. Gardner, 21 N. W. 35, 39, 61 Wis. 174. See, also, Kelly v. Rummerfeld, 94 N. W. 649, 650, 117 Wis. 620.

"Cross," as used in the charter of a railroad company, declaring that, if the railroad should intersect or cross any highway, the company should restore such highway to its former condition of usefulness, meant the actual cutting in two of the highway by the railroad, and did not include a place where the railroad for some distance ran along the edge of the highway, so that in some places it was necessary to change the edge of the highway, but which did not traverse or intersect it. State v. New Haven & N. R. Co., 45 Conn. 331, 344.

To cross means to pass from side to side of. Cent. Dict. And one railroad cannot be said to cross another unless the rails of one extend over that rail of the other which is furthest from the side of approach. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co., 70 Pac. 939, 940, 67 Kan. 569.

The word "cross," as used in the articles of incorporation of a railroad company, giving it permission to build viaducts over navigable streams or bays, or water over which such railroad may cross, does not include the Delaware, because "cross" means to go over from bank to bank, on the theory that the Legislature could not confer the power to cross the Delaware, as, in order to cross such a navigable river, that the authorization from the state was not alone sufficient, as it had not exclusive jurisdiction, yet, as it possessed jurisdiction of some sort for the purpose of guarding the common highway, its permission was needed by whomsoever claimed the right to interfere at all with this public privilege. Attorney General v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 631, 646.

Pub. St. c. 112, § 160, requiring a guard at a cornice of a roof over a station platform, where some portion of such construction crosses the railroad, does not apply to a case where a cornice of a roof over a station platform is one foot five inches from the nearest line of the outside rail. Quinn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 55 N. E. 891, 895, 175 Mass. 150.

Within the provision of the railroad law conferring on every steam railroad the right to cross or unite its railroad with any other railroad before constructed, to any point on its road, and providing that every railroad corporation whose road is intersected by any new railroad shall unite with such road in forming necessary intersections and grant the requisite facilities, the word "cross" could hardly have been intended to apply to one kind of a railroad, and the word "unite" to another kind; and, as the legislature by the word "cross" intended to preserve the right of railroads of different kinds to cross each other, the word "connect" should also be construed to apply to different railroads, and hence the electric railroads are subject to the provisions of the statute. Stillwater & M. St. Ry. Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co., 64 N. E. 511, 514, 171 N. Y. 589, 59 L. R. A. 489.

As cross on same level.

Though the word "cross," when used as a verb, may and does frequently mean to intersect, as to lay a body across another, as to cross a word in writing, and should, when used in some connections, receive that construction, it is equally true that it also means, as defined by lexicographers, as well as in ordinary parlance, to pass from side to side, to pass or move over, or to cross a road or river, which may be done by passing upon a bridge elevated upon the level of the road or river. As a preposition it means "over, from side to side." In ordinary and popular phrases, the word is used indifferently to express the passing from side to side of an object, whether the passage is affected by moving directly upon the object crossed, or by passing from it at an elevation. A bridge is said to cross a river. A man is said to have crossed a river who has passed over it upon a bridge, which does not come in contact with the river. As used in Gen. R. R. Act 1850, § 39, requiring locomotives to sound a bell or whistle at least 80 rods from the place where the railroad should cross any traveled road or street, it does not mean merely to cross at grade, but includes an overhead crossing. People v. New York Cent. Ry. Co. (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 199, 202 (affirmed in 13 N. Y. [3 Kern.] 78, 80).

Within Rev. St. art. 4232, requiring trains to give signals where the railroads cross any public road and to stop where two railroads cross, relates only to crossings at grade. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Thomas, 28 S. W. 343, 344, 87 Tex. 288.

CROSS-ACTION.

Set-off as, see "Set-Off."

CROSS-BILL.

A cross-bill, ex vi termini, implies a bill brought by defendant in a suit against the plaintiff in the same suit, or against other defendants in the same suit, or against both, touching the matters in question in the original bill. A bill of this kind is usually brought either (1) to obtain a necessary discovery of the facts in aid of the defense to the original bill, or (2) to obtain full relief to all parties touching the matters in the original bill. Mercantile Trust Co. v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 518, 524 (citing Story, Eq. Pl. § 389); Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. Co. v. Texas Cent. Ry. Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 61, 70, 137 U. S. 171, 34 L. Ed. 625; Stonemetz Printers' Mach. Co. v. Brown Folding Mach. Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 851, 852; First Nat. Bank v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 580, 584; Shields v. Barrow, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 130, 144, 15 L. Ed. 158; Ayres v. Carver, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 591, 595, 15 L. Ed. 179; Thruston v. Big Stone Gap Imp. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 484, 485; North British & Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Lathrop (U. S.) 70 Fed. 429, 433, 17 C. C. A. 175; Kemp v. Mitchell, 36 Ind. 249, 256; Summers v. Hutson, 48 Ind. 228, 233; Ladner v. Ogden, 31 Miss. 332, 340; Bishop v. Miller, 48 Miss. 364, 369, 371; McRae v. University of the South (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 463, 466; Griffin v. Griffin, 70 N. W. 423, 424, 112 Mich. 87; Hill v. Frink, 40 Pac. 128, 129, 11 Wash. 562; Boland v. Ross, 25 S. W. 524, 525, 120 Mo. 208; Kidder v. Barr, 35 N. H. 235, 251; West Virginia Oil & Oil Land Co. v. Vinal, 14 W. Va. 637, 677-679; State v. Nathans, 49 S. C. 199, 218, 27 S. E. 52. If its purpose is different from this, it is not a cross-bill, though it may have a connection with the general subject of the original bill. Armstrong v. Mayer (Neb.) 95 N. W. 51, 54 (citing Stuart v. Hayden, 18 C. C. A. 618, 72 Fed. 402; Krueger v. Ferry, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 432, 5 Atl. 452, 453. Sometimes it is brought against the codefendants in such depending suit, where they have opposite claims which the court cannot determine on the bill already filed, and the determination of such clashing interests is still necessary to a complete decree on the subject-matter of the suit. Krueger v. Ferry, 5 Atl. 452, 455, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 432 (citing Coop. Eq. Pl. 85).

The object of a cross-bill is either (1) to bring before the court new matter in aid of the defense to the original bill, (2) to obtain a discovery of facts from the plaintiff or codefendant in aid of the defense of the original bill, (3) to obtain some affirmative relief as to the matters in issue in the original bill, or (4) to obtain full relief for all parties and a complete determination of all controversies which arise out of the matters charged in the original bill. Blythe v. Hinckley (U. S.) 84 Fed. 228, 234; Perkins Oil Co. v. Eberhart, 64 S. W. 760, 765, 107 Tenn. 409; Springfield Milling Co. v. Barnard & Leas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 261, 263, 26 C. C. A. 389; Harrison v. Harrison, 19 Atl. 126, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 75.

A cross-bill is a species of pleading in equity used for the purpose of obtaining discovery necessary to the defense, or to obtain some relief founded on the collateral claims of the party defendant to the original suit. Tison v. Tison, 14 Ga. 167, 171.

A cross-bill is a proceeding to procure a complete determination of a matter in litigation. Derbyshire v. Jones, 94 Va. 140, 142, 26 S. E. 416.

A cross-bill is proper when the defendants, or any or either of them, have equities arising out of the subject-matter of the original suit which entitle them to affirmative relief which they cannot obtain in that suit. Whittemore v. Paten (U. S.) 84 Fed. 51, 56 (citing Kingsbury v. Buckner, 134 U. S. 650, 658, 10 Sup. Ct. 638, 33 L. Ed. 1047); Quick v. Lemon, 105 Ill. 578, 584; Ayers v. Chicago, 101 U. S. 184, 187, 25 L. Ed. 838; Hooper v. Central Trust Co., 32 Atl. 505, 508, 81 Md. 559, 29 L. R. A. 262.

A cross-bill may be filed for relief whenever any question arises between the defendant and complainant, or between two defendants to the bill, that cannot be determined completely without a cross-bill or cross-bills, to bring any matter in dispute completely before the court, to be litigated by the proper parties and upon the proper proofs. In such cases it becomes necessary for some one or more of the defendants to the original bill to file a cross-bill against the complainant and one or more of the other defendants to that bill, and thus to bring the litigated points fully before the court. Perkins Oil Co. v. Eberhart, 64 S. W. 760, 765, 107 Tenn. 409.

A cross-bill, like all other bills, must contain within itself, if true, a distinct cause of equitable relief. Nichol v. Dunn, 25 Ark. 129, 131.

It must seek equitable relief; but, subject to this qualification, a claimant who has brought a defendant into a court of equity and subjected him to an adjudication of his rights in a certain subject-matter cannot be heard to say that there is no equity in a cross-bill which seeks an adjudication of all the rights of the parties to the original suit in the same subject-matter. Springfield Milling Co. v. Barnard & Leas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 261, 263, 26 C. C. A. 389.

As counterclaim.

See "Counterclaim."

As a defense or auxiliary suit.

A cross-bill is a mere auxiliary suit and a dependency of the original. Joyce v. Growney, 55 S. W. 466, 470, 154 Mo. 253; Stonemetz Printers' Machinery Co. v. Brown Folding Mach. Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 851, 852; Blythe v. Hinckley (U. S.) 84 Fed. 228, 234; Meissner v. Buek (U. S.) 28 Fed. 161, 162; Port Royal & A. R. Co. v. South Carolina (U. S.) 60 Fed. 552, 553; Hooper v. Central

So far that the equity between the codefendants is the result of complainant's litigation. McRae v. University of the South (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 463, 466 (quoting Judge Cooper in Hergel v. Laitenberger, 2 Tenn. Ch. 251, 254). And jurisdiction of the original bill includes the jurisdiction of the cross-bill. First Nat. Bank v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 580, 584; Brooks v. Laurent (U. S.) 98 Fed. 647, 652, 39 C. C. A. 206. It is a mere auxiliary proceeding, either for discovery in aid of the defense against the original bill, or to procure a more complete determination of the matter already in litigation in the court, or for both these purposes. Lord Hardwicke says that "both the original and the cross bill constitute but one suit, so intimately are they connected." Johnson R. Signal Co. v. Union Switch & Signal Co. (U. S.) 43 Fed. 331, 332; Ayres v. Carver, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 591, 595, 15 L. Ed. 179; Hill v. Frink, 40 Pac. 128, 129, 11 Wash. 562; Chappel v. Chappel, 39 Atl. 984, 989, 86 Md. 532. It is generally treated as a defense to the original bill, or as a mere auxiliary suit rendered necessary in order to fully present and have adjudicated the subject-matter already in litigation. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Lathrop, 70 Fed. 429, 433, 17 C. C. A. 175; Ladner v. Ogden, 31 Miss. 332, 340. A sovereign state cannot be forced into court against her consent; but a cross-bill presupposes that the plaintiff is already in court rightfully, and, when the state comes into court of her own accord and invokes its aid, "she is of course bound by all the rules established for the administration of justice between individuals." State v. Pacific Guano Co., 22 S. C. 50, 74. And when a suit is instituted by a state, and a cross-bill is filed against it, it is proper to serve the state by making substituted service upon the Attorney General, by whom the bill was filed. Port Royal & A. R. Co. v. South Carolina (U. S.) 60 Fed. 552, 553. It is in the nature of defense, and it is obtained by way of affirmative relief, which is in avoidance of that sought by the original bill, and, like all new and distinct facts, must be proved.—Richardson v. Lightcap, 52 Miss. 508, 516. In its nature it is nothing more than an answer to the original bill, except that, inasmuch as it shows ground for a relief not prayed for in the original bill, it must itself annex to the answer a prayer for the relief which it seeks to obtain. Meissner v. Buek (U. S.) 28 Fed. 161, 162. It is considered and used as a matter of defense, and may answer the purpose of a plea puls darrein continuance.

where the matter of the defense arises after answer. Neal v. Foster (U. S.) 34 Fed. 496, 498. It is nothing more than an addition to the answer. It makes a part of the pleading which states the defense; the answer being the other part. Canant v. Map-pin, 20 Ga. 730, 731. It is a pleading in equity, which in its very nature is a mode of defense. A cross-bill, in seeking a discovery and making no defense which was not equally available by answer, is not sustainable. McDaniel v. Callan, 75 Ala. 327, 331 (citing Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 387, 393). It "is a bill brought by a defendant against a complainant or other parties in a former bill touching the matters in question in that bill, and it should be so formed that both causes may be heard together and one decree cover both." McDougald v. Dougherty, 14 Ga. 674, 679.

The cross-bill and original bill are distinct suits, which proceed side by side; the hearing of one being delayed until the hearing of the other. So a decree on a cross-bill is a final decree, that disposes of the whole case of such defendant and puts him out of court, and is such a final decree that an appeal therefrom will lie. Nichol v. Dunn, 25 Ark. 129, 131. To the contrary, see Ex parte South & North Alabama R. Co., 95 U. S. 221, 225, 24 L. Ed. 355.

New matters and parties.

A cross-bill under the chancery practice can be sustained only on matter growing out of the original bill. 2 Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Prac. 1548n. A cross-bill is filed touching matters in the original bill. Jewett Car Co. v. Kirkpatrick Const. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 625; West Virginia Oil & Oil Land Co. v. Vinal, 14 W. Va. 637, 677-679; Summers v. Hutson, 48 Ind. 228, 233 (citing Frear v. Bryan, 12 Ind. 343); Galatian v. Erwin (N. Y.) Hopk. Ch. 48, 58; Cunningham v. Erwin, Id. It should not introduce new and distinct matter not embraced therein. The province and only legitimate use of a cross-bill is to aid in the defense of the original suit, and the matters of it cannot be more extensive than the defense to the original bill. Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70, 75.

A cross-bill is a mode of defense. The original bill and the cross-bill are but one cause. It must be confined to the subject-matter of the original bill, and cannot introduce new and distinct matter not embraced in the original suit. Thruston v. Big Stone Gap Imp. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 484, 485; Ayers v. Chicago, 101 U. S. 184, 187, 25 L. Ed. 838; Weathersbee v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 523, 524; Comfort v. McTeer, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 652, 662.

Such cross-bill may set up new matter arising subsequently, but still it must constitute part of the same defense, or relate to the same subject-matter in such a way as to be a defense to the original suit. Ledwith v. City of Jacksonville, 13 South. 454, 458, 32 Fla. 1.

It should not introduce new and distinct matters not embraced in the original bill, as they cannot properly be examined in that suit, but constitute the subject-matter of an original independent suit. Ayres v. Carver, 59 U. S. (17 How.) 591, 595, 15 L. Ed. 179; Hill v. Frink, 40 Pac. 128, 129, 11 Wash. 562.

A cross-bill is brought either to aid in a defense of an original suit or to obtain a complete determination of the controversies between the original complainant and the cross-complainant over the subject-matter of the original bill. If its purpose is different from this, it is not a cross-bill, although it may have a connection with the general subject of the original bill. It may not interpose new controversies between codefendants to the original bill, the decision of which is unnecessary to a complete determination of the controversies between the complainant and the defendants over the subject-matter of the original bill. If it does so, it becomes an original bill. Stuart v. Hayden (U. S.) 72 Fed. 402, 410, 18 C. C. A. 618. If new facts are introduced by it, they must be so closely connected with the cause of action set up in the original bill as to render the cross-suit a mere auxiliary of the original suit. It must not be the means of instituting a distinct suit in relation to other matters. Harrison v. Harrison, 19 Atl. 126, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 75 (citing Kirkpatrick v. Corning, 39 N. J. Eq. [12 Stew.] 136, affirmed on appeal 40 N. J. Eq. [13 Stew.] 343; Krueger v. Ferry, 41 N. J. Eq. [14 Stew.] 432, 5 Atl. 452, affirmed on appeal Ferry v. Krueger, 43 N. J. Eq. [16 Stew.] 295, 14 Atl. 811). See, also, Springfield Milling Co. v. Barnard & Leas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 261, 263, 26 C. C. A. 389.

It is not the office of a cross-bill to bring new parties before the court, and matters not germane to the subject-matter of the original bill cannot be set up in it. Perea v. Harrison, 41 Pac. 529, 530, 7 N. M. 666.

A cross-bill for relief must be strictly confined to the matters which are involved in the original bill, and is filed to enable the defendant in the original bill to fully avail himself of some defense by making his redress complete through a granting of affirmative relief, which could not be done under the original bill and answer; and thus, where the defendants' cross-bill shows that a matter in the original bill involves a new party, such new party may be brought in. Griffin v. Griffin, 70 N. W. 423, 424, 112 Mich. 87.

It is clear that none but a party to the original bill can be made a party to a crossbill. Oswald v. Givens (S. C.) Rich. Eq. Cas. 328, 351.

New parties cannot be introduced into a cause by a cross-bill. If the plaintiff desires to make them new parties, he amends his bill and makes them. Shields v. Barrow, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 130, 145, 15 L. Ed. 158. "Any defendant in a chancery suit may make his answer a cross-bill against the complainant, his codefendant or defendants, or all of them, and may introduce any new matter therein material to his defense, and may require the same to be answered, and in the same manner may require of his complainant, or any of the defendants, a discovery of any matter material to his defense; and he shall have process thereon against the defendants to such cross-bill, and the like proceedings therein as in other bills or cross-bills. Code 1871, § 1030. Bishop v. Miller, 48 Miss. 364, 369, 371.

A cross-bill may be filed only by a party to the suit, and may not introduce new matter or new parties. Thruston v. Big Stone Gap Imp. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 484, 485.

A cross-bill may be brought by a defendant against the plaintiff in the same suit, or against the other defendants, or against both, but it must be touching the matters in question in the bill. Cross v. De Valle, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 5, 14, 17 L. Ed. 515; Neal v. Foster (U. S.) 34 Fed. 496, 498; Ledwith v. City of Jacksonville, 13 South. 454, 32 Fla. 1; Kemp v. Mitchell, 36 Ind. 249, 256; Kopper v. Dyer, 9 Atl. 4, 10, 59 Vt. 477, 59 Am. Rep. 742; McMullen v. Eagan, 21 W. Va. 233, 247.

There is a well-defined distinction between a cross-bill merely defensive in character and one seeking affirmative relief; for example, the dismissal of an original bill carries with it a cross-bill of the former character, but not of the latter. Price v. Stratton (Fla.) 33 South. 644, 645.

CROSS-COMPLAINT.

See "Cross-Petition."

Complaint distinguished, see "Complaint."

Counterclaim distinguished, see "Counterclaim."

A cross-complaint is in the nature of an original action. When the defendant files a cross-complaint and seeks affirmative relief, he becomes the plaintiff and the plaintiff in the original action becomes the defendant in the cross-complaint. Northwestern & P. Hypotheek Bank v. Ridpath, 70 Pac. 139, 143, 29 Wash. 687.

"A cross-complaint is a pleading by defendant to an action which contains a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the plaintiff in reference to the transaction upon which the original transaction is founded, or affecting property to which the original transaction relates." Harrison v. McCormick, 11 Pac. 456, 457, 69 Cal. 616.

What is now very commonly denominated a "cross complaint," is practically synonymous with a cross-bill in chancery practice, and is, under our present Code, technically a counterclaim. Douthitt v. Smith, 69 Ind. 463. Liberal as our decisions have been in giving to the counterclaim a comprehensive force and effect, they have firmly held to the cardinal principle that there must be some legal or equitable connection between the matters pleaded as a counterclaim and the matters alleged in the original complaint. Shelly v. Vanarsdoll, 23 Ind. 543. The term "counterclaim" is used to denote the matters constituting the ground of defense, as well as the pleading in which it is stated, and the term "cross-complaint" is very frequently used to designate the pleading, although it has been said that a "counterclaim" is the proper title of the pleading. Whatever term may be used to designate the pleading, whether "cross-complaint" or "counterclaim," it is only proper where it pleads a matter connected with the original subject of the action, which entitles the defendant to affirmative relief or mitigates the recovery. A matter constituting an entirely distinct cause of action, not connected with the matters stated in the complaint, cannot be pleaded as a counterclaim. Standley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 95 Ind. 254, 261, 262, 263.

CROSS-DEMAND.

A "cross-demand" is a statement of any new matter constituting any cause of action in favor of defendant, or all the defendants, if more than one, against the plaintiff, or all the plaintiffs, if more than one, and which the defendant or defendants might have brought when the suit was commenced, or which was then held, whether matured or not, if matured when pleaded. Rev. St. § 2891. Musselman v. Gallagher, 32 Iowa, 383, 389.

CROSS-EXAMINATION.

The right of "cross-examination" is that of treating the witness as the witness of the adverse party and of examining him by leading questions. Precisely what subjects may be included in cross-examination seems to be a matter of some doubt. In England, when a competent witness is called and sworn, the other party will ordinarily and in strictness be entitled to cross-examination, though the party calling him does not choose to examine him in chief, unless he was sworn by mistake, or unless, an immaterial question having been put to him, his further examination in chief has been stopped by the judge. It is held by the Supreme Court of the United States that a party has no right to cross-examine any witness, except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination, and that, if he wishes to examine him in regard to other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him as such in the subsequent progress of the cause. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 448, 10 L. Ed. 535; Commonwealth v. Eastman, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 189, 217, 48 Am. Dec. 596. This rule is undoubtedly sustained by the weight of American authority. 8 Enc. Pl. & Prac. pp. 101, 102; Hobart v. Young, 12 L. R. A. 693, and notes, 21 Atl. 612, 63 Vt. 363. In some of the states, as in New York, for instance, the scope of the cross-examination is left to the discretion of the trial judge, although the decisions of that state favor the American rule. "Under this doctrine, if the cross-examination extends beyond the grounds covered in the direct examination, the witness becomes the witness of the party cross-examining. The testimony brought out binds him as though he had called the witness himself, and in bringing it out he is confined to the methods of the direct examination." McKelvey, Ev. § 246. One of the great difficulties in the practical application of this rule is in determining when a fact sought to be elicited in cross-examination is germane to the examination in chief. "According to the English rule, when a party produces a witness who is sworn and examined, the opposite party is not confined on his cross-examination to the matters upon which the witness was examined in chief. He may cross-examine him upon every issue in the case." 8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 112; Berwick, Mayor, etc., v. Murray, 19 L. J. Ch. 281. "This rule has been adopted in a number of American jurisdictions, and the fact that the witness would be incompetent to testify, were he called by the cross-examining party, does not affect the rule. The party who would have the right to make such objection effectually waives it by calling the witness and examining him upon a single point, and the other party is then at liberty to cross-examine him generally." 8 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 102. The English rule seems to prevail in Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, South Carolina, Vermont, and perhaps other jurisdictions. In Tennessee a defendant may cross-examine plaintiff's witness as to any matter in issue, though no inquiry was made in respect thereto on the direct examination. Sands v. Southern Ry. Co., 64 S. W. 478, 479, 108 Tenn. 1. "Greenleaf says it is a well-settled rule that a witness cannot be cross-examined as to any fact which is collateral and irrelevant to the issue, merely for the purpose of contradicting him by other evidence if he should deny it." Seller v. Jenkins, 97 Ind. 430, 438.

Cross-examination is not confined to the mere categorical review of the matters stated in the direct examination. It is a proper effort to test the truth of that evidence. State v. Miller, 56 S. W. 907, 910, 156 Mo. 76.

The examination of a witness by the party producing him is denominated the "direct examination"; the examination of the same witness upon the same matter, by the adverse party, the "cross-examination." The direct examination must be completed before the cross-examination begins, unless the court otherwise direct. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1801, § 846.

CROSS-PETITION.

A cross-petition, under Civ. Code, § 96, subd. 3, is the commencement of an action by defendant against a codefendant or a person who is not a party to the action, or both, or by a plaintiff against a coplaintiff, or a person who is not a party to the action, or both. By said section a defendant may have a cross-action against a common defendant alone, or a third person may be joined with the defendant, or against a third person alone, but he cannot have a cross-action against the plaintiff alone or jointly with a third person. Grimes v. Grimes, 88 Ky. 20, 22, 9 S. W. 840, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 658, 659.

Newman in his Pleading and Practice says: "A counterclaim, however, under the Code, is but another name for a cross-petition, and may be so styled without impropriety, especially in an action prosecuted by equitable proceedings." Pages 610-618. And see authorities cited in support of the text. This was written with reference to the old Code, which was somewhat different from the new Code in regard to the characterization of pleadings in the caption, but the same with reference to the substance of the pleadings. Walker v. Symser's Ex'rs, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 662, 670, 80 Ky. 620.

CROSS-TIE.

A cross-tie is defined to be a sleeper connecting and supporting the parallel rails of a railroad: Howser v. Cumberland & P. R. Co., 30 Atl. 906, 908, 80 Md. 146, 27 L. R. A. 154, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332 (citing Stand. Dict. 444).

CROSS-WALK.

"A cross-walk lies in the street and is a part of it, and when it is out of repair the person or corporation, bound to repair the street is bound to repair the cross-walk, or, what is the same thing, the part of the street on which it lies must be made so that teams and persons may pass over it in safety." Hines v. City of Lockport (N. Y.) 60 Baro. 378, 381.

Cross-walks extend for the whole distance between the extended boundary lines of intersecting streets, where they meet the sidewalks. O'Neill v. City of Detroit, 15 N. W. 48, 49, 50 Mich. 133.

Cross-walks extend the entire distance across the street spanned by them. O'Neill v. Detroit, 50 Mich. 133, 15 N. W. 48. The fact that a township built a sluiceway under a cross-walk as originally constructed, using the boards of the walk as a covering for the sluice, did not deprive the walk of its distinctive character, under Sess. Laws 1887, § 3, providing that townships, villages, etc., shall keep in repair all public highways, cross-walks, etc. Frary v. Allen Tp., 52 N. W. 78, 79, 91 Mich. 669.

Sidewalks not included.

As used in Acts Mich. 1879, p. 223, No. 244, creating a liability against a city in favor of persons sustaining bodily injury on any of the highways, streets, bridges, cross-walks, and culverts, etc., cross-walks do not include sidewalks, though it may be a part of the sidewalk which crosses a street or an alley; the intention of the statute being to distinguish between those portions of the street which the city itself constructs and keeps in repair and the other portion, namely, sidewalks, which it compels property owners to build and keep in repair; rendering the city liable in one case and not in the other. Pequignot v. City of Detroit (U. S.) 16 Fed. 211, 212.

CROSSING.

See "Grade Crossings"; "Private Crossings"; "Public Crossing"; "Railroad Crossing"; "Road Crossing"; "Street Crossing"; "Wagon Crossing."

All crossings, see "All."

Crossings, within the meaning of the law requiring railroads to maintain crossings, include street crossings in cities and towns, as well as crossings of public roads and private ways. Western & A. R. Co. v. City of Atlanta, 74 Ga. 774, 778.

The statute prohibiting the crossing of a lake within three miles of a toll bridge applies to any person crossing the lake on the ice in winter. Cayuga Bridge Co. v. Stout (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 33.

Under the amendment to the act incorporating the Cayuga Bridge Company, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person to cross a lake within three miles of the bridge without paying toll, embarking upon one side of the lake six miles from the bridge, and crossing in such a direction as to leave the lake within sixty rods of the bridge on the other side, is not such a crossing within the three miles as is contemplated by the act. Sprague v. Birdsall (N. Y.) 2 Cow. 419.

As crossing on same level.

A statute authorizing a railroad in course of construction to construct crossings where it intercepted other lines meant one where the original use as exercised at the point of crossing might be continued in concurrence and co-operation with the new use, and would not permit the severing of the old roadbeds and rails, or the division of its route by a cut or fill, which can only be passed by raising or lowering its grade. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co. v. National Docks & N. J. J. Connecting Ry. Co., 18 Atl. 574, 579, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 90.

"Crossings," as used in a statute requiring a railroad to construct "farm crossings" on lands traversed by it, includes a passage under the track as well as over it, and hence it is the duty of the company to construct a crossing under the tracks, when they traverse lands on an embankment elevated at a considerable distance above the grade. Wheeler v. Rochester & S. Ry. Co. (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 227, 232.

"Farm crossings," as used in the charter of the St. Paul & Sioux City Railway Company (Sp. Laws 1864, c. 1, subc. 2, § 2), providing that the company shall construct and maintain all proper and necessary farm crossings over the line of the road, means crossings from one side to the other of the railroad track, whether by passing over it or under it. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Murphy, 19 Minn. 500, 522 (Gil. 433, 452).

Approaches included.

The term "crossing," as used in a statute requiring railroads to make and maintain safe crossings where they intersect a public highway, includes not only the actual traveled railroad across the highway, but the necessary embankment and approaches to the railway. The object of the law is to secure the public from the inconvenience and expense resulting from the destruction of highways when they are crossed by railroads. Moberly v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 17 Mo. App. 518, 519.

The word "crossing," as applied to the intersection of a common highway and a railroad, and as used in the statutes relating to such crossings, means the entire structure, including the approaches, though a part of such structure may be outside the lines of the railroad's lands, or the place where the roads actually cross each other. Town of Roxbury v. Central Vermont R. Co., 14 Atl. 92, 101, 60 Vt. 121.

Gen. St. §§ 3489, 3491, providing that, on petition of any railroad company and notice to the owners of "land adjoining the crossing," the railroad commissioners may make alterations in the location of a highway or a railroad at the crossing of the two, to render the crossing less dangerous, should be construed to include land adjoining the approaches to the crossing, which are or may be altered by the order of the railroad commissioners. Cullen v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 33 Atl. 910, 912, 66 Conn. 211.

In reference to vessels.

"Crossing," as used in Act March 3, 1885, providing rules and regulations to be used by vessels crossing or overtaking each other for preventing collisions at sea, should be construed to include vessels which were on courses converging by at least three points. "Their difference in speed being not more than from 1.2 to 1.5 knots, and each bearing from two to three points forward of the other's beam, they were crossing, and not overtaking, vessels. A vessel may be crossing another's course, and at the same time overtaking her in a certain sense, or she may be overtaking another in a general or popular sense, or in reference to certain aspects, and clearly not be an overtaking vessel in the sense of the rules of navigation. A faster sailing vessel, sailing a racing voyage across the Atlantic and starting after her rival, might in a popular sense be said to overtake and pass the other whenever she got nearer to her destined port, though at no time sailing within sight of the other. So two vessels beating up stream against a head wind might be so navigated as to be always sailing on opposite tacks. The hinder vessel, if all the time gaining on the other, would in one sense be an overtaking vessel—that is, overtaking in reference to their general progress; but she could not be an overtaking vessel in the sense of the rules of navigation, so long as the two were running on opposite tacks. The vessels in that case would be crossing vessels, and the crossing rule would apply, though the one to leeward was gaining on the other. When beating and on the same tack, the faster vessel, if behind, would be overtaking in the sense of the rules, and the overtaking rule would apply." The Aurania and The Republic (U. S.) 29 Fed. 98, 104.

CRUCIBLE.

A crucible is a chemist's melting pot, made of earth. State v. Bowman, 6 Vt. 594, 596.

CRUDE.

The word "crude" is defined as "in its natural state; not cooked or prepared by fire or heat; undressed; not altered, refined, or prepared for use by any artificial process; raw." Recknagel v. Murphy, 102 U. S. 197, 198 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Crude," as applied to sawlogs, means their natural state or condition after having been severed from the remainder of the trunk and other portions of the tree. It means that they have not been polished, dressed, altered, refined, or prepared for use by artificial process. Buckl v. McKinnon, 20 South. 540, 541, 37 Fla. 391.

CRUDE BULLION.

"Crude or base silver bullion," as the term is understood in Montana, is silver in bars mixed to a greater or less extent with base materials. Hope Min. Co. v. Kennon, 3 Mont. 35, 44.

CRUDE MINERAL.

"Crude mineral," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, Free List, par. 651, does not include so-called Mexican onyx, a mineral consisting chiefly of carbonate of lime and certain impurities, principally ferrous oxides, imparting to the material its beautiful and variegated colors, crystalline in structure, and belonging scientifically to the group of calcites, recognized by the leading dictionaries and encyclopedias as belonging to the general class of marble, used for the same general purposes in ornamental and interior decoration as marble, and being worked and finished by the same processes. Mexican Onyx & Trading Co. v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 732.

CRUEL.

In order that a homicide be committed in a cruel manner, there must be presence of the motive to inflict bodily or mental suffering, from the effect of which the injured person dies. Territory v. Fewel, 17 Pac. 569, 571, 4 N. M. (4 Johns.) 318 (quoting from Territory v. Pridemore, 13 Pac. 96, 4 N. M. [Johns.] 137, which held that an accidental homicide could not be said to be cruel).

"Cruelly," as used in a complaint under Pub. St. c. 207, § 53, for cruelly driving a horse when unfit for labor, alleging that defendant did cruelly drive, etc., exhausts the requirements of the statute with regard to the state of mind of the actor, and a further allegation that defendant knew the horse to be unfit for labor is unnecessary. Commonwealth v. Porter, 42 N. E. 97, 164 Mass. 576.

"Cruelly," as used in Code 1896, § 5093, providing for the punishment of any one cruelly killing any animal, is used to describe the manner of the killing, and limits prosecution for the offense to the taking of life by some cruel method, and does not authorize a prosecution merely for killing an animal. Horton v. State, 27 South. 463, 124 Ala. 80.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

See, also, "Unusual Punishment."

The phrase, as employed in the constitutional provision forbidding the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment, means such punishment as would amount to torture, or such as would shock the mind of every man possessed of common feeling, such, for instance, as drawing and quartering the culprit, burning him at the stake, cutting off his nose, ears, or limbs, starving him to death, or such as was inflicted by an act of Parliament as late as 22 Hen. VIII, authorizing one Rouse to be thrown into boiling water and boiled to death for the offense of poisoning the family of the bishop of Rochester. State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 310, 312. See, also, Miller v. State, 49 N. E. 894, 897, 149 Ind. 607, 40 L. R. A. 109; Hobbs v. State, 32 N. E. 1019, 1021, 133 Ind. 404, 18 L. R. A. 774; Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U. S. 130, 134, 25 L. Ed. 345 (citing Cooley Const. Lim. [4th Ed.] 408).

"Cruel and unusual punishment" means some cruel or degrading punishment not known to the common law, or a punishment so disproportioned to the offense as to shock the sense of the community. An act inflicting a greater punishment for an offense when committed in one part of the state than when committed in another is not void as inflicting a cruel and unusual punishment. In re Bayard (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 546, 549.

The provision in the Constitution prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment is, as a part of the Constitution of the Union, a restriction upon the government of the Union; and, as a part of any state Constitution, it is a restriction upon the government of the state which has established it. Barker v. People (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 686, 702, 15 Am. Dec. 322.

Whatever is greater than has ever been described or known or indicted must be cruel and unusual punishment. State v. Driver, 78 N. C. 423, 426.

Const. art. 6, § 23, in prohibiting the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments, meant those which are so excessive or so cruel as to meet the disapproval and condemnation of the conscience and reason of men generally. State v. Becker, 51 N. W. 1018, 1022, 3 S. D. 29.

Any punishment declared by statute for an offense which was punishable in the same way at the common law cannot be regarded as cruel or unusual in the constitutional sense. People v. Durston, 7 N. Y. Supp. 145, 150, 7 N. Y. Cr. R. 350 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. 329).

2 How. Ann. St. c. 304, authorizing the imprisonment of a debtor who has assigned or disposed of, or is about to dispose of, his property with intent to defraud his creditors, is not in conflict with Const. art. 6, § 31, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments, as the act provides for the debtor's release on payment of the debt, or giving security for its payment, or security that he will apply for an assignment of all his property. Dummer v. Nungesser, 65 N. W. 564, 566, 107 Mich. 481.

Death.

On a conviction under Comp. Laws 1897, § 1151, inflicting the death penalty for assault upon a train with intent to commit robbery or other felony, it was contended that the infliction of the death penalty was a cruel and unusual punishment, within the eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding such punishments, and it is said that much difficulty has been expressed by courts and text writers in attempting to define the scope of this constitutional provision. In People v. Morris, 80 Mich. 634, 638, 45 N. W. 591, 592, 8 L. R. A. 685, 686, it is said: "The difficulty in determining what is meant by cruel and unusual punishment, as used in our Constitution, is apparent. Counsel for defendants claim that, as properly understood, it means, as used in this connection, punishment out of proportion to the offense. If by this is meant the degree of punishment, we do not think the contention is correct. When, in England, concessions against cruel and unusual punishments were first wrested from the crown, slight offenses were visited with the most extreme punishment, and no protest was made against it." In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519, it is said punishments are cruel when they involve torture or lingering death. But the punishment of death is not cruel, within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution. It implies there something inhuman and barbarous, something more than the mere extinguishment of human life, and hence such provision of the Compiled Laws was not unconstitutional. Territory v. Ketchum, 65 Pac. 169, 170, 10 N. M. 718, 55 L. R. A. 90.

Death by electricity.

Cr. Code, § 505, directing the infliction of the death penalty by electricity, prescribed no new and unusual punishment, in the sense of the constitutional inhibition against the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. It only directs a new method of inflicting the usual punishment for a capital crime. People v. Durston, 24 N. E. 6, 7, 119 N. Y. 569, 7 L. R. A. 715, 16 Am. St. Rep. 859.

Disproportionate punishment.

A punishment for a crime done in a state prison is not cruel and unusual, where it is the same as if the crime had been committed elsewhere. Pub. Acts 1893, No. 118, §§ 64, 65. People v. Huntley, 71 N. W. 178, 181, 112 Mich. 569.

Ordinarily the term "cruel and unusual" implies something inhuman and barbarous in the nature of the punishment. But it is possible that imprisonment in the state prison for a long term of years might be so disproportionate to an offense as to constitute a cruel and unusual punishment. However that may be, it cannot be held that the punishment is cruel and unusual where a statute provides that one who has been convicted in this state of a felony committed here since it went into effect, or who twice before in this state, or another state, or both, has been sentenced and committed to prison for terms of not less than 3 years each, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for 25 years. St. 1887, c. 435, providing that whoever has twice been convicted of crime and committed to prison for terms of not less than 3 years each, shall, on conviction for a felony committed after the passage of the act, be deemed an habitual criminal, and shall be punished by imprisonment for 25 years, does not impose a cruel and unusual punishment. McDonald v. Commonwealth, 53 N. E. 874, 875, 173 Mass. 322, 73 Am. St. Rep. 293.

Upon the Legislature alone is conferred the power to fix a minimum and maximum to the punishment for all crimes. It is true that cases might arise where the punishment imposed by an act is so cruel and unusual that the courts would interfere and protect the rights of the party, but in the present case the penalties fixed by the act (Pub. Acts 1889, No. 207, providing as a punishment for the first offense of selling liquors unlawfully a fine of not less than $50 or more than $200, and imprisonment in the county jail for not less than 20 days or more than six months, and for every subsequent offense a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500, and imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 6 months or more than 2 years) are such as the Legislature had the power to impose, and the act is not in conflict with Const. art. 6, § 31, as imposing excessive fines and unusual and cruel punishment. People v. Whitney, 63 N. W. 765, 766, 105 Mich. 622.

"The difficulty in determining what is meant by 'cruel and unusual punishments,' as used in our Constitution, is apparent. Counsel for defendant claims that, as properly understood, it means, when used in this connection, punishment out of proportion to the offense. If by this is meant the degree of punishment, I do not think the contention correct. When, in England, concessions against cruel and unusual punishments were first wrested from the crown, slight offenses were visited with the most extreme punishment, and no protest was made against it. But our concern is to ascertain how this language is to be understood in the constitutional sense. * * * Imprisonment for larceny is, and always has been, in this country and in all civilized countries, one of the methods of punishment. There may be circumstances surrounding the commission of larceny where 15 years would not be considered too severe a punishment. When punishment is commensurate with the depravity of the criminal, as shown in the commission of the act, justice is done. Under most of our criminal laws, cases may arise where the punishment inflicted might be considered cruel, but that does not condemn the law." How. Ann. St. § 9180, punishing horse stealing by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than fifteen years, unless for the first offense, when the court may sentence to two years in the House of Correction, is not unconstitutional, as imposing a cruel and unusual punishment, though the punishment under other statutes for larceny of property of the same value would be less. People v. Morris, 45 N. W. 591, 592, 80 Mich. 638, 8 L. R. A. 685.

The term "cruel and unusual punishment," within the meaning of a constitutional provision prohibiting such punishment, does not include a penitentiary sentence of two years for selling a paper devoted mainly to scandals, etc. State v. Van Wye, 37 S. W. 938, 136 Mo. 227, 58 Am. St. Rep. 627.

The term "cruel and unusual punishment," in the constitutional provision prohibiting such punishment, does not include the imposition of a fine of $50 and a sentence of three months at hard labor in the House of Correction for selling intoxicating liquors contrary to law. Pervear v. Commonwealth, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 475, 480, 18 L. Ed. 608.

Where a husband cruelly whipped his wife without excuse, and inflicted a permanent injury upon her, and was sentenced to imprisonment for two years, it was not cruel or unusual. State v. Pettie, 80 N. C. 367, 368, 30 Am. Rep. 88.

Flogging.

Flogging is not cruel and unusual punishment, within the meaning of Act March 3, 1835, prohibiting cruel and unusual treatment of seamen. On the contrary, it was at the time of the passage of the act the then most usual and known to, and sanctioned by, the law. United States v. Collins (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 545.

"Cruel and unusual punishment," should not be read as "cruel or unusual punishment"; but, to be within the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment it must be, not only cruel, but also unusual, so that, though the punishment of offenses by stripes is certainly odious, it is not unusual, and hence, is not cruel and unusual punishment. Commonwealth v. Wyatt (Va.) 6 Rand. 694, 701.

Forfeiture.

It would seem that a law providing that those who did not make certain improvements on lands held by them should forfeit such lands, unless they should agree to be bound by statutes held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, is in violation of the provision of the Constitution, providing that excessive fines shall not be imposed nor cruel punishments inflicted. This appears more plainly when it is considered that the Constitution forbids the forfeiting of the estates of even attainted traitors and felons, except during life. Gaines v. Buford, 81 Ky (1 Dana) 481, 492.

Under the liquor law of June 28, 1889, providing that those having furnished bond and paid taxes in compliance therewith shall, upon any violation of the law, in addition to the penalties for such violation, forfeit their tax paid, which may be as high as $800, and be unable to continue business or become surety on a bond under the act for one year, and providing, further, that druggists, upon failure to keep a public record of purchasers and purposes of purchase in any single instance, shall be subject to a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500, and imprisonment for not less than ninety days or more than one year, and for a second offense a disability to sell liquor for any purpose for five years, the penalties, which are imperative, and not discretionary, must necessarily break up business, and are not measured by any standard of proportion or amount. The only measure of restraint is the value of the business broken up, and this may reach tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is safe to say that throughout the United States any fine or forfeiture is unusual which has not some limitation of value, and any punishment is unusual which forfeits any civil rights. Dueling and conviction on an impeachment are the only two things in most states which involve civil incapacities of a public nature, and both of these are provided for by the Constitution. Disabilities to transact business are almost, or quite, unheard of in this country. The act is in violation of the constitutional prohibition against excessive fines and unusual punishments. People v. Haug, 37 N. W. 21, 26, 28, 68 Mich. 549.

Imprisonment at hard labor.

The term "cruel and unusual punishment," in the constitutional provision prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment, does not characterize imprisonment at hard labor, though such punishment may be severe. State v. Hogan, 58 N. E. 572, 575, 63 Ohio St. 202, 52 L. R. A. 863, 81 Am. St. Rep. 628.

Loss of suffrage.

Const. 1850, art. 13, § 17, prohibiting cruel punishments, does not include the disqualification from exercising the right of suffrage, and from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit, as a punishment for setting up or conducting a game of cards whereby money or other thing may be lost or won. Harper v. Commonwealth, 19 S. W. 737, 93 Ky. 290.

CRUEL NEGLECT.

The mere neglect of a husband, with no circumstances of aggravation, to provide maintenance for his wife and children for 15 years, during which she has supported the children from her own earnings, is not such gross or wanton or cruel neglect as will sustain a libel for divorce in her behalf, under Gen. St. c. 107, § 9, making gross or wanton or cruel neglect a ground for divorce. Peabody v. Peabody, 104 Mass. 195, 197.

CRUEL WEAPON.

A pistol is not a cruel weapon, within Rev. St. § 3462, relating to punishment for manslaughter in the heat of passion by a weapon, or any means, neither cruel nor unusual. If a pistol is a cruel weapon, then any weapon that is likely to take life or commonly used to take life is a cruel one, and all weapons are cruel. It must be some other than such a common weapon that can be distinguished as cruel. Schlecht v. State, 75 Wis. 486, 488, 44 N. W. 509.

CRUELLY BEAT.

"Wantonly and cruelly beat," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal for any person to wantonly or cruelly beat, torture, kill, or maim any horse or other domestic animal, does not import that the beating is serious enough to kill the animal, although the crime is aggravated if such result follows. Commonwealth v. Miller (Pa.) 3 Lanc. Law Rev. 175.

Evidence that the defendant, with a claphoard in his hand, followed a mule into a barn, and beat the mule so that the witness across the road could hear it, is sufficient to justify an inference by the jury that the defendant cruelly beat the mule. State v. Gould, 26 W. Va. 258, 264.
